These two fundamental cultural differences mean that any Indian convert to Christianity must deeply sacrifice cultural values and habits of behavior that affect the well-being of the whole of a community.

Finally, Indian peoples universally lack a word for "god*," just as most tribes lack a word for "war." These have been provided by missionaries and US government officials over the years of colonial intervention in Indian affairs. Our understanding of the world, as Apache scholar Viola Cordova has argued, is radically different from European understandings of God and is complex to the point of having evaded successful interpretation by Eurocolonial scholars to this day. At this point, comparisons should be made not with Christianity but between Native understandings and the explanations of modern theoretical astrophysicists.

GEORGE E. "TINK" TINKER

Nativity (from Lat for "birth"), festival of Jesus* birth, observed in Western churches on Christmas*, December 25, and in Eastern churches culminating on January 6 as a part of the Theophany* (Epiphany*) celebration. The term is also used for the birthdays of John* the Baptist (June 24) and Mary* (September 8).

Natural Law, moral norms shared by Christians and others. Paul assumes that all people have an awareness of God's Law* through conscience, so that it is possible for them to do "by nature" what God also commands in the Law (Rom 2:14-16).

How is this to be understood? Emphasis may be placed on an intuitive sense of good and evil, or on rational deduction from the first principles of practical reason*, or on natural human tendencies. Thomas Aquinas* combined these: natural law consists in precepts of practical reason formulated after careful inquiry into natural inclinations and needs; thus life, reproduction, care of the young, life in society, and religion ought to be respected in private actions and in the laws of states.

A rival theory, building on the feudal* notion that rights are based on a mutual oath*, was that rights are not "natural" but are based on social customs, oaths and contracts, or divine revelation. In the history of colonization*, conquering powers often made the claim that people may enslave themselves freely. This perspective was opposed by Bartolomé de las* Casas, who argued that rights have a status independent of personal choice. Eventually this was to develop into the theory of "inalienable rights." The US Declaration of Independence and the Declaration of the Rights of Man brought theories of inalienable natural rights into public law. The Universal Declaration of Human* Rights, formulated by the United Nations (1948, 1949), has become part of international law.

EUGENE TESELLE

Natural Theology, without appeal to revelation*, endeavors to show that the propositions that God exists, God more probably exists than not, God is more reasonably believed to exist than not, or the like, are true. This contrasts with natural atheology, which tries to prove the contradictory, or some logical contrary, of these propositions, and with a defense, which replies to a natural atheology argument. Coming with various strictures – among them deductive, probabilistic, abductive (to the best explanation), and cumulative – it may use perceptual, introspective, metaphysical, moral, historical, aesthetic, or epistemological premises. Pascal's wager that belief in God is more rational than unbelief, since a believer may gain infinite benefit and risks minor loss, whereas the unbeliever may gain minor benefit and risks infinite loss, is not an argument that God exists, but for its being a better gamble to believe that God exists than not to believe. It is not an instance of natural theology.

The "moral argument" refers to a variety of arguments to the effect that there being true moral propositions entails the existence of God, or that our obligation to obey such laws arises only from God commanding us to do so, or that the existence of things possessing value can be explained, or is best explained, only by reference to God.

The "ontological argument" endeavors to show that "God does not exist" is not possibly true, since a proper understanding of the concept of God includes necessary existence or existence in all possible worlds.

The "cosmological argument" infers from there being things that might not have existed, whose existence possibly has an explanation, to there being something that cannot not exist that has caused them. Stronger versions make no claims regarding infinite regress and stress the necessity of there being an explanation for there being things that might not have existed.

The "teleological argument" rests on the idea that the best explanation of the natural order that makes science and everyday life possible is the world being created and sustained by a mind with sufficient power. A specific form begins with the enormous improbability of life having arisen from what the initial physical conditions are believed to be, concluding that it happened only because God brought it about. This idea is challenged by the notion of an infinity of "parallel universes." Religious experience (someone at least seeming to experience God) is appealed to as evidence that God exists, or as best explained by theism*.

KEITH E. YANDELL

Nature (Gk physis; Lat natura), that which makes things, and the world as a whole, act as they do. The earliest Greek philosophers suggested that this factor is matter in one or another mode (water, fire); Plato, that it is transcendent forms in the ideal realm; Aristotle, that it is the form in each individual thing. Theology, while acknowledging that natural things are self-forming and self-sustaining (in contrast to miracles*), sees matter and form as created and sustained by God*. Ancient, medieval, and modern sciences have increasingly traced the lawlike regularity of natural processes. Process* theology sees God as both source and sustainer of these regularities.

Nature and Grace. In Christian life, nature is associated with human capabilities, and grace* with divine influence beyond those capabilities. While Protestants tend to discuss "sin* and grace," Catholic theologians focus on "nature and grace," considering the prior question of the role of grace apart from sin. Hence Thomas Aquinas* asserts that grace presupposes and perfects human nature, and acknowledges human achievements in work, culture, science and technology, and politics; yet the human spirit is satisfied only through God's self-communication in grace, echoing Augustine's opening statement in his Confessions: "You have made us for yourself, and our hearts are restless until they rest in you."

Naude, Beyers, minister of the Dutch Reformed Church and member of the Broederbond. After the Cottesloe Consultation (1960), he was forced to leave his church and founded the Christian Institute of Southern Africa (1963). The Christian Institute promulgated a gospel of justice and equality of races, suffered persecution from the government as a result, and was banned (1977). Naude was placed under a five-year house arrest. See also SOUTH AFRICA.

MOKGETHI MOTLHABI

Nave, main portion of many churches (excluding the chancel*) where the laity worship.

Nazarene. Jesus is called "the Nazarene" in the Gospels and Acts; early Christians are called "Nazarenes" by Jewish leaders (Acts 24:5). "Nazarene" continued to be a Jewish designation (Notzerim); it was used by other Christians for Jewish-Christian groups in Syria. Today it is a self-designation for Christians, especially members of the Church of the Nazarene.

Nazarene, Church of the, arose out of the 19th-c. Holiness* Movement in North America. Urban mission on the East and West Coasts (late 19th c.) led to the organizing of two small regional church bodies: the Church of the Nazarene (in the West) and the Association of Pentecostal Churches of America (in the East). The two groups merged (1907) as the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene. The Holiness Church of Christ, located in the south central USA and committed to evangelism among the mostly rural poor, joined with the other two (1908), followed in 1915 by the Pentecostal Mission in Nashville, Tennessee, and the Pentecostal Church of Scotland in Glasgow. All were committed to evangelism in the USA; to the education of young people for Christian faith, life, and service; and to mission around the world. In 1919 the denomination dropped the term "Pentecostal" from its name.

Having arisen out of the Holiness Movement, the Church of the Nazarene traces its theological heritage to John Wesley*. Theologically, that entails the following commitments:

1. To the primary role and authority of Scripture* in all things pertaining to Christian belief and practice – locating the denomination within Protestantism*. The authority of Scripture lies most fundamentally in its disclosures concerning how humankind may come to know and experience God's redeeming work.
2. To Arminianism*, the theological understanding of the 17th-c. Dutch Reformed* theologian Jacobus (James) Arminius*.
3. Most important, to the theological view that humans may experience sanctification* in the present world, to the extent that they know their inner lives to be nothing but undivided love* for God and for others. After conversion, this is a second work of grace called "entire sanctification*."

With more than 1.5 million members in 150 countries (in 2005), the Church of the Nazarene is governed by the quadrennial General Assembly, consisting of delegates from each district that organizes the congregations in a given area. In between sessions of the General Assembly, the affairs of the denomination are supervised by six general superintendents and by a general board, which consists of elected ministerial and lay members.

The Church's relatively successful missionary outreach raises two challenging questions: (1) How can a view of Christian belief and life that arose in a North Atlantic cultural setting be translated into the varied cultural contexts of the world? (2) How can the Church of the Nazarene remain a single, international denomination by minimizing or avoiding domination by its North American "mother church"?

HAL CAUTHRON

Nazarenes, Gospel of the, medieval name for excerpts from a Jewish-Christian gospel, most of them found in Jerome*, some in the Latin version of Origen's* commentary on Matthew and in Eusebius* (although the attributions are often disputed).

The name alludes to Nazareth, Jesus' hometown. Based mainly on Matthew and perhaps on free-floating traditions, the Gospel of the Nazarenes could have been composed in the Jordan area or Syria* (late 2nd c. or, according to Lührmann, the 4th c.).

The narrative of the rich man (Matt 19:16–24) in the Gospel of the Nazarenes contains the comprehensive formula uttered by Jesus: "Man, fulfill the law and the prophets." Appended is the injunction to love "your brothers, Abraham's sons," alluding to the Gospel's background in a Jewish-Christian community. The "daily bread" in the "Our Father" is understood to be "our bread of tomorrow," perhaps rightly so.

The baptism* of Jesus creates some problems, as usual: Is it conceivable that Jesus may have sinned, even in ignorance? In a moralizing version of the parable of the talents, the Lord punishes not the servant who had hidden the money but another who had "spent it on harlots and flute-girls." HANS-JOSEF KLAUCK

Nazism and Christianity. See GERMAN CHRISTIANS; RACISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN WESTERN EUROPE.

Negative Theology. See APOPHATICISM.

Nehemiah. See EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, THE BOOKS OF.

Neighbor, "one who is near" (from Old English for "near dweller," a translation of Greek and Hebrew terms with similar connotations). Leviticus 19:18, "You shall love your neighbor as yourself," summarizes the Law in the NT (Matt 19:19, 22:39; Mark 12:31, 33; Luke 10:27; Rom 13:9; Gal 5:14; Jas 2:8). Inevitably the question arises, "Who is my neighbor?" In the OT, "neighbor" generally refers to a member of Israel, but also to people of neighboring countries (especially in Job and in exilic texts). Similarly, in the NT, "neighbor" usually designates a member of the church or of one's social community. But in Luke 10:29–37, Jesus reverses the question. In response to the lawyer's query "Who is my neighbor?" Jesus asks, Who "became a neighbor" to the wounded man (in the parable of the good Samaritan)? In this way, Jesus expanded the neighbor relation to involve universal love*. DANIEL PATTE

Nemesius of Emesa (late 4th c.), bishop of Emesa, author of On Human Nature, which makes much use of the Platonist* tradition in discussing the soul*. This work was used by John* of Damascus and, in Latin translation, by the Scholastics*.

Neo-orthodoxy, catchall term for the new approach to theology that emerged after World War I in Germany with "Crisis* theology" (Karl Barth*, Rudolf Bultmann*, Emil Brunner, Friedrich Gogarten, Paul Tillich*) and later in the USA (H. Richard and Reinhold Niebuhr*, Paul Lehmann, Edwin Lewis, Elmer Homrighausen), all liberals who challenged the optimism of liberal* theology and reemphasized the Reformation themes of sin* and justification*. In criticizing modern confidence in progress and emphasizing revelation* rather than natural* theology, they tended to overvalue the European Christian tradition as it had evolved since Constantine* and had benefited from colonialism*. But Barth and Reinhold Niebuhr associated themselves with secular rather than religious socialism, and Tillich paid increasing attention to non-Western religions.

Neoplatonism and Christianity. With Plotinus (204–69 CE), Platonism* took on a new level of both transcendence and complexity, and this had various consequences for its interaction with a soon-to-be triumphant Christianity. Plotinus himself had little direct influence on Christian thinking; the influence came primarily through his pupil Porphyry* (232–c305). The irony is that Porphyry was a noted opponent of Christianity, such that his work Against the Christians was condemned to be burned by imperial decree (448). However, his distinctive metaphysical position, identifying the first principle with the "Father" of the intellectual triad (Being, Life, and Intellect), provided a welcome stimulus to the Cappadocians* Gregory* of Nazianzus and Gregory* of Nyssa (late 4th c.) in developing the doctrine of the Trinity*.

With Porphyry's pupil Iamblichus of Chalcis (c245–325), Platonism took a turn toward Sacramental* theology, with the adoption of the rituals of theurgy into a philosophical system (cf. Myst. II.11), and this was continued in the Athenian school of Syrianus (c370–435), Proclus (412–80), and Damascius (c465–535). While this paralleled the development of Christian sacramental theology, it is not clear that there was any direct influence from Platonism before the time of Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite (early 6th c.), who was clearly influenced by the Athenian school, particularly in his love of triads and in his adoption of the process of procession and return as a cosmic principle.

However, Platonism constituted primarily a pole of opposition for Christian thinkers of this period; much polemic was directed at it. Particular bones of contention were the Platonist doctrines of the eternity* of the world, the pre-existence of the human soul*, and the absolute unity, suprarationality, and impersonality of the first principle. The Alexandrian Christian philosopher John Philoponus (c490–570) inveighed against the former two doctrines, Augustine* (354–430) particularly against the latter. Plotinus had argued that his first principle, the One, must be superior to intellect and being, and thus absolutely impervious to passions, and this position, maintained by all subsequent Platonists, undermined the Christian concept of a personal God*.

Interesting figures on the interface between Platonism and Christianity include Synesius of Cyrene (370–413), a Hellenic philosopher sympathetic to Christianity, who was prevailed upon to become bishop of his native city; Marius Victorinus (mid-4th c.), a Roman lawyer and Platonist philosopher (influenced by Porphyry) who converted to Christianity late in life; and Boethius* (c480–524), who wrote The Consolation of Philosophy. See also PLATONISM AND CHRISTIANITY. JOHN M. DILLON

Nepal. Although Christianity arrived in Nepal much earlier, present-day Christianity cannot trace its roots before 1950. Since then Nepalese Christianity has experienced phenomenal growth.

When Nepal was still divided into small kingdoms and principalities (18th c.), Capuchins* did missionary work among the Newar people in the Kathmandu Valley, establishing a Christian community with several thousand members. But when Nepal became unified, all Nepalese Christians were deported to Betiya, India (1769), and Christian mission was prohibited.

With the end of the royal Rana regime (1951) and the introduction of democracy, Christian professionals were allowed to come to Nepal for the promotion of health* and education*, although the constitution banned any conversion to Christianity. The punishment for converting to Christianity was a one-year imprisonment; that for preaching or trying to convert someone was a three-year imprisonment; and that for baptizing a convert was a six-year imprisonment. This law, active until 1990, was officially removed in 2008 with the declaration of Nepal as a democratic federal republic, a secular state.

In the midst of these persecutions, Christianity has grown, gaining converts among Hindus, Buddhists, and indigenous people (including Kirants). Denominational differences have been minimal among churches, although some denominational differentiation arose after 1990. The indigenous and autonomous church movement with an Evangelical*, Pentecostal*, and Charismatic* character is predominant. Signs, miracles*, and prayers for healing* are common during church services and during witness among non-Christians.

Church worship takes place on Saturday; baptism* and the Lord's* Supper are the main sacraments*. Most churches are congregational, and the relationship between laity and clergy is nonhierarchical. Women ministers are accepted in most churches. All ministers receive theological education at several Bible training centers.

Nepalese Christians believe that the Bible is the inspired Word of God (see Scripture) and that being born again is absolutely necessary to experience salvation* and entrance in God's kingdom*. Yet Christians also strive for the inner transformation of society and for a better quality of life through education and health care. Christians show patience and respect when dealing with people of other faiths and ideologies.

The main challenges for Nepalese Christian leadership in this period of rapid growth include how to maintain faithful discipleship in their society and work toward the unity of the body of Christ.

Statistics: Population (2008): 29 million. Christians, c4% (almost all independents, with a few Protestants, Roman Catholics, and Orthodox; most are Charismatics); Hindus, 80%; Buddhists, 9%; Muslims, 4%; Kirants, 3%. (Based on 2001 census and World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

BAL KRISHNA SHARMA

Nepotism, conferral of office or other benefits on family relations. It became an issue with the 16th-c. popes and was formally condemned in the next century.

Nero (37–68), Roman emperor (54–68). The last emperor descended from Julius Caesar, he was adopted by Claudius and proclaimed emperor at the age of 16. The philosopher Seneca was his adviser early in his reign, and government was orderly. But his murder of family members, his erratic activities, and his tyrannical measures turned the senatorial class against him. After the fire in Rome (64), which was blamed on the Christians, the city was rebuilt with regular streets and impressive buildings. The discovery of a plot against Nero (65) led to the execution of Seneca, Lucan, and Nero's wife, Poppaea. He was killed after a revolt by several generals, joined by the Praetorian Guard. Since he was hated by the Romans, Christian apologists found it useful to associate the persecutions* with his name. The "number* of the Beast" (Rev 13:11–18) is the total of the numerical values of the letters in Neron Kaisar.

Nerses IV Shnorhali (1102–1173), Armenian* catholicos*, author of historical, exegetical, doctrinal, pastoral, and liturgical works. He was called Shnorhali, "the Gracious," in homage to his meekness and charity, and to his religious poetry. He was educated in the Karmir Vank Monastery, ordained a priest, then a bishop. As the assistant of the catholicos Gregory III Pahlawuni (his brother), he contributed to the discussions over the doctrinal and ritual disagreements with the Roman Catholic Church (1139–41).

In 1166 Nerses became a catholicos, advocating persuasion over coercive methods of conversion* in the struggle against the "Children of the Sun" (a syncretistic* sect). In negotiations with the Byzantine Church (1165–72), he demonstrated an irenic spirit and affirmed the primacy of common faith over ritual and disciplinary divergences. Although Nerses remained faithful to the mitigated Julianist positions of the Armeno-Syrian Council of Mantzikert (726; affirming, following Julian of Halicarnassus [d528?], that Christ's body was incorruptible, though capable of all human experiences, including suffering), for Christian reconciliation he was ready to abstain from the Miaphysite* formula.

IGOR DORFMANN-LAZAREV

Nestorian Church, common but erroneous name for the Church* of the East, also called the Assyrian*, Chaldean, or East Syriac Church. While it adheres to the view of Christ held by Nestorius*, Diodore* of Tarsus, and Theodore* of Mopsuestia, it refined and developed Nestorius's Christology by emphasizing the mystery* of the incarnation*.

Nestorianism, the position defended by Nestorius*.

Nestorius (c351–c451), patriarch of Constantinople (428–31). A native of Syria*, he entered a monastery in Antioch, where he assimilated the Antiochene* tradition in biblical interpretation and Christology, probably studying under Theodore* of Mopsuestia. His reputation as a preacher led to his being appointed patriarch of Constantinople (428). He supported a member of his clergy who preached against calling Mary “Theotokos*,” or “Mother of God,” because for him Jesus' humanity and divinity were joined by will, not by nature or hypostasis, although the conjunction is so intimate that Jesus and the Word become one person, not two. Eusebius* of Dorylaeum accused him (wrongly) of Adoptionism*. His position was attacked by Cyril* of Alexandria, who issued 12 anathemas, and by a council in Rome (430). At the Council of Ephesus* (431), Nestorius was removed from office and his doctrines condemned. Upon returning to his monastery, he was banished (436), supposedly to Petra but actually to Upper Egypt and the Great Oasis, where he wrote his Book of Heraclides, responding to the two Councils of Ephesus* (431, 449) and arguing that his views agreed with those who were now condemning Eutyches*.

EUGENE TESELLE

Netherlands, The. According to a legend, Christianity was brought to what is now the Netherlands by Servatius, who moved his episcopal see* from Tongern (present-day Belgium) to Maastricht (383), where the episcopal see remained until 722, when it was moved to Liège (Belgium). Nevertheless, we can say that the southern parts of the Netherlands were Christianized during the last century of Roman rule (late 4th to early 5th c.). The northern parts (on the other side of the rivers Maas and Waal) were Christianized from 689 onward by Willibrord, who was ordained archbishop of the Frisians, with his see in Utrecht.

The ecclesiastical division of the territory, the south under the Diocese of Liège and the north under the Diocese of Utrecht, remained more or less the same (except for some parts along the borders, which belonged to the dioceses of Münster and Cologne in present-day Germany) until the Dutch revolt (with a decentralized state and freedom of religion as its main targets), when the Republic of Seven United Provinces declared itself independent from the Spanish kings (1581). The Dutch Reformed* Church obtained a monopoly position in the north, while Roman Catholicism continued to be strong in the south, which remained under Spanish rule. After the Vienna Conference (1815), the United Kingdom of the Netherlands (Kingdom of the Netherlands since the separation of Belgium, 1830) was established, and its new constitution (1848) recognized freedom of religion.

Despite social mobility, the north–south divide is strongly felt in Dutch Christianity and contributed to a strong differentiation among regions in which almost total church affiliation from birth until death was the norm: the Protestant “pillar*” in the north, the Roman Catholic “pillar” in the south, and liberal and socialist “pillars” in between. During the 1960s, church membership decreased rapidly. In 2004 the Dutch Reformed Church, the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (separated from the former in 1886), and the Lutheran Church united to form the Protestant Church in the Netherlands, the second largest Christian denomination in the Netherlands after the Roman Catholic Church.

For years now, the Central Office for Statistics, the Social and Cultural Planning Office, and the Scientific Council for Government Policy have been producing different, and partly contradicting, statistics on church membership owing to different definitions of Christian and religious affiliations and various instruments for measuring them. Whereas some scholars speak about an ongoing secularization* in the Netherlands, others speak about a slowing of this process, or even a resurgence of religion in the public domain.

According to the study “God in Nederland” (God in the Netherlands), conducted every 10 years from 1966 to 2006, 55% of the Dutch people associate themselves with Christianity in a general way. In 2006, 30% said that they belonged to a church (61% said they did not); 40% of church members attended church services regularly (vs. 77% in 1966).

While 66% of Dutch people say that the churches should not express themselves on (personal or social) ethical or political issues, they value religion highly when it comes to matters of life and death* (73%) and hold that religion has a social function in maintaining norms and values (74%), in creating social cohesion (63%), in drawing the public's attention to wars and other disasters (63%), and in celebrating national holidays (56%). For 66%, religion and politics are connected, but only 15% favor politics based on religion.

Despite declining church membership, a majority show an interest in religious or spiritual matters. More than 50% indicate that they seek deeper meaning in life and that there is something beyond the visible world, something that connects human beings, the world, and the universe; 33% say that they have had a mystical experience, and 66% say that they pray regularly.

The Netherlands is commonly referred to as one of the most secularized countries of the world, although Dutch scholars have become more cautious in explaining what this signifies exactly. Most would speak about a deinstitutionalization, which applies not only to churches and mosques but also to other social organizations, whereas a substantial part of the Dutch population practices religious rituals or prayers in a noninstitutional context, which many call spirituality*.

The situation of Dutch Christianity is ambiguous: a majority of Christians practice a postmodern* spirituality outside the institutional churches, and the faithful who remain within the churches are becoming more orthodox or conservative. The Netherlands has not become areligious, but it is too early to speak about a "resurgence of religion" as some have suggested.

Statistics: Population (2006): 16.5 million. 55% are affiliated with Christian values in a general way, but only 30% belong to a church (Roman Catholics [primarily in the south], 60%; Protestants [primarily in the north], 40%); Muslims (mainly of Turkish and Moroccan descent), 5%; members of Eastern religions, 1.1%; Jews, 0.2%. (Source: "God in the Netherlands," 2006.)

FRANS WIJSEN

Nevin, John R. See MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY.

New Age Spirituality and Christianity. New Age spirituality became a clearly identified movement in the 1970s, but its several dimensions were not necessarily new. It grew out of ancient thought, of trends already present in North American culture, and of developments in other parts of the world. As a quest for a spiritual pathway that would offer an alternative to traditional Christian ways associated with mainline churches, sincere seekers sought a spirituality* that felt congruent with their experience, and more responsive to dramatic global changes and to the new realities of contemporary life.

The Christian community responded in diverse ways, in some cases with interest and a desire to learn, often with caution, and frequently with clear rejection. These different responses reflect the diversity of the New Age Movement, as well as the complexity and many-sidedness of Christianity. Should New Age be viewed as an arena for tarot or integral spirituality, crystals or ecology, witchcraft* or holistic health, astrology or planetary transformation? Three patterns have characterized New Age spirituality:

1. New Age as a journey toward the divine, which is generally viewed as within oneself or as one's higher self, in contrast with the transcendent personal God often emphasized in Christianity. Through developmental processes, meditation drawn from Eastern traditions, and channeling that puts one in touch with one's past lives, one nurtures the divine within.
2. New Age as a journey toward self-discovery (implied by the preceding) is the effort to know oneself and to realize one's full potential as a human being, an endeavor undertaken through reflection, inquiry, and discussion in small groups, and meditation focused on "right mindfulness." On occasion, this inward journey employs the grammar of science, speaking about vibrations, energy, and evolution, but more frequently links spiritual maturation with the ancient Hindu/Buddhist understanding of karma and samsara that connects human growth to past lives.
3. New Age as a journey toward the world embraces all peoples and cultures and has affirmed the goodness of the original creation*. Those engaged in New Age thought often commit themselves to issues of ecology* and justice*.

Christian churches have been positive about New Age sensitivity to ecology and holistic health, but are more critical of the absence of a clear statement about a personal God* and about Jesus, and the emphasis on reincarnation rather than eternal* life. Christians ask whether New Age communities are truly committed to a more just and humane world or are preoccupied with personal fulfillment and trivial practices. See also SPIRITUALITY CLUSTER, CHRISTIAN FORMS OF: IN NORTH AMERICA.

DUNCAN S. FERGUSON

New Caledonia. See HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN THE SOUTH PACIFIC AND AUSTRALIA.

New Covenant (Heb berit hadasa; Gk kaine diatheke; also translated “new testament”) is a designation that, since NT times, the Christian Church has claimed for itself as “the people of the new covenant.” From patristic times, this designation was used both in a supersessionist* sense, emphasizing discontinuity between “old” and “new” covenants, and in a qualitative sense, emphasizing continuity.

In polemic writings against Jews, Justin* Martyr (c100–c165), and later, e.g., Irenaeus*, Tertullian*, and Origen*, emphasized that the church has supplanted the people of Israel, which has been rejected – a supersessionist view reiterated throughout the history of the church and grounded in multiple NT texts.

Yet the same church fathers affirmed the continuity between the old and new covenants as they rejected Marcion’s* teaching and Gnostic* views that emphasized complete discontinuity. Continuity is recognizable when one notes that the concept of “new covenant” originated in Jeremiah and was an early Apocalyptic* Jewish doctrine (though rarely found in midrash*). As distinct from the several renewals of the covenant (e.g. in the time of the Josianic reform; 2 Kgs 23), Jer 31:31–34 (cf. Ezek 36:25–28) speaks of an eschatological* “new covenant.” It is new, not because of a discontinuity with the “old” covenant, but because it is written on the human heart cleansed from sin* (or “forgiven”; cf. Atonement #1); not because God changed the covenant, but because, in this cleansed/forgiven condition (through the role of the Holy* Spirit, adds Ezek 36), humans will at last be faithful to it – whether they are Israelites or Apocalyptic Jews (Jubilees*), Essenes* of Qumran, or the people of God in the broader sense that includes the Gentiles*/nations* envisioned by Paul in 2 Cor 3:2–6. The Last* Supper tradition presents Jesus as saying, “This cup is the new covenant in my blood” (1 Cor 11:25), integrated into (the longer version of) Luke 22:20; while Mark 14:24 merely has “blood of the covenant,” Matt 26:28 adds “for the forgiveness of sins” (a new covenant language).

The ambivalence between the supersessionist view of “new covenant” (originating in the polemical separation of Christianity from Judaism) and the qualitative view (emerging in the HB and early Jewish origins of this concept) persists. The choice of one or the other option has significant theological and ethical implications, especially since “covenant” includes a call (an election*) to a particular task for the glory of God. See also ANTI-JEWISH, ANTI-JUDAISM; COVENANT; UNIQUENESS OF CHRIST.

DANIEL PATTE

New Creation refers to God’s work of recreation, understood as renewal, replacement, or making new things. The idea of God’s recreation, already implied in God’s covenant with all living things (Gen 9:1–17) after the Flood*, becomes explicit in Isa 43:19 and 65:17: God creates new things, specifically new heavens and a new earth. Paul* employs the expression “new creation” (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15), which the authors of Jewish apocalyptic writings such as 1 Enoch* (72:1) and Jubilees* (1:29, 4:26) previously used.

As Pelagius* notes, “new creation” has been diversely interpreted to refer to (1) the inner transformation of individual believers by the Holy* Spirit (Augustine*, Basil*, John* Chrysostom); (2) the personal experience of rebirth through baptism* that often provides a new identity (Theodoret* of Cyrrhus; see Grace of God Cluster); (3) the new community of faith formed through the ministry of Christ and the apostles (John* Chrysostom); (4) God’s establishment of a new world through divine interventions in history in order to replace the present age with an eschatological new kingdom*, a process beginning with Christ’s death and resurrection (Cyril*); (5) God’s preservation and restoration of the natural world, according to theologians’ and ethicists’ recent interpretation of Rom 8:18–25.

SEJONG CHUN

New Haven Theology, a revision of Edwardian* Calvinism that Nathaniel W. Taylor (1786–1858) developed with Chauncey A. Goodrich and Eleazar T. Fitch at Yale College. Taylor redefined the doctrines of original* sin* and freedom of the will* in order to urge the unrepentant to convert. He also employed God’s moral government as a theological superstructure, rejected the sinfulness of “unregenerate doings,” and insisted that God did not condemn anyone to hell* before creating the world (see Infralapsarianism). These teachings sparked the “Taylorite” controversy, which divided Connecticut

Congregationalists* (early 1830s) and eventually dissolved New England's Edwardsian tradition.

ELIZABETH MASON CURRIER and DOUG SWEENEY

New Israel. See JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; NEW COVENANT; SUPERSESSIONISM.

Newman, John Henry (1801–90). Anglican priest and fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, Newman served as vicar at the university church (1828–43). Received into the Roman Catholic Church (1845), he was made a cardinal (1879). He opposed liberal* theology, which he described as “the doctrine that there is no positive truth in religion, but that one creed is as good as another.”

Closely allied to the Oxford* Movement, he played a central role in producing the Tracts for the Times (1833–41) and the journal British Critic (1836–42), preaching and writing extensively on the early church, the independence of the church* from state infringements, the apostolic priesthood*, and the sacraments* as means of grace*. In “Tract 90” (1841), he argued that the Anglican Thirty*-nine Articles could be read in a fully Roman Catholic sense. He published Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine shortly before his reception into the Roman Catholic Church.

Appointed rector of the Catholic University of Ireland*, he published his inaugural lectures, The Idea of a University (1852), his most influential work. As editor of the liberal Catholic journal the Rambler (1859–60), he wrote “On Consulting the Faithful in Matters of Doctrine” (1859). In 1864, following an attack on Catholic honesty, Newman published his Apologia pro Vita Sua, establishing his reputation as a stylist, apologist, and theologian. He replied (1865) to Edward Bouverie Pusey's* Eirenicon. His Letter Addressed to the Duke of Norfolk (1875) defended individual conscience in Catholic life and Catholic national loyalty against Gladstone's* argument. Among his poems, only his “Lead, Kindly Light” and “The Dream of Gerontius” (1865, in Edward Elgar's musical setting) are remembered. Newman's most important theological/philosophical work, An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent (1870), summarized his life's thought on faith* and reason*, the place of probability in human decision making, and the nature of certitude.

PETER C. ERB

New Measures. See FINNEY, CHARLES GRANDISON.

New Testament and Its Canonization. The use of the NT writings as authoritative scriptural* documents developed slowly during the 2nd c. Early in the 2nd c., local churches used the Gospels (most often Matthew*) and a few other writings. Three of the Pauline Epistles – 1 Corinthians*, Romans*, and Ephesians* – were often cited. 1 Peter* and 1 John* are mentioned by Papias*. Hebrews* and Revelation*/Apocalypse were in circulation. But explicit interest in gathering together the apostolic writings did not begin until after 150.

The transition can be seen in Asia Minor. The generation of Papias* and Polycarp* (first half of the 2nd c.) was satisfied to claim continuity with the apostles*, looking first to living traditions* (e.g. sayings of Jesus independent of the Gospels) and only then to writings. Paul was often ignored, except by Marcionites*, as was the Fourth Gospel, except by the Valentinians*. But after 150, the canon principle was at work: disputes over the content of the apostolic proclamation, arising from the confusing diversity of apostolic traditions, could be resolved only by consulting the apostles' writings. The canon principle, possibly invented by Marcion* when he recognized only Paul and Luke as authoritative, was used against him and the Gnostics* by Irenaeus*, whose career began in Asia Minor, followed by Tertullian*, Clement*, and Origen*. Thus Asia Minor was the center of the formation of the NT canon, followed by Rome and then Alexandria. Paul and the Fourth Gospel were no longer ignored, but the aspects that seemed to aid Gnostics* were neutralized through their juxtaposition with writings ascribed to other apostles, including James and Peter. James 1:14–26 affirms but also corrects Paul's emphasis on faith, and 2 Pet 3:15–17 cautiously accepts Paul's letters. Regarding the Gospels, Irenaeus noted that each had distinctive features that could be used by one of the groups he viewed as heretical. Yet together, as the “fourfold gospel” (one gospel, “according to” four different writers), these distinctive scriptural texts supplemented, corrected, and interpreted each other. Simultaneously, the OT, specifically the Septuagint*, including the Apocrypha*, the Bible of the Greek synagogue, was asserted against Marcionites and Gnostics. By 200, something very much like the present NT was taking shape, but this was not yet the “canon.”

The canonization process continued, with debate over the authorship and standing of a number of books, including Hebrews (questioned in the West), James, 2 Peter, and Revelation/Apocalypse (questioned in the East). In Alexandria, several other writings (including Hermas* and Barnabas*) were included, while in Syria only the Gospels (with Tatian's* Diatessaron*), Acts, and Paul were included; James, 1 Peter, and 1 John were added only after 400.

Only in the 4th c. was there agreement about the canon, a specific list of books. The first list of writings that corresponds exactly to the later NT is in Athanasius's* festal epistle (367); his inclusion of Revelation/Apocalypse is probably due to his alliance with the West, just as Damasus of Rome agreed with the East and affirmed Paul's authorship of Hebrews. The canon was thus finalized as part of a diplomatic agreement among Nicene leaders in the decades following the condemnation of Arianism in Nicaea* and in the first decades of Arian* power in the Western Roman Empire. North Africa followed the lead of Rome (councils in Hippo, 393, and Carthage, 397), still expressing some doubts about the authorship of Hebrews.

At about this time, Jerome* rediscovered and translated the HB, suggesting that it had greater validity than the Septuagint, the earlier Greek translation. Luther retained the traditional NT canon, but raised questions about several of its writings because they lacked a strong doctrine of justification by faith. He also raised questions about the Apocrypha*, which the Reformation churches usually include only as an appendix to the Bible. See also BIBLE, CANON OF; BIBLE, TEXTS AND MANUSCRIPTS.

EUGENE TESELLE

New Testament Theology arose out of a perceived need for inquiry into the meaning of the NT independent of contemporary theological bias (19th c.). In approaching the task, scholars confront questions about (1) the sense in which NT theology is historical*, (2) what is meant by "theology*," (3) whether NT theology should be limited to canonical writings, and (4) how the diversity of viewpoints reflected in the NT writings should be assessed. The following are representative answers.

William Wrede (1859–1906). (1) The task of NT theology is strictly historical. One goal of the history* of religion school was to present a history of the thought-world of early Christianity. (2) Theology involves the personal viewpoint of the scholar and thus obscures the historical investigation of the NT. The NT does not provide answers to the questions of dogmatic theology. (3) Inquiry should not be limited to canonical texts, because the goal is to understand the wider thought-world of early Christianity. (4) The diversity of the NT results from the historical development of early Christianity.

Adolf Schlatter (1852–1938). (1) NT Theology is historical because its subject matter is that of the past. However, theology and history are interrelated. The NT is designed to evoke faith* and is best understood from that perspective. (2) Theology expresses the convictions* of early Christians as found in NT writings, especially in the self-understanding of Jesus. (3) The NT is the primary source of NT theology. Other ancient texts (and their choice) introduce the historian's bias. The OT is also important for understanding NT faith. (4) Diversity in the NT does not imply opposition, for it arises from diverse reactions to the powerful message of Jesus.

Rudolf Bultmann* (1884–1976). (1) Historical reconstruction is necessary to interpret the NT in a way that has meaning for the present. The theology of Paul and John developed out of the message of Jesus and the proclamation of the early church. (2) Theology is found in the religious self-understanding of Paul* and John*. These two writers convey an understanding of human existence – an existential* understanding – that can be apprehended by modern people. (3) Noncanonical texts are important sources. Within the canon, Paul and John are privileged as sources of theology. (4) NT writings are diverse, but not all express "theology."

Some biblical scholars question this formulation of the task, but, explicitly or not, all engage these questions on some level. See also BIBLICAL THEOLOGY.

SUSAN E. HYLEN

Newton, Isaac (1642–1727), born in Lincolnshire, England, in the year Galileo* died; studied at Cambridge University; became a revolutionary philosopher and mathematician. His first love throughout his life was theology and a millennial* interpretation of the Bible, a seemingly ironic perspective for one who made the world seem like an ordered, rational place, bounded by mathematically knowable laws. Yet he made explicit that he wrote Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy (1687) in order to make humankind believe more deeply in the deity, although this might not be obvious to modern readers.

Newton's science* rested on the bedrock assumption that "nature is exceedingly simple and conformable to herself" and that whatever

"holds for greater motions, should hold for lesser ones as well." Rules are universal; the laws that hold for the physics of local motion, or mechanics, also hold for planetary motion. Thus to tackle the problem of why bodies on the surface of our planet are not thrown into space by its rotation and orbital revolution, Newton rigged up "a conical pendulum" that would be analogous to the earth, so as to measure its swing and the hold that earthly gravity exacted on it. This illustrates Newton's style of reasoning and his demand for experimental proof, which complemented his demonstration that mathematics applies to mechanics. MARGARET C. JACOB

New Zealand. Anglican missionaries from New South Wales, Australia*, arrived in 1814, followed by Wesleyan and French Marist missionaries. Before colonization (1850s), the large majority of Christians on the islands were Maori, who became missionaries themselves. Maori movements combining Maori culture* and Christianity developed rapidly, until the colonial wars over land and sovereignty in the 1860s disillusioned many Maori.

The main settler churches were the Church of England, as well as Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, and Wesleyan (Methodist) churches. Abolition of state aid to church schools in 1877 was supported by many Protestants, who were content with the education provided by Sunday schools. Roman Catholics disagreed. Religious orders provided low-fee education until state aid resumed (1970s). Because of secularist and Catholic opposition, there was no teaching of divinity in the University of New Zealand until 1945.

By 1900 all churches had established newspapers, theological colleges, national governing bodies, and networks of pastoral care and advocacy, as well as missionary work in the Pacific and Asia. Sectarian bigotry was strong, but it largely disappeared after Vatican* II and the introduction of Roman Catholic ecumenical initiatives. Formal ecumenical initiatives were only partially successful: Protestants formed the National Council of Churches (1942); Catholics joined a freshly structured Conference of Churches (1988), which disbanded in 2004. Attempts to unite Anglicans, members of Churches of Christ, Methodists, and Presbyterians fell apart in the 1980s. Yet much informal local cooperation endured. The rapid growth of Pentecostal churches and Charismatic* networks in the major churches left liberals and Evangelicals alike mystified by changes in worship and by Spirit-centered theology and piety. Pacific Islander migration also brought new configurations and the emergence of churches linked to parent bodies, rather than with New Zealand denominations.

Although all the churches grew after 1945, dissension about adaptation to cultural change emerged. Thus in 1967 Presbyterians attempted to try for heresy Principal Geering, the mentor of those who see no future in theistic Christianity. Feminists mounted a broader critique, to which women's* ordination, inclusive* language, and action against male sexual misbehavior were not sufficient answers. Increasingly articulate Maori Christians from the 1970s mounted a critique of the overt and covert racism* that had long belittled them. Their appeal to the much-neglected Treaty of Waitangi (1840) required all the churches to develop new forms of partnership with the Maori. Anglicans have gone the farthest along the bicultural path. Churches have also been divided in their response to homosexuality*. Evangelicals have increasingly challenged liberal solutions to such issues, but as yet Christian political parties have failed to gain representation in Parliament. New Zealand Christianity has produced a number of theological scholars, and informed ministers and laity, who have brought Christian perspectives to bear on national issues.

In the early 21st c., the majority (69%) of New Zealanders were Anglo settlers; Maori, the Polynesian inhabitants of the islands, were a minority (10%). Despite the dramatic fall in church attendance and involvement among major denominations, the Christian heritage remains important, although many no longer identify themselves as Christians in the census. New* Age spirituality has some popularity. The great world religions are poorly represented in New Zealand. The churches face a huge challenge to reconnect effectively with the major concerns of many New Zealanders. Nonetheless, Christian missionary and humanitarian concerns are still strong, though not wholly expressed through Christian organizations.

Statistics: Population (2000): 3.9 million (M). Christians, 3.2 M, 84% (Protestants, 0.9 M; Anglicans, 0.8 M; Roman Catholics, 0.5 M; independents, 0.2 M); Buddhists, 0.04 M, 1%; nonreligious, 0.5 M, 14%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

IAN BREWARD

Nicaea, First Council of (325). The first of the ecumenical* councils, it was called by the emperor Constantine* because of the controversy aroused by Arius's* assertion that the Son was a creature, brought forth by the free choice of the Father. Arianism had already been condemned at a regional synod in Antioch (325), presided over by Hosius*, but a council of all the world's bishops seemed desirable.

A creed offered by the Arians was rejected by the angry majority. Subsequently, Eusebius* of Caesarea, whose views had been condemned at the synod in Antioch, offered the creed of his church; the emperor approved it but suggested the addition of homoousios (i.e. an affirmation that the Son is "of the same nature" as the Father). The wording of the creed finally adopted by the council seems in fact to be based on the creed of Jerusalem rather than Caesarea. Four anti-Arian anathemas concluded the creed.

The key assertion of the Council of Nicaea was that the Son is homoousios with ("of the same nature" as) the Father. Since the Arians had attacked the term, the Council may have felt that this was an appropriate way to draw a line, especially since Constantine supported it. The Council failed, however, to explain how the Father and the Son are distinct; in fact, it anathematized those who said that the Son is of a different "ousia or hypostasis" than the Father. This lack of clarity resulted in 50 more years of controversy, which ended only with the rapprochement of the Homoousian* party (arguing that the Son is "of the same nature" as the Father) and the Homoiousian* party (arguing that the Son is "like in essence" with the Father) at the Council of Alexandria* (362) and the distinction made by the Cappadocians* between one ousia and three hypostases. See also CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRIES; TRINITY IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY; TRINITY IN THE WESTERN TRADITION.

EUGENE TESELLE

Nicaea, Second Council of (787). Called by the empress Irene* to end Iconoclasm*, this broadly representative council first met in Constantinople (786), was interrupted by the army, which had Iconoclastic sympathies, and moved to Nicaea (787). It approved images of Christ, Mary, and the saints, painted or mosaic or depicted by other suitable media. A differentiation was made between worship* of God and veneration* of saints, quoting Basil* of Caesarea (comparing images of the emperor to the Son as an image of the Father): "The honor rendered to the image rises to the prototype." See also ICON; ICONOCLASM AND THE ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY; JESUS, IMAGES OF, CLUSTER: IN BYZANTINE ICONOGRAPHY; MARY, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER: THEOTOKOS: IN BYZANTINE ICONOGRAPHY.

Nicaragua. The population of Nicaragua today includes mestizos* (69%), whites (17%), blacks, including mulattos (9%), and only a small percentage (5%) of indigenous peoples, whom Dominican* monks, including Bartholomé de las* Casas, and later Franciscans*, initially evangelized. The Roman Catholic Diocese of Nicaragua (which included Costa* Rica until the independence period) was first based in Leon. Granada had the first established church in Central America.

During the Central American Federation of the Central American Republics (1821–38), the constitution named Roman Catholicism the only religion, "with the exclusion of the public exercise of any other." From 1838 to 1858, the Liberal Party prevailed with anti-Catholic measures, but from 1858 to 1893 the Conservative Party was in control. A strong liberal reaction after 1893 guaranteed religious liberty, to the detriment of the Roman Catholic Church. Civil registration, matrimony, cemeteries, judicial rights, and public education, which were administered by the Roman Catholic Church, were placed under state control. However, under the Somoza family dictatorship (1934–79), certain favors were granted, such as financial support, return of expelled monastic orders, and religious education in the schools, in exchange for ecclesiastical support for the regime.

Many external hindrances (common in Central America) worked to the detriment of the Roman Catholic cause: lack of clergy, abolition of tithes, expropriation of church lands, lack of cultural integration, economic dependence, and popular resistance to political and ecclesiastical domination. Tensions existed among the clergy over questions of political loyalties, actions on behalf of the poor*, and foreign interference in domestic affairs. Foreign powers seeking rights to construct a canal across the isthmus through Nicaragua vied for control during the 19th c.

Early British relations with the Miskito people, the lumber trade, and the establishment of settlements presaged the first pre-independence Anglican (Episcopal) groups in the coastal area. The arrival of Jamaican* Baptists* signaled the beginning of limited Protestant activity. In 1849 the German Moravians* began fruitful work with the Miskitos and the Sumos until World War I, when the work was taken over by the US group from Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. Under the Conservative government, the foreign Bible societies experienced mixed success, and the arrival of Protestants was largely hindered; but under the Liberals (after 1893), more arrived, including the Central American Mission (1900). As a result of division, however, work progressed slowly.

At the Panama* Missions Conference (1916), Nicaragua and El* Salvador were assigned to the Northern Baptist Church (now American Baptist Church). Together with the Moravians, the Baptist Church made important contributions to efforts to resolve national issues, especially in defense of the poor, despite the population's significant resentment against the USA owing to the nearly continuous occupation of Nicaragua by US Marines from 1912 to 1933, US support of the Somosa dictatorships, and the US role in the destructive Contra War (1980s).

Especially strong has been the growth of the Assemblies* of God congregations, alongside that of numerous other Pentecostal/Charismatic* groups, the Seventh-day Adventists*, Nazarenes*, and Jehovah* Witnesses. Slowly at first, Protestantism has in recent times grown rapidly, constituting around 15% of the population. The ecumenical CEPAD (Evangelical Council for Aid to Victims) united more than 40 churches and agencies in response to the 1972 earthquake. Under the leadership of Gustavo Parajón, this movement helped to meet the urgent social, medical, and educational needs of the marginalized*.

Statistics: Population (2000): 5 million (M). Christians, 4.9 M, 96.3% (Roman Catholics, 4.3 M; Protestants, 0.6 M; independents, 0.2 M); native religionists, 0.1 M; nonreligious, 0.1 M. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

SIDNEY ROOY

Nicene Creed. Properly speaking, the creed adopted by the Council of Nicaea* (325), based on the baptismal creed of Jerusalem. The "Nicene Creed" used today in both Eastern and Western churches is a slightly longer creed adopted by the First Council of Constantinople* (381), more accurately called the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed.

Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed (the) differs from the Nicene Creed in its omission of the anathemas*, its presentation of several formulations about Christ (emphasizing Jesus' full divinity), and its extension of Nicaea's minimal references to the Holy* Spirit. Christians believe "in the Spirit, the holy, the lordly and life-giving one, proceeding forth from the Father, co-worshipped and co-glorified with Father and Son" (but not "proceeding forth from the Father and the Son" [*Filioque], later added in the Western Church).

Nicholas of Cusa (1401–64), German philosopher/theologian, canon* lawyer, administrator, cardinal; engaged in a lifelong effort to reform and unify the universal and Roman Catholic church. Chancellor to the archbishop of Trier and expert at the Council of Basel* (1432–38), he wrote the Conciliarist* Catholic Concordance (1433), then moved to the papal side (1437), was a papal delegate to Constantinople* (1438), then cardinal and bishop of Brixen (1450), and finally part of the papal curia in Rome (1458–64).

He wrote 20 philosophical/theological treatises and dialogues, as well as 10 works on mathematics. (His pastoral efforts are reflected in more than 200 sermons.) His On Learned Ignorance (1440) extended Christian Neoplatonic* thought and was the basis for his subsequent writings. It expounds central ideas on God*, the universe, and Christ, acknowledging the limits of human knowing about what God is. Reason* is appropriate for the finite realm but cannot measure the infinite God, because there is no proportion between God and creatures. The created universe is at once "enfolded" in God's oneness and "unfolded" as a limited or "contracted" image of that oneness. Since God is its center and circumference, learned ignorance proposes that the universe is neither centered on the earth nor limited in extent. Only Christ provides a measure that unites the finite and infinite. Nicholas's later On Conjectures (1442), About Mind (1450), and Vision of God (1453) propose conjectural metaphors* for exploring the limits of our knowledge and for seeing the transcendent God. See also APOPHATICISM; ETERNITY; MIND; MYSTICISM, MYSTICS. CLYDE LEE MILLER

Nicholas (Nicolas) I, Pope (858–67), champion of papal power, used the False* Decretals against metropolitans*; criticized Photius*; sought the Bulgars* loyalty; invited Cyril* and Methodius to Rome (867).

Nicholas of Lyra (c1270–1349), biblical exegete, professor at the Sorbonne (from c1309), provincial (head of the Franciscans*) of France (from 1319).

He learned Hebrew (possibly at the center of Jewish learning in Évreux), became acquainted with the Talmud, midrash, and the work of Rashi (Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac, 1045–1105), became a Franciscan (c1300), and moved to Paris, where he flourished in the university setting, despite conflicts over evangelical poverty* between the papacy and the Franciscan order (see Olivi, John Peter). He participated in the trials of the Knights Templar* (1307) and of the Beguine* mystic* Marguerite Porete* (1310, burned at the stake). His Literal Postill on the Whole Bible (c1322, 1331), which became a manual of exegesis, was a running commentary on the OT and NT, known for its double literal* sense (rather than mystical or allegorical sense), its affirmation of history and literary context, and Jewish interpretations of the OT. The double literal sense served as his key to the interpretation of OT prophetic passages, allowing him to draw one sense for the prophet's own time and another (usually christological and typological*) for the future. Among many other works, Moral Postill on the Whole Bible (1333–39) is a typological* and allegorical* series of notes on passages of Scripture that could be given both a moral and a spiritual interpretation. See also HERMENEUTICS.

PHILIP D. W. KREY

Nicholas of Myra (4th c.), bishop legendary for his generous acts in Myra, Asia Minor; widely revered in Byzantium, patron saint of Russia and other countries. His feast day (December 6) became the occasion for gift giving in the Low Countries. Under the influence of Germanic traditions, he became known as St. Nicholas, a figure that was secularized in the Protestant Netherlands and New York, gradually becoming the contemporary Santa Claus.

Nicodemites, term coined by Calvin* (1543), based on Nicodemus's* behavior, to characterize Protestants in Roman Catholic areas who kept their beliefs quiet or attended Mass without communing, contrary to Calvin's view that testimony to the true faith must be bodily and spiritual; the true church must be visibly set in contrast to the false.

Nicodemus, Pharisee* and learned member of the Sanhedrin*, who came secretly to Jesus (John 3:1–15), cautiously defended Jesus' activities, and helped bury him (John 19:39–42).

Nicolaites, group condemned in Rev 2:6, 14, 15; followers of Nicolaos (Acts 6:5) according to Irenaeus* (c180). Clement* of Alexandria relates Nicolaos's offer to share his beautiful wife in order to counter the charge that he was excessively proud to be her husband and as a sign of Christian self-sacrifice (and male superiority). Nicolaitism referred to the practice of concubinage among clergy and the marriage of clergy after celibacy* was imposed on all priests (1059).

Niebuhr, H. Richard (1894–1962), US theological ethicist who, like his brother Reinhold, found his voice during the 1930s against a background of economic depression, totalitarianism, and World War II. Niebuhr understood human agents as responders in the midst of interactions with others; the interactive stances of persons and communities are always ordered and oriented by faiths* in valued realities. Different faiths in different objects support different patterns of practical life. Accordingly, Niebuhr decried the idolatries* of the age, e.g. nationalism*, racism*, capitalism, and communism, which took a human community, activity, or desire as a limiting and distorting center of value and brought with them a train of bad consequences. For Niebuhr the radical faith in God that comes to us in Israel and in Jesus Christ demands a revolution in our more usual devotions. His influential book, *Christ and Culture, addressed what he considered the primary problem of Christianity: the relation between devotion to God-in-Christ and the many ends, achievements, and values to which culture invites our allegiance. In response he outlined five types of moral theology: Christ against culture, Christ of culture, Christ above culture, Christ and culture in paradox, and Christ the transformer of culture. See also CULTURE CLUSTER: CULTURAL STUDIES; CULTURE CLUSTER: CULTURE AND CHRISTIANITY; HISTORY AS A THEOLOGICAL CONCEPT; JESUS, IMAGES OF, CLUSTER: IN LITERATURE.

DOUGLAS F. OTTATI

Niebuhr, Reinhold (1892–1971), US theologian and political thinker, influential interpreter of Christian social ethics*. Son of a German immigrant pastor, pastor in Detroit (1915), professor at Union Theological Seminary in New York (1928), leading figure in the theological movement known as Christian Realism.

Niebuhr developed his own theological position during a time of general disillusionment following World War I. In contrast to earlier Social* Gospel theologians, who expected to transform modern industrial society by moral ideals drawn from the teachings of Jesus, Niebuhr insisted that change can be brought about only by power* and that those with power are inevitably influenced by their own interests. The teachings of Jesus therefore provide little direct guidance for Christian social ethics, which must be concerned with a rough justice* among competing interests rather than a community of mutual love*. Niebuhr's early works, Moral Man and Immoral Society (1932) and An Interpretation of Christian Ethics (1935), developed this approach to social problems, which became known as Christian Realism.

Niebuhr's most important work, The Nature and Destiny of Man (1943), offers a more positive view of the social and political relevance of Christian tradition. While we must avoid sentimental efforts to turn the sacrificial love that Jesus reveals into a simple historical possibility, we need the biblical view of humanity, balanced between the image* of God and the sinful creature, to face the realities of history without thinking that we can end evil in the world and without giving in to despair. During World War II and the cold war that followed, Niebuhr became increasingly convinced that democracy needed to be guided by the substance of this Christian interpretation. In the words of an aphorism that he coined for The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness (1944), "Man's capacity for justice* makes democracy possible; but man's inclination to injustice makes democracy necessary."

Later authors and religious leaders had mixed views of Niebuhr's legacy. Martin Luther King, Jr., found Niebuhr's realistic emphasis on power important in shaping his own view of nonviolence* and social change. Others have suggested that Niebuhr's Christian Realism made him slow to support movements for justice among the powerless and insufficiently critical of the realities of US power. Nevertheless, no figure has emerged since Niebuhr's time with a comparable ability to make persuasive connections between Christian tradition and contemporary political choices. See also DEMOCRACY AND CHRISTIANITY; SOCIAL ETHICS; UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (IN THE UNITED STATES).

ROBIN W. LOVIN

Niemöller, Martin (1892–1984), U-boat commander during World War I, captain of a Freikorps troop during the unsuccessful Kapp putsch against the Weimar Republic. After he completed theological studies in Münster (from 1919) and was ordained as a Lutheran pastor (1924), his first post was with the Lutheran Home Mission in Westphalia; he later (1931) became a pastor in the wealthy Berlin suburb of Dahlem, where he was assisted by Dietrich Bonhoeffer's* close friend, Franz Hildebrand. Conservative and nationalistic in his politics, Niemöller was initially enthusiastic about Nazism*; even its anti-Semitism* did not overly concern him. However, he became increasingly troubled by the regime's intrusion into church affairs, founded the Pastors' Emergency League, and joined the Confessing* Church. His preaching became openly critical of the government. He was imprisoned in Sachsenhausen (1938), then in Dachau, until he was liberated by US troops (1945). Even in prison, though, his attitude toward Nazism was ambivalent. Critical of the government's neopaganism, he nonetheless lobbied former naval colleagues to secure his release so that he could fight for Germany*. In the years following the war, Niemöller remained a controversial figure. Unpopular in Germany because of his insistence that Germany acknowledge its wartime guilt, he courted controversy in the wider West because of his opposition to the arms race and the Vietnam War. He was the principal author of the 1945 Stuttgart Declaration of Guilt and served as president of the Hesse-Nassau Lutheran Church (1947–62) and president of the World* Council of Churches (1961).

MARK R. LINDSAY

Nietzsche, Friedrich (1844–1900), German philosopher whose impact on 20th-c. Continental philosophy and critical theory is perhaps unmatched. Son and grandson of Lutheran pastors, trained as a philologist and scholar of classics (University of Leipzig), appointed professor of philology (University of Basel, 1868). Early in his career, he was influenced by the thought of Schopenhauer and the operas of Wagner; he left the academy in 1879. His most well known work is Thus Spake Zarathustra (1883–85), but the works most important for understanding his vehement and incisive criticism of Christianity and religion are The Gay Science, in which Nietzsche's madman announces the death* of God, and On the Genealogy of Morals. This criticism focused on the psychological and social needs served by beliefs, rituals, and religious practices and culminated in a "genealogical" method that explains moral and religious beliefs in terms of social interests and power struggles. In the Genealogy, Nietzsche argued that Christianity's "ascetic* ideal" promises an afterlife that can be achieved only by denying life in this world. This, he claims, is a strategy of the "will to power of the weakest" that both consoles the weak and infects and renders powerless the strong. Despite Nietzsche's attack on religion*, there are clear signs in his writings of prophetic, ascetic, and mystical* sensibilities, whether expressed in the "redemptive" mission of Zarathustra, in his reflections on body, spirit, and discipline, or in his ecstatic invocations of Dionysus.

Nietzsche's impact on Christian thought has been significant. Barth* countered Nietzsche's attack on Christianity but also applauded his insightful analyses of the drive to human self-aggrandizement that marks "religion." This Christian appropriation of Nietzschean suspicion is found more recently in Ricoeur* (hermeneutics* of suspicion) and Merold Westphal. Tillich* embraces Nietzsche's existentialist* analysis of human "existence as estrangement" and interprets Nietzsche's "will to power" as an affirmation of human life in spite of this estrangement. In this, Tillich claims, Nietzsche provides a genuine alternative to the Christian affirmation of life "in spite of" estrangement. Finally, Nietzsche has had an enormous impact on Death* of God theologians such as Thomas Altizer and Gabriel Vahanian and on postmodern religious thinkers and "secular theologians" such as Mark C. Taylor and Charles Winquist. In general, these thinkers accept some version of Nietzsche's proclamation of the "death of God" and embrace Nietzsche's critique of metaphysics*, his perspectival and bodily epistemology, and his Dionysian celebration of life and love for reality.

TYLER ROBERTS

Nigeria. Christianity in Nigeria, with its large youth membership, is dynamic and vibrant. It plays a more important social role than African* Religion or Islam*, the two other major religions in the country. It is highly diversified, comprising traditional mainline churches (Anglican*, Protestant – including Methodist*, Presbyterian*, and Baptist* – and Roman Catholic), Pentecostal/Charismatic* Evangelical, Prosperity* Gospel, and African* Instituted churches, as well as new religious movements founded by Nigerians. In a situation of rampant poverty*, the traditional African understanding of religion as the source of both spiritual and material well-being and the contemporary materialistic culture have combined to make the Prosperity Gospel, according to which wealth is a sign of divine favor, the most popular among the common people.

Late 16th–18th Centuries. The introduction of Roman Catholicism marked the first wave of evangelization in Nigeria. In 1515 Oba Osuola, the king of the Binis, and in 1571, the olu (king) of the Itshekiris, with the help of Portuguese traders in their territories, had asked that Roman Catholic Portuguese missionaries be sent to Benin City and Warri in Southern Nigeria (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). At that time, Nigeria was not yet a political entity but comprised different kingdoms. The approach of the missionaries was to convert the king first and thus win the kingdom. Hence the focus of attention was the courts of the kings. The kings allowed their children and some prominent men in their kingdoms to become Christians. In 1600 Domingos, the son of Sebastião, a prominent Warri Christian, was sent to Portugal to study for the priesthood. He was not successful and returned home in 1608 with a Portuguese wife and some missionaries to work in Warri. Spanish and Italian missionaries, and possibly Brazilian Catholic missionaries of African descent, later joined the Portuguese missionaries in Warri.

Because there were not enough missionaries in Europe, and because of the death or illness of many missionaries, this first wave of contact could not continue beyond 1770, when the last group of missionaries went to these two kingdoms. During the intervening period, many people had been baptized and churches built, but only in the courts of the kings. Christianity did not penetrate the interior of the kingdoms and died out in the 19th c., when missionaries could no longer go there. Today one reminder of this first encounter is an Africanized church in Benin City, called Arousa Church, whose liturgy contains Latin terms, such as sanc-tus and introit, reminiscent of Roman Catholic Latin Mass, while elements of African Religion are used also in worship. In Warri, a huge cross in the center of old Warri town serves as another reminder.

Mid-19th–Mid-20th Centuries. The second wave of evangelization that resulted in the implantation of Christianity in Nigeria was initiated in the 19th c. by Protestant missionaries. The impetus was an Evangelical revival* in England and France that led to the formation of missionary societies in these countries to bring the gospel to non-Christians. This coincided with the period of the "European scramble for Africa" (see Berlin Conference), British colonization, and the amalgamation of Nigeria into a single political unit under British control. It was also the period of the abolition of Atlantic slave* trade and the resettling of liberated slaves in Sierra* Leone and Liberia*.

Among the liberated slaves in Sierra Leone were Nigerians of the Yoruba ethnic group, who became Christians and later emigrated to Badagry and Abeokuta in Western Nigeria. From Nigeria they invited the missionaries they had known in Sierra Leone to bring Christianity to Nigeria. Initial responses came from Methodists (1842) and Anglicans (Church Missionary Society, 1845). In the Church Missionary Society team was Rev. Ajai Crowther*, a Yoruba, who later became the first African Anglican bishop. The liberated slaves who had returned to Nigeria greatly facilitated the work of the missionaries. The success of these missions inspired the United Presbyterian Church and the Southern* Baptist Convention (USA) missions to the Efiks in Calabar in the Southeast (1846), and the Yoruba in Badagry (1850), respectively, as well as the Roman Catholic mission to Lagos (1867). However, by 1859 a Roman Catholic community, probably the fruit of an earlier Portuguese missionary effort, was discovered in Lagos under the leadership of a catechist known as "Padre Antonio," a native of São Tomé. From the 1860s, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, Qua Iboe (Church of Scotland Mission), and Methodist missionaries entered Nigeria from Calabar in the Southeast, and expansion of missionary work in Nigeria began in earnest. In 1884 a Roman Catholic mission to the Igbo in Onitsha entered Nigeria from the East. Meanwhile, the Protestant mission in Western Nigeria had spread to Idah and other places in the north.

The 19th-c. missionaries adopted a different approach than did those of the earlier period. Rather than seek the conversion of the king first, they sought to convert individuals. They called for complete severance of Christians from their traditional culture, which they saw as evil, and expected African Christians to imbibe European culture and practice Christianity as it was practiced in Europe. They established "Christian villages" (Roman Catholics) and "mission villages" (Protestants) where Christians lived together apart from others (a practice later discontinued). Protestant missionaries studied the people's (oral) languages, reduced them to writing, and analyzed and formalized their grammar, translated the Bible into the local languages, and introduced literacy education for adults so that they could read the Bible (see Bible Translations Cluster). Both Protestant and Roman Catholic missionaries introduced Western education* and Western health care. These gave people a new lease on life and made Christianity attractive not only because of its religious value but also because of the social benefits that came with it.

The late 19th c. involved many challenges within the Christian fold. There were two schisms born of personal conflicts between pastors: one in the Presbyterian Church (Calabar, 1882), and another in the Baptist Church (Lagos, 1888). The most significant challenge was the breakaway in 1890 of about 600 Nigerian members from St. Paul's Breadfruit Anglican Church in Lagos to establish the "African Church," the first African* Instituted Church (AIC) in Nigeria. This was attributed to racism* in the church, the high-handedness of Bishop Herbert Tugwell in dealing with African members, and the disdainful attitude of the European missionaries toward African culture*. Many other breaks followed. While these early AICs held on to traditional Christian theology, there emerged others that, under the weight of colonial oppression, preached apocalyptic*, political theology. These new AICs include the Aladura Movement, which encompasses a group of AICs of a common type but of diverse origins that arose among the Yoruba (early 20th c.) – equivalent to the AICs called "Zionist" in Southern* Africa – which see the church as God's city of refuge for Africans. Other AICs preach ultimate victory for suppressed Africans (equivalent to Ethiopianists); others look for the coming of a messiah to deliver Africans from their bondage and are called "Messianic." For all of them, the Bible is the basis of their beliefs and practices.

Mid-20th–Early 21st Centuries. The flowering of the Christian missionary efforts started about the middle of the 20th c. This period has been the coming of age of Christianity in Nigeria. It is marked by the rapid spread of Christianity to all parts of the country, a large increase in the number of Christians, and a large body of Christian elite and well-educated native clergy. It corresponds to Nigeria's post-independence (1960) period, a failed attempt by the Protestants to form a National Church of Nigeria, the Roman Catholic Church's post-Vatican* II (1962–65) period, and Nigeria's post-civil war (1967–70) period. During the war, the Christian churches were seriously engaged in caring for the hungry, the wounded, the sick, and the dying. After the war, they were engaged in reconstruction and rehabilitation work. The Catholic Church distinguished itself in all this by the support it offered through international Catholic agencies.

The civil war (1967–70) slowed the growth of Christianity, and afterward the government made matters worse by taking over Christian schools and hospitals. In spite of this, Christianity continued to spread rapidly, and the government started handing back the schools and hospitals, and allowed churches to establish universities.

Since the mid-20th c., the Christian churches have shown great commitment in grappling with social issues. During the 1983–99 military regimes, often called the “dark years” of Nigerian political history, the nation experienced the most severe government repression it ever knew. The Christian churches resisted this strongly. From year to year and with dogged determination, the Christian Association of Nigeria, the umbrella body of all the churches in Nigeria, denounced the military government and its repressive policies. When in 1993 the incumbent military president, Ibrahim Babangida, a Muslim, annulled the presidential election that was believed to have been won by Chief M. K. O. Abiola, also a Muslim, the Christian community in the country reacted in strong protest, because the election was attested to have been free and fair by international observers; at stake was the issue of justice*.

Since Nigeria returned to democratic rule in 1999, political elections have been a thorny issue, as every aspirant wants to win by fair means or foul. This has resulted in the use of violence, cheating, and manipulation of election results. The Roman Catholic Church in particular has played a major role in monitoring these elections through its Justice, Development, and Peace Commission.

This period has witnessed great dynamism in Nigerian Christianity. Since the 1970s, Christians have been going on organized pilgrimages* to the Holy Land in large numbers yearly. A proliferation of new religious movements has led to the establishment of new kinds of independent churches of Pentecostal and Charismatic* orientation that do not fit into traditional patterns. A notable one is the Deeper Life Bible Church, which started as a movement that helped Christians of all denominations toward a life of holiness* and whose members first met in people’s homes. Today the Deeper Life Bible Church has branches all over the country. The Synagogue Church of Pastor Joshua in Lagos, which focuses on healing*, is tied to the personality of the pastor. Since its founding in the 1990s, it has not established any branches. The Spiritan ministry of Rev. Fr. Edeh, a Catholic priest, also focuses on healing and is tied to the personality of the priest. Others are more open and have branches. They include the Winners Chapel, the Charismatic Movement, the Solid Rock Church, the Foursquare Gospel Church, and the Open Bible Church. It is impossible to count or keep track of these churches, as they spring up very fast. Most of them engage in televangelism, with healing and prosperity as their main topics.

Distinctive Features of Christianity in Nigeria. An impressionistic picture emerges from a listing of the features of various churches. While some of these features are common to all the churches, some are particular to certain churches.

Common to all the churches is the highly structured nature of the leadership. In the African Instituted Churches, some of which were either founded or are led by women, women* play significant leadership roles. In the other churches, even though women constitute about 70% of the membership and workforce, they occupy very few leadership positions. Probably because of the influence of the male-oriented traditional culture, there is no massive movement to change the situation. Only recently have women Liberation theologians appeared on the scene (see Circle of Concerned African Women Theologians).

All churches take theological* education seriously. The Roman Catholic Church has 10 theological seminaries with an average of 350 students in each, 1 graduate school of theology jointly operated with other West African Bishops Conferences, and 5 universities, one of which is operated by the Nigerian Bishop’s Conference and the others by different Catholic organizations and individuals. The other churches have several theological colleges and seminaries, and more than 20 universities between them. In the Catholic Church, seminary training lasts five to seven years beyond secondary school, while some churches require two or three years of training beyond secondary school.

Ecumenism is a vital rallying point for a Nigerian Christianity that faces a constant threat from Islamic* insurgency. It is concretized in the formation of the Christian Association of Nigeria at the national and state levels, and the establishment of a Christian Social Center in Abuja, the nation’s capital. However, there is still much to be done at the level of theological and pastoral unity of the churches.

All the churches express a concern for the poor* through community development projects and material relief programs. They also take the worldview of the people seriously. In a situation where nearly every disease is attributed to evil spirits and many people cannot afford to pay hospital bills, midnight rituals and healing* services, hitherto practiced only in the African Instituted Churches, have become important features of Nigerian Christianity, cutting across all denominations. Inculturation*, including the introduction of elements from contemporary “pop culture,” such as the playing of guitars and trumpets during worship, is practiced by all the churches, including the Roman Catholic Church. This has led to a reduction of the traditional European elements in Christian worship such that, e.g., a Roman Catholic from Europe would find it difficult to feel at home at some Nigerian eucharistic celebrations.

Nigerian churches are very missionary minded. Many of the locally founded churches, such as the Brotherhood of the Cross and Star, take their evangelistic crusades to the USA and Britain, and have outposts in these countries. The Roman Catholic Church sends missionaries to the USA and Europe. In the 1990s, the Missionary Society of St. Paul was established by the Nigerian Catholic hierarchy to train and send priests to various parts of the world. The priests of this missionary society work in many parts of Africa, the Caribbean, and the USA.

In 1994 an apparition of the Blessed Virgin Mary* experienced by a teenage Catholic girl in Aope, Benue State, was in the news all over the country. The apparition was accompanied by messages calling for repentance and conversion. Large crowds of people visited the apparition grounds to witness the event, which was reported to take place weekly. Since then, the place has become a center of pilgrimage*, although the Nigerian Catholic hierarchy has neither officially condemned nor commended the incident.

In the early 21st c., the conservative Convocation of Anglicans in North America (CANA) placed itself under the spiritual jurisdiction of Archbishop Peter Akinola, Anglican* primate of Nigeria.

Some of the African Instituted Churches use the Bible and particularly the Psalms as a means of protection against evil spirits. They counsel members to sleep with the Bible under their pillow (see Bible Interpretation Cluster: In Africa). Only two sacraments* are emphasized in these churches: baptism* and the Eucharist*. In the Brotherhood of the Cross and Star and the Cherubim and Seraphim churches, baptism is administered in rivers by immersion and the Eucharist is celebrated with peanuts and cookies. Marriage* is not emphasized and is rarely celebrated.

Christianity faces constant confrontation by Islamic fundamentalists. Nearly every year, serious clashes occur between Christians and Muslims, resulting in the burning of churches and mosques, and the killing and maiming of people, particularly in the Muslim-dominated northern part of the country. One such clash occurred because a Christian unknowingly drove his car over a Qur'an that a Muslim had accidentally dropped on the road.

Christianity has helped to bring Western civilization to Nigeria and to form an educated generation of Nigerians that led the fight for Nigeria's independence. The missionaries helped to reduce mortality and morbidity by introducing Western medical services in the country. By studying some Nigerian languages and committing them to writing, Christian missionaries have contributed immensely to the development of these languages. However, because the current wave of Christianity came to Nigeria alongside the colonization* of the country, some Africans see it as heavily implicated in the colonization of Nigeria and as a form of imperialism*, particularly as it has displaced the African Religion of the people. In a country with a strong Christian presence, corruption, embezzlement of public funds, tribalism*, and the big divide between the rich and the poor in the midst of enormous natural wealth constitute an embarrassment to Christian witness. See also AFRICAN RELIGION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: WESTERN AFRICA; PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: WESTERN AFRICA; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: WESTERN AFRICA.

Statistics: Population (2000): 111.5 million (M) (main ethnic groups: Yoruba, 17.5%; Hausa, 17.2%, Igbo, 13.3%, Toroobe Fulani, 4.9%, Yerwa Kanuri, 3.0%). Christians, 51 M, 45.9% (independents, 21 M; Anglicans, 20 M; Protestants, 14 M; Roman Catholics, 13.4 M; 17 M of these Christians are doubly affiliated, identifying themselves with more than one denomination); Muslims, 49 M, 43.9%; African Religionists, 11 M, 9.8%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

JUSTIN UKPONG

Nikon, Patriarch (1605–81), sixth patriarch of the Russian Orthodox* Church and architect of church reforms. Shortly after ascending to the patriarchal throne (1652), Nikon brought Russian liturgical and textual traditions into line with contemporary Greek norms in an effort to reform the church and to centralize the power of the patriarchy. His changes (especially the new hellenized spelling of “Jesus” and the revised sign of the cross) encountered fierce resistance across Russia and engendered the Old* Believer Movement. Nikon’s reforms were accepted at a Russian church council (1666–67), but the patriarch was removed from the throne for extending his power into secular domains.

ROY R. ROBSON

Niles, Daniel Thambyrajah (1908–70), along with Paul Devanandan and M. M. Thomas*, was seminal in shaping the ecumenical movement and the theological conversation in South Asia. A deeply committed Methodist, like Wesley* D. T. Niles shaped his books through his sermons and ministry rather than through a theological system. Although influenced by the neo*-orthodox thought prevalent in the ecumenical movement, he was also a contextual* theologian searching to understand the theological message for particular places and times. Deeply Christocentric (see Uniqueness of Christ), Niles nevertheless clearly believed he could live out his faith only in the midst of discussion and interaction with people of other faiths with equal passion and commitment. His ability to hold together seemingly opposite ideas as complementary ones helped him provide vision for the church in the early 1900s. See also INDIA.

DAMAYANTHI M. A. NILES

Nil Sorsky (c1433–1508), monk and spiritual leader of the Russian trans-Volgan fathers. Nil traveled throughout the Christian East, including Jerusalem and Mount Athos*, and learned hesychasm*. In Russia*, Nil founded a cloister on the Sora River. He taught a form of monasticism* that questioned the need for worldly goods, making him known as a “Non-Possessor.” He also taught the importance of simplicity, tolerance, and mystical* Christianity. Although most large monastic communities did not follow his example, his influence spread through small hermitages. Nil’s Rule was revived at the famed Optina Monastery in 19th-c. Russia.

ROY R. ROBSON

Ninety-five Theses, questions for academic debate posted by Luther*, October 31, 1517, and sent to church authorities. They challenged current teaching and practice concerning indulgences*, which were clearly subject to abuse and later reformed at the Council of Trent*. The theses open with a statement that the whole Christian life should be one of penance*, and end with an exhortation to follow Christ through tribulation as the way to genuine peace.

Ninian (c360–c432), first Christian missionary to Scotland and Northern England. Although many traditions are not historically verifiable, there is no doubt that Ninian was the first bishop of Galloway after planting a church (c397) and later a monastery in Whithorn, and that his mission was particularly successful among the Celts*.

Nino or Nina (early 4th c.), venerated as a saint, “equal to the apostles and the enlightener of Georgia”; a Cappadocian woman, who converted the royal family (King Mirian and Queen Nana) of Iberia (Eastern Georgia*). According to the Georgian tradition, she preached the gospel and performed healings first in Rome, then in Georgia; according to the Western tradition, she was brought to Georgia as a slave of the royal family.

Nisibis, School of. Founded under Bishop Barsauma, with Narsai (d502) as first head, and joined by scholars from Edessa* after 489, the school flourished (until the 7th c.) as an East Syrian center of exegesis and liturgical studies. Statutes from 496 and 590 reveal the school’s community life. From Nisibis emerged the genre of “cause” literature on the origins of liturgical feasts. During Henana’s directorate, a controversy over the normative role of Theodore* of Mopsuestia led to the exodus of many teachers and students. The school was also famous in the West and served as a model for Cassiodorus’s plan of study for monks.

UTE POSSEKEL

Njangali, Florence Spetume (1908–84), canon in the Anglican Church and member of the revival movement in Uganda*; first woman deacon in East Africa (1973); campaigner for women’s ministry in the Anglican Church. Njangali actively influenced the decision to allow women’s* ordination as priests (1980).

ROBERT KAGGWA

Noah, son of Lamech, was the father of Shem, Ham, and Japheth. He found favor with God, built an ark, survived the Flood*, and ultimately preserved humanity (Gen 6–9). After the Flood,

God made a covenant* with Noah never to destroy life on earth again. In later biblical texts (Isa 54:9; Matt 24:37–38), Noah is recognized as righteous (Ezek 14:14, 20; 1 Pet 2:5) and a person of great faith (Heb 11:7). Early church commentators noted Noah's obedience, seeing him as a new Adam*. Conversely, early rabbinical commentators questioned his righteousness because of his drunkenness (Gen 9:21).

JEFFRY C. DAVIS

Nobili, Roberto de (1577–1656), a controversial Jesuit missionary in Indian Church history, began his work in Madurai (South India, 1606), questioning the Portuguese approach to mission and initiating a “new Madurai mission” that defined what it is to be a Christian within the Indian cultural context.

His option to work among the Hindu* society elite had consequences in the mission field. But Nobili was very creative. Having mastered Tamil and Sanskrit, he cited Sanskrit sources in his three Latin treatises, in which he spoke highly of Indian culture and civilization, for an European audience. Conversely, his Tamil writings sought to communicate traditional Roman Catholic Christian doctrines and to prove the superiority of Christianity over Hinduism through arguments based on the scholastic theology of his time. But the God of reason did not win over his audience.

Nobili attempted to differentiate sociocultural aspects, such as the caste* system, the wearing of saffron, the “sacred thread,” and tuft of hair by Brahmins, and vegetarianism, from Hindu religion. This was an insightful way of carrying out his mission but, in the context of the Indian worldview, where it is not clear where culture* ends and religion begins, his efforts were misguided and failed.

The most important aspect of his missionary approach was his search for a sense of a pristine and monotheistic God in India, and he found it in the concept of Brahman, the one, true, immaterial God dimly apprehended through the natural light of reason – as Paul referred to the “unknown God” before the Athenians (Acts 17). But his zeal to prove that his religion was the fulfillment of all others prevented him from appreciating the nuances of the Hindu concept of God. Nevertheless, the questions he raised remain relevant and still need to be adequately answered. What is it to be a Christian in the Indian cultural context? Could the Christian message be made intelligible to people of India by using symbols of Indian religions? In intercultural and interreligious dialogue*, Nobili's approach calls for a revisioning of the mission* in India today. See also INDIA.

ANAND AMALADASS

Nominalism views universals not as “real” but only as names or concepts in the mind. Most likely developed by Johannes Roscellinus (Abelard's* teacher), it became an issue in 1092 when Roscellinus was accused of tritheism*, affirming three persons but denying the “reality” of unity in the divine essence. Nominalists of the later Middle Ages (beginning with William* of Ockham) argued that many theological concepts have no grounding in reality and can be resolved only by revelation*. Deconstruction (see Postmodernism and Liberation Theologies) advances a nominalist view that order is imposed by human discourse. Feminists* also do so when critiquing the “essentialism” in facile assumptions regarding women. Many postmodern, postcolonial, and Liberation theologies (see Liberation Theologies Cluster; Postmodernism and Liberation Theologies; Postmodernism and Theology; Postcolonialism and Christian Theology) as well as contemporary cultural studies of Christianity (see Culture Cluster: Culture and Christianity Cluster) adopt similar nominalist positions. See also UNIVERSALS.

Nomina Sacra (Lat “sacred names”), in (handwritten) Christian manuscripts, abbreviations of “Jesus,” “Christ,” “Lord,” “God,” and other holy names formed by the first and last letters (omitting the intervening letters), with a line over both letters. This is the practice of most early Christian manuscripts. See also CHI-RHO; IHS; INRI.

Nomocanon in the Eastern Orthodox* Church, a collection of laws including both canons* of the church and imperial laws; it reflected a close alliance between church* and state in the Orthodox world. It was compiled in different versions from the 6th c. (John Scholasticus) and the 8th c. (Photios*) to the 13th c.

Nonconformists, a term first applied to those Protestants (soon called “Puritans*”) who declined to conform to certain prescriptions of the Church of England's 1559 Book of Common* Prayer. With the Act of Uniformity (1662) requiring assent to “all and everything” in the revised Book of Common Prayer, more than 2,000 clergy (of some 9,000) refused to comply, and “Nonconformist” then meant separation from the Church of England. Until the 19th c., “Dissenters*” was the more common term for groups such as Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Baptists. By the late 19th c., "free churches" became the favored label, implying a positive rather than negative difference from the established church.

DALE A. JOHNSON

Nonconformity and Theological Education. Protestant Nonconformity in Britain emerged after 1660 from the restoration of the Church of England as the nation's established church (see United Kingdom). Its 17th-c. groups included Presbyterians*, Congregationalists*, and Baptists*; later Evangelical movements such as Methodism* were subsumed under the label "Nonconformist."

Since their members were excluded from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, Nonconformist places of theological* education first took shape as "Dissenting academies," often conducted in the homes of local ministers. Several of these provided the basis for the more substantial "theological colleges" formed by the mid-19th c., with more than one tutor and 25–40 students. By 1850 Congregationalists had more than a dozen colleges (three in Wales, one in Scotland), Baptists six (two in Wales), and Presbyterians one. With greater central government, English Methodists established branches of the Theological Institution in Manchester (1842) and London (1843), followed later by additional branches in Leeds and Birmingham.

General programs of study involved a literary course (languages, philosophy, mathematics, and science) of two to three years and a theological course of three to four years. With no capacity to offer degrees, colleges could only hope that students would stay the full course. Many feared the loss of faith* that would come when piety was married to education, while the colleges argued that the education of ministers had to keep up with the general educational pattern within the churches. The absence of denominational support for Congregational and Baptist colleges often placed the institutions in financial straits.

Opening the older universities to Nonconformists after 1870 produced a new pattern: separation of the arts and theology courses and the relocation of several colleges to Oxford, Cambridge, Manchester, and Bristol. First to move was the Congregationalist Spring Hill College to Oxford in 1886, taking the name Mansfield College. Others followed over the next 40 years, enabling the denominations to think of themselves as integral parts of the larger society.

This development provided the foundation for yet another pattern that emerged in the later part of the 20th c., the establishment of theological federations of colleges in ecumenical partnerships, usually connected with a university and often including Anglican institutions. In addition to greater resources provided by such relationships and the ability to offer various degrees and certificates, these programs frequently included emphases on mission* and on education for laity* in a variety of ministry situations.

DALE A. JOHNSON

Nonjurors, English and Scottish clergy who, when William III came to the throne (1688), refused to swear allegiance on grounds that they would violate their previous oath to James II; hence they were also called Jacobites. Disobeying the law of the realm, they kept their own hierarchy and worshipped separately. Most adhered to the doctrine of the divine* right of kings, which also meant passive obedience to established authority.

Nonviolence, refusal, especially for religious or moral reasons, to use violent means to defend oneself (e.g. Matt 5:37–48) or achieve one's goals. See also KING, MARTIN LUTHER, JR.; MENNONITES; PACIFISM AND CHRISTIANITY; PEACE CHURCHES.

Norbert of Xanten (c1080–1134), Reformer, founder of the Premonstratensians. Following his conversion* (1115), he tried to reform the house of canons* in his hometown of Xanten. At his request, Pope Gelasius II permitted him to be a wandering preacher in Northern France. The order of Premontr  was founded (1120) with the aid of the bishop of Laon; an order of canons* living under the Augustinian* Rule, it was recognized by the pope (1126). Norbert became archbishop of Magdeburg (1196) and helped prevent a renewal of the investiture* controversy.

Nordic Countries. See DENMARK; FINLAND; LUTHERANISM CLUSTER: IN NORDIC COUNTRIES; NORWAY; SWEDEN.

North Africa. See HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: NORTH AFRICA.

North America. See CANADA; QUEBEC; UNITED STATES.

North India, Church of (CNI), is a united and uniting church formed in 1970 that brought together six denominations after 41 years of dialogue. The denominations that united were the Council of Baptist Churches in Northern India, the Church of the Brethren* in India, the Disciples* of Christ, the Church of India (formerly the [Anglican] Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon), the Methodist Church (British and Australasian Conferences), and the United Church of North India (Congregationalists and Presbyterians). In the early 21st c., the CNI had a membership of 1.25 million in 3,000 pastorates covering, despite its name, all of India, with the exception of Kerala, Tamil Nadu, Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka, and Lakshwadeep Islands.

Espousing a firm belief in the Apostles* and Nicene* Creeds, the CNI makes an attempt to draw on the theological insights of all its constituent churches. Its union and life as a united church have made possible the evolution of theological positions that are both ecumenical and contextual*. Likewise its liturgy represents the diversity of its constituent member churches and seeks to articulate the love of God in the midst of present reality.

The polity* of the CNI brings together the Episcopal*, Presbyterian*, and Congregational* elements of its constituent members. In its episcopacy, the CNI is both constitutional – bishops are appointed and perform their duties according to the constitution – and in historic continuity with the early church. Furthermore, the CNI is not committed to any one interpretation of episcopacy.

The CNI is divided into 26 dioceses, each with a bishop. The highest body, the synod, meets once every three years to elect an executive committee and a moderator, who acts as the presiding bishop and the head of the church.

The CNI is made up largely of members of subaltern communities: Dalits* (“outcastes,” about 150–200 million persons) and Adivasis* (about 60–70 million “original dwellers of the land,” indigenous persons). Therefore, the CNI has always been actively involved in social action and solidarity with subaltern communities through its social and health service boards. This solidarity is also expressed in a theological and pastoral praxis and mission agenda (see Dalit Theology). The CNI is committed to becoming radically transformed and to transforming communities. See also INDIA; SOUTH INDIA, CHURCH OF. ENOS DAS PRADHAN

Norway. Most Norwegians presently combine a public ritual Christianity limited to important life transitions and a strong private Christian religiosity, although there is tension between a large state church with modest demands on its members and groups (including Charismatic groups), inside and outside the state church, whose doctrinal and ethical demands on their members are much stricter.

The transition from Norse to Christian religion lasted about two centuries, through trade contacts with Europe, Viking raids, and missions from England, Germany, and Denmark. Having died (1030) fighting for Christianity, King Olaf* Haraldsson gained a reputation as a saint, which strongly contributed to the spread of Christianity among Norwegians. In 1539, when Norway was a weak province of Denmark, the Reformation was decreed by the Danish–Norwegian king. In the 17th c. an absolute monarchy was combined with a strict, law-protected Lutheran orthodoxy.

A process of religious pluralization of the monolithic Lutheran culture began in the 19th c. Norway was separated from Denmark* and entered a union with Sweden* (1814). The new constitution consolidated the state* church. In 1845 religious freedom was established; Methodists, Baptists, Lutheran free churches, and others progressively organized, but their membership never became large. Ascetic* revivalist* movements remained within the state church, because the lay preacher Hans Nielsen Hauge*, who inspired these movements, was loyal to the state church, despite his criticism of its religion.

By 2000 about 86% of Norwegians were members of the state church, while the number of Roman Catholics, Muslims, and Buddhists grew with the arrival of immigrants and refugees after 1970. Many Lapps (the Sami people, an old ethnic minority) joined a conservative Christian movement within the state church, that of the Laestadians.

While a large majority of the population takes part in life cycle rites (baptism, confirmation, weddings, funeral services) and Christmas Eve worship services, only 2 to 3% attend services on Sunday. The Church of Norway performs some “civil* religion” functions on solemn national occasions or in times of crisis. By contrast, the relatively few members of free* churches (and members of conservative religious organizations within the state church) frequently attend meetings; yet the free churches are stagnating. Charismatic groups (mostly within the state church) have grown rapidly since 1970.

The Church of Norway has a complicated system of state and ecclesiastical government, with an increasing role given to democratically elected councils. The first female pastor was ordained in 1961. In 2000, out of 11 bishops 2 were women.

In public schools, all pupils receive religious education. Christianity dominates in the curriculum, but religious tolerance and dialogue are emphasized. Theological education with liberal tendencies was established with the first university (1816). In reaction, the more conservative Norwegian Lutheran School of Theology (Menighetsfakultetet; 1907) was established. The recently founded Missionary College provides theological education for the many missionaries (sent since 1850 around the world).

Christians involved in 19th-c. revivalist* movements combined modernizing concerns for individuals and social issues and anti-modernizing ethical impulses. During the 20th c., these groups strove to maintain a Christian stamp on social institutions (e.g. public schools) while fighting liberal laws (e.g. on abortion). Despite these conservative trends, the Church of Norway broadened its Christian ethical commitments in a liberal direction to include social (global exploitation; discrimination against immigrants), ecological*, peace*, and sexuality* issues. Although less importance is now given to doctrinal issues and more to spirituality*, Norwegian churches remain relatively conservative, dogmatically speaking.

A charter member of the World* Council of Churches, the Church of Norway participates in the Christian Council in Norway, which provides a forum for dialogue among all denominations and facilitates some dialogue with Muslims and Buddhists.

Statistics: Population (2000): 4.46 million (M). Christians, 4.2 M, 94.7% (Protestants, 4.14 M; independents, 0.13 M; Roman Catholics, 0.04 M); Muslims, 0.06 M; nonreligious, 0.11 M. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

PÅL REPSTAD

Notes of the Church. See MARKS OF THE CHURCH, NOTES OF THE CHURCH.

Novatianism, rigorist movement in the Western Church that grew out of the Decian* persecution (249–50). Novatian was a Roman presbyter who opposed the election of Cornelius and became a rival bishop of Rome. He and his followers revived the position of the Montanists* that those who committed serious sins* must be excluded permanently from the church.

Novena, Roman Catholic devotion with special prayers on nine successive days, in imitation of the apostles' nine-day preparation between the Ascension* and Pentecost*.

Novice, Novitiate, new member of a religious community who is under probation, and may be dismissed or may voluntarily leave.

Number of the Beast, 666 (Rev 13:28; in some manuscripts, 616). Hebrew and Greek letters had numerical values, suggesting a connection between names and numbers. It has often been argued that the letters for "Neron Kaisar" (Greek for "Nero the Emperor"), when written in Hebrew, add up to the number of the beast.

Numbers, fourth book of the Pentateuch*, recounts Israel's wilderness* journey from Mount Sinai to Canaan*. Its title derives from the census lists in Num 1 and 26.

The book moves from preparations for Israel's march through the wilderness* (Num 1–10), the old generation's slide into rebellion and death (11–20), to signs of hope* in the midst of the death of the old generation (21–25), and the rise of a new generation on the edge of the Promised* Land (26–36).

Numbers was compiled by priestly groups in the 5th c. BCE to provide renewed identity, devotion, and hope to Jews who returned from the Babylonian Exile* (587 BCE) to Judah* under the aegis of the Persian Empire.

Earlier wilderness journey traditions associated with Northern Israel (Ephraim) (e.g. Ps 78) were reshaped in Numbers as a paradigm for all Israel, offering both warning and hope for the reconstruction of the Jewish community after the Exile. The unique prophetic authority of Moses* (Num 12) was supplemented by affirmations of Aaron's* authority as high priest (Num 16–17, 25), reflecting shifting leadership patterns in the postexilic Jewish community.

Numbers encouraged diligent obedience to the Torah*, offered hope to returnees from the Exile as a new generation in the Promised Land, reinvigorated devotion to a rebuilt Jerusalem* Temple* (symbolized by the wilderness Tabernacle* in Num 1–10), and supplemented earlier biblical law codes with new legal traditions and interpretations (e.g. Zelophehad's daughters in Num 27, 36).

Numbers includes the Aaronic priestly blessing* (Num 6:22–27), the manna story (11; see John 6), the miraculous water from the rock (20; see 1 Cor 10), the bronze serpent (21; see John 3), and Balaam's* promise about a future king and a star (24:17; see Matt 2).

DENNIS T. OLSON

Nun, strictly speaking, a woman leading an enclosed* life; in popular usage, any woman under religious* vows. See also WOMEN'S RELIGIOUS ORDERS CLUSTER.

Nunc Dimittis, Simeon's song (Luke 2:29–32), named from its opening words in Latin; used in daily prayer since the 4th c.

Nuncio, permanent diplomatic representative of the Roman See* to a government (the representative to the USA is called an "apostolic delegate" because of the differentiation of church* and state).

Nuptial Mass includes the ritual celebration of Christian marriage*, which takes place within the liturgy of the Word and after the homily. On a day other than a Sunday or feast day, the liturgical texts (prayers and biblical readings) may be chosen by the couple from options within the Roman Missal and Lectionary. The nuptial blessing is normally imparted by the assisting minister within the Communion rite after the Lord's Prayer and before the peace.

KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ

Oak, Synod of the (403), synod held by order of Emperor Arcadius in a suburb of Chalcedon, attended by enemies of John* Chrysostom, most of them from Egypt. Condemned on 29 charges, Chrysostom was removed from the See of Constantinople and exiled by the emperor. Soon recalled because of popular protest, he was nevertheless permanently exiled the next year.

Oath, solemn appeal to God, or another sacred person or thing, as witness that a statement is true or a promise is binding. Christian groups that forbid oaths (following Matt 5:33–37) are often permitted to make an “affirmation” rather than take an oath.

Obadiah, one of the Twelve Prophets; shortest book of the OT, comprising only 21 verses, mostly in poetic form characterized by vivid language and imagery. Obadiah (Heb “servant” or “worshipper of YHWH”) was identified by later Jewish tradition (Sanh. 39b) with King Ahab’s administrator (1 Kgs 18:3–16), yet this is a relatively common biblical name, possibly that of a Judean prophet of the 6th c. BCE.

The book, identified as a “vision” of Obadiah (v. 1; cf. Isa 1:1; Nah 1:1), begins with a prophetic judgment against Edom, Judah’s hostile neighbor, possibly alluding to its having seized part of the Judean territory during the Babylonian rule. The book consists of two sections: (1) an oracle against Edom (vv. 1–14), announcing the coming defeat of Edom (vv. 1–9) and describing Edom’s crime against Judah (vv. 10–14); and (2) the day of YHWH (vv. 15–21), proclaiming both the coming judgment* to all nations and the deliverance of Israel (vv. 15–18), when the Promised Land previously occupied by other nations will be repossessed by Jerusalem and the kingdom shall be YHWH’s (vv. 19–21).

The oracle against Edom is well connected with the “oracles against nations” of other prophetic books, especially Jer 49:7–22; Ezek 25:12–14; Amos 1:11–12, 9:12; and Joel 3:19. The pronouncement of the coming judgment upon Edom (vv. 1–14) broadens to include all nations on the “day of the Lord” (vv. 15–21). Thus through the centuries, “Edom” has been interpreted as symbolic of the alien outside world that will be condemned.

PHILIP CHIA PHIN YIN

Oblate, in the early Middle Ages, a child dedicated to a monastery*; more recently, any person devoted to specific work in a monastery.

Oblation, bread and wine offered at the time of the offertory* for consecration in the Eucharist*; by extension other gifts presented during the service for charitable purposes.

Ockham (Occam), William of (c1285–c1347), Scholastic philosopher, controversial theologian, political writer; was born in England, entered the Franciscan* order, was educated at Oxford and Paris, studied with Duns Scotus*. While teaching at the University of Paris (1320–23), he composed works on Aristotelian physics and logic. His work on the rule of parsimony (already apparent in Aristotle*), known as “Ockham’s [or more usually Occam’s] razor,” asserting that theories should not be multiplied without necessity, has been used ever since to assess competing theories in a broad range of disciplines (sciences, philosophy, theology, law). Ockham’s major contribution to Scholastic metaphysics* was his distrust of claims of human certitude with respect to the reality of universals*; universals are “names,” mental “abstractions,” rather than existing things in reality. The contention that Ockham was simply a nominalist* is now widely contested. Ockham argued that everything real is individual and particular. Thus he came to reject the assumption that matters of faith* were also matters of reality, thereby criticizing the ontology argued for by Aquinas*. Therefore, the immortality* of the soul* and the existence, unity, and infinity of God* are not matters of reality discernible by human reason*; they are matters of faith through revelation* alone. Later in his career (after 1328), Ockham devoted himself to ecclesiastical politics, joining the Franciscan dispute with Pope John XXII over apostolic poverty* and church possessions, and arguing for a strict separation of church* and state on religious grounds.

DAVID W. ODELL-SCOTT

Offertory, originally an anthem* sung during the Mass* while the people's offerings were collected and the elements were placed on the altar; currently, that part of the worship* service during which offerings are made.

Office, Divine, daily public worship services of the Western Church. In the early church, the practice of the Divine Office was simply a series of stated times for prayer during the day. The monastic movement appropriated it and made it more formal (see Benedict, Rule of). The usage spread to the nonmonastic clergy during the Middle Ages. The Breviary* is a compilation of prayers and readings for the Divine Office for private as well as public use. (The Divine Office should not be confused with the Divine* Liturgy of the Eastern Orthodox* Church.) See also DIVINE OFFICE OF THE LITURGY OF THE HOURS.

Olaf Haraldsson (995–1030), patron saint of Norway*. A Viking king baptized in Rouen (1012), he established Christian laws in Norway and brought English clergy to the country (1016). Forced into exile (1028), slain in Stiklestad while trying to return (1030), like Christ, he attained victory through death. His cult* quickly spread, and his reliquary* in Nidaros Cathedral became a site of pilgrimage*. He was canonized* in 1164, and presented as a martyr*, model Christian, and “eternal king of Norway” in the Divine* Office for St. Olaf (feast, July 29). Hundreds of European and North American churches are dedicated to him. The number of people who go on pilgrimage to Nidaros (now Trondheim) continues to grow.

VIDAR L. HAANES

Old Believers (Russian, starovery), also known as staroobiradtsy (Old Ritualists), is a generic term for a diverse group of religious dissidents who separated from the Russian Orthodox* Church in the late 17th c. because of changes in the Russian Orthodox liturgy (1660s). The violent methods used by the reformers, social and economic disasters, and eschatological* sentiment led to religious unrest. In the 18th–19th c., the important centers of Old Believers were in the north (on the White Sea), the trans-Volga region, the border between Russia* and the Polish Commonwealth, the Baltic provinces, Bessarabia, Moscow, the Urals, and Siberia, but their geographic distribution was uneven.

According to official data, 190,944 persons registered as Old Believers in 1716–26 and as a consequence paid a double poll tax. To avoid this tax, many Old Believers remained nominal members of the Orthodox Church. Thus the actual number of Old Believers could not be precisely determined until 1905, when they were granted full legal rights. In 1912 there were 1.8 million Old Believers (less than 2.5% of the population in the Russian Empire). However, the Old Believers' strength lay not in their numbers but in their literacy, economic power, and strong communal identity.

Except during a period of enlightened toleration (1763–1814), the imperial government did not grant legal rights to Old Believers and tried to assimilate them into the Orthodox population. They finally received the same legal rights as the Orthodox Church in 1905. In the Soviet Union, the number of Old Believers declined owing to religious repression, and some migrated to Australia, the USA, South America, China, and European countries. After the breakdown of the Soviet Union (1991), there was a revival of Old Believer religious life, but its impact remained limited in post-Soviet Russia.

There are two main types of Old Believers: priestly (popovtsy) Old Believers, who differ from the mainstream Orthodox Church only on the issue of ritual; and priestless (bespopovtsy) Old Believers, who accept lay ministry and have fewer sacraments than the Orthodox Church. Among priestly Old Believers, some (beglopopovtsy) recruit priests from the Orthodox Church, while others (belokrinitskie) have had their own church hierarchy since 1846, when the Bosnian bishop Amvrosii (Popovich) ordained bishops for the “Old Orthodox Christian Church.” The priestless Old Believers have many divisions (ranging from moderate to radical), which are divided over the understanding of the Antichrist* and other eschatological views (see Eschatology and Apocalypticism in Orthodox Eastern Europe) and over the role of sacraments. Marriage* became a subject of fierce debate among priestless Old Believers: some advocated celibacy* as the only way to salvation* (in the absence of priests who could perform the sacrament of matrimony); others concluded that marriage was a sacrament performed by God that a priest merely witnessed (see Marriage, Theology and Practice of, Cluster: In Eastern Orthodoxy). Moderate Old Believers who kept their own rites were recognized by the Orthodox Church and formed the United Faith (Edinoverie, officially approved in 1801).

Old Believers preserved the medieval Orthodox rite and liturgy, including the monophonic (znamennyi) chant of Byzantine origin, traditional iconography, and book culture.

Generally, Old Believers' culture and way of life are regarded as reflecting the way of life typical of Russia before Westernization under Peter the Great.

Like many other religious dissenters, Old Believers were and are active in trade and business, differing from average Russian peasants by their well-organized and sustainable agricultural economy. For both priestly and priestless Old Believers, the role of the laity is conspicuous. Laypeople interpret the Scripture and participate in interconfessional debates. Women as a rule have a higher status among Old Believers, both in everyday life and in religious life than do women in the Russian Orthodox Church; among priestless Old Believers, it is not unusual for women to carry out the roles of ministers (cf. Women's Ordination Cluster: In the Orthodox Church).

IRINA PAERT

Old Catholic Church, separated from the Roman Catholic Church in 1870–71 in protest against the promulgation of the dogma of the doctrinal infallibility* of the pope (First Vatican* Council, 1869–70) “as an innovation contrary to the traditional faith of the Church.” After the signing of a letter of protest (by 1,400 German laypeople and clergy, September 1870) and the excommunication* by the pope of leaders of the protest (including Johann Joseph Ignaz von Döllinger), a first Old Catholic congress met in Munich (1871) with representatives from Germany*, Austria*, and Switzerland*. The main tenets were adherence to the ancient “catholic faith” and its origin in the early church, the rejection of “new dogmas,” and the reformation of the Roman Catholic Church. The affirmation that the (Old) Catholic Church (as independent from Rome) was the true Catholic Church – an affirmation accepted by several governments in Germany and Switzerland – led to the Old Catholics' claim on church buildings and other properties owned until then by the Roman Catholic Church in these countries. Other congresses (Cologne, 1872; Breisgau, 1874; Breslau, 1876; Baden-Baden, 1880; Krefeld, 1884) and synods established the Old Catholic Church, following models of earlier groups in the Netherlands*, resulting in the election of a first bishop, Professor Joseph H. Reinkens (1873, ordained by the non-Roman archbishop of Utrecht). In 1874 they abolished the requirement of clerical celibacy* and declared the “Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany” to be autonomous, episcopal, synodal in organization, and catholic in liturgy. Beyond the German-speaking countries in Europe, the Old Catholic Church spread to Poland* and North America, and in 1995 had a worldwide membership of approximately 800,000.

Old Latin Version (Vetus Latina), Latin translation of the Bible from the Septuagint* and the Greek NT, probably completed in North Africa and Southern Gaul (late 2nd c.). There are three “text types,” K, I, and D, formerly known as the African, Italian, and European manuscript traditions, respectively. See also BIBLE TRANSLATIONS CLUSTER: EARLY TRANSLATIONS/VERSIONS.

Old Testament and Its Canonization. Speculating about the growth and development of the OT canon – the books of Tanakh* for Jews and of the OT for Christians – is complex and challenging because there are no surviving ancient records that describe the processes of its formation and recognition either by Jews or subsequently by Christians. Several references in books later included in the canon suggest that there was a recognition of their sacredness, but the reasons for including them in Tanakh/OT are nowhere explicitly stated. Essentially the literature that was included in the canon of Tanakh was that which clarified the identity and mission of the Jewish people as the people* of God and that subsequently had a similar function in the Christian community as its OT canon.

Initially this literature included the Law of Moses*, then the whole Pentateuch*, and later the additional books of the Prophets* and the Writings*. Torah, the Law or Pentateuch, was recognized as authoritative c500 BCE, the Prophets (Nebiim) c200 BCE, and the final collection of Writings (Ketubim) between the late 1st c. CE and the mid-2nd c. CE. The OT writings that gained sacred status among the Christians before their separation from the Jews (between 70 and 135 CE) included many books now classified as noncanonical books, the Apocrypha* and Pseudepigrapha* (see Septuagint).

The scope of Tanakh and the OT canon was not settled for either the Jews or the Christians before their separation, but those books that were considered sacred by the Jews of the 1st c. CE are the same books that were initially accepted as Scripture* by the early Christians. Both Jews and Christians ceased recognizing most of the pseudepigraphal writings by the 3rd c. CE, but most Christians continued to include in their OT much of the apocryphal literature. The Protestant churches later accepted the same OT sacred books that were recognized by rabbinic Judaism and included only 39 OT books. No official decisions settled the matter for either the Jews or the Christians. The primary criteria for inclusion in the Tanakh or OT were widespread use in the respective communities and adaptability to the needs of both religious communities.

The churches have never reached complete agreement on the scope of their OT. Also, the Christians, unlike the Jews, organized their OT canon with the Prophets at the end, pointing to the continuing revelation* of God in their NT. See also BIBLE, CANON OF.

LEE MARTIN McDONALD

Olga (Old Norse Helga, 890–969, christened Helena), Varangian princess, wife of Igor and mother of Svjatoslav (Sviatoslav), rulers of Kiev, regent during the early years of her son, grandmother of Vladimir*. In 957 she paid a visit to the Byzantine emperor Constantine VII in Constantinople* and was baptized by him. Her conversion and practice of Christianity in Kiev attest to the gradual process of Christianization of Kievan Rus' in connection with Byzantium*, rather than with Latin Christianity. See also UKRAINE.

PETRE GURAN

Olives, Mount of, a hill east of Jerusalem*. It is represented as a place of worship and revelation (2 Sam 15:32; Ezek 11:23; Zech 14:4). According to the Gospels, Jesus* met the crowd there on Palm* Sunday (Mark 11:1), taught there (Luke 21:37, 22:39), and prayed there after the Last* Supper (Mark 14:26); his ascension* took place nearby (Luke 24:50–51; Acts 1:12).

Olivi, Peter John (c1247–98), charismatic Franciscan* teacher in Narbonne, France. As the order gained prestige and influence, he became critical of Aristotle* and pagan philosophy; he defended a return to authentic Franciscan life in Questions on Evangelical Perfection. Controversy centered on his teachings on the vow of poverty* (usus pauper); these teachings were censured (1283), and his writings were banned by the order (1285). After being rehabilitated (1287), he taught at the convent of Santa Croce (Florence). Olivi's writings were in the tradition of Joachim* de Fiore and influenced Ubertino de Casale, the Spiritual Franciscans, and other 14th-c. members of apocalyptic* movements.

MARY BETH INGHAM, CSJ

Olympias (late 4th–early 5th c.), illustrious, wealthy noblewoman. She was born in Constantinople, the granddaughter of the Praetorian prefect and consul Ablabius. Around 385 she married the much older Nebridius, who became prefect of Constantinople (386). Soon widowed at the age of about 20, she refused to remarry, even when, to exert pressure, Theodosius* I forbade her to administer her own property. She adopted an ascetic* life and founded a monastery* next to the great church of Constantinople, where she became patron of bishops, monastics, and the poor, and presided over a center of spiritual life and influence in church and imperial politics. Gregory* Nazianzen wrote a poem for her wedding. Gregory* of Nyssa dedicated his commentary on the Song of Songs to her. She was ordained a deaconess* in her 30s by Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople (381–97). Two sisters, a niece, another relative, and 50 of her servants, among others, belonged to her monastery of 250 ascetic* women, which was later burned in the Nika riots of 532 under Justinian, but apparently rebuilt. Olympias is a saint of the Eastern Church.

Olympias was a friend, confidante, and loyal supporter of John* Chrysostom as bishop of Constantinople. After his exile (404), she too was tried and exiled because of her support of him. From exile John Chrysostom wrote 17 surviving letters to her; hers to him have not survived. Olympias died in exile before 419.

Several sources mention Olympias and her life, including the anonymous 5th-c. Life of Olympias; the 7th-c. Narration Concerning St. Olympias attributed to Sergia, a successor in her monastery; Palladius's* Lausiac History; and Sozomen's Ecclesiastical History. Sergia's account relates miraculous events surrounding the transfer of her bones from a grave outside the city to a place in her monastery. See also DEACONESS.

CAROLYN OSIEK

Omnipotence of God. God is omnipotent in that he is all-powerful, ruling over or administering all things and in all aspects. The Hebrew Shaddai is translated in Greek as Pantocrator (All-Ruling; LXX*), which became omnipotens (able to do everything) in Latin. In Christian usage, the term is found chiefly in the Book of Revelation* and the Apostles* Creed.

This language is rooted in the doctrine of creation*; finite things would not exist or have any power of action without the creating and sustaining activity of God. God's power is not merely physical "might"; it is power or authority exercised on and through the world and compatible with God's wisdom and goodness. Without God the world might not exist at all, or it might be a different kind of world; God is understood to be the cause of what is actual. (Note the differentiation between what might happen and what actually happens.)

The Scholastics* distinguished between God's "absolute power," all that God "can do," and God's "ordered power," what God actually wills to do; God acts consistently with God's own purposes (in creation*, covenant*, salvation*) and remains faithful to those purposes. Because God acts in a consistent way, it can happen that something that is "logically possible" will be "circumstantially impossible."

The reality of evil*, both in nature and in human life, raises issues of theodicy*: How could a good God create a world with so much suffering*, and a humanity that freely commits so many evil acts? Since the time of Plato*, some have posed a dilemma: given these facts, God must either be all-powerful but not good, or be good but not all-powerful. The Book of Job* seems at times to suggest the former, just as Paul must finish a discussion of election* with an exclamation about the unsearchable depths of God's ways (Rom 11:33–35).

Omnipotence is sometimes understood to be "omnicausality," whereby God not only causes but determines all events, including sin*; this was the position of the Stoics* and Spinoza* among philosophers, and Calvin* and Schleiermacher* among theologians.

Theologians have usually affirmed, however, that the omnipotent God "permits" sin. Thus for Barth*, because God wills to be "God for human beings" and calls them to respond, God made it possible to reject this call, i.e. to sin, although it is morally illegitimate, impossible, fruitless, and tragic to do it. Sin is the "impossible possibility," a contradiction of what both God and humanity properly are.

An influential response to the problem of evil* is found in the narrative of Joseph, whose brothers intended evil while God intended good (Gen 45:5–8). For Augustine*, God permitted only those kinds of evil that could be used to accomplish some good. While this may seem to be small consolation to those who suffer great evil, the emphasis is on God's activity to overcome it (thus for Tillich*, God is "the power of being to overcome nonbeing"). For Bonhoeffer*, God shares human suffering and rejection; God identifies with the oppressed* and has a "preferential* option for the poor" (Liberation* theology).

From these diverse perspectives, God's omnipotence is incompletely manifested in the present world. The eschatological* hope* is that Christ will subject all things to God (1 Cor 15:24–28; Phil 3:21; 1 Pet 3:22; Heb 2:5–8; Rev 19–21), not through an exercise of absolute power but through the establishment of a community in which God is "all in all" (1 Cor 15:28) or of the New Jerusalem in which God dwells with God's own people (Rev 21:1–4). See also GOD, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER.

EUGENE TESELLE

Omnipresence of God, God's presence "everywhere" or "to all." It is not that God is diffused throughout space and divided – hence the traditional dictum "All of God is everywhere," like a sphere whose center is at every point.

The objection that ancient Israel assumed that God is not present in Sheol* (Ps 88:4–5, 10–12) is contradicted in Ps 139:8. Is God too pure to behold evil* (Hab 1:13)? Conversely, does God dwell or abide in particular places? In the Tabernacle? In the Temple? In the faithful (John 6:56, 15:5; cf. 1 John 2:6)? Is God "more present" in Christ than elsewhere? In the debates over Christology*, it was agreed that the Incarnation* cannot mean that God is localized in Jesus. To avoid this view, the followers of Cyril* spoke of the Word's dwelling in Jesus' humanity, while the Antiochenes*, stressing God's transcendence of space and time, explained Jesus' unique relationship to God.

EUGENE TESELLE

Omniscience of God, God's all-knowing. The "all" is usually understood to include not only what is actual but also what is possible but never actualized. Traditionally, it was assumed that God's knowing is eternal*, without temporal sequence, so that all events are known "now" by God; God's "foreknowledge" of future events is really a "present knowledge" to God, without detriment to the human exercise of finite freedom. Modern theologians have generally favored a more "living" understanding of God, as knowing actual events as they occur, but against the background of God's awareness of all possibilities and God's purposes for what should be actualized. See also MIDDLE KNOWLEDGE; PREDESTINATION.

EUGENE TESELLE

Onesimus, the slave mentioned in the letter of Paul to Philemon*. Traditionally viewed as a runaway slave from Philemon's house, who has met Paul* in prison and been baptized by him; alternatively viewed as a slave who has gone legally to Paul for intercession. It is not clear whether Paul intended that Philemon free Onesimus. Without questioning the institution of slavery*, Paul defined a new relationship between slave and master.

Ontological Argument, classic argument that begins with a definition or description of God and concludes from it that God exists. It can be formulated in various ways: that the proposition “God is” is self-evidently true; that God’s essence includes God’s existence; or that God is “necessary being,” i.e. if God is possible, then God is necessary. The argument has been challenged for moving from thought to reality and for assuming that existence is a predicate included in a definition.

The classic expression of the argument is that by Anselm* (Proslogion 2–4). He begins with his characteristic theme of “faith* seeking understanding,” praying that he might understand that God is as he believes God to be. While Chap. 2 seems to deduce God from a definition, Chap. 3 evokes a way of discovery, for when one understands that God “truly is” (i.e. is self-existent), it becomes evident that God “cannot not exist.”

The ontological argument was challenged by Aquinas* and the Nominalists*, revived by Descartes* and Leibniz*, criticized by Kant*, and revived in an altered form by Hegel* (who saw it as thought’s self-transcendence in Absolute Spirit) and by Hartshorne* (who interpreted it as a recognition that God must be both absolute and relative). A diminished form of the argument, championed by Barth*, is that it is simply an explication of the contents of belief based on revelation*.

EUGENE TESELLE

Ontology, the part of philosophy that considers “being as being,” viewing it comprehensively and asking about the cause or causes of all that is. Aristotle* discusses these questions in his work on “first philosophy,” given the title of Metaphysics by its ancient editors (see Metaphysics and Christian Theology). Among the Greek philosophers, the Ionians first asked about physis, or “nature,” and answered in terms of matter and its movements; Plato* and Aristotle asked about the definiteness of things, and answered in terms of the “forms” that shape matter. But Aristotle also went on to consider “being as being,” and he generalized in terms of “potency” (what can be) and “act” (“actuality”; what is). His principle was that actualization, the change from potency to act, can occur only through the influence of something that is already “in act.” Thus the motions of the heavenly bodies stimulate the changes in earthly matter; in turn, all finite being is moved by divine being, which is fully actual, “pure act,” with no unactualized potentialities.

Subsequent thinkers developed this notion of God as “pure act.” Finite things, they said, “receive” or “have” or “participate in” being, while God “is” being, Being Itself. Boethius* and Avicenna* took the additional step of differentiating, with respect to every finite thing, what it is (its definiteness or essence) from that by which it is (its existence). Finite things come into existence and pass away, and their being, on this view, is actualized not by themselves but by God. This ontology based on the “real distinction” of essence and existence in all finite beings, and on God as Being Itself through whom all other things are actualized, was developed most completely by Thomas Aquinas*.

This ontology was criticized as indemonstrable in the later Middle Ages by the Nominalists*. A different approach was taken by the founder of modern philosophy, Descartes*, who gave primacy to thought rather than being; he started with the syllogism “I think, therefore I am,” then moved to God, and was able to connect thought with the external world only through God. Many see this emphasis on thought as the downfall of modern philosophy, although there were many attempts to connect thought with being, especially by Hegel* and Whitehead*. Another kind of criticism is found in Heidegger* and Derrida*, for whom the chief error is “ontotheology,” supposing that God can be known as the source of all other beings; the “différance” between beings and their being is affirmed, but the “being of beings” is concealed and is disclosed through interaction with human beings, with no transcendent source.

EUGENE TESELLE

Open Communion, celebration of Communion in which all who have faith in Christ are invited to take part in the Eucharist* (because it is an invitation from the Lord, and not from a given church). It is contrasted with the practice in certain churches of limiting Communion to their own members* or (in the Reformed* tradition) of fencing* the table to exclude those who have not made formal repentance*.

Ophites (from Gk for “serpent”; also Naasenes, from Heb for “serpent”), members of a Gnostic* movement that gave a special role to the serpent (Gen 3), on the grounds that creation* was imprisonment of humanity by a lesser deity; through the serpent, a higher deity led Adam* and Eve* to eat from the tree of true knowledge (Gen 3).

Oppression, Oppressed. Oppression is an important biblical theological concept, although traditionally it has not been considered to be such. However, in view of the numerous times oppression is mentioned in the HB, expressed by a great variety of Hebrew words, and its centrality in Israel's faith creed (Deut 26:5–9), some biblical scholars and theologians concluded that it is an important theological concept. In the NT, from the outset the gospel proclaims itself to be good news to the poor and oppressed (Luke 4:18; Matt 11:5). In the Bible, manifestations of oppression are most frequently mentioned in the economic* sphere, in which the victims are poor*, impoverished because of other people's sin* of greed. However, theologically we can extend the concept of oppression to all degrading experiences inflicted on humans, including sexism*, racism*, and heterosexism (see Sexuality Cluster), and to the devastation of the environment (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster). The concept of oppression refers to the social manifestations of evil*, revealing that people ignore or reject God.

Oppression is tied to liberation*; both situations occur throughout the Scriptures, from the birth of the people of Israel, who were liberated from slavery* in Egypt; to the prophets* who denounce oppression as an offense against God; to the Psalms that cry out to God because of oppression; to Jesus' programmatic platform, "good news to the poor"; and finally to Revelation*, which, in the midst of the great repression of God's people (Jews or Christians), addressed the needs of the oppressed, encouraging them not to be overwhelmed, because God is present.

Oppression, when recognized as a theological experience, helps us recognize the historicity of salvation*. Oppression is related to sin* and exposes sin; the fact that there is oppression demonstrates that, in some way, someone harms someone else or some group harms other groups. Oppression, together with disease and other afflictions, are negations of God's Reign (or Kingdom*); therefore, the presence of oppressed people or refugees* is always a call to act; for Christians, struggling against oppression is giving witness to their calling as sons and daughters of God (Rom 8:23). The presence of oppression is thus a context that calls Christians to interpret the nature of this oppression and to demonstrate their faith in God. Situations of extreme poverty are privileged locations to better understand the message of salvation*.

ELSA TAMEZ (translated by Gloria Kinsler)

Optatus of Milevis (Numidia, now Algeria), bishop (365–85), author of a work against the Donatists*, The Donatist Schism, first written c367 and revised with an additional book c385. Augustine* later drew on Optatus's critique of the Donatists' claim to represent the one holy church and on his readiness to receive Donatists back into the Roman Catholic Church without rebaptism.

Option for the Poor. See PREFERENTIAL OPTION FOR THE POOR.

Opus Dei, an organization primarily of laypeople within the Roman Catholic Church that is similar to, though not identical with, a religious* order. It was founded by Josemaria Escrivá de Balaguer (1902–75, canonized 2002) as an informal association, originally of men studying at the university. They lived in a residence in Madrid purchased by Escrivá; a women's section was added shortly afterward. This nascent organization was disrupted by the Spanish civil war, during which Escrivá fled to France; he returned to Burgos, within the territory controlled by the Nationalist troops of General Franco. Opus Dei – the name means "the work of God," and it is commonly referred to by its members as "the Work" (Opus) – flourished in the aftermath of the civil war, largely through its involvement in Spanish higher education. To the lay organization was added (1943) the Sacerdotal Society of the Holy Cross, a branch constituted by priests to look after the members' spiritual needs. Meanwhile, Escrivá moved from Burgos to Madrid, where his society gained recognition as a "pious union" from the bishop of Madrid.

Escrivá sent his second-in-command, Alvaro del Portillo (who eventually succeeded him at the head of Opus Dei), to Rome (1945), where a new headquarters was opened. Opus Dei became a secular* institute (1947), but gradually outgrew this constraining status. It was granted the rank of "personal prelature" (1982), a form of diocese without geographic boundaries, the only one of its kind (as of 2007). From Rome, Opus Dei spread to Portugal (1945), England (1946), France and Ireland (1947), and Mexico and the USA (1948). Its more than 80,000 members are now widely scattered across the world.

Its spirituality is based on the writings of its founder, particularly on Camino, a small book of 999 maxims. Beyond promoting the sanctification* of its members in their daily, ordinary life, Opus Dei has no specific apostolate, although its members appear to be heavily involved in higher education* and communications. There are various types of membership. Some live celibate lives in communities, while others marry and remain with their families. Theologically and socially conservative, the organization has been criticized for its secrecy and what seemed to some rather questionable methods of recruitment. In December 1981, the cardinal archbishop of Westminster at the time, Basil Hume, issued a series of "guidelines" for the behavior of Opus in his diocese, which focused on these issues. MICHAEL J. WALSH

Orange, Second Council of (529), regional council held in Southern Gaul under the presidency of Caesarius of Arles. Pelagian* and semi-Pelagian* views are condemned in Canons 1–8; these are followed by propositions taken from the writings of Augustine* by Prosper* of Aquitaine a hundred years earlier; the conclusion affirms universally "prevenient" (anticipatory) grace* while condemning the view that God predestines* anyone to evil and damnation. Although the decrees were confirmed by Pope Boniface II (531), they were overlooked from the 10th to the 16th c., not being included in the collections of canons. They were rediscovered and published in 1538, influencing both the Reformation* and the Council of Trent*.

Orans, Orant (Lat "one praying"), artistic representation of a person praying with hands and arms upstretched, the usual posture for prayer in the ancient world.

Oratorio, musical work, usually on a biblical theme, sung by solo voices and chorus; similar to opera but without dramatic action. See also PASSION.

Oratory, place of worship other than a parish church, usually for a specific community or group. See also CHAPEL.

Orders, Holy Orders, ordination* as a sacrament* in the Roman Catholic Church; also a sacrament* (mystery) in the Orthodox churches. See also RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC, CLUSTER.

Ordinal, liturgical book, especially in the Anglican Communion, containing the forms to be used for ordaining deacons* and priests* and consecrating bishops*.

Ordinances, Baptist designation for baptism and the Lord's Supper, to underscore the belief that these are not sacraments productive of grace, but mere symbols.

Ordinary, in canon* law, the bishop* or other official with permanent jurisdiction over a diocese* or other territory. In liturgy, the unvarying portions of a worship service (e.g. the Mass*), contrasted with the "proper*" portions.

Ordination (Lat ordinatio) designates a rite of initiation into a sacred ordo (rank, order, office, authority). In ancient Rome, ordinatio was used for appointments to civil office; for Latin Christians, ordinatio assumed the same meaning as the Greek, cheirotomia, an initiation into a sacred liturgical order by the laying* on of hands (cf. Jerome, Comm. in Isaiam 16.58.10).

In the OT, there were "ordinations" by anointing with oil for priests (Lev 8:10–36, 21:10) and kings (1 Sam 10:1, 16:13–14; 1 Kgs 19:16) and the laying on of hands for the Levites (Num 8:10–13) and Joshua, Moses' successor (Deut 34:9; Num 27:15–23). In later Judaism, rabbis were "ordained" by the imposition of hands.

In the NT, Jesus selects the Twelve* by personally calling them (Mark 3:13–19; Matt 10:1–4; Luke 6:12–16). Subsequent Roman Catholic tradition specifies Jesus' command, "Do this in remembrance of me" (Luke 22:19), as the primordial priestly ordination (cf. Council of Trent, Doctrina de ss. Missae sacrificio, can. 2; Denz.-Hün., *1752).

In Acts 6:6; 1 Tim 4:14; 1 Tim 5:22; and 2 Tim 1:6, the imposition of hands provides the paradigm for the ordination rite. By the time of Ignatius* of Antioch (c35–107), the three orders of bishop (episkopos), presbyter (presbyteros), and deacon (diakonos) (mentioned in Phil 1:1; 1 Tim 3:1–13; and Titus 1:5–9) are clearly distinguished from each other (cf. Smyr. 8:2). The minor orders (e.g. subdeacon and reader) developed later.

Ordination by prayer and the laying on of hands is found in the early church (cf. Hippolytus*, the Apostolic* Tradition; c3rd c.), and most Christian denominations continue to ordain in this way. Roman Catholics, Orthodox, and most Anglicans believe that only bishops* have the authority to ordain. Other denominations see ordination more as an installation into a public ecclesial function than as an initiation into a sacramental* order by bishops (see Orders, Holy Orders). Catholics and Orthodox reserve episcopal, priestly, and diaconal ordination for men. Accordingly, they generally regard the deaconesses of the early church as consecrated laywomen rather than as members of the ordained clergy (cf. Nicaea* I, Can. 19). See also WOMEN'S ORDINATION CLUSTER.

ROBERT FASTIGGI

Ordo Salutis (Lat “order of salvation”), a topic that originated among Lutheran theologians in the 17th and 18th c., stimulated by the growth of Pietism* and vigorously debated with Reformed and Catholic opponents. Paul seems to have suggested (Rom 8:29–30) a causal or temporal sequence in God’s acts of salvation: foreknowledge*, predestination*, calling or vocation*, justification*, and glorification. Other stages were added in an attempt to clarify the process. Several areas of controversy arose: (1) Does predestination follow God’s foreknowledge of human acts? (2) Is justification based on human decision (and thus will*) or on irresistible grace*? (3) If justification is through faith* alone, how is it supplemented by other divine gifts? (4) Is a mystical union* with God in Christ to be the culmination of the process? This way of thinking is generally criticized for its excessive claims of precision, both theological and psychological.

Organ, instrument with pipes sounded by compressed air, used during worship in Western* churches since the Middle Ages, especially in cathedrals; the use of organs in parish churches grew during the 19th c.

Orientation, positioning of a church so that the worshippers face the sunrise, symbolic of revelation* and of Christ’s return in glory.

Origen (c185–c254), biblical scholar, theologian, spiritual writer. Born in Alexandria, he was a catechist and teacher in Alexandria (205–32) and Caesarea (234–50). He journeyed to Rome (c212), where he heard Hippolytus*; to Arabia (c213–c228) at the invitation of the governor; to Jerusalem and Caesarea (c231); to Antioch (c232–33) at the invitation of Julia Mamaea, mother of the emperor; to Greece (c232, c238–44); and to Arabia (c244–49), where he persecuted the bishops Beryllus and Heraclides before church councils. During the Decian* persecutions (249–51), Origen was imprisoned and tortured; by living a few more years, he was denied the status of a martyr*.

In Alexandria Origen was in close contact with Platonist* philosophers, Gnostics* (especially Valentinians*), and Marcionites*, debating the relation of God to the world, the origin of evil*, and the compatibility of justice* and mercy* in God. The Nag* Hammadi library contains a number of Gnostic works known to have been debated somewhat later by Plotinus*, who began his career in Alexandria. Origen’s theological system responds to the concerns of these various movements, refuting them with references to the Bible, which Origen interpreted allegorically*, in a framework that was influenced by the movements themselves. Toward the end of his life, he was in contact with the young Porphyry*, the Neoplatonist* philosopher who would later write against the Christians, viewing Christianity as un-Hellenic and doomed to failure.

In Palestine, Origen was ordained a presbyter and was permitted to preach, but his chief function was the less formal one of a teacher, or didaskalos. He permitted his homilies to be recorded after he reached the age of 60 (c245). His lifetime work on the text of the Bible led to the compilation of the Hexapla*. In Caesarea he also became more fully acquainted with Jewish scholars and their interpretations of the Bible.

Origen’s theological “system,” while it peeks through his exegetical works, is made explicit in On First Principles (229–30). He thinks of the Trinity* as coming forth when the Father wills to create; this activity is everlasting, because God could never have been unwilling or unable. The original creation* is of finite minds or spirits, created equal since God cannot be the source of inequality, and united with God through the light of the Word* and the fire of the Spirit*. Through koros (satiation, weariness, carelessness, self-centeredness) their fall* occurs. The mind named “Christ” is the only one who remains united with God; Satan* is the one who rebels most radically; others drift away to various degrees.

Because of the fall*, God designs a succession of worlds with pedagogical intent, leading fallen spirits back to their original unity with God through both suffering and persuasion, in ways that speak to the needs of each spirit at its stage of development. The various ranks of angels*, e.g., are spirits doing penance by moving the heavenly bodies and ministering to human beings. Following the Stoics*, Origen thought of the soul* as self-moving but influenced by external stimuli and internal inclinations; God’s pedagogy, then, works through stimuli in ways that preserve free choice (see Moral Influence). Origen speculates that all spirits, even Satan, might eventually be led back to God. The hardening of Pharaoh’s heart (Exod 4:21) is interpreted pedagogically, and the drowning of Pharaoh’s army (Exod 14:21–29) is described by language reminiscent of that of baptism. This pedagogical process goes through many successive worlds; in one place (On Prayer 27.16), Origen suggests

(if we are to take him literally!) that the worlds are numbered by weeks, months, and years of ages, and by sabbatical and jubilee years, at least 50×365 epochs.

The present world is the one in which Christ becomes incarnate* in human flesh. (Origen also mentions the possibility that Christ made himself present to angelic powers in other ages.) Christ mediates divine truth and on the cross ransoms* human beings from bondage to Satan (see Atonement). The gospel is proclaimed by the Christian Church, with its sacraments and its ordained clergy, but Origen felt that these externals symbolize a more internal and charismatic* authority exercised by spiritual persons like himself, who gain deeper insights into the truth and whose authority is not necessarily reflected in outward office.

The allegorical* method, earlier applied by Greek grammarians to their classics and by Philo* of Alexandria to the Septuagint*, was applied by Origen to the entire Bible, including the NT. In approaching a text, the grammarians differentiated between history (what actually occurred), fiction (what could have occurred but did not), and myth (what could not have occurred as narrated). These “stumbling blocks” in the text are a clue that it has a higher, non-literal meaning; indeed, even “history,” when properly understood, reflects higher levels of meaning. Origen sometimes speaks of three levels of meaning: body (the letter of the text), soul (its moral overtones), and spirit (its intimations of transcendent realities). Thus the creation narrative (Gen 1) becomes fully intelligible when “heaven” means the spiritual “heaven above heaven” and “earth” means matter in all its forms; the land of promise is the “pure land” of spirits united with God. The exodus from Egypt and the wandering in the wilderness are an allegory of ascent to God; the Book of Joshua (= Jesus) is an allegory of the conquest of desire* under the guidance of Christ.

Although Origen aroused controversy, his work was also valued for its exegetical insights and spiritual ardor. Origenism* was both attacked and defended for several centuries; Origen’s works survived largely through Latin translations, often under others’ names. Many of his interpretations and teachings were later abandoned. Yet it can be argued that his perspective was at core a biblical one, examining the complex relationships between God and finite spirits under all possible circumstances and finding them resolved through divine initiative and free creaturely response.

His major works include a lost autobiographical letter cited by Eusebius* (233); Hexapla (215–45); On First Principles (229–30); commentaries on Ps 1–25 and Lamentations (c225), Genesis (230–34), John (231–48), Pauline Epistles, Isaiah, and Ezekiel (243–45), Canticles (245–47), Ps 1–72 and 118 (245–47), Matthew and Luke (249); homilies on many biblical books (239–42); On Prayer (234); Exhortation to Martyrdom (235); and an apologetic work, Against Celsus (249).

EUGENE TESELLE

Origenist Controversy (the) erupted in the last years of the 4th c. over varying interpretations of the works of the 3rd-c. Origen, especially his speculative treatise On First Principles (see Origen). Origen was the most prominent pre-Nicene* Greek-writing theologian, and a “tamed” version of his theology had influenced such 4th-c. figures as Gregory* of Nyssa, Basil* of Caesarea, and Ambrose*. Although serious theological issues were at stake – centering on the relation of the members of the Godhead, a cosmic vision of creation* and final end, the origin of the soul*, humans’ possession of the “image* of God,” the status of the body*, ascetic* spirituality, evil*, and the justice* of God – the controversy was heightened by enmity between the circles of Jerome* and of Rufinus* of Aquileia, with various aristocrats, monks, and bishops from Palestine, Egypt, and Italy choosing sides. Jerome had earlier translated a number of Origen’s less speculative writings, yet when Rufinus brought out On First Principles in Latin (397–98), Jerome charged that Rufinus had deliberately masked heterodox elements in Origen’s theology; the controversy thus also involved debates over proper principles of translation. Both Rufinus and Jerome defended their positions at length, Jerome being pressed to respond to Rufinus’s allegation that his writings advocating a stringent asceticism and his Commentary on Ephesians were tainted by Origenist ideas. Even after Bishop Anastasius* of Rome in 400 (apparently) condemned Origen’s writings, the controversy continued. Some issues (e.g. whether a human can live without sin*) spilled over into the Pelagian* controversy in the second decade of the 5th c. Until that time, Jerome seemed unaware that Rufinus and his partisans knew a stronger, more speculative form of Origenism through their association with the 4th-c. monk and theologian Evagrius* Ponticus.

It was largely an Evagrian adaptation of Origenist theology centered on Christology* that spurred the second outbreak of controversy over Origenism among monks in 6th-c. Palestine: Would or would not, in the “restoration of all things,” believers be made equal to Christ? At the Council of Constantinople* (553), propositions linked to Origenism were condemned; and in the Syriac* Church, Origenism became deeply embedded in disputes between Monophysites*/Miaphysites* and Nestorians*. In the West, the condemnation of both Origenism and Pelagianism* left the field open to the development of Augustinian* theology, which stressed human sinfulness and divine determination, not human potential and freedom*. See also MONASTICISM CLUSTER: IN THE SYRIAC TRADITION. ELIZABETH A. CLARK

Original Righteousness, creation of human beings in a state of rectitude before the Fall*. Debates continue as to whether this righteousness was natural or the result of grace*, actual or merely potential.

Original Sin, the doctrine, primarily in Western* churches, that the sin of Adam* and Eve* was somehow transmitted to their offspring. It was used to explain the practice of infant baptism “for the remission of sins” (from the Apostles’ Creed), an explanation not needed in the East, where churches emphasized infant baptism as an initiation into the Kingdom* of God (see Baptism Cluster; Orthodox Churches, Eastern, Cluster).

The doctrine was justified by reference to several passages in Paul (e.g. Rom 5:12–15; 1 Cor 15:45–50) and the statement about being conceived in sin (Ps 51:5). The latter reinforced the association of original sin with concupiscence* and sexuality* (even in marriage*) and the emphasis on the virginity of Mary* as the only way in which Jesus could be without original sin.

The first explicit attack on the doctrine came from the Pelagians* (who emphasized freedom* of choice and were repeatedly condemned, 418–31). The doctrine of original sin was shaped by Augustine’s* anti-Pelagian writings. For him original sin was not genetic, not a change in the “seed,” but a privation or a dysfunction in human life. Peter* Lombard’s later statement that original sin is “a wounding of nature and a deprivation of grace*” may be an appropriate summary. Original sin does not abolish individual responsibility; Augustine tended to treat it as the penalty of sin, which then becomes sin when a person “voluntarily” fails to resist it.

During the Protestant Reformation, Luther* emphasized original sin, and his follower

Flacius* located it in the “substance” of the soul*. Calvin* and his followers called it accident rather than substance, but with their doctrine of “total depravity” they insisted that it affects all aspects of human life, not merely with a lack of orientation toward good but with an inclination toward evil*.

Enlightenment* writers often attacked the doctrine for its pessimism and negativity (see Kierkegaard, Søren Aabye). But Kant* revived it on a different basis, looking not to the origins of the human race but to the structure of human willing*, operating with a kind of moral inevitability: because of a natural inclination toward lesser values, actual willing falls short of the moral law that is apprehended by practical reason; by the time we come to full moral awareness, Kant argues, we are already guilty. Thus human history is from the first a history of sin and redemption*. Kant’s approach has been adopted, with important differences of detail, by almost all subsequent German theologians.

In contemporary (Liberation*) theology, another way of interpreting original sin is to emphasize “structural* evil” (or systemic evil*): the oppression* that arises from inequalities of class, race, sex, and other conditions. These are types of evil that are larger than, and prior to, the individual, enveloping all, both the oppressor and the oppressed, in a web of guilt and powerlessness. EUGENE TESELLE

ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Orthodox Churches, Eastern

Orthodox Churches, Eastern: Greek Orthodox Church and Its Theology

2) A Sampling of Eastern Orthodox Churches in Context

Orthodox Church, Eastern: In Georgia
Orthodox Church, Eastern: In Greece
Orthodox Churches, Eastern: In Mexico
Orthodox Churches, Eastern: In Romania
Orthodox Churches, Eastern: In Russia
Orthodox Churches, Eastern: In Ukraine
Orthodox Churches, Eastern: In the United States

1) Introductory Entries

Orthodox Churches, Eastern. Eastern Orthodox churches (also known as the Greek* Orthodox Church) are a worldwide communion of autonomous (autocephalous*) churches constituting a major branch of Christianity. The body of Orthodox Christians identifies itself as the “one, holy, catholic, and apostolic church” of the Nicene* Creed, emphasizing its spiritual unity despite the administrative independence of the churches. “Orthodox” means both “correct worship” and “correct belief”; with this name, Orthodox Christianity highlights its profound care for apostolic purity in worship and dogma.

The mother churches of Orthodoxy are the sees* of apostolic foundation in Constantinople*, Alexandria*, Antioch*, and Jerusalem*. The Orthodox Church today includes these patriarchates* and their dependencies along with the churches of Russia*, Serbia*, Romania*, Bulgaria*, Georgia*, Cyprus*, Greece*, Poland*, Albania*, the Czech* Republic, and Slovakia*. Estimates of worldwide Orthodox Church membership range between 225 and 250 million. The Church has active mission* efforts in every inhabited continent.

In Orthodoxy each local church is presided over by one bishop* assisted by presbyters* and deacons*. Each is regarded as manifesting the catholicity of the one Orthodox Church. Orthodox men may be married before being ordained as priests* but not thereafter; bishops are selected from the celibate or widowed clergy. The clerical ranks are not open to women; however, the role of deaconess* once existed and is being revived in certain places. All bishops are of equal authority, but in every synod one bishop is granted the place of “first among equals” for administrative purposes and given the title of metropolitan*, archbishop*, or patriarch*. The patriarch of Constantinople has carried the title of ecumenical* patriarch since the 5th c., has the primacy of honor among all hierarchs, functions as coordinator among the Orthodox churches, and presides over all inter-Orthodox meetings. He does not exercise supreme administrative authority like the pope of Rome.

Unity and continuity are at the heart of the Orthodox Christian ethos. Embracing the Pauline dictum that “there is one body and one Spirit,” Orthodoxy insists that the Holy* Spirit guides the Church into a single, unchanging understanding of truth* across all times and cultures. The Orthodox Church regards itself as the sole authentic successor of apostolic Christianity, as expressed in its Scriptures, Holy Tradition, forms of worship, and canonical succession of bishops (see Apostolicity and Apostolic Succession).

Divine truth is manifested in the life of the Church* through “conciliarity,” i.e. the consensus of the whole body of Orthodox believers, both clergy and laity. The highest authority in the Orthodox Church is an ecumenical council, a worldwide gathering of representatives that unanimously proclaims the mind of the Church on disputed matters. The Orthodox Church recognizes the inspired and infallible authority of the seven ecumenical councils: Nicaea* I (325), Constantinople* I (381), Ephesus* (431), Chalcedon* (451), Constantinople* II (553), Constantinople* III (680–81), and Nicaea* II (787). (The Quinisext* Council of 692 in Constantinople is seen as the completion of the fifth and sixth councils and is therefore implicitly included in the seven.) Adherence to the principle of conciliarity led the four Eastern Patriarchates to reject papal claims of Roman supremacy and the Filioque, resulting in the Great Schism of 1054.

The Orthodox Church identifies itself as the continuation of the church of the martyrs*. In Orthodox spirituality, martyrdom remains the paradigmatic path to holiness, and the Church continues to venerate martyrs from even the earliest decades of Christianity. Relics of martyrs are a sine qua non for the consecration of new churches. In the past three centuries, when large parts of the Orthodox homelands have been under the persecution* of totalitarian regimes, the Orthodox Church has offered up countless new martyrs for Christ.

The Orthodox Church identifies itself as the continuation of the church of the fathers (see Patristics), whose writings are still used for liturgy and catechesis. Particularly important are the saints Basil* the Great, Gregory* the Theologian, John* Chrysostom, Athanasius*, and Cyril* of Alexandria, Maximus* the Confessor, John* of Damascus, and Gregory* of Nyssa. The patristic age remains open-ended, and such late figures as the saints Photius* the Great, Gregory* Palamas, and Mark* of Ephesus are considered fathers. Two other writers not counted as fathers have exerted an incalculable influence on Orthodox theology: Origen* of Alexandria and Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite. Patristic* modes of thought and exegesis remain paradigmatic for Orthodoxy; the idea of the development of doctrine is accepted to a limited degree.

The ascetic* ethos of early Christianity exerts a strong influence on Orthodox piety. The disciplines of prayer, fasting, and almsgiving are emphasized for all Christians and especially for those with monastic vocations. Orthodox monasteries are largely independent of one another, although for the past millennium Mount Athos* in Greece has acted as the spiritual center of Orthodox monasticism* and its tradition of hesychasm*. Orthodoxy does not have different monastic orders as in the West.

The spirit of Orthodox theology is epitomized by the maxim "The theologian is the one who prays, and the one who prays is a theologian." Orthodox theology is experiential and doxological in character, drawing from and leading to the personal encounter of love between God and humankind. Orthodoxy disfavors speculative or scholastic approaches to theology, reserving the title "theologian" for those who have been enlightened by personal experience of God.

Orthodox theology is markedly apophatic* in character, starting from the premise that human words and concepts are inadequate for speaking of God, who in essence is unknowable. The idea of a mysterion (mystery*) is quintessentially Orthodox: the Trinity*, the Incarnation*, and the Church* and its sacraments* are all referred to as "mysteries" – those things that cannot be grasped intellectually and yet may be known through personal participation. Humanity can experience God in God's uncreated energies, attributes of divinity in which humans participate by the cooperation of their free will. God is known always as philanthropos (loving humankind). Responding fully to divine love leads a person to union with God, known as theosis*.

"Ousia*" and "hypostasis*," "being, nature*," and "person*" are key concepts in Orthodox thought. The unity of the Trinity derives not from some abstract common substance, but from the one Father who is the unique cause of all being, begetting the Son and giving procession to the Spirit as coequal divine persons. The Western Filioque is rejected as blurring the distinction between persons* and as without basis in Scripture or Holy Tradition. In the Incarnation, the person of the Son was fully united to human nature. All of Orthodox ecclesiology and spirituality grows organically out of these dogmas of the Trinity and the Incarnation.

The Orthodox understanding of the human condition differs markedly from Western conceptions (including the Western emphasis on atonement* and justification*). The salvific effects of the Incarnation extend not just to fallen humanity, but to the entire cosmos. Original* sin is not understood as a sharing of the guilt of Adam's fall* but as the inheritance of his corrupted mortal nature. Humans are seen more as victims of the devil's* deception than as criminals to be condemned by divine justice. Death* is understood not as God's curse on creation, but as God's enemy and the inevitable consequence of separation from life with God. Sin* is viewed more in terms of a disease of the soul than as individual acts of lawbreaking. The human person is regarded as a psychosomatic unity that sin afflicts in its entirety, leading to all the suffering of soul and body of this present life.

Salvation* is defined not merely as forgiveness*, but even more as liberation* of the human mind from delusion and the renewal of human nature by union with the God-man Christ, whose healing presence is experienced through the Orthodox Church and its sacramental mysteries. These include baptism*, chrismation*, Communion*, confession*, unction*, matrimony*, and ordination*. The Divine* Liturgy is the high point of sacramental life. The church year is developed around the Resurrection*, called Pascha*.

Orthodoxy attaches a special devotion to the Virgin Mary*, called the Theotokos*, "birth-giver of God." She is venerated as the paragon of fallen humanity renewed by voluntary cooperation with divine grace*. She is regarded as Panagia (All-Holy) and Aeiparthenos (Ever-Virgin) but not as co-redemptrix or as the product of an immaculate* conception. The Orthodox believe that after her death, she was given a place of unique prominence in heaven, where she acts as an intercessor for Christians. Orthodox Christians venerate icons* of Christ, the Theotokos, the martyrs, and the saints as a means of expressing their honor to God and the saints. See also FLOROVSKY, GEORGES; LOSSKY, VLADIMIR; STANILOAE, DUMITRU.

ARCHBISHOP DEMETRIOS [TRAKATELLIS]

Orthodox Churches, Eastern: Greek Orthodox Church and Its Theology.

The expression "Greek Orthodox Church" has two meanings. In the broad sense, it refers to the entire body of Orthodox (Chalcedonian) Christianity, sometimes also called "Eastern Orthodox," "Greek Catholic," or generally "the Greek Church," because the mother communities of Orthodoxy were all located in the Greek-speaking portion of the ancient Roman Empire.

The Orthodox Church as a whole is aptly described as Greek in its common preference for the Byzantine* rites of worship and its adherence to the ethos of Christianized Hellenism developed by the Greek-speaking fathers of the early church. Despite its name, the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch is, ethnically and linguistically, mostly Arabic.

In a narrow sense, the expression "Greek Orthodox Church" refers to any of several independent churches within the worldwide communion of Orthodox Christianity that retain the use of the Greek language in formal ecclesiastical settings. In this sense, "Greek Orthodox" can be distinguished from "Russian Orthodox" or "Serbian Orthodox," the difference between churches being linguistic only, not theological or liturgical.

In the latter sense, the following Orthodox churches are properly called Greek Orthodox: the Ecumenical* Patriarchate of Constantinople and its dependencies in Europe, Asia, North, Central, and South America, and Australia and on Mount Athos* in Greece; the Patriarchate of Alexandria; the Patriarchate of Jerusalem*; the Church of Greece*; and the Church of Cyprus*. In both the broad and narrow senses of the term, the Greek Orthodox Church has always been ethnically diverse; phyletism* and nationalism are anathema to Orthodox ecclesiology. The Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of America, with headquarters in New York City, comprises the largest Orthodox ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the USA.

The theology of the Greek Orthodox Church is identical to that of all Eastern Orthodox* churches, which taken together are understood in Orthodox ecclesiology to constitute the one undivided body of Christ. Among the Orthodox churches, there are minor variations in liturgical expression, clerical dress, and ecclesiastical custom.

Greek Orthodox Christianity is characterized by great joyfulness in the presence of God, who is ever philanthropos, "who ever loves humankind," and who inspires a spontaneous, exuberant love* among people. The eucharistic service, called the Divine* Liturgy, is conducted by clergy and laity in a majestic and celebratory manner, as are baptisms and weddings. Even occasions of mourning, such as services of Christian burial, Lenten contrition, or Good* Friday, are conducted with a characteristic "joyous sadness," or charmolupe, to use the coinage of St. John* Climacus. This sense of joy* among the Greek Orthodox pervades their daily life and culture as well as their liturgical expressions: the customary street greeting in the Paschal season is Christós Anésti! – "Christ is risen!"

In the modern era, Greek Orthodoxy has been significantly affected by its subjugation to Muslim rule in many places. Under the Tourkokrateia, the period of Ottoman domination, Orthodox bishops were forced to become not only spiritual leaders but also ethnarchs, leaders of the ethnic community and advocates of Hellenic culture in the face of official repression (see Millet). Religious persecution in this era resulted in the recognition of many neomartyres (new martyrs*). The repressions of the Tourkokrateia sparked several waves of emigration to the New World, Africa, and Australia, giving rise to large communities in what is often referred to as the diaspora. Most of Greek Orthodoxy in the diaspora follows the Gregorian calendar* for liturgical purposes; however, the date of Pascha* (Orthodox Easter) is always calculated to ensure a common celebration among all the Orthodox, including those who follow the Julian calendar*.

Greek Orthodox Christianity is especially conscious of the influence of Hellenistic thought and culture in the development of early Christianity. In the diaspora, the Church has made special efforts to support the study of Greek language and Hellenic culture among its people. While all Orthodox churches follow the same festal calendar, emphasis is given by Greek Orthodoxy to the Annunciation* on March 25, celebrated simultaneously with the day of Greek independence from Turkish rule. Likewise, the Feast of the Holy Protection on October 28 is celebrated as OCHI day, commemorating Greece's refusal in 1940 to accede to Fascist demands for capitulation. The Feast of the Three Hierarchs (Basil* the Great, John* Chrysostom, Gregory* Nazianzen the Theologian) on January 30 is also a celebration of Greek literacy and learning.

Greek Orthodoxy is characterized by a deep devotion to the saints* of the early church, especially the Virgin Mary*. Great affection is also shown for ancient martyrs like St. George and St. Demetrios, beloved hierarchs like St. Nicholas and St. Spyridon, and St. Constantine* and St. Helen*. Particular devotion is shown for St. Nektarios of Pentapolis (1846–1920), the “saint of our time,” a monastic who served as a hierarch and teacher in Alexandria, Athens, and the Greek island of Aegina, and whose life epitomizes the love, joy, humility, and miraculous existence of Greek Orthodox Christianity.

ARCHBISHOP DEMETRIOS [TRAKATELLIS]

2) A Sampling of Eastern Orthodox Churches in Context

Orthodox Church, Eastern: In Georgia. The Apostolic Autocephalous* Orthodox Church of Georgia is one of the most ancient Christian churches. It originated, according to tradition, with the apostle Andrew's 1st-c. mission and was established as a state religion (for the Eastern part of present-day Georgia) when through the ministry of a young Capadocian woman, Nino*, the royal family converted to Christianity (early 4th c.) in Mtskheta. First under the jurisdiction of the See* of Antioch*, it became autocephalous* (self-governing, led by a catholicos*) from the 480s but was still linked with the “mother church” of Antioch until the 740s, when it started confirming a locally elected catholicos. The full separation from Antioch took place in the 11th c. Catholicos Melkisedek I (1010–33) was made the first patriarch of all Georgia. In 1811 autocephaly was abolished as a result of the annexation of Georgia by Russia. It was restored in 1917 but gradual recognition came in 1943 (by the Russian* Orthodox Church) and in 1990 (by the Ecumenical* Patriarchate).

The Orthodox Church of Georgia, having adhered to the Chalcedonian Christology, is one of the Eastern Orthodox* churches and shares their liturgy and theology. Yet traditional liturgical Eastern Orthodox chant, architecture, wall paintings, and icons* have distinctive characteristics, despite a significant Byzantine influence.

Many biblical, liturgical, and patristic texts were translated before the 8th c. from Armenian, Syriac, and Greek but later were corrected according to the Greek. The Church kept close ties with the Palestinian Church until the 8th–9th c., but then stayed closer to Byzantine tradition. Georgians were present in monasteries* outside of Georgia as early as the 5th c., in the Holy Land; among the many notable Georgian monasteries are Iviron on Mount Athos* (10th–11th c.) and Holy Cross in Jerusalem (11th c.).

Original Georgian hagiography described the lives and martyrdom of local saints, including Shushaniki (5th c.), Eustatius of Mtskheta (6th c.), Abo of Tbilisi (8th c.), Gregory of Khandzta (10th c.), Euthymius (10th–11th c.), and George the Athonites (11th c.). Theologian Ephrem Mtsire (the Minor; 11th c.) translated and commented on works by church fathers such as Gregory* of Nazianzus. Philosopher Ioane Petritsi translated and commented on Elements of Theology by Proclus (12th c.) and initiated Neoplatonic studies at the Gelati Academy in West Georgia.

As a result of wars, successive occupations by Ottoman, Persian, and Russian troops, and ensuing dire economic situations, the Church suffered a great deal from the 16th to the 20th c. Restoration of autocephaly (1917) offered a moment of relief, but was soon overshadowed by Communist rule in Georgia. From 1977 (enthronement of Catholicos-Patriarch Ilya II), the Church went through a complex process of renewal and struggle with some aspects of the newly established democratic society, such as nationalism and fundamentalism*. In the early 21st c., the Church had 36 bishops, c570 monasteries, and c900 ordained priests. It also had two newspapers, a journal, and a television channel. The church actively participates in the life of the country but is not closely associated with the state.

TAMARA GRDZELIDZE

Orthodox Church, Eastern: In Greece.

The modern history of the Orthodox Church of Greece begins with the declaration of Greek independence from Ottoman rule (1821). Early postrevolutionary Greek governments were supportive of the Church, although political leaders educated in the West were critical of its backwardness and the isolation of its leadership. Western powers appointed Otho, a Bavarian prince, to head the kingdom of Greece. Bavarian advisers drew up the blueprint for the organization of the Church of Greece and its relationship to the state. The Ecclesiastical Constitution of 1833 defined the church as a department of the new state and declared the Church of Greece independent from the Ecumenical* Patriarchate of Constantinople, under whose ecclesiastical jurisdiction most of Greece had been for many centuries. The Church was to be governed by a permanent synod consisting of a president and two to four additional members, all appointed by the king. In 1850 Constantinople recognized the autocephaly* of the Church of Greece. State control of the church progressively decreased over the following decades, although national politics, especially the republican–royalist controversy (first quarter of the 20th c.) and the military junta (1967–74), often adversely affected the Church.

The jurisdictional boundaries of the Church of Greece expanded as the Greek nation claimed additional territories. The Church of Crete is semiautonomous under the jurisdiction of the Patriarchate of Constantinople, while the Dodecanese Islands are organized with five metropolises, each directly under Constantinople. The Church of Greece is governed by two synods, both presided over by the archbishop of Athens: a permanent synod consisting of 12 metropolitans reconstituted yearly and a larger synod consisting of all metropolitans (currently about 80).

The Orthodox Church of Greece plays an important role in the political, cultural, and economic life of the country. Clerical salaries are paid by the state, and members of the theological faculties of the universities of Athens and Thessaloniki are, like those of other university faculties, employees of the state. Religious instruction is mandatory for Greek Orthodox students attending primary and secondary public schools. Lay theologians and brotherhoods contributed greatly to the spiritual and educational life of the church in the 20th c., in particular the Church's own Apostoliki Diakonia and the lay brotherhoods of Zoe and Soter (the former since the early 20th c.). The late-20th-c. monastic revival (especially that of Mount Athos*) has had a significant impact as well. See also GREECE.

JAMES C. SKEDROS

Orthodox Churches, Eastern: In Mexico. The Antiochian Orthodox Church and the Greek Orthodox Church arrived with immigrants from the Ottoman Empire and Greece (1875). The Archdiocese of North America of the Patriarchate of Antioch provided pastoral care for Orthodox believers in Mexico. A diocese of Mexico, Central America, Venezuela, and the Caribbean was established in 1966 and was elevated to an archdiocese in 1995. In Mexico there are about 570 Orthodox families of Syrian-Lebanese origin, which belong to the Antiochian community. There were also 150 families of Greek origin, but they withdrew (1969) from the Antiochian Orthodox Church when Bishop Pablo de Ballester built a cathedral and named it Santa Sofía (Hagia Sophia), the name of the venerated Greek Orthodox Church. The Antiochian Orthodox Church is in communion with the Ecumenical* Patriarchate of Constantinople. In 1972 the Holy Synod established the Exarchate of Mexico at the request of the community of Peñón de los Baños (Mexico City), which had belonged to the Mexican Apostolic Catholic Church, and its 10,000 members became Orthodox.

MONICA URIBE

Orthodox Church, Eastern: In Romania. The Eastern Orthodox Church in Romania (Biserica Ortodoxă Română) is an autocephalous* Eastern Orthodox* Church, in full communion with the other Eastern Orthodox churches.

It is the only Eastern Orthodox Church using a Romance language. The majority of people in Romania (18.8 million, or 86.8% of the population; 2002 census) belong to it, as do some 0.7 million Romanians from the Republic of Moldova* and other important diaspora communities. The Romanian Orthodox Church is often viewed as the second largest after the Russian Orthodox Church.

After the Great* Schism (1054), the people of Romania remained in communion with the Eastern Orthodox churches. With the creation of Romanian principalities during the Middle Ages, the first Metropolitanate of Ungro-Vlachia was founded in 1359 in Curtea de Argeș. The Metropolitanate of Moldavia was founded in 1401 in Suceava. The Metropolitanate of Transylvania (founded in the 15th c.) has its center in Alba Iulia. All these metropolitanates were under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Constantinople.

During the following centuries, the Orthodox Church flourished mainly in Wallachia and Moldavia. Many well-known churches and monasteries erected at that time (e.g. Cozia, Voronet, Putna, Sucevita) are still among the glories of the Romanian people.

The Romanians first adopted Church Slavonic as the language of their liturgy (early 9th c.). Until the 16th c., many religious texts were only transcribed in Church Slavonic. However, important Romanian language translations circulated, including, e.g., the Codicele Voronețean (the Codex of Voronet). Later (16th–18th c.), Slavonic was abandoned in favor of Romanian. Thus for the past few centuries, Romanians (unlike the inhabitants of other major Orthodox nations) have had no sacred language other than their own spoken language.

In 1859 the Romanian principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia formed the modern state of Romania. Since the Orthodox Church organization tends to follow the structure of the state, in 1872 the Orthodox Metropolitanates of Ungro-Vlachia and of Moldavia were united to form the Romanian Orthodox Church, which became autocephalous* (1885) and was raised to the rank of patriarchate (1925).

After World War II, the Orthodox Church as an institution was more or less tolerated by the atheist regime, although it was severely controlled and excluded from the public sphere. Persecution was always present, in many and varied ways. The Communist authority initiated mass purges that decimated the Orthodox hierarchy. By January 1953, about 500 Orthodox priests were in prison. As a result of measures passed in 1947–48, most Orthodox universities and high schools were closed. A new persecution campaign struck the Church in 1958–62, when more than half of its remaining monasteries were closed, more than 2,000 monks forced to take secular jobs, and about 1,500 clergy and lay activists arrested (out of a total of up to 6,000 in the 1946–64 period).

During the timid liberalization period (from 1962), the Romanian Orthodox Church, under the wise leadership of Patriarch Justinian, recovered dramatically. Its diocesan clergy numbered about 12,000 in 1975, and by then it was already publishing eight high-quality theological reviews, including Ortodoxia and Studii teologice.

Since the 1989 Romanian Revolution and the advent of democracy, the Church lives a clear renewal in different sectors of its life.

The Romanian Orthodox Church has jurisdiction over a minority of believers in Moldova*, who belong to the Metropolitanate of Bessarabia. About 2 million Romanians in the Republic of Moldova have resisted Russification for 192 years (after the annexation of Bessarabia by the Russian Empire in 1812). Romanian is their principal language, as well as their liturgical language. With the creation of greater Romania after World War I, Orthodox Christians in Moldavia became part of the Church of Romania. After Stalin's annexation of this region (1944), the Church there was again brought under the authority of the Russian Orthodox Church. After the fall of Communism, Moldova's government refused to allow the Romanian Church to exercise any authority in Moldova. Yet the European Court ruling of 2001 declared the Metropolitanate of Bessarabia to be a part of the Church of Romania and permitted its operation in Moldova.

The Orthodox Church of Romania is organized as a patriarchate, its highest hierarchical and canonical authority being the Holy Synod, under the presidency of the patriarch. The primate of the Church (in 2007, His Beatitude Daniel [Ciobotea]) is archbishop of Bucharest, metropolitan of Ungro-Vlachia, and patriarch of Romania, locum tenens of Caesarea in Cappadocia. There are six metropolitanates and ten archdioceses in Romania, with more than 14,000 priests and deacons. There are also more than 630 monasteries, with more than 8,500 monks and nuns; three metropolitanates; and seven dioceses of the Orthodox Church of Romania. There are more than 15,000 existing church buildings, and many others are in the process of being built or rebuilt.

There are in Romania 15 theological universities where more than 10,000 students (some of them from Bessarabia, Bukovina, and Serbia) currently study for bachelor's, master, or doctoral degrees in theology. Among the renowned Romanian theologians are Fr. Dumitru Staniloae* (1903–93), an Orthodox theologian with far-reaching influence. Father Ilie Cleopa (1912–98) from the Sihastria Monastery can appropriately be viewed as representative of the many "spiritual fathers" of contemporary Orthodox monastic* spirituality.

VASILE MIHOC

Orthodox Church, Eastern: In Russia.

Orthodox Christianity came to Russia in 988–89, when Vladimir*, grand prince of Kiev, like his grandmother, Olga*, was baptized and chose the religion of Byzantium as the state religion. The Mongol invasion (1237) prompted the Orthodox metropolitan to relocate from Kiev to the city of Vladimir and then to Moscow. This move mirrored other changes in Russian church culture. The northeast, less devastated than the southwest, partly owing to such saint-princes as Alexander Nevsky, could spread Orthodoxy to the indigenous peoples of Siberia through missionaries, including Stephen of Perm. The southwest, by contrast, was absorbed by Poland* and Lithuania*. There, the Russian Orthodox Church encountered Roman Catholics and Jews* on a regular basis and learned to articulate and defend their faith in multi-confessional and minority conditions.

Paradoxically, the 14th- to 15th-c. Mongol occupation of the northeast in many ways strengthened the Orthodox Church. Sergius* of Radonezh created the Trinity-Sergius Monastery. Theophanes the Greek and Andrei Rublev created unsurpassed iconography*. Orthodox metropolitans supported Moscow's consolidation of rival principalities and its struggle against the Mongols, enabling it to become the political center (mid-15th c.).

If Russia was baptized by the Byzantines*, it was catechized by the Bulgarians*, who provided a ready-made Slavic language and Orthodox culture through the missionary efforts of Cyril* and Methodius. A second wave of translations, largely of a monastic nature, came from the same lands (14th c.).

The theological characteristics of this early period of Russian Orthodoxy are found primarily in the fabric of the Church's life and in its self-conception, rather than in explicitly theological treatises. The early historical narratives tell of the adoption of Byzantine Orthodoxy as the providence of God, placing Russia within the greater narrative of biblical history. The 1071 canonization of St. Boris* and St. Gleb as martyrs (they died in self-sacrificing humility, though not explicitly for their faith) testifies to the beginnings of what the 20th-c. historian George Fedotov identifies as a characteristically Russian "kenoticism" (from kenosis, or "self-emptying"). This model of humility can be traced through the monasticism* pioneered by Theodosius of the Kiev Caves (d1074), Sergius* of Radonezh (d1392), and Nil* Sorsky (d1508). The flourishing of monasticism (from the 14th c.) may also have been influenced by the rise of hesychasm* in Byzantium and especially on Mount Athos*. Kenosis and asceticism* also took a striking form in the enduring Russian hagiographic (and literary) tradition of the holy* fool.

Theology also finds expression in the musical, liturgical, and perhaps especially iconographic output of this era. Later Russian thinkers (including Evgenii Trubetskoy) link the explosion of Russian spiritual aesthetics of this period with the terrible suffering arising from its material and political turmoil under the Mongols.

At the same time, the plight of Orthodox peoples outside Russia strengthened the global significance of Muscovite Orthodoxy. The fall of Constantinople to the Ottomans (1453) meant that Moscow became the world's only sovereign Orthodox nation. Some monks elaborated the "Third Rome" theory (Rome and the "New Rome," Constantinople, had fallen; Moscow was now the world center of the true faith). Others believed that the end of the world was at hand. Ultimately, Muscovites concluded that, as only ritual and language distinguished them from their beleaguered Orthodox neighbors, they had to take particular care to preserve those forms. This concern with ritual would manifest itself in numerous church councils, including the "Stoglav" (1550–51).

Orthodoxy in Russia faced a number of crises echoing those in Europe, including the "Judaizing" heresy* in Novgorod, according to which Christ was an OT prophet (and which thus shunned all formal elements of the Church), and the "Non-Possessors" conflict (over whether monks should be poor, as Nil* Sorsky argued, or use material power for social work, as Joseph of Volokolamsk emphasized).

Russia attained full ecclesiastical autonomy in 1589, with the election of the first patriarch of Moscow. This change in status would prove important in 1596, when part of the Orthodox clergy in Poland-Lithuania agreed to union with Rome (see Brest-Litovsk, Union of). Muscovy could defend the interests of fellow Orthodox Christians, the primary reason that a Cossack-led Ukrainian independence movement pledged allegiance to the Orthodox czar (1654). The resulting inflow of Ukrainian and Belarusian clergy educated at the Kiev Academy (founded by Petr Mohyla, 1632) served as Russia's hierarchs for more than a century and brought their multiconfessional experience with them.

This era involved some of the earliest high-level exchange with the Christian West, with mixed results. After the ecumenical patriarch Cyril Lucaris* published a confession of faith that was more Calvinist than Orthodox, Petr Mohyla produced one that relied on Roman Catholic catechisms and required significant revisions before the Council of Jassy could ratify it (1642).

Ironically, it was contact with other Orthodox churches that led to Russia's first serious church-state crisis (1650s), when Patriarch Nikon* introduced changes in liturgical rituals and texts based on contemporary Greek and Ukrainian practices. Full-scale religious rebellion erupted, including a power struggle with Czar Aleksei Mihailovich. A church council (1666–67) both deposed Nikon and condemned the Old* Believers, who vehemently opposed his reforms.

Church–state relations took a new turn in 1721. Peter I eliminated the office of patriarch and replaced it with a church governing body, the Holy Synod. While the church retained much autonomy, the state now enlisted it to help modernize and “enlighten” society and its administration. But educated hierarchs also helped rebuild the Optina hermitage, which, through Paisii Velichkovskii (1722–94) and his disciples, revitalized the Greek tradition of spiritual elders (starsy) and produced a spiritual and ascetical* literature drawn from hesychast* sources, notably the Philokalia, which Velichkovskii translated into Russian. Seraphim of Sarov exemplified these mystical ideals. In the 19th c., Optina Monastery and its line of starsy would attract such religious writers as Ivan Kireevsky, Nikolai Gogol, Fedor Dostoevsky*, Lev Tolstoy*, and Konstantin Leontiev.

Catherine II continued Peter I’s policy of undermining the Church’s autonomy by strictly limiting the number of monks and nuns and secularizing* church lands (1764). Women wishing to pursue the religious life responded by organizing separate communities. Bishop Feofan the Recluse (1815–94) helped foster diocesan schools for girls and establish new convents.

The 19th c. saw continued growth in church construction and missionary activity as far as Alaska and Japan, in theological academies, and in religious education and publication. Metropolitan Filaret (Drozdov, 1782–1867) sponsored the Biblical Society and the translation of the Bible into Russian (previously available only in Church Slavonic). The great reforms of Alexander II spurred the astronomical growth of convents and such charismatic, socially active priests as Ioann of Kronstadt.

The Revolution of 1905 prompted many within the clergy to call for changes in church government, most notably in the form of a church council and the election of a patriarch. Paradoxically, this opportunity arose from the February Revolution and the installation of the provisional government in 1917. The First All-Russian Council (Sobor) began its sessions in August 1917. The patriarchate was restored, with Metropolitan Tikhon (Bellavin) being elected. Liberal reforms included an emphasis on preaching (including lay preaching), monastic autonomy, and a new emphasis on the role of women in church life (among the issues on the agenda was the restoration of the order of deaconesses).

But these reforms had little chance of being implemented. After the October Revolution, the Church lost the right to own real estate and its legal status. In an encyclical (January 1918), Tikhon* admonished the Soviet government for its anti-Church actions, persecution, and terror, and excommunicated those who took part in those activities.

The patriarch refused to take sides in the civil war. But “Red priests,” also known as Renovationists or “the Living Church,” formed an alliance with the Bolsheviks and separated from the Russian Orthodox Church, trying to force parishes to use the vernacular, accept married bishops, and adopt the Gregorian* calendar. The mass of the people rejected these changes, and Renovatism vanished.

The hierarchy leading the millions who left Russia after the civil war found itself in an unprecedented position. In 1920 Tikhon issued a decree that allowed the “higher church administration in exile” to continue until the Russian Church could freely administer itself. Several splits ensued in the Church over differing interpretations of this decree; different groups were led by Metropolitan Antony (Khrapovitsky) and Metropolitan Evlogy (Georgievsky). Yet for decades, Russian Church practice and publications survived in the diaspora in ways that were impossible in Russia.

In Soviet Russia, the situation of the Church deteriorated rapidly. The League of the Militant Godless, launched in 1925, sought to organize antireligious campaigns. On July 20, 1927, attempting to win the favor of the authorities, Metropolitan Sergii issued his controversial declaration of loyalty to the Soviet government. The Church in Russia and abroad split three ways on the basis of people's attitudes toward Sergii's declaration.

Arrests of the clergy and forced liquidation of churches reached catastrophic proportions. In 1939, in most regions of the USSR, only one church was functioning. Attempts to reorganize monasteries as "workers' collectives" failed. According to the most conservative estimates, by the end of the 1930s at least 40,000 clergy, a similar number of monastics, and unknown millions of lay believers had died for their faith.

The German invasion in 1941 brought an abrupt halt to the terror. Stalin's appointment of Sergei as patriarch in 1943 marked official recognition of the Church in Soviet society. Over the following two decades, the Soviet government showed little overt hostility toward organized Orthodox activity. This changed in 1961, when the 22nd Congress of the Communist Party adopted a program of renewed antireligious propaganda that guided Soviet policy for the next quarter-century: thousands more churches and monasteries were closed. Nevertheless, such dedicated priests as Dmitry Dudko and the spiritual-intellectual Alexander Men* found ways to preach the Orthodox faith, and an underground network of duplication and distribution of religious literature arose.

During the decades of Communist oppression, Russian Orthodox theology flourished abroad. Émigré theologians, first in Paris and later in the USA, found themselves in an environment conducive to fresh theological reflection, not least because of their contact with Western Christian intellectuals and secular philosophers. Their thought in turn influenced Western Christianity, as could be seen, e.g., at Vatican* II. They often drew on the theological creativity of the late 19th c., such as that of the "Slavophile" Alexei Khomiakov or the "Westernizers" Vladimir Soloviev* and Pavel Florensky. Sergei Bulgakov*, Nicolas Afanasiev, Paul Evdokimov, and Elisabeth Behr-Sigel were prolific authors of fresh and often challenging theology; Vladimir Lossky* and Georges Florovsky* produced a more conservative (but still creative) "neopatristic synthesis." All of these thinkers, together with other colleagues of the St. Serge Institute in Paris, figured in the work of Alexander Schmemmann (who spearheaded a liturgical renewal within Orthodoxy concomitant with that in the West) and patristic scholar John Meyendorff, both of whom moved to the USA in the 1950s.

There, schools such as St. Vladimir's Seminary and Holy Trinity Seminary play a vital role in theological education and publication. Orthodoxy in Western Europe and North America is enriched by Russian ecclesiastical culture through iconography (e.g. Leonid Ouspensky, Gregory Kroug), monastic life (Jordanville, St. Tikhon's), popular writers and preachers (Alexander Elchaninov, Metropolitan Anthony Bloom), and holiness (Archbishop John Maximovich).

In 1988, the millennium anniversary of Christianity in Russia, policies toward religion reversed thanks partly to glasnost. Thousands of churches opened, millions of people were baptized, new and old monasteries, convents, and seminaries received new members, a flood of religious publications appeared, and religious feasts became legal holidays. The Church attained a prominent, privileged position. Patriarch Aleksey II (enthroned in 1990) became a highly visible national figure.

But the impact of 80 years of atheist rule persists. Church attendance is low. Debates over the 1997 federal law "On Freedom of Conscience and Religious Associations" showed the chasm between the Church's conservatives and nationalists, who sought guarantees protecting the Russian Orthodox Church, and liberals and democrats, who sought freedom of conscience for all denominations. The Moscow Patriarchate chose to support the former. Membership in the World* Council of Churches is another divisive issue.

Yet with newly thriving theological schools such as St. Tikhon Orthodox Humanities University and St. Andrew Biblical Theological Institute, and the rise of many young theological scholars studying in Russia and abroad, signs of theological life continue. Serious theological reflection undergirds documents on the Church's social concept and on relations with non-Orthodox produced by the Jubilee Bishops' Council of 2000.

Orthodox Christianity in Russia has a great and varied tradition, born of the Byzantine legacy, enriched by its cultural particularity, and steeped in incalculable suffering. Alternately grandiose and humble, brilliantly creative and staunchly conservative, it is deeply rooted yet still sprouting rapid new growth, in directions that are difficult to predict.

PETER C. BOUTENEFF and NADIESZDA KIZENKO

Orthodox Church, Eastern: In Ukraine. Orthodox Christianity, the main religious tradition of Ukraine, shaped Ukrainian cultural identity throughout its turbulent history. According to the tradition, Christianity came to the territory of contemporary Ukraine in the 1st–2nd c. on the Crimean Peninsula (then a part of the Eastern Roman Empire, later Byzantium*). Yet Christianity was not accepted into the entire territory of Ukraine until the 10th c., when Prince Volodymyr (Vladimir*) the Great established Christianity in its Eastern Christian (Byzantine*) form as the state religion (988 or 989).

In the 11th–13th c., the Metropolitanate of Kiev included 16 dioceses in territories that are presently part of Ukraine and Belarus* and European parts of Russia*. Appointed by patriarchs of Constantinople, the metropolitans of Kiev were ethnic Greeks. After the Great* Schism (1054) between the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches, clergy of medieval Rus remained in communion with the Orthodox churches. The Kiev-Pechersky Monastery* (later called Lavra*), established in the 11th c., became the main center of the Orthodox monastic tradition among the Rus principalities.

The Mongol invaders (1238–42) disrupted the political and religious life of the Rus principalities; the metropolitans of Kiev moved their see from ruined Kiev to Vladimir (later called Moscow). As the Ukrainian and Belorussian territories became parts of Lithuania* (14th c.), princes of Lithuania campaigned for independent Ukrainian and Belorussian metropolitanates, against the wishes of Moscow. Because of a conflict between the patriarch of Constantinople and the Russian Church over the Council of Florence* (1438–45), the Orthodox Metropolitanates of Ukraine and of Russia were divided. In 1448 Russian bishops elected their own metropolitan and proclaimed the independence of the Moscow Metropolitanate from Constantinople. As a consequence, the Metropolitanate of Kiev (encompassing Ukrainian and Belorussian territories) became once again a part of the Patriarchate of Constantinople and was independent of Moscow.

Following the alliance between Lithuania and Catholic Poland* (1385), the Orthodox Church in Lithuania lost state support. The Roman Catholic Church became much more powerful in Ukraine, especially after 1569, when Lithuania and Poland were united and Ukrainian territories became Polish. The 1596 Brest*-Litovsk Union created Uniatism*, "Greek Catholicism"; all Orthodox bishops in Ukraine recognized the authority of the pope, although the Ukrainian Church kept its Eastern Christian liturgical tradition (see Divine Liturgy). It was illegal for the Orthodox clergy not to recognize the Union; the Ukrainian aristocracy started to convert to Roman Catholicism.

Thus the Ukrainian Orthodox Church became illegal. But as such, it became one of the bastions of national identity for Ukrainians under Polish occupation. The Brest-Litovsk Union prompted a wave of Ukrainian polemical literature that defended Orthodoxy; Orthodox movements supported by the Ukrainian elite established Orthodox educational institutions. Most important, the Ukrainian Cossack military took the side of the Orthodox Church and supported the consecrations of a metropolitan of Kiev and of five bishops by the patriarch of Jerusalem (1620); an Orthodox hierarchy in Ukraine had thus been reestablished. In 1632 the metropolitan of Kiev, Peter Mohyla*, founded the Kievan Collegium (later called the Kiev-Mohila Academy), which was for a long time the sole higher educational institution for Orthodox Slavic peoples. In exchange, the Orthodox Church supported the rebellion of the Cossack Bohdan Khmelnytsky against the Poles in his victorious war of liberation, which established the Cossack elite in power in Ukraine.

The Pereyaslav Treaty (1654) gave control of most of the Ukrainian territory to the Moscow czar (as a protection against the Poles). Russian authorities tried to incorporate the Metropolitanate of Kiev (a part of the Constantinople Church) into the Russian* Orthodox Church, forcing the newly elected metropolitan of Kiev to swear allegiance to the patriarch of Moscow. Soon this act was condemned by a council of Constantinople bishops, and the Orthodox dioceses in Ukrainian territories under Polish control joined the Uniate Church.

As a part of the Russian Orthodox Church (18th c.), the Metropolitanate of Kiev lost its autonomy, becoming an ordinary diocese. Ukrainian Church rules and traditions were made to conform to Russian patterns. However, educated Church leaders from Ukraine received important positions in the Russian Church and its educational institutions. In 1786 Russian authorities secularized Church lands and in exchange financially supported the Orthodox clergy. The dubious results were that monasteries that did not get state support were closed and that the Orthodox clergy became alienated from ordinary believers, since they did not need financial support from them.

Meanwhile, in Western Ukraine, the Uniate Church had taken root in the population, while all of the Church's properties remained under (Catholic and Uniate) Church authority.

After the partition of Polish territories among Russia, Prussia, and Austria, most of the Ukrainian territories became part of the Russian Empire, opening Western Ukraine to an attempted restoration of the Orthodox Church. The well-known monastery Pochayiv Lavra was returned to Orthodoxy (1833). The Uniate Synod of Polotsk (1839) repudiated the Brest*-Litovsk Union; all remaining Uniate Church property in the territory of the Russian Empire was returned to the Russian Orthodox Church. In the late 18th c., after the conquest of Crimea by the Russian Empire (Crimea had previously been under the Ottoman Empire), the colonization of these lands by Orthodox people, particularly Ukrainians and Russians, was encouraged; new Orthodox parishes were created in Southern Ukraine.

The collapse of the czarist regime in the Russian Empire (1917) promoted national and church life in Ukraine. The independent Ukrainian People's Republic was proclaimed (1918). There were movements in favor of an autocephalous* or at least an autonomous Ukrainian Orthodox Church within the Russian Orthodox Church; this second movement was supported by the All-Ukrainian Church Council (1918). But the Ukrainian independent state was defeated in its liberation war (1917–20) by the Russian Bolsheviks; Ukraine became one of the Soviet Socialist Republics of the USSR. During that war thousands of Orthodox clergy and believers were cruelly killed.

Some of the Orthodox parishes in Ukraine proclaimed the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church. But this Church was short lived: no bishop joined it; it was not recognized by world Orthodox churches, and the Bolsheviks liquidated it during a campaign of repression.

In the 1920s and 1930s, the Orthodox Church in Ukraine suffered from severe persecution by Communist powers; in 1926 thousands of clergy were imprisoned and killed (formally recognized as holy martyrs in 2000). Orthodox Church buildings were ruined or confiscated. Church properties were expropriated. Christian missionary activity became a state crime; Church educational fellowships were forbidden. The collaboration of Church authorities with the Communist regime split Orthodox believers. Some of the clergy and believers refused to recognize the authority of the official Church hierarchy and created "catacomb" groups.

After World War I, Orthodox parishes in Western Ukraine were part of the new Polish state. In 1924 the patriarch of Constantinople recognized the autocephaly of the Orthodox Church of Poland (mainly Ukrainian parishes). However, Western Ukraine was conquered by the Soviet Union, becoming a part of the USSR (1939). During World War II and the German occupation (1941–44), Ukrainian bishops consecrated in the Polish Orthodox Church declared the creation of a second Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church, in addition to the Ukrainian Autonomous Orthodox Church (a part of the Russian Orthodox Church). With the restoration of Soviet control over Ukraine (1944) the second Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church became illegal; its hierarchs emigrated to North America and Western Europe and continue to serve Ukrainians of the diaspora under the jurisdiction of the Patriarchate of Constantinople.

From the 1940s through the 1980s, the Ukrainian Autonomous Orthodox Church (as a part of the Russian Orthodox Church) survived despite severe limitations on its missionary activity and religious education and despite pressing state atheist propaganda. It was only during the period of democratization (“perestroika”) in the Soviet Union (1980s) that state control over the Church abated. Hundreds of Orthodox parishes opened in 1988, the year when the 1,000 years of Christianization was celebrated.

The rebirth of the Orthodox Church brought conflicts with the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church (the Uniate Church in Western Ukraine), which had been forced to join the Russian Orthodox Church in 1946, while all its buildings and properties were given to the Orthodox Church. During the restoration of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church (1980s–1990s) believers of that Church reappropriated hundreds of Church buildings in Western Ukraine (which had belonged to the Orthodox Church for about 40 years).

In 1990 the patriarch of Moscow granted to the Ukrainian Orthodox Church an autonomous status within the Russian Orthodox Church, while a number of parishes of the Russian Orthodox Church in Western Ukraine declared the restoration of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church (its third form), which resulted in the inter-Orthodox conflicts in Ukraine (from the 1990s).

In 1991, when Ukraine became an independent state, the head of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, Philaret, the metropolitan of Kiev, tried to gain autocephaly for the Ukrainian Orthodox Church from Moscow. Following the rejection by the Moscow Patriarchate (1992), Metropolitan Philaret left the Ukrainian Orthodox Church and proclaimed the creation of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church of the Kiev Patriarchate, which included some of the bishops of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church. However, not all its believers and clergy recognized this union and continued their independent existence.

Among these Orthodox denominations, the world Orthodox churches recognize and are exclusively in communion only with the Ukrainian Orthodox Church (c17,000 parishes in 2008; still a part of the Russian Orthodox Church). The independent Orthodox denominations – the Ukrainian Orthodox Church of the Kiev Patriarchate (c4,000 parishes) and the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church (c1,200 parishes) – do not “have the grace of church sacraments,” because their clergy were consecrated by bishops forbidden by the Church to serve.

In the early 21st c., efforts to resolve these complex issues were in process. The Ukrainian state repeatedly declared its interest in a union of all three Orthodox denominations in one independent church. The Patriarchate of Constantinople and the Russian Orthodox Church continue to engage in negotiations on the status of the Ukrainian churches.

DMYTRO BONDARENKO

Orthodox Churches, Eastern: In the United States. The Orthodox Church in the USA was established through mission in Alaska in the late 18th and 19th c. and then through immigration in the late 19th and early 20th c.

Missionaries from the Church of Russia* (among them the monk Herman, 1760–1837; and Innocent John Veniaminov, 1797–1879, bishop of Alaska, 1840–52) established a mission in Alaska (1794) and translated the Scriptures and liturgical texts into local languages, while supporting indigenous cultures. The mission, serving about 10,000 faithful, continued after the sale of Alaska to the USA (1867). Yet Protestant missionaries proselytized among the native Orthodox. Although the Orthodox Church maintained a presence in the Alaskan territory, the office of the bishop moved to San Francisco (1872).

Numerous Orthodox immigrants arrived in the USA during the late 19th and early 20th c. from Greece*, Asia Minor, Russia*, the Balkans*, and the Middle East. Early parishes often began as pan-Orthodox communities, serving immigrants from many ethnic backgrounds, in, e.g., New Orleans (1864), San Francisco (1867), and New York City (1870). As the number of Orthodox immigrants increased, parishes served particular ethnic communities.

The Greeks, the largest group of Orthodox immigrants (c200,000 in 1920), were organized into about 138 parishes, initially maintaining a connection with the Greek Orthodox* Church of Greece or with the Ecumenical* Patriarchate of Constantinople (claiming responsibility for all Orthodox in the “diaspora”). Because the Patriarchate was not in a position to adequately exercise its ministry in the USA, Orthodox Church life developed with little hierarchical supervision. Yet in 1922, the Patriarchate established the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America led (1931–48) by Archbishop Athenagoras Spiro (1886–1972; who became patriarch of Constantinople).

Most parishes serving Slavic immigrants became associated with the Russian Orthodox Diocese (located in San Francisco). With the rapid increase of Slavic immigrants in the Eastern USA (including 150,000 Carpatho-Russian immigrants), the diocesan center moved to New York (1905) under Archbishop Tikhon Bellavin (1865–1925; later patriarch of Moscow); about 50 formerly Eastern Catholic Carpatho-Russian parishes entered the Russian Orthodox Diocese.

By 1933 three major Russian Orthodox jurisdictions opposed each other over the Bolshevik Revolution (1917). (1) The Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church, or Metropolia, the largest, declared itself temporarily independent of the Church of Russia (1924). (2) A diocese of the Russian Orthodox Church Abroad, serving Russian immigrants with royalist sympathies, refused after 1925 to acknowledge the authority of the Church of Russia. (3) The Church of Russia established an exarchate (1933).

Other autocephalous* Orthodox churches – the churches of Serbia (1921), Antioch (1924), Romania (1930), Albania (1932), and Bulgaria (1938) – established dioceses in the USA, while the Ecumenical Patriarchate established dioceses for the Ukrainians (1937) and the Carpatho-Russians (1938). These “ethnic” (rather than territorial) dioceses served the immigrants’ short-term needs but sacrificed canonical order and the unity of the episcopacy; a polity of congregationalism and an attitude of phyletism* and parochialism pervaded church life.

After World War II, having lost their immigrant character, many parishes adapted themselves in order to serve parishioners who were born and educated in the USA and often married beyond their ethnic communities. English gradually became an acceptable liturgical language. Clergy were educated at Holy Cross Greek Orthodox School of Theology (Boston) or St. Vladimir’s Orthodox Theological School (New York). People from other religious traditions became members of the Orthodox Church. Pan-Orthodox cooperation for retreats, charitable outreach, religious education, and campus ministry increased.

The Standing Conference of Canonical Orthodox Bishops in America – from 1960 under the leadership of Archbishop Iakovos Coucouzis (1911–2005) of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese – brought together most of the primates, coordinated pan-Orthodox activities, including religious education and campus ministry, and established bilateral theological dialogues with the Episcopal Church (1962), the Roman Catholic Church (1966), the Lutheran Church (1968), and the Reformed churches (1968).

The Patriarchate of Moscow granted autocephaly to the Russian Orthodox Metropolia, which became the Orthodox Church in America (1970), regularizing the formal relationship with the Church of Russia lost in 1924. Yet the autocephalous status of the Orthodox Church in America was not recognized by the Ecumenical Patriarchate and most other autocephalous churches. Tensions among the jurisdictions in the USA increased. In 1975 the Patriarchate of Antioch unified its two diocesan jurisdictions in the new Antiochian Orthodox Christian Archdiocese.

The Orthodox churches around the world engaged in renewed conciliarity*. The Ecumenical Patriarchate organized conferences (early 1970s) on themes relevant to the entire church. Pan-Orthodox conferences (1990, 1993) examined the issues related to the “diaspora.” All Orthodox bishops in the USA met (1994, 2000) and confirmed the need for greater administrative unity. The Standing Conference continued to serve Orthodox cooperation and unity under the leadership of Archbishop Demetrios [Trakatellis] (1928–), the exarch of the Ecumenical Patriarchate and primate of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese. The c5 million Orthodox Christians in the USA (2007) are gathered in more than 1,500 parishes, with about 20 monasteries, 3 graduate schools of theology, and a college.

THOMAS E. FITZGERALD

ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL, CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Orthodox Churches, Oriental (Non-Chalcedonian): Their Theologies and Liturgies

2) A Sampling of Oriental Orthodox Churches in Context

Orthodox Churches, Oriental: Armenian Apostolic Church

Orthodox Churches, Oriental: Coptic Orthodox Church

Orthodox Churches, Oriental: Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church

Orthodox Churches, Oriental: Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church

Orthodox Churches, Oriental: Syriac Orthodox Church, Universal

1) Introductory Entry

Orthodox Churches, Oriental (Non-Chalcedonian) Churches: Their Theologies and Liturgies. The ancient churches in the East that decided not to adhere to the dogmatic formulation of the Council of Chalcedon*, usually known as “Oriental Orthodox churches,” number six: the Armenian Apostolic Church, Syriac Orthodox Church Universal, Coptic Orthodox Church, Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church of India, and Eritrean Orthodox Church. During the 20th c., owing to various historical circumstances, especially foreign oppression, these churches were scattered all over the world, establishing their jurisdictions in Europe, North America, and Australia.

Historically these churches have remained closely associated. Their relationships became more active after 1965, when the heads of the churches met in Addis Ababa to confirm their unity in faith and tried to coordinate their ecumenical activities as one church family. They are connected through their traditions and teachings. The Coptic Orthodox Church is the mother church of the Ethiopian and Eritrean churches. The Indian Malankara Orthodox Church is closely related to the Syriac Orthodox Church. The Armenian Church has two jurisdictions: the Armenian Apostolic Church, Mother See of Holy Etchmiadzin; and the Catholicosate of the Great House of Cilicia. Etchmiadzin enjoys the honor of primacy.

These churches accept the dogmatic decisions of the first three ecumenical councils: Nicaea* (325), Constantinople* (381), and Ephesus* (431). Their Christology is based on the formulation of Cyril* of Alexandria (see Miaphysite). All of them accept seven sacraments*. Although they are not in communion with the Byzantine Church (Eastern Orthodox* Church), they have a common heritage.

Remaining faithful to the tradition of the early church, the Oriental Orthodox churches have a hierarchical system of church administration, including the threefold* office of ministry (deacons*, priests*, bishops*), implemented according to the general trends in the entire Orthodox family.

In the Oriental Orthodox churches, only male believers can be ordained. Women can become deaconesses, especially in the Armenian Church. The clergy are both celibate and married. The married clergy are not allowed to take high offices in the Church. Canonically marriage is allowed only before ordination for the diaconate.

These churches have rich liturgical traditions. The influence of monasticism* is strong (see Monasticism Cluster: Monasticism; Monasticism Cluster: In the Syriac Tradition), especially on their liturgies for the Divine* Office (see Eucharist Cluster: In Oriental Orthodox [Non-Chalcedonian] Churches). Although they share core liturgical principles, the liturgical tradition is different from one church to another, depending on region and culture. Their church calendars* are based on the old Jerusalem tradition but reflect local particularities. The hymnal systems are also different.

The Armenians have one Divine Liturgy, mainly that of St. Basil* the Great with prayers from the liturgies of St. John Chrysostom*, Athanasius* the Great, and Gregory of Narek. During the 12–13th c., the Armenian Liturgy was influenced by the Roman Mass*. Unleavened bread and pure wine are used. The Armenian Church celebrates the Nativity and Epiphany on the same day, January 6.

The Divine Liturgy of the Syriac Church belongs to the original version of the Antiochene liturgy, with some slight changes. This liturgy is ascribed to James* the Apostle (see James, Liturgy of St.). Originally, it was written in Greek, then translated into Syriac in the 5th c. before the Council of Chalcedon. In the liturgy, leavened bread is used with salt and oil.

The liturgy of the Coptic Orthodox Church takes the form of a dialogue between people and priest. During the whole year, the Coptic Orthodox Church celebrates the Liturgy of St. Basil* the Great (as edited in the 12th c.) every day except for Christmas, Epiphany, and Easter. During these feasts, the liturgies of St. Gregory* the Theologian and of St. Mark* are celebrated. Leavened bread and wine made of grapes are used.

Almost all the forms of the Divine Office of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, except some local particularities, correspond to the liturgies of the Coptic Orthodox Church. Yet the Ethiopian Orthodox stipulates that, for celebrating liturgy, there must be at least two priests and three deacons. The Ethiopian Liturgy comprises 15 anaphoras*, including the Anaphoras of the St. Apostles, of St. John the Evangelist, of St. Athanasius the Great, of St. Gregory of Nazianzus, and of St. Gregory the Armenian. Each of these anaphoras has a special emphasis either on the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ or on the Last Supper and Resurrection.

The liturgies of the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church and Syriac Orthodox Church are alike. The Malankara Indians have 16 anaphoras for liturgy, although they celebrate mainly the Liturgy of St. James, as well as the liturgies of St. Matthew and St. Mark, St. Ignatius of Antioch, St. Cyril of Rome, St. Basil the Great, and St. John Chrysostom.

These churches have strong monastic* traditions regulated by the rules of desert fathers in Egypt and Cappadocia, although local elements have been inculturated.

BISHOP YEZNIK PETROSSIAN

2) A Sampling of Oriental Orthodox Churches in Context

Orthodox Churches, Oriental: Armenian Apostolic Church. One of the Oriental Orthodox (non-Chalcedonian) churches, the Armenian Apostolic Church is the national church of the Armenian people, in Armenia and beyond (especially in Georgia*, Russia*, and Iran*; c5.6 million members worldwide). Its spiritual center is the Holy See of Etchmiadzin, headed by the catholicos* of all Armenians, the supreme spiritual and hierarchical authority. In addition there are three hierarchical sees: the Catholicosate of the Great House of Cilicia (since 1446), the Armenian Patriarchate of Jerusalem (since the 7th c.), and the Armenian Patriarchate of Constantinople (since 1464).

The Armenian Church is called "apostolic" because tradition says that it was founded by two apostles of Jesus Christ, Thaddeus* and Bartholomew*, the "first illuminators of Armenia", who were martyred there (1st c.). The preaching of Christianity among different groups of people, among them the members of the royal family, the martyrdom of the first Christians, the establishment of Christian communities, and the construction of churches, monasteries, and chapels all created favorable conditions for Gregory* the Illuminator, the first catholicos* of the Armenian Church, to proclaim Christianity in the country, to struggle against paganism, to found dioceses, and to organize the Armenian Church. During the reign of King Tiridates, c314 (301, according to some), Christianity was proclaimed the state religion in Armenia.

The theology and dogma of the Armenian Apostolic Church are based on the Holy Bible, sacred tradition*, canons, and teachings of great 4th- and 5th-c. church fathers, especially Athanasius* of Alexandria (d370), Basil* the Great (d379), Gregory* the Theologian (d390), Gregory* of Nyssa (d394), and Cyril* of Alexandria (d444), as well as on the dogmas adopted by the ecumenical councils of Nicaea* (325), Constantinople* (381), and Ephesus* (431).

Except for the christological* issue regarding the two natures of Christ, divine and human, the doctrine of the Armenian Church is identical with that of the Eastern Orthodox* churches. The decisions of the fourth ecumenical council, Chalcedon* (451), created division and estrangement between the Armenian and Byzantine churches, which previously had cooperated with each other and maintained close relations. In the 6th c., the Armenian Church officially rejected the decisions of Chalcedon.

The Divine* Liturgy of the Armenian Church is based on the missals of St. Basil* of Caesarea and St. Gregory* the Theologian. In the course of time, the Divine Liturgy underwent changes: it was celebrated in the Armenian language; it incorporated special rites and original Armenian chants; and it assumed a national character. During the Divine Liturgy, unleavened bread and pure wine are used. Communion is given to the faithful in the form of consecrated bread steeped in the wine. For each liturgy, only one consecrated loaf of bread is used. Only one liturgy can be celebrated each day on the same altar, and only one priest can celebrate the Divine Liturgy, for there is no concelebration* in the liturgy of the Armenian Church (see Eucharist Cluster: In Oriental [Non-Chalcedonian] Orthodox Churches).

Those who do not receive the sacrament partake in the Divine Liturgy through prayer and especially unceasing remembrance of our Lord Jesus Christ. At the end of the liturgy (patarag), portions of blessed thin unleavened bread, mas, are distributed to those who have not received the sacrament. Mas is distributed in remembrance of the agape*, which used to take place after the Divine Liturgy, in order that the faithful who have not received the sacrament might not be deprived of the blessing and might share in the divine feast.

BISHOP YEZNIK PETROSSIAN

Orthodox Churches, Oriental: Coptic Orthodox Church.

One of the Oriental Orthodox (non-Chalcedonian) churches, the Coptic Orthodox Church is the main Christian church in predominantly Muslim Egypt*, although it is also present in other countries, with c9.5 million members worldwide. The name "Coptic" is derived from the Arabic qibt, "Egyptian." (Arabic is the language commonly used by Church members since the 10th c.). The Coptic language is derived from ancient Egyptian, written in an alphabet derived from Greek. The central parts of the liturgy continue to be said in Bohairic, one of the Coptic dialects.

The pope of Alexandria heads the Coptic Orthodox Church's clergy, which includes bishops who oversee the priests ordained in more than 60 dioceses in Egypt, Jerusalem, and other parts of the world. Both the pope and the bishops must be monks; they regularly meet as the Coptic Orthodox Holy Synod to oversee matters of faith and pastoral care. The pope of the Coptic Church, although highly regarded, is not viewed as infallible*. Priests are married.

The theology of the Coptic Church was influenced by a strong monastic tradition (see Monasticism Cluster: Monasticism) and has its foundation in the school of Alexandria*, which included Clement* of Alexandria and Origen*, who, with the Church in Egypt, played an important role in the theological debates of the time in a quest for a catholic (universal) church. Athanasius* of Alexandria was a key theologian in combating Arianism* and defending the Council of Nicaea* (325). His successor, Cyril*, played a similar role in combating Nestorianism* at the First Council of Ephesus* (431). The Coptic Orthodox Church emerged as one of the Oriental Orthodox* churches (falsely) accused of Monophysitism* (the belief that Christ as the Son of God has "only one nature," monophysis). The Coptic Church denies that it is Monophysite. But rather than affirming the christological* formulations of the Council of Chalcedon* (451; Christ is one person* or hypostasis*, "known in two natures without division or separation, confusion, or change"), the Coptic Church accepted the formulation of Cyril, who wrote of "one incarnate nature of the divine Word" (the Greek phrase begins with Mia physis). Hence the Coptic Church is "Miaphysite*." For Copts, the Lord's perfect divinity and perfect humanity are united in one nature called "the nature of the incarnate Word." Among the great 6th-c. theologians, Severus* of Antioch wrote many theological treatises refuting both Nestorian* Dyophysitism (two natures in Christ) and Eutychian* Monophysitism.

The beginnings of the Coptic Liturgy are obscure; it is difficult to trace its origin before the 4th c. Yet as in the Eastern Orthodox churches, for which "the theologian is the one who prays, and the one who prays is a theologian" (see Orthodox Churches, Eastern, Cluster: Introductory Entries), these theological debates about Christologies were intense because they reflected and affected the life of prayer in the Coptic Church. In addition, the liturgy is informed by the Scriptures, the Apostolic* Tradition attributed to Hippolytus* of Rome (c215; which survived only in Arabic), the *Didascalia apostolorum (written in Syria, 3rd c.), the Apostolic* Constitutions (4th c.), the Euchologion of Sarapion of Thmuis (4th c.), and the description of the liturgy of Jerusalem by Egeria.

After the Arab conquest of Egypt (7th c.), and especially from the 10th c., scholars and ecclesiastical authorities of the Coptic Church started to write in Arabic rather than Greek. Yet the Coptic Church adopted the Bohairic dialect (of Lower Egypt) as its liturgical language; the service books now include Bohairic and Arabic translations in parallel columns, but the actual use of Arabic is limited to the lessons of the Bible and certain hymns.

The Coptic Euchologion (liturgical book) contains the evening and the morning offerings of incense* and, since Pope Gabriel Ibn Turaik (1131–45), three liturgies: those of St. Basil*, St. Gregory* of Nazianzus, and St. Cyril* (also known as the Liturgy of St. Mark).

From monastic spirituality, the Coptic Church inherited the Horologion (Book of Hours), which contains the "seven hours" (worship services), each including 12 psalms, a reading from the gospel, hymns (troparia), and an absolution.

The Coptic Church trains its clergy in several theological colleges and laypeople in Sunday schools. There are around 30 monasteries of men and women. In the past, the Coptic Church contributed to the evangelization of Nubia and Ethiopia* and now conducts missions in Kenya, South Africa, Congo, and Latin America under the leadership of several bishops. The Coptic Church engages in ecumenical theological dialogue* as a member of the World* Council Churches, Middle East Council of Churches, and the All African Conference of Churches. See also EGYPT.

YOUHANNA NESSIM YOUSSEF

Orthodox Churches, Oriental: Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church. One of the Oriental Orthodox (non-Chalcedonian) churches, the Ethiopian Tewahedo Church was the national church of Ethiopia (the second “Christian nation,” after Armenia*) from the 4th c. until 1974 (the fall of Emperor Haile Selassie). It remains the church of the majority of Ethiopians (in Ethiopia and abroad), with a total membership of about 40 million (in Ethiopia c38 million; 35,000 parishes, nearly 500,000 priests and monks). Throughout its history, the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church was an instrument of cultural integration, assimilation, and unity in traditional Ethiopia. It was under the authority of the Coptic pope of Alexandria from the 4th c. until it became autocephalous* (1959) with the crowning of Abuna Baslios, the first patriarch of Ethiopia.

The appellation “Tewahedo” (from the Ge’ez verb meaning “to be of more than one by unity”) emphasizes its belief in the existence, in Christ, of humanity and divinity in unity. Jesus Christ is one person, the Word incarnate, with one will. He is perfect man and perfect God. According to the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, both Eutyches* and Nestorius* are heretics* – Eutyches for denying the existence of humanity in Christ, and Nestorius for denying divinity in Christ united with his humanity.

Ethiopian cultural and religious identity has its roots in the OT, which narrates the journey of the queen of Sheba to the palace of King Solomon* in Jerusalem (1 Kgs 10:1–9). According to traditions recorded in Kebra Nagast (Book of the glory of kings), the (legitimate) Ethiopian emperors were descendants of the son of King Solomon and the queen of Sheba, Menelik, who with his companions stealthily brought to Ethiopia the Ark (Tabot) of the Covenant, which became an important symbol* for the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church.

The Church (with a bishop and all the sacraments) was established in the 4th c. when Athanasius*, the patriarch of Alexandria, appointed Frumentius* the first bishop of Ethiopia. It became and remains the center of Christianity in the Horn of Africa. The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church as an apostolic, autocephalous, and ecumenical church, led by its patriarch, is in full communion with the other Oriental Orthodox churches, a founding member of the World* Council Churches, and a member of the All African Conference of Churches.

Five Pillars of Mystery. The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church rests on five “pillars of mystery,” grounded in Scripture: the mysteries* of the Trinity*, the Incarnation*, baptism*, Holy Communion*/Eucharist*, and the resurrection* of the dead.

1. The Holy Trinity is three in name, in person (akal), and in deed and one in essence, in divinity, in eternity, and in will. The Father is himself heart, and is the heart for the Son and the Holy Spirit. The Son is himself Word, and is the Word of the Father and of the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit is himself life (breath), and is the life (breath) of the Father and the Son.
2. The Incarnation is the mystery of God the Son, one of the Trinity, having descended from heaven and taken up flesh and rational soul from the Holy Virgin Mary*; it is the mystery of God becoming human and of human becoming God (John 1:14). The Divinity with the flesh and the flesh with the Divinity become one person and one nature in perfect union without change, without confusion, without separation, and without division. As the liturgy expresses, “He [Christ] is one before and after His Incarnation” (see Miaphysite).
3. Baptism, a sacrament, is a mystery in the sense that, when the priest recites the prayer over the water and blesses it, the water becomes “water of life” (which flowed from the side of Christ; John 19:34–35) and one receives the invisible grace* and is adopted as a child of God. In Church practice, a boy is circumcised at the age of 8 days and baptized on his 40th day, and a girl is baptized on her 8th day. (Circumcision of girls was once the norm but is now proscribed by civil law.)

4. Holy Communion is a supreme act of life through which believers can hold intimate communion with God and that which makes them one with God. It is a mystery because, when the priest blesses the bread and the wine with the liturgical prayer, the bread and the wine are changed into the real Flesh and Blood of the Son of God.
5. Resurrection is the mystery of life after death. All those who have departed will arise in the union of body* and soul* (the souls being united with their bodies) on the day of resurrection, when Christ will come in his glory to judge the living and the dead.

The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church also observes the sacraments of confirmation* (or holy myron; see Chrismation), holy orders (see Ordination), matrimony*, penance*, and unction* of the sick, as do other churches (Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Anglican).

Holy Scriptures. With Cyril of Alexandria, the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church affirms that “holy books are the breath of God,” the absolute truth; nothing can be added or removed from them. In addition to the books of the Protestant Bible and the OT Apocrypha (see Bible, Canon of the), the Ethiopian Bible includes Joseph Ben Gurion (or Josippon, a popular chronicle of Jewish history from Adam to Titus), Jubilees*, Enoch*, the Testament* of Our Lord; Apostolic* Church Order, Apostolic* Constitutions (or Apostolic Canons), and the Didascalia* of the Apostles.

Church Buildings. A church building is the abode of God and, irrespective of one’s age, race, or gender, a place of education where the gospel is taught; a place for prayer, intercession, and forgiveness of sin; a place of worship where Holy Communion and baptism are conducted; and the final resting place of Christians. The church is different from other buildings because it has been consecrated by bishops and anointed with myron/chrisem, and is the place where sacraments are conducted and where the Ark of the Covenant is kept (see Ethiopia).

According to the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church rites and tradition, the church building has three parts (divided by partitions): the outer ambulatory (qene mahlet), where the choir leads worship and chant hymns; the surrounding ambulatory (kidest), where the faithful receive Holy Communion; and the sanctuary (Holy of Holies, Mekdes, reserved for ordained men), where the liturgy is conducted and which houses the throne for the Ark of the Covenant.

The Ark of the Covenant (Tabot) is the repository of the tablet (tsilat) on which the Ten Commandments are written as given to Moses by God on Mount Sinai. In a church, the tablet represents and thus is called the Ark. The reason for bowing and praying in front of the Ark is that, when the Israelites were in penance and begging God for forgiveness, God revealed himself through the Ark, which is a means of mercy and salvation (Exod 25:20–25) (see Symbolism).

The Ark of the Covenant did not disappear after OT times; it was brought to Ethiopia long before Christianity arrived. The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church has accepted and preserved the OT and the rites contained therein, following Christ’s teaching in Matt 5:17–19. It honors the Ark of the Covenant and bears witness publicly and openly to it as a cornerstone of its doctrine. The Tabot placed in each church building is made in the names of the Trinity, the Virgin Mary, the saints, prophets, apostles, and martyrs.

The Holy Virgin Mary is revered in the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church as the abode of the Holy Spirit, the Mother of God (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster: Theotokos), the Eternal Virgin, the Holy of Holies. According to the Liturgy/Anaphora of Jacob* of Serug (Syria, 5th c.), since the Word of God graced her by being born of her, the Church honors, thanks, and implores God through her.

Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs are given the honor and title of “holy” and “saint,” for they gave their lives for the sake of God, bore witness in his name, and served God with all their energies and capacities. The Church honors, thanks, and implores not only the Holy Virgin Mary, but also angels (created on the first Sunday, according to Jubilees, 2:6–8) and the saints (holy ones, made from fire and wind, 3 Macc 2:10–11). Angels are always praising God (Rev 4:8–11), “ascending and descending” between God and humans (John 1:51; Heb 1:14). Angels and/or saints present human prayers, alms, and offerings to God; bring God’s mercy and gifts to humans (Dan 9:20–22; Luke 1:13; Acts 10:3–5); bring souls before God after death (Luke 16:22); guard every creature (Matt 18:10); bring solace and help in times of suffering and hardship (Acts 2:7–11; Ps 89:7); and are sent to separate sinners from the righteous at the end of time (Matt 24:31; Rev 7:1–4). Thus the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church honors the relics of saints who departed after serving God in word and deed; their relics, kept in church buildings, continue to perform miracles.

Praying, Fasting, and Observing Feasts.

These observances follow both Scripture and tradition. Fasting* does not merely entail abstinence from food. There is true fast when the eye is kept from seeing evil, the mouth from speaking evil, and the ear from hearing evil (Matt 15:10–20). There are seven fasting periods: Lent (the great fast), Wednesdays and Fridays, Nineveh (commemorating the prophet Jonah), the eves of Christmas and Epiphany, Advent, the feasts of the apostles, and the assumption of the Holy Virgin Mary.

Prayers, said seven times a day (from morning to midnight), are of three kinds: private, family, and public. Public prayers conducted by priests, including the Holy Liturgy, include hymns, often qenes composed in honor of a saint, including those composed by Yared (6th c.). The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church uses 14 anaphoras (liturgies) to celebrate Holy Communion, including the Anaphoras of St. Mary, St. Athanasius*, St. Basil*, St. Gregory*, St. Epiphanius*, St. John* Chrysostom, St. Cyril*, and St. Jacob* of Serug.

Alms (giving one’s bread to the hungry, bringing the homeless poor into one’s house) are among the most important religious deeds and are always associated with worship.

Icons* are important for all Orthodox churches. The difference is that for the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, icons and the making of icons and other sacred objects are associated with the making of Arks (of the Covenant). Thus the making of icons is understood in terms of biblical texts about the building of the Ark of the Covenant. Exodus 31:1–6, especially, underscores the idea that God selects artists to design the tabernacle, the holy vestments, the Ark, the cherub, and the paintings that, once consecrated and blessed, become means of blessing. They are venerated and God blesses all who venerate them as “godly art,” in contrast with images that should not be worshipped. As the Church understood when books were not readily available (as in catacombs), sacred images, sacred arts and buildings, sacred objects, relics, and sacred gestures, including the sign of the cross, are necessary means to teach the faithful and to express one’s faith.

The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church has played an important role in education in Ethiopia. It developed the Ethiopian script and literature. It established an education system for the clergy. Before the advent of modern education, the Church trained all the government functionaries, including judges, officials of the imperial court, and civil servants. Churches and monasteries were virtually the country’s only “libraries.” Every parish had its own school, although as a result of recent political events, only about 43% have their own schools (in 2005 there were only c125,000 students). Because of a lack of teaching materials, lessons are largely oral and learned by rote memory, and educational programs are consequently lengthy. The Church struggles to introduce modern teaching methods and teaching materials.

BISHOP ABBA SAMUEL WOLDE
TEKESTEBIRHAN

Orthodox Churches, Oriental: Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church (Indian Orthodox Church). The Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church is an autocephalous* Oriental* Orthodox Church deeply rooted in Indian social culture and spirituality, with about 2 million faithful headed by a supreme catholicos* (in Kottayam, Kerala). It traces its origin to the apostle Thomas*, who, according to tradition, arrived on the Malabar coast (present-day Kerala, South India) in 52.

Since the 16th c., the history of the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church has been deeply marked by bitter struggles, first with the Portuguese* Roman Catholic colonizers, then with the British missionaries and other ecclesiastical authorities who wanted either to proselytize or to wield power over the ancient Christians of India. These foreign “missionary” efforts eventually divided the one Christian community into several bodies. Because of the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church’s spiritual and liturgical connections with Syriac-using Persian and Middle Eastern Christian communities (see present cluster: Syriac Orthodox Church, Universal), the British rulers labeled the native Indian Christians of St. Thomas “Syrian Christians.”

The Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church fully shares its faith and eucharistic Communion with the other churches in the Oriental Orthodox family. Rooted in the mystery* of the Holy Trinity* and the incarnation* of God in Jesus Christ, the Church centers its liturgical life on the Holy Eucharist and practices the other sacraments of baptism*, chrismation*, ordination*, marriage*, confession*, and the anointing* of the sick. Holy Scripture* is widely used both in public liturgical celebrations and in personal and family devotional life. The Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church upholds the faith of three of the seven ecumenical councils (Nicaea*, 325; Constantinople*, 381; Ephesus*, 431) and practices with other Orthodox churches the intercession of the Holy Virgin Mary* and the saints*, and prayers for the departed.

A founding member of the World* Council of Churches and an active participant in the fruitful 20th-c. theological dialogue* between the Oriental Orthodox and the Eastern Orthodox churches, the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church also maintains theological dialogues with the Roman Catholic Church and the churches of the Reformation.

The Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church has active social and teaching ministries, two thriving theological faculties, and a dynamic Sunday school and student movement. Its 1,500 parishes are governed by elected parish councils. The priests can choose to be married or celibate, while bishops are elected from among celibate clergy by the representative church assembly with two-thirds laypeople. The Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church is one of the few Orthodox churches that still practice the direct election of bishops and head of the church by the people and clergy. Its Holy Synod, the supreme body in matters of faith and discipline, has 25 member bishops.

KONDOTHRA M. GEORGE

Orthodox Churches, Oriental: Syriac Orthodox Church, Universal. According to tradition, Peter established his Holy See in Antioch (37), presiding over the church in Antioch (the capital of the Roman province of Syria) and consecrating Evodius and Ignatius Noorono as bishops, before leaving for missionary work. Thereafter, there was a succession of bishops or “patriarchs of Antioch and all the East,” until Patriarch Ignatius Zakka I was (consecrated 1980). The seat of the Patriarchate is now Damascus, the capital of present-day Syria.

The 1st-c. Syriac Orthodox Church flourished in the eastern part of the Roman Empire and soon beyond, in the Persian Empire, Iraq*, Mongolia, India*, and China*. Jacob* Baradai (c500–78) revived the spiritual life of the Church in Syria, Armenia*, Egypt*, Persia, and Cyprus*.

In the early 7th c., the Syriac Orthodox Church had c20,000 parishes and hundreds of monasteries and convents. The Syriac Orthodox Church survived domination by Arabs (for whom Syrian monks and scholars translated the Greek philosophers into Arabic) and Mongols. Yet the Church suffered greatly during the Mongol invasions (14th c.). A separate uniate Patriarchate of Antioch (Syriac Catholics) was established (late 18th c.). Yet from the mid-20th c., the Syriac Orthodox Church began to flourish again, as it did in India (see the present cluster: Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church).

Theology and Liturgy. The Syriac Orthodox Church recognizes only three ecumenical councils (Nicaea, 325; Constantinople, 381; Ephesus, 431), rejecting the decisions of the Council of Chalcedon (451) about the person of Christ, which made too many concessions to the Nestorians*. The Syriac Orthodox Church believes in the Holy Trinity* – Father, Son, and Holy Spirit – the one true God, and in the Lord Jesus Christ as God in whom divinity and humanity are united in a real, perfect, indivisible, and inseparable way, and all their properties are present and active. The doctrinal position of the Syriac Orthodox Church is similar to that of the Coptic*, Armenian*, and Ethiopian* Orthodox churches. Veneration of the saints* and prayers for the dead are essential elements of the Church's tradition. The Church recognizes the seven traditional sacraments*. The liturgical language of the Church is Syriac (vernacular languages are used alongside Syriac); the usual anaphora* is that of St. James*. Famous schools of theology were established in Antioch*, Nisibis*, and Edessa*; Ephrem* the Syrian and Jacob* of Edessa graduated from these schools.

20th–21st Centuries. The Syriac Orthodox Church, now spread all over the world, has been an active member since 1960 of the World* Council of Churches (one of its presidents has been Patriarch Ignatius Zakka I Iwas, since 1998). It takes part in ecumenical and theological dialogues around the world. The Syriac Orthodox Church maintains a number of monasteries, an integral part of its spiritual and cultural heritage. There are three minor seminaries and two major seminaries (one in Syria and one in India) for training clergy. The Church includes about 4 million adherents (the major part in India) in 36 dioceses and 1 catholicos, 37 archbishops, and 1 bishop under the Syriac Orthodox patriarch.

METROPOLITAN ATHANASIOS GEEVARGIS

Orthodox Worship. See DIVINE LITURGY OF THE ORTHODOX CHURCHES; EUCHARIST CLUSTER: IN ORIENTAL ORTHODOX (NON-CHALCEDONIAN) CHURCHES.

Orthodoxy (Gk “correct belief”) in Western Christianity emphasizes adherence to the accepted dogmas, viewed as revealed understandings or teachings, usually confirmed by an authority: Scriptures*; councils*, synods*, and other church assemblies; creeds*; or a prelate (pope, patriarch, bishop). Having an orthodox faith* is to believe in such authoritative teachings. Orthodoxy is opposed to heterodoxy (“alien teaching”) and heresy*. In Eastern Christianity, “Orthodoxy” refers to the worship, belief, theology, and practices of the Eastern Orthodox* churches or Oriental Orthodox* churches. See also ORTHOPRAXY.

Orthodoxy, Festival of, first Sunday in Lent, first observed in 843 after the defeat of Iconoclasm* and the restoration of icons*.

Orthopraxy (Gk “correct practice”) in Christianity emphasizes “lived faith*” rather than “faith” as “correct belief” (see Orthodoxy). Although the term is often used to characterize Judaism* because of its emphasis on action rather than belief, orthopraxy is also found throughout church history: for various groups (e.g. religious* orders, the Social* Gospel Movement, Liberation* theologians), the Christian faith* is not limited to a proper understanding of God, but is a matter of experiencing God's reality by entering and sharing in God's very life in a “praxis according to God” (G. Gutiérrez); as is written in Micah 6:8: “What does the Lord require of you but to do justice, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with your God?”

Otto of Freising (c1115–58), bishop of Freising, historian. Born in Austria* of noble ancestry, he studied in Paris*, probably under Hugo* of St. Victor. He became a monk and abbot in a Cistercian* abbey in Champaign, then was appointed bishop of Freising (1138). He took part in the Second Crusade* (1147–48), introduced Aristotle* in Germany, and wrote both an interpretative History of the Two Cities and a narrative of Barbarossa's early reign.

Ousia (Gk "essence"), term used by the Capadocians* to designate the divine "essence," which is the same in the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, in the doctrine of the Trinity* (in contrast to the term *hypostasis, "person"). See also HOMOOUSIANS, HOMOIOUSIANS, HOMOIANS, ANOMOIANS.

Oxford Group. Founded by Buchman* (1921), it was originally called "First Century Christian Fellowship." Nicknamed the "Oxford Group," it was subsequently called "Moral* Re-armament" (1938) and was finally (2001) given the name "Initiatives of Change." Known for its concern for personal and social transformation, it was criticized for moral absolutism, anti-Communist fervor, obsession with sex, exaggerated claims, and cultlike personal guidance. First organized in England, it entered the USA in 1939 and is now active in many countries, seeking inter-religious cooperation. The conference center on Mackinac Island (Michigan, 1942–66) was superseded by the one in Caux, Switzerland (established in 1946).

Oxford Movement, religious revival* in the Church of England. In its initial stage (1833–45), it was known for its publication of Tracts for the Times (1833–41), the translation of major works by early church fathers, a series of writings by classic Anglo-Catholic theologians, as well as a rigorous campaign to oppose theological liberalism* and secular interference in religious life and to enliven Anglicanism's Catholic roots: its episcopal, sacramental, and creedal identity. Its major leaders included John Henry Newman*, Edward Bouverie Pusey*, and John Keble*. Despite Newman's "Tract 90" (1841), in which he argued that the Thirty*-nine Articles of the Anglican tradition could be interpreted in a Catholic sense, his conversion to Roman Catholicism (1845), and a crisis over the Gorham case (1850, when a secular court ruled on a theological matter), which led to the conversion of others to Roman Catholicism, the movement continued to exert a strong influence on the Anglican Church. Although its primary focus came to an end with Pusey's death (1882), it continued in other forms: the ongoing Anglican Old High Church Movement (which had begun before it), late Victorian ritualism, and the much different liberal Catholicism of Charles Gore (1853–1932) and Lux mundi: A Series of Studies in the Religion of the Incarnation (1889).

PETER C. ERB

P

Pacem in Terris, encyclical letter (1963) of Pope John* XXIII, calling for peace on earth though truth, justice, charity, and liberty, which should be based on the “divinely established order” of creation that grants rights and freedoms to all peoples. See also SOCIAL ENCYCLICALS.

Pachomius (c292–346), early Egyptian monastic leader; inaccurately described as “the founder of cenobitic* monasticism.” Raised in a pagan family, he became a Christian after leaving the Roman army (313) and became a monk (c316). After settling in Tabennesi, Upper Egypt, he gradually organized and led a confederation of large monasteries, known as the Koinonia (Gk “fellowship”), and composed the first known monastic* rule. He was celebrated in several biographies (composed c390s), which were preserved in Greek and in dialects of Coptic. Scholars have discovered letters and catecheses attributed to Pachomius and his successors, Theodore and Horsiesius.

J. WILLIAM HARMLESS, SJ

Pacific, South, and Australia. See HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN THE SOUTH PACIFIC AND AUSTRALIA.

Pacifism and Christianity. History is replete with varieties of Christian pacifists. A single definition will not suffice. The word “pacifism” (from Lat pacem facere, “to make peace”) reflects Jesus’ teaching in Matt 5:9, “Blessed are the peacemakers, for they will be called children of God.” It has a proactive meaning: a commitment to engage actively in practices of peacemaking. It has an avoidance meaning: a commitment to avoid practices of violence and war. It has a Christ-is-Lord meaning: a commitment to follow the way of Jesus Christ as revelation of God and God’s will. Different Christian pacifists emphasize one or more of these three meanings and thus are not easily classified.

The Christ-is-Lord meaning is seen in the high Christologies* of John 1, Heb 1, Col 1, Phil 2, and Rev 5. We practice “preaching peace by Jesus Christ – he is Lord of all” (Acts 10:36). The Sermon* on the Mount, the most widely quoted portion of Scripture in the early church, became a manual for living this life as a reconciling community. Jesus’ nonviolence is evident in his welcoming of outcasts and rejection of the temptation to achieve rule by violent revolution as the Maccabees* and revolutionaries in his time had tried to do. Jesus accepted his atoning* death on a Roman cross, eschewing violent resistance. Despite the view that the Book of Revelation supports violence, in it followers of the Beasts do violence, while followers of the Lamb do not; they perform the deeds that Jesus taught, as is repeatedly emphasized.

Pacifism was the practice of the church during the first centuries. In the Didache and the writings of all the church fathers through Origen, participation in the violence and idolatrous culture of Caesar’s wars was rejected. But with the “Constantinian shift,” Christianity became the enforced religion of the Roman Empire, and the emperor’s wars became “Christian” (see Constantine). Ambrose and Augustine* introduced the ethic of just war*, although it has never been officially decreed as the ethic of the Roman Catholic Church.

In the Constantinian context, pledges to live by the Sermon on the Mount and vows of nonviolence were taken by priests, monks, and nuns, from the Desert* Fathers/Mothers and the Benedictine* communities to Patrick* of Ireland, Francis* of Assisi, and the noncrusading Celtic* Christian missionaries throughout Western Europe. But usually vows of nonviolence were not taken by laypersons.

Holy Spirit–minded and Bible-reading “sectarians” throughout the medieval period reclaimed Jesus’ nonviolence for their own lives but were usually pessimistic about the political order. Among these were Peter Valdes* and the Waldenses*; John Wyclif* and the Lollards*; Petr Chelcicky and the Czech Brethren; the “imitatio Christi” movement; and the Brethren* of the Common Life. The Radical Reformation of the 16th-c. Anabaptists* (Swiss Brethren, Dutch Mennonites*, Hutterites*, and later Amish* and Brethren in Christ) became the “historic peace church” movement of Protestantism; they were subsequently joined by the Quakers* (17th c.), the Church of the Brethren (18th c.), the Disciples of Christ/Christian* Churches (19th c.), and the Pentecostal* Movement (20th c.). Although most Disciples of Christ and Pentecostals gave up the normative peace position of their founders – not unlike the Roman Catholic Church itself – some are recovering it, and the United* Church of Christ has named itself a peace church.

A line of 19th-c. pacifist thought running from Tolstoy* and Thoreau (see Transcendentalism) to 20th-c. practitioners like Gandhi* and Martin Luther King*, Jr., has profoundly transformed the modern world, as seen in Indian independence, the US civil* rights struggle, Eastern European revolutions against Soviet Communism, “people power” in the Philippines*, the battle against apartheid in South* Africa, and lesser-known groups like the “Abejas” in Chiapas, Mexico*, and the Palestinian* Liberation Christian Movement dedicated to nonviolence. A long line of nonviolent warriors for justice preceded King (David Walker, Sojourner* Truth, Harriet Tubman*) and worked alongside him (James Farmer and the Fellowship of Reconciliation [Chicago, 1942], Bayard Rustin, Rosa Parks, Ella Baker*, Fanny Lou Hamer). South* African Christians (including Bishop Tutu and the martyred Stephen Biko) also testify to this African-rooted tradition of nonviolent challenge to injustice (see Reconciliation as a Christian Praxis). In the context of democracy, all of these warriors urged governments – not only churches – to adopt nonviolence: Christ is Lord of all of life.

Roman Catholic modern-day prophets follow in the footsteps of Dorothy Day* (founder of the Catholic* Worker Movement) and Thomas Merton*. The Fellowship of Reconciliation, American Friends Service Committee, Pax Christi, and Mennonite Central Committee have innovated new practices of peace and justice for healing a broken world. The Protestant trajectory of peace-minded radical Christians includes German radical Pietists* (e.g. Christoff Blumhardt*), Swiss Reformed (Leonhard Ragaz, Karl Barth*); German Lutherans (Dietrich Bonhoeffer*) and Hutterites (Eberhard Arnold); French Reformed (e.g. André Trocmé, Jacques Ellul); and North American pacifists (William Stringfellow, Clarence Jordan, John Howard Yoder, Brethren James McClenndon). Dale Brown writes, “Pacifism – peace-making – should not merely be a compliance with law but a joyful response to and participation in the kingdom* coming.” See also CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION; MILITARISM; PEACE MOVEMENTS; PEACE AND PEACEMAKING.

KENT DAVIS SENSENIG and
GLEN H. STASSEN

Padroado. See PATRONATO, PADROADO.

Paedobaptism, also Pedobaptism. See INFANT BAPTISM.

Pagan, Paganism, term used by Christians to refer to all religions outside the biblical tradition. The Latin paganus originally referred to people from the countryside, to civilians (when used by soldiers), and to any persons outside, and inferior to, one’s group. Tertullian* compared Christians, with their disciplined life, to soldiers; thus all others were pagans, “civilians” or outsiders, in God’s eyes. This Christian use became widespread (4th c.), although gentilis, “Gentile*,” was still preferred. “Pagan” entered the language of imperial law (late 4th c.) as a term of derision. The terms “Gentile,” “ethnic,” and “non-Christian” are less contemptuous when one cannot designate groups by their proper names.

Pakistan, one of the largest Islamic countries with Islam* as the state religion, includes a significant Christian community, although it remains a small minority (2.5% of the population).

Thomas* the Apostle is said to have brought Christianity to Northern India, present-day Pakistan, in the 1st c. – a tradition now supported by archaeological discoveries in Taxila (coins of the reign of King Gundaphorus, before whom, according to the tradition, Thomas was brought) and the Taxila cross (2nd c.; used as a symbol of Christianity by the Church of Pakistan). But these first Christian communities soon disappeared.

The second wave of Christianity arrived with Jesuits* in the 1590s, then with Augustinians* and Carmelites* in the 17th c., leading to the establishment of a few churches, which also disappeared.

The third wave of Christianity came in the 19th c., when the Indian subcontinent was ruled by the British Empire; a few garrison churches were established, and the arrival of missionaries was facilitated. The United Presbyterian Church of North America sent its first missionary, Andrew Gordon, his family, and his sister (1854) to Sialkot, Punjab (East Pakistan); they were joined by Ifrahim H. Steven and A. R. Hall (1856) and by Scotch Presbyterian missionaries. The Church Missionary Society of England established a church in Karachi (1850) and an Anglican diocese in Lahore, Punjab (1877). Methodist and other Presbyterian churches also sent missionaries. Christianity flourished primarily among Hindu outcastes (Dalits*) in Punjab and is still growing despite difficulties. The Roman Catholic Church is also primarily in Punjab (in Lahore; vicariate, 1880) and Karachi (archdiocese, 1950).

The mainline churches now serving in Pakistan are the Roman Catholic Church and Protestant churches, including the Church of Pakistan (uniting Anglicans, Methodists, Lutherans, and Scotch Presbyterians) and the Presbyterian Church of Pakistan, the Associate Reformed Church, and the Salvation* Army. A large number of independent denominations (Baptists, Brethrens*, Pentecostals*/Charismatics*) and parachurch organizations and movements (e.g. YMCA*, YWCA*, Scripture Union, Serving in Mission [SIM], Inter Serve, Youth with a Mission, Pakistan Fellowship of Evangelical Students [PFES]) are also working in Pakistan.

Christianity, a tiny minority without official recognition, does not have much direct impact on Pakistan's political life. But Christian churches have played an important role as pioneers in education*, health*, and social programs. Many churches have opened schools and educated hundreds of thousands of people, making no distinction based on race, sex, or religion and thus training many people who held or hold positions of leadership in society. Unfortunately, schools and colleges were nationalized between 1972 and 1998, when the government denationalized these schools and one college (Forman Christian College in Lahore); the churches are busy mending the educational network, creating new schools, even in homes of Christians. Similarly, the churches and their programs make a significant contribution to adult literacy, welfare, and the protection of life. Struggling to eliminate poverty*, illiteracy, and injustice, and extending Christian love to the needy and to domestic, factory, and agriculture workers, are salient features of life for Christians in Pakistan. Church-sponsored clinics, dispensaries, and hospitals also help hundreds of thousands of people at low or nominal charges.

Since the early 1990s, Muslim militancy, fundamentalism, and extremism have put the Christian Church in a different situation. Hatred and enmity between Christian and Muslim communities have intensified. Some Christians have been killed; others have been accused of blasphemy in legal cases (under shari'a). Most Christians live in fear, even as they continue worshipping, holding evangelistic and healing Charismatic meetings, and carrying out their regular work, while the government protects them from terrorist attacks. See also ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

Statistics: Population (2000): 156 million (M). Muslims, 150 M, 96%; Christians, 3.9 M, 2.5% (1970, 1.2 M, 1.8%) (Protestants, 1.8 M; Roman Catholics, 1.2 M; independents, 0.85 M); Hindus, 1.9 M, 1.2%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

ARTHUR JAMES

Palafox y Mendoza, Juan de (1600–59), born and died in Spain*; bishop of La Puebla de los Angeles (1640–49), inspector general of New Spain (1642), acting viceroy (1642). With Pope Innocent X's support, he secularized the Roman Catholic Church (taking away the authority of the religious orders, Augustinians*, and Franciscans*), destroyed idols* of indigenous peoples, and confronted the Jesuits practices and doctrines. His many writings include Nature and Virtues of the Indian.

MARÍA ALICIA PUENTE LUTTEROTH and ELIZABETH JUDD

Palestinian Liberation Theology. Ever since their nakba (catastrophe) in 1948, Palestinian Christians – clergy and lay – have reflected on the reality of their lives in light of their Christian faith, even though this was not called a “Palestinian theology of liberation” until the late 1980s. In 2006 the Palestinian Christian community is less than 2% of the population, and the number of trained theologians is very small. Most theological reflection is done by parish priests and pastors. People's personal experiences and stories of their lives under the Israeli occupation provided the context of theology, as is clear in their writings. Thus besides the formal name “Palestinian theology of liberation,” Palestinian theologians (e.g. Jerjes Khoury, Mitri Raheb) use terms like “local” or “contextual” theology in a similar sense.

At the heart of this theological reflection is the political injustice against Palestinians. One of the main instruments used to oppress the Palestinians has been the Bible. An exclusive reading of the biblical text by Jewish and Christian Zionists has provided the basis for the liberation of Israel, even as it has been used to condone the oppression* of Palestinians. Palestinian Liberation theology has sought to develop a theology that grants physical and spiritual liberation inclusively, to all people. Such a theology seeks to inspire people to work for justice*, peace*, and reconciliation*. An inclusive theology of God, people* (of God), and land* (including “promised* land”) derived especially from the OT has been crucial for promoting the sharing of the land between Israelis and Palestinians (Lev 25:23; Ezek 47:21–23; Jonah). The prophetic material has been helpful in emphasizing God’s demand for justice and mercy (Mic 6:8, Amos 5:24).

In Palestinian Liberation theology, Jesus is the paradigm of faith and life. He was born and lived under occupation, and was killed by occupation forces. For Palestinian Christians, Jesus Christ is the only hermeneutical key to biblical interpretation. He inspires Palestinian Christians to follow him in the way of nonviolence* and peacemaking (Matthew 5:9), emphasizing the importance of resisting evil* without resorting to evil methods.

Practically, Palestinian Liberation theology expresses itself through ecumenical programs for Christians, locally and internationally, in Christian–Muslim relations, and in the work of justice and peace, on the basis of nonviolence, in partnership with others, including Muslim and Jewish peace activists. See also ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; PACIFISM AND CHRISTIANITY. NAIM STIFAN ATEEK

Palestrina (Prenestino), Giovanni Pierluigi da (c1525–94), Italian composer. From 1551 he held appointments in Rome at the Capella Giulia, San Giovanni Laterano, Santa Maria Maggiore, San Pietro, and the Sistine Chapel. His oeuvre is regarded as the ideal implementation of the Council of Trent’s* guidelines for liturgical music, emphasizing textual clarity. His reputation as the Roman Catholic composer led to the formulation of a “Palestrina style,” which remained the paradigm of sacred music until the 19th c. His sacred works include at least 104 Masses*, 323 motets*, 72 hymns*, 68 offertories*, 35 Magnificat settings, 11 litanies, and 55 sacred madrigals. TASSILO ERHARDT

Paley, William (1743–1805), British theologian and moral philosopher, whose coherent system of thought greatly influenced 19th-c. elites in Britain. His Natural Theology (1802) provided a clear and comprehensive statement of the argument from design*, which found in nature overwhelming empirical evidence of God’s creative purposes. The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (1785) advocated a form of utilitarian ethics* that meshed traditional Christian theology with the rational pursuit of pleasure and the prudent avoidance of pain. Paley taught as a young man at Cambridge University, where his lucid, well-organized books became a required part of the curriculum. D. L. LEMAHIEU

Palladius (c364–420/30), writer on early monasticism, especially Lausiac History (c419) on monks, including Olympias*. Fearing an adulterous relationship with a woman in Constantinople, he went to Egypt and became associated with Evagrius* of Pontus. He served as a bishop in Bithynia (400), but as a friend of John* Chrysostom, whose biography he wrote, he was exiled (406).

Palladius (5th c.), first recorded bishop of the Irish, sent to Ireland* (431) by Pope Celestine I; probably worked in the southeastern part of the country because of contacts with Wales and Cornwall. His relationship to Patrick* is uncertain.

Pallium (Lat “cloak”), originally a rectangular cloak, often worn by philosophers, ascetics*, and clergy*. Later a narrow band worn over the shoulders and hanging down in front and back, conferred on archbishops* or patriarchs* by the pope* as a sign of legitimacy.

Palmer, Phoebe (1807–74), North American Methodist writer, theologian, and evangelist, central figure in 19th-c. Evangelicalism*.

Born to a prosperous family in New York City, she married Dr. Walter Palmer (1826). The death of three children led her to desire sanctification*, which she experienced in 1837. In a time when holiness teaching was becoming popular among US Evangelicals, Palmer promoted holiness among the well-educated middle class.

Her reformulation of John Wesley’s* doctrine of entire sanctification influenced Wesleyan and Reformed branches of the Holiness* Movement and Pentecostalism*. Like Wesley, Palmer believed that Christians could experience “entire sanctification” – a state in which the presence of the Holy* Spirit eradicates the desire to sin*. In addition she emphasized the instantaneous manner of entire sanctification, “a second baptism of the Holy Spirit.” For her, Christians became sanctified when they consecrated themselves to God and believed in God’s promise to make them holy (The Way of Holiness, 1851). Palmer began Tuesday Meetings for the Promotion of Holiness (1840), edited the periodical Guide to Holiness (1862–74), and publicized her teachings through extensive travel in the USA and England. Although she never sought ordination, her 1859 book, Promise of the Father, defended women's right to preach. See also WOMEN'S ORDINATION CLUSTER.

SARAH JOHNSON

Palm Sunday, Sunday before Easter*, at the beginning of Holy* Week, celebrating Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mark 11:1–11, par.). In Jerusalem in the 4th c., worship on this day included a procession, and this practice spread throughout the Western Church during the Middle Ages.

Pammachius (c340–410), Roman senator, friend of Jerome*, who dedicated several works to him. After the death of his wife (the daughter of Paula*), he became a monk and established a hostel for pilgrims. He tried to mute the fury of Jerome's attacks on Jovinian* and on Rufinus* of Aquileia. He died during the Goths* occupation of Rome.

Pamphilus (c240–310), champion of Origen*. After studying in Alexandria, he taught in the school in Caesarea that had been made famous by Origen and made use of its library. His Apology for Origen, written in collaboration with Eusebius* of Caesarea, carried on his tradition after his martyrdom during the Diocletian* persecutions.

Panama. The Christianization of Panama began when Panama was still a part of Colombia* during the colonial period. Strategically situated along a transoceanic route, it was quickly occupied by Spaniards (early 16th c.). The indigenous populations were decimated (now 6% of the population). The first bishop on the continent was sent to Panama (1513). Franciscans* early evangelization was greatly hindered by the recurring violence of pirate raids and colonial oppression. After the independence movement, the Roman Catholic Church was granted governmental favors and concessions by the Concordat with Colombia (1887).

When Panama seceded from Colombia, assisted by the USA in a hegemonic and neocolonial role, the Constitution of 1904 established freedom of religion and civic control of public life. Constitutional modifications (1972) granted religious freedom and recognized Roman Catholicism as the dominant faith, but prevented clergy from holding public office. Although weakened by a lack of leadership, a hybrid religiosity, and Protestant proselytism*, the Roman Catholic Church was paradoxically revitalized by a renewed emphasis on evangelization, the Charismatic renewal, and the struggle for justice* to the marginalized that brought state persecution (1960s–1970s). Despite the scarcity of clergy (since colonial times), most of whom are from foreign countries, Roman Catholics (many of them closely associated with folk religionists) constitute more than 75% of the multiethnic population (with a majority of mestizos*, 70%; African Americans, 14%; whites and Asians, 10%; and Native Americans, 6%).

The work of Protestant missions began in the midst of international conflict over the building of a canal across the isthmus. Tens of thousands of mostly Caribbean black immigrants came to construct the trans-isthmus railroad, then to participate in French attempts to build a canal (1878–79) and to construct highways. Many of these workers and their families were members of Protestant (Methodist and Baptist) churches. The digging of the Panama Canal by the USA (1904–14) brought a wave of Protestant missionaries. The Methodists were the first to initiate significant work with the Latinos/as (1905), but until the mid-20th c. the growth of the Protestant Church was slower than that of the population. Yet Adventists* made notable progress among African Americans, and from 1929 Pentecostals* (the Quadrangular Pentecostal Church) grew most rapidly in number.

Since the mid-20th c., the Assemblies* of God and Charismatic* groups have spread like wildfire. Poverty, anomie, marginalization, lack of hope, a sense of impotence, unemployment, and forced migration were the lot of the multitudes. The search for the transcendent, a hope for better times to come, empowerment by the fire of the Holy* Spirit, the promise of healing* for the body and mind, and the assurance that God cares for them as persons have given them new purpose and meaning. Now Charismatics/Pentecostals* constitute the largest Evangelical group (70–80% of Protestants).

Statistics: Population (2000): 2.8 million (M). Christians, 2.5 M, 88.2% (Roman Catholics, 77%; Protestants, 11%); Muslims, 4.4%; non-religious, 3%; Baha'is, 1.2%; Buddhists, 1%; native religionists, 1.3%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

SIDNEY ROOY

Panama Conference (1916). At the World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh (1910), US representatives were eager to describe Latin America as "missionary territory," but British and German representatives opposed this on the grounds that the continent was already Christian. Nevertheless, in 1913 a conference on missions in Latin America was held in New York (1913), with the participation of many North American mission societies; it established the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America. While Europe was preoccupied with World War I, a major conference was held in Panama (1916) on mission activities in Latin America, followed by regional conferences including those in Montevideo (1925) and Havana (1929).

Panentheism, view that the world, while not identical with God (see Pantheism), exists “in God.” This view is based on Acts 17:28 and the theological tradition (including Process* theology), which says that God “holds all things together.”

Pantheism, philosophical and religious view that the world is identical with God: God is everything and everything is God. While the world and God may be differentiated as the All and the Whole, or the world may be viewed as the “expression” of God, God is thought not to have any being or life independent of the world. Another tenet of pantheism is that everything in existence is part of one Being, which highlights the unity of all things.

Papacy. See POPES, ROMAN CATHOLIC, AND THE PAPACY.

Papias (c60–130), bishop of Hierapolis in Asia Minor. Irenaeus* says that he was a disciple of John* and an associate of Polycarp*. His work on the “sayings of the Lord” – especially his statement about two of the Gospels: that Mark*, the interpreter of Peter, set down what he remembered and that Matthew* wrote down the “sayings” in Hebrew – is known only from quotations by Irenaeus* and Eusebius.*

Papua New Guinea. Christianity plays an important role in modern Papua New Guinea (taken here as an example of Melanesia, including New Caledonia, Solomon Islands, and Vanuatu; see also Fiji). In 2000, 96% of Papua New Guinea’s 5.1 million people claimed to be Christian. The Preamble to the 1975 Constitution, drafted by a committee with a Roman Catholic priest as deputy chair, explicitly invokes “Christian principles.”

Christianity was introduced by Loyalty Islands teachers of the London Missionary Society (LMS) from Australia across the Torres Strait (1871) and in New Britain by Fijian and Samoan teachers of the Methodist Church (1875). Papua

New Guinea’s rugged terrain and the difficulty of communication shaped the development of geographic missionary zones. In British New Guinea (Papua), a government-endorsed committee allotted separate regions to the LMS, Methodist, and Anglican missions (1890). The Roman Catholic mission led by Sacred Heart missionaries refused to subscribe to an agreement restricting its activities, and so was forced to work inland from the Gulf of Papua. In effect, the committee created virtual missionary “states within a state.” The geographic isolation of each mission helped to avoid religious conflict. In each case, the Christianity planted by the missionaries was therefore strongly denominational, rooted in the soil of particular European and Pacific Islands churches.

Missionary attitudes toward indigenous culture differed widely. Anglicans belonging to the Anglo-Catholic school stressed continuity with the Melanesian past; conservative Evangelicals in the Kwato and Seventh-day Adventists* sought to create a new cultural environment to help their converts make a “clean break” with the past. Methodists tended to stand midway between these extremes. The Lutheran pioneer Christian Keysser, in the colony of German New Guinea (since 1899), sought integration between culture and Christianity and waited until a whole community was ready before baptizing anyone.

In pre-contact Papua New Guinea, myths and ritual acts represented people’s understanding of the nature of the cosmos and of the way in which it could be controlled to human advantage by religious rituals. For all but a few, conversion to a new religion did not entail any loss of faith in the invisible world of spirits or the efficacy of rituals. In the first generations of contact, the knowledge system for obtaining material wealth and gaining control over life was barely affected. The widespread flourishing of Millennial* or prophetic “cargo” cults, predicting material equality between Papua New Guineans and Europeans in a blissful social order free of trouble, was an expression of the traditional Melanesian way of thinking during the period of upheaval.

The Christian missions differed widely in their response to the Japanese invasion of Papua New Guinea (1942). Many missionaries returned to Europe and Australia in the panic of the invasion, some believing they had been ordered out by the colonial government. Some who remained with their flocks were captured. Altogether 330 Christian missionaries and mission workers perished during the Pacific War. Many of them are honored by their respective churches as modern martyrs.

Since the 1960s, the dominance of the original mission churches has been challenged by the arrival of Jehovah's* Witnesses and, especially, Pentecostal churches, particularly the Four Square Gospel and Assemblies* of God. Few churches have sought to combine Christianity with traditional Melanesian religious beliefs. The only example of organic union has been the 1968 merging of the LMS and Methodist churches to form the United Church of Papua New Guinea and the Solomon* Islands.

After Papua New Guinea's independence (1975), the prominence of Christian leaders was evident in the Bougainville secessionist movement. Among the protagonists on both sides of the conflict were prominent Roman Catholics, including a priest-politician, a former seminarian who had become the provincial premier of Bougainville, and the bishop of Bougainville. In many areas, the churches continue to be responsible for maintaining basic health and education services. In the running of its day-to-day affairs, Papua New Guinea resembles the neighboring Solomon Islands in being permeated by strong Christian influences.

Statistics: Population (2000): 5.1 million (M). Christians, 4.4 M (Protestants, 2.6 M; Roman Catholics, 1.4 M; Anglicans, 0.3 M; independents, 0.3 M); native religionists, 0.2 M. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

DAVID WETHERELL

Parabalani, health care workers supervised by Alexandria's bishop; after they killed the Neoplatonist* Hypatia* (415), several imperial edicts restricted their numbers and activities.

Parable (Gk parabole; Heb masal), as a literary genre, a short narrative fiction used by rabbis and Jesus as an illustration. In the Synoptic* Gospels and the Gospel of Thomas*, several parables are introduced by a formula: "The Kingdom* of God [or Heaven, or the Father] is like" (Mark 4:30–31 [13:34]; Matt 13:31–53, 20:1, 25:1; Luke 13:18–21; Thomas 20, 57, 76, 96–98, 107, 109). Most of Jesus' parables are "parables of the Kingdom," the core of Jesus' teaching; they do not have meaning in themselves but create it "by being laid beside the kingdom of God" (Bernard Scott).

Jesus' parables have been diversely interpreted according to the interpreters' views of the Kingdom (see Kingdom of God, Concept, Cluster).

1. Parables are read as wisdom* teachings or example stories when the Kingdom as reign is envisioned as a community of believers who submit to God's authority as king. Thus Luke and his followers throughout history tend to read the parables as wisdom teachings (Luke 4:23, 5:36, 6:13) and example stories (Luke 10:25–37 [the good Samaritan], 12:15–21, 16:19–31 18:9–14 [also the introduction of parables, 13:5, 14:7, 15:2–3, 18:1, 19:11]).
2. Parables are read as apocalyptic allegories that describe in figurative ways the coming of the Kingdom as the impending Judgment* when the Kingdom is envisioned as the eschatological, just empire ruled by God that will bring to an end the present evil, demonic empires. Matthew and his followers tend to read the parables in this apocalyptic* way. The secret of the Kingdom is the impending Judgment* of all that impedes the establishment of God's empire (Matt 13). This allegorical interpretation, sometimes subtly expressed (e.g. by a slight twist alluding to the Judgment; 15:13), is most often explicit when parables are presented as eschatological warnings, e.g., about the coming separation of "the sheep and the goats" (25:31–46; see also 18:1–35, 20:1–16, 21:28–22:14, 25:1–30).
3. Parables are read as mysterious symbols* of the Kingdom when the Kingdom is envisioned as the mystery* of God's kingly activity – a mystery (not a secret that could be unveiled) that by definition is beyond understanding (Mark 4:11) but can be glimpsed through parables. Thus for Mark and Thomas and their followers, parables do not "refer" to anything in particular. They are corrective lenses that enable believers to recognize the mysterious, ongoing activity of God. For Thomas parables focus believers' sight on a mysterious reality "within them" and within others (e.g. Thomas 3, 24, 70, 83). For Mark this mysterious reality is "among them," in mysterious interventions of God in life. For example, Mark offers an "allegorical/symbolic" interpretation of the parable of the sower (4:1–20) without taking the parable to be an example story (Luke) or an allegorical warning about the Judgment

(Matthew); the mysterious parable points to a mysterious reality in human experience: there are people with hard hearts who hear the word and fail to bear fruit; and there are people who bear fruit because mysteriously they are good ground, rather than paths, rocks, or thistles (the decision is not theirs).

Saying that each of the Synoptic Gospels tends to present the parables in one way or another is not saying that it necessarily and always views the parables in this way. These three views of the parables can be found in each of the Gospels.

Contemporary biblical scholars (following Perrin, Funk, Crossan) underscore that reading parables as symbols of the Kingdom (#3) is closer to the teaching of the historical Jesus*. Yet through the centuries, as well as today, the apocalyptic interpretation (#2) has been very popular and receives much scholarly attention (Weiss, Schweitzer, Dodd, Jeremias, and later "political" studies of Matthew, Mark, and the historical Jesus*), but the wisdom/moral interpretation (#1) is not ignored by scholars (from Jülicher to those who engaged in a different quest for the historical* Jesus). See also DISCIPLESHIP; JESUS, QUEST FOR THE HISTORICAL; KINGDOM OF GOD, CONCEPT OF, CLUSTER; SYMBOLISM. DANIEL PATTE

Parachurch Organizations, "parallel to, outside the church," i.e. without direct control by bishops or governing bodies, and led by either clergy or laity. Some examples include monastic communities, which are largely self-governing; confraternities* and sodalities* for laity during the Middle Ages; SPCK* (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1698) and the SPG (Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, 1701); voluntary societies for mission and service within the Church of England; 18th-c. Methodist and Baptist missionary societies; voluntary societies in Congregational New England churches after 1800, which were formative in Midwestern states; and 19th-c. women's* missionary societies. Parachurch organizations without denominational ties are a major factor in foreign missions and youth ministries generally oriented toward individual conversion. Parachurches have become a worldwide phenomenon, as nondenominational and independent* churches multiply. Ecumenical efforts may run counter to parachurch mission organizations. See also CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER; PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER; IN BRAZIL: PARACHURCH ASSOCIATIONS.

Paraclete (Gk "advocate"), term in Johannine writings for the Holy* Spirit (John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7) and Christ (1 John 2:1).

Paradise (from a Persian word for an enclosed garden), term used in the Septuagint* for the Garden of Eden (Gen 2–3) and later for heaven* (Luke 23:43; 1 Cor 12:4; Rev 2:7).

Paradox (from Gk), an event contrary to expectation (in the LXX*, Philo*, Josephus*); in philosophy, a crisis in logic. Twenty-six hundred years ago, the Greeks discovered the "liar's paradox": if a sentence like "I always lie" is true, then it is false; if it is false, then it is true. For atheists, claims about God are meaningless, not paradoxical. For Christians, paradoxes abound; they are the very stuff of faith*. Although rare in the NT, the word "paradox" designates Jesus' healings and words of forgiveness (Luke 5:26). For Barth* (about Rom 1:1), "The call to be an apostle is a paradoxical occurrence, lying always beyond one's personal self-identity." See also METAPHOR; MYSTERY. VOLNEY P. GAY

Paraguay. Christianity arrived in the 16th c., with the European conquest. The territory was occupied by peoples of different ethnic groups, especially the agrarian Guarani. The Roman Catholic Church and its religious orders, especially the Jesuits*, evangelized the natives and established an original system of reductions*.

During the colonial period, church and state were associated through the patronage system (see Patronato, Padroado), which superimposed religious and civil powers and subordinated the native population in quasi-slavery for forced labor. The native peoples instigated several unsuccessful rebellions, which often took religious forms, proclaiming the arrival of a liberating messiah.

After the period of colonization and a bloody war against Argentina*, Brazil*, and Uruguay* (1865–70) that decimated the local population, the Paraguayan state first organized itself independently of the Church. The Liberal governments promulgated laws establishing civil marriage and secular education (1903) and instigated an openness toward modernizing currents. During the late 19th c., Protestantism arrived with European immigrants; the Methodist Church (1886) and Lutheran Church (1893) were the first Protestants established in Paraguay.

Christianity in Paraguay, primarily Roman Catholic, was not highly institutionalized. It was only after 1940 that the Roman Catholic Church developed a larger clergy, founded Catholic* Action (1932), and established the Episcopal Conference (1955), Caritas (1958), and a Catholic university (1960). Following the Second Vatican* Council and the church renewal, headed in Paraguay by Bishop Bogarín Araña, conflicts with the government began. The Church defended human* rights and liberties, and resisted the dictatorship of Alfredo Stroessner (1954–89). The problem of the land* (colonization having deprived most people of access to the land that they needed to feed their families) is at the center of the reflection and practice of the churches, led by groups of lay Catholics who support the agricultural associations, which the dictatorship violently repressed (1976). At present, 300 religious institutions are registered with the Paraguayan state, yet the population remains primarily Roman Catholic.

Statistics: Population (2000): 5.5 million (M). Christians, 5.3 M, 97.7% (Roman Catholics, 4.9 M, 89%; Protestants, 0.2 M, 4%; independents [including Pentecostals/Charismatics], 0.1 M, 2%); nonreligious, 1.3%; native religionists, 0.6%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

VERÓNICA GIMÉNEZ BELIVEAU and
DAMIÁN SETTON

Parham, Charles F. See ASSEMBLIES OF GOD.

Parish (Gk paroikia), since the 5th c., a geographic subdivision of a diocese*, served by at least one priest*. The parish became a focus of community life, a repository of records of baptisms, marriages, and funerals; it had a role in civil government and assumed pastoral responsibility for all persons living in the area. Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, Anglican, and European Protestant churches continue to be organized by geographic parishes. Even in these areas, this mode of organization is being replaced by congregations as “voluntary associations,” which are typical of North American Protestantism (see Church, Concepts and Life, Cluster: In North America) and, globally, of independent* churches. One attends the congregation that seems most compatible with one’s needs and inclinations.

Parousia (Gk “presence,” “arrival”), Christ’s return in glory to judge the living and the dead (1 Thess 2:19, 3:13, 4:13–5:23; 1 Cor 15:23; Matt 24:3, 27–39).

Particular Baptists, members of an early Baptist movement (see Baptist Churches Cluster) formed in the 1630s in London under the leadership of John Spilsbury with a commitment to Calvinist* theology centered on total depravity, election*, predestination*, and Christ’s atoning death for the elect alone – hence the name “Particular” Baptists. Following revivals (18th c.) initiated in England by Andrew Fuller, Robert Hall, and William Carey, they founded the English Baptist Missionary Society (1792). Particular Baptists joined New Connection General Baptists to form the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland (1891); their position was adopted by mainstream Baptist movements (contrast with Free Will Baptists).

Pascal, Blaise (1623–62), French mathematician, scientist, religious polemicist, apologist; most celebrated as the author of the Provincial Letters (January 1656–June 1657) and the Pensées (published posthumously, 1670). He was converted (1646) by two Jansenist* brothers who were tending to the broken hip of his father, Étienne. Three years after his sister, Jacqueline, entered the Port-Royal* convent, he underwent a definitive “second conversion,” on November 23, 1654, which he recorded in a document known as the “Memorial,” which he kept sewn into his clothing for the remainder of his life.

Through the Provincial Letters, a series of pamphlets, he defended the leading Jansenist* theologian, Antoine Arnauld*, based at Port-Royal*, against the accusations of the Jesuits*. Pascal’s vivid style, satirical depiction of the Jesuits, and clarification (or indeed simplification) of complex theological issues, such as sufficient and efficacious grace*, opened the debate to a wider secular public, which followed the increasingly bitter conflict with interest.

During the final years of his short life, Pascal drew on his earlier experience in worldly and scientific circles by writing a defense of the need for the Christian religion addressed to various skeptics and nonbelievers: the text, comprising a series of short fragments and longer passages and left in a disorderly state at his death, is now known as the Pensées. Perhaps the most well known and influential passage is that commonly called “Pascal’s Wager,” in which the reader is engaged in a debate on the odds of winning or losing if one wagers on the existence of God. In its analysis of free* will* and commitment, the “Wager” is perceived by many to foreshadow 20th-c. existentialist* thought.

Strongly influenced by Augustine*, Pascal's portrait of the human condition in a world without God uncovers the absurdities of a life led without spiritual purpose. In key passages such as that known as the "Disproportion of Man," he draws on recent scientific discoveries (like the invention of the telescope and microscope) to demonstrate the inconstant and fluctuating state of humanity in the wider universe. Two thinkers who played a large part in Pascal's writing are Michel de Montaigne and René Descartes*. While Pascal made positive use of Montaigne's skepticism by placing uncertainty and doubt* at the core of his attempts to persuade a skeptical reader, he reacted against Descartes's belief in the primacy of reason to comprehend God. For Pascal, although reason signals human greatness, the heart (or intuition) must play the central role in matters of faith. See also APOPHATICISM; HETERONOMY; MYSTICISM, MYSTICS.

NICHOLAS HAMMOND

Pasch (Gk and Lat pascha; from Heb pesach), Jewish Passover* and Christian Easter* (cf. French, Pâque; Spanish, Pascua).

Paschal Candle, candle lit during the paschal vigil and remaining lit until the day of the Ascension* or the eve* of Pentecost*.

Paschal Controversies. See CALENDARS; EASTER.

Paschal Vigil, principal early church Easter* observance, celebrating Christ's dying and rising, from Saturday night to Sunday morning, when baptisms were administered.

Paschasius Radbertus (c790–c860), Carolingian* theologian, author of the treatise On the Body and Blood of Christ (831/33, revised 844), asserted the real presence* of Christ's flesh and blood in the Eucharist*, although he also called it a spiritual presence.

Passion (Lat "suffering"), the suffering* of Christ in Gethsemane, his trial*, suffering and death on the cross*, viewed as atonement* for human sin*.

Passion Play, a mystery* play traditionally performed during Lent that dramatically depicts the Passion*. First performed during the Middle Ages, especially in Roman Catholic Western Europe (the most famous being the Oberammergau Passion Play in Bavaria), Passion plays are still regularly performed all over the world in "Roman Catholic countries," including the Philippines* and Brazil*. There are movie versions of the Passion, e.g. Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ (2004). Unfortunately, Passion plays commonly convey anti*-Jewish messages and are often associated with anti*-Semitism.

Passions (Music). Passion narratives were at first chanted in a monotone with simple inflections by the single voice of the deacon* during Holy Week. Later chant forms distinguished the speech of different people by different pitches: the evangelist, tenor range; Jesus, bass range; and other "speakers," higher "discant" (or "descant") range. By the 15th c., these different pitches were assigned to different singers. From the 16th c., both Roman Catholic and Lutheran composers developed the Passion into a distinctive musical form of vocal, choral, and instrumental elements for Holy Week worship, culminating in J. S. Bach's* St. John Passion and St. Matthew Passion. Later, the Passion took the form of oratorios* performed outside of worship, though often within church buildings.

ROBIN A. LEAVER

Passover (= Pasch), Jewish spring festival celebrating the Exodus*, liberation* from bondage in Egypt, indirectly associated with the covenant*. The same term was applied to Christ's death and resurrection (cf. 1 Cor 5:7), which according to the Gospels occurred during the period of Passover (although the Synoptic* Gospels and John* presuppose slightly different calendars), and to the annual observance of these events (see Easter). See also LEAVEN.

Pastor (Lat "shepherd"). Leaders in the early church were often called shepherds (Acts 20:28; Eph 4:11; 1 Pet 5:2; Rev 2:27, 7:17, 12:5, 19:15). "Pastor" came to be a title emphasizing the watching, guiding, and healing role of bishops, priests, and ministers – their care* of souls. The pastoral role ideally follows the model of Jesus, the good shepherd (John 10:1–18), yet it can become authoritarian and patriarchal*. "Pastor" is the title commonly used in many parts of the world to designate Protestant clergy, as distinguished from Roman Catholic priests.

Pastoral Care refers to practices of guiding, healing, reconciling, sustaining, and liberating (Lartey's categories). While the God in whose name these practices are performed is confessed as one, the practices themselves are many.

1. Guiding. A thread running through the many practices of guidance is the leading of persons to righteousness* before God and within the church and the world. In all churches, this pastoral function has been closely linked to practices of the ordained office (e.g. the counsel of the staretz for Orthodox Christians; the office of Seelsorger [carer of souls] in Lutheranism). However, laity have provided these kinds of pastoral care. For example, several saints* and theologians whose sayings and writings guide Orthodox Christians were laypersons. Among Christians throughout much of West and Central Africa, the advice of nonordained elders* is frequently sought after. The pastoral formation that Susanna Wesley* gave to her son, John, exemplifies how one family member can guide another.

2. Healing. From the casting out of demons by disciples and the placing of hands on the sick by early church elders to today's medical ministries and charismatic* expulsion of illness and demons, the church has engaged in a great, and sometimes bewildering, variety of healing* practices. These practices are invariably shaped by context and culture; e.g. some Korean Christians have incorporated Shamanistic* practices into their ministries for the mentally ill; some South African churches have blended local and Christian practices of healing; Orthodox Christians have sought spiritual healing through secular physicians who as devoted Christians performed pastoral roles, such as St. Panteleimon. In many churches, these practices are linked to sacramental functions such as anointing* the sick among Roman Catholics, liturgies for healing among many Protestant and Orthodox communities, and revival preaching (e.g. that of the German Pietist Johann C. Blumhardt*).

3. Reconciling. Reconciliation* involves the setting right of broken relationships with God, other believers, and creation. Reconciling practices have involved various kinds of discipline* for and penance* by those adjudged responsible for those breaks. Adherence in various denominations to prescribed practices such as those detailed in early medieval manuals of penance have been matched by the careful use by many denominations of the Gospel of Matthew* as an authoritative penitential manual. In some churches, reconciliation is practiced as a sacrament* with individual and corporate rites. Throughout history certain disciplinary practices have taken on demonic* form and, consequently, have been rejected by later practitioners (e.g. the detailed prescriptions for the torture of suspected witches* in the 1486 Malleus Maleficarum [Witches' hammer]; Luther's* letters calling for the persecution of German Jews as a "severe mercy" to drive some of them to convert).

4. Sustaining. These practices aim to console and strengthen the spirits of those beset by turmoil within and misfortunes without. In their letters of consolation to those facing illness and death, Ambrose* and Chrysostom* provided literary templates that have been adopted and adapted throughout history. Sermons to persecuted congregations (e.g. by Martin Luther King*, Jr., and Desmond Tutu) have enabled them to endure, while sermons addressed to grieving congregations (e.g. by Jeremy Taylor [1613–67] and Richard Baxter* [1615–91]) have enabled them to hope*. Sacramental practices of Communion*, penance, and the anointing of the sick proffer solace, while commonplace ministries of both priests* and the priesthood* of all believers provide life-giving sustenance. Nevertheless, some of these practices have served as tools for political oppressors to dissuade the faithful from taking action against external misfortunes (cf. Liston Pope, Millhands and Preachers, 1942; W. E. B. DuBois, The Souls of Black Folk, 1903).

5. Liberating. Setting captives free from addictions within and oppression* without has been a prominent pastoral practice. In many churches, the pastoral teachings of the ordained have informed these practices (e.g. Roman Catholic social* encyclicals influenced many social ministries such as that of the Catholic Worker Movement in the 1900s). Furthermore, many routine pastoral practices, such as healing rituals within African Charismatic/Pentecostal churches, aim to liberate believers from oppressive political forces. Liberating practices have frequently placed their practitioners at odds with secular and even ecclesial authorities, as evidenced by the struggles of Bartolomé de las* Casas (1484–1566) to defend the rights of indigenous Americans. Nevertheless, prophetic pastoral practices have often endured opposition by those authorities and sometimes crossed confessional boundaries, as exhibited by the inspiration that the ministry of Las Casas provided to Ann Davison (1783–1871) before the US Civil War for her dissent from prevailing Southern Reformed pro-slavery theologians and church leaders.

Many finite, and therefore fallible, practices are the means by which the faithful seek to care for other Christians and the world. While any one of them may, in fact, fail to provide care, many of them may be acknowledged to represent the care of the one God for the faithful and the world. See also DISABILITY AND CHRISTIANITY.

LEONARD M. HUMMEL

Pastoral Epistles, 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus, Deutero-Pauline letters, written c100 in Asia Minor, that emphasize the patriarchal household*, the danger of heresies*, and ecclesiastical authority. Traditionally, and in contemporary fundamentalist* readings, they were and still are used to marginalize women and discredit those who think differently from those in authority, without considering socioeconomic, cultural, or internal problems in Christian communities. The Pastoral Epistles were directed to churches in Asia Minor undergoing internal conflicts of class (1 Tim 2:9, 6:10, 17) and gender (1 Tim 2:9–15; 5:3–16; 2 Tim. 3:6–7), theological disputes (1 Tim 1:3, 4; 4:1–4; 2 Tim 2:14–26; Titus 1:10–14; 2:1–3), and power struggles (1 Tim 5:17–25). The author considered rich women, benefactors who taught in the churches, to be domineering women (1 Tim 2:9b–12) who imposed themselves on the congregation, were attracted by Gnostic*-leaning Judeo-Hellenistic teachings (1 Tim 6:20), and deprecated marriage* (1 Tim 4:3). Their teachings were considered dangerous because, by undermining the importance of marriage, they freed women and slaves (1 Tim 6:1–2; Titus 2:9–10) from conforming to household norms very similar to those upheld by the governing and aristocratic class throughout the Roman Empire. The author combated primarily the influence that his opponents' theology had on behavior, especially on that of women and slaves, but in the process presented (e.g. in 1 Tim 2:15; 4:16) a soteriology* contradicting what Paul* said about grace* in his own letters. The author worried that the free behavior of women and slaves exacerbated the hostility of Roman society and hindered the church's mission. To resolve the conflicts, the author's theology tied salvation* to moral instruction, affirmed the Aristotelian domestic codes (see Household codes), and imposed them on the church and its members (1 Tim 3:4–5, 15). The requirements for church leadership (1 Tim 3:1–13; Titus 1:5–9) reflect a move toward a rigid authoritarian church structure. These Pastoral Epistles reflect the church struggles of their time and propose solutions that must be carefully assessed before being applied to other times and contexts.

ELSA TAMEZ

Pastoral Theology, branch of theology concerned with, and informed by, the care of God's people. "Pastoral" refers to the biblical image of shepherding. Pastoral theology focuses on the human condition and the shaping of a Christian response to human living and human suffering*. It has several overlapping meanings:

1. In its most general, and earliest, sense (also called "practical" theology; still understood as such in Roman Catholic and some Anglican contexts), the study of texts and methods underpinning the practice of ministry, beginning with patristic* treatises on the "cure of souls" and continuing through the 19th c.
2. The 20th-c. fields of psychology* and religion, as well as pastoral counseling/psychotherapy. Anton Boisen's refocusing of pastoral theology from the study of texts to "living human documents" coincided with an understanding of human suffering* through modern psychology and innovations in clinical and therapeutic methods. North Americans Seward Hiltner, William Clebsch, and Charles Jaekle articulated the "traditional functions of pastoral* care" as "healing, sustaining, guiding, and reconciling*," to which Carroll Watkins Ali recently added "nurturing, liberating*, and empowering." German writers integrated client-centered psychology with theology, except for neo-orthodox* pastoral theologians, who retained primacy for proclamation. British writers alternately integrated object-relations theory with Anglican sacramental theology or invoked premodern spiritual sources such as ascetical* theology and the practice of spiritual direction. While the degree to which 20th-c. pastoral theology engaged in biblical and theological reflection has varied, it is defined by its interaction with psychological theory and practice. This trajectory continues in the exploration of pastoral care and neuroscience.
3. In response to a critique that the pastoral discipline had neglected its authoritative theological voice in favor of secular psychological paradigms, pastoral theology in the 21st c. represents a movement to reengage in constructive theological work. Adopting "correlational" approaches beginning with Paul Tillich*, and revaluing experience as the ground of theology from Feminist*, Womanist*, Mujerista*, and

Black* theology, as well as Third World or global contextual* theologies, contemporary pastoral theologians affirm that all theology must begin with the human situation. Don Browning advocated reclaiming the authority of ethical* norms in pastoral and practical theology. Feminist proposals such as Bonnie Miller-McLemore's "living human web," Emmanuel Lartey's community-based intercultural models, and other writings at the intersection of pastoral and public theology, exemplify the shift of pastoral theology from individualistic to communal, justice*-oriented, and global approaches. Engagements with postmodernism* and social constructivism represent further avenues for pastoral theology as a constructive, interdisciplinary enterprise. PAMELA COOPER-WHITE

Patriarch, in Roman Catholicism, the title of a bishop who has the authority to ordain metropolitans*; in the Eastern Orthodox* Church, the title of the head of an autocephalous* church. See also ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

Patriarchy and Christianity. Patriarchy refers to a legal, social, economic, cultural, and political system that validates and enforces the sovereignty of male heads of families over dependent persons in the household: wives, unmarried daughters, and dependent sons and slaves, male and female. In Roman law, the term familia referred to all persons and things ruled by the paterfamilias, including animals and land. Patriarchy as a social system has been found in classical societies around the world.

The status of women in patriarchal societies has many nuances, depending on how their physical protection and property deriving from their families of origin are related to their position in their husband's family. Although one cannot define a single social pattern true of all patriarchal societies at all times, there are general characteristics common to most patriarchal systems. Women's status under patriarchy is one of subjugation; they have no legal status in their own right. The lineage of children is passed down through the father. Male children are preferred to female children. The bodies, sexuality, and reproductive capacity of wives belong to their husbands. The sovereignty of the husband over the wife includes the right to beat her, to confine her physically, and sometimes to sell her into bondage. Women are excluded from public leadership roles in politics and culture. Their education is limited to household skills and minimal literacy. Their right to inherit as daughters or widows is restricted; what property they do inherit is usually administered by a male relative or guardian.

These patterns of patriarchy were reconfirmed in early modern European law codes and continued to define women in Europe and the Americas until the Feminist Movement of the late 19th and first half of the 20th c. The Feminist Movement in various societies has succeeded in winning for women the legal status of citizens, with the rights to vote, hold political office, make property transactions in their own name, and have access to higher education, professional credentials, and employment. Many remnants of patriarchy remain, however, in modern societies. Women are still seen as the primary household workers and child raisers. Cultural norms and legal restrictions continue to limit women's economic, political, and social equality and to ratify the view that women are subordinate to men as a gender group, a subordination interconnected with class and racial inferiority.

Christianity, like other classical religions, has been deeply influenced by patriarchy and has also functioned to ratify it as normal, natural, and the will of God. Religious validation of patriarchy is expressed on both the symbolic and the structural levels. The churches have traditionally been organized along patriarchal lines, with an exclusively male clergy as the ruling class. A hierarchy of patriarch or pope, bishops, priests, and laymen rules the church from the top, with laywomen and children as the most subordinate group. Women are excluded from ordination, public preaching, and public teaching; teaching is allowed only in private or with children. In Western cultures, this pattern gradually began to change in the 20th c. with the ordination of women (see Women's Ordination Cluster), but the Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and conservative Protestant churches still cling to it.

On a symbolic level, God is pictured as a patriarchal father and lord, ruling over humanity and creation. The patriarchal hierarchies of male over female, father over children, and lord over slaves* is reduplicated symbolically in the relation of God and Christ to the church as Father to Son, lord to servants, and husband to wife. The idea of Christ as head of the church as his body (Eph 4:15–16, 5:23–30; Col 1:18, 3:15–22) reduplicates the legal view of the wife's lack of autonomy* and her belonging, as a body*, to her husband. See also ANDROCENTRISM; KYRIARCHY; SEXISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

ROSEMARY RADFORD RUETHER

Patrick (5th c.), British missionary, bishop, patron saint of Ireland; dates unknown (perhaps died 493). Born to a British landowning family and enslaved by Irish raiders at the age of 16, he escaped back to Britain after six years. He then returned to Ireland as a missionary, rising eventually to the rank of bishop. Some conflation of Patrick and Palladius* (sent from Rome in 431) has arguably occurred. Patrick's "Confession" and "Letter to Coroticus" survive but are difficult to interpret, although both suggest a highly controversial figure. The later hagiographical works on Patrick by Muirchu and Tirechan developed the legend and cult.

NICHOLAS J. HIGHAM

Patripassianism, a form of Monarchianism*, also known as Sabellianism*, which held that the Trinity is only different modes of divine action, so that the Father also suffered as the Son.

Patristics, study of the "fathers," now also "mothers," of the church, after the "apostolic age." The period beginning in the 2nd c. was devoted to interpreting the apostolic message in the midst of Greco-Roman culture*, a culture originally hostile to Christianity that nevertheless contributed many of the concepts used in doctrine and canon law and that, during the 4th c., came to be dominated by Christianity (see Inculturation Cluster: Of Christianity in the Greco-Roman World). The "patristic era" includes the apostolic* fathers, the Apologists*, the debates over the doctrines of the Trinity* and Christology*, and the Pelagian* controversy. It is often viewed as the formative period for Christian doctrine, worship, and institutions, viewed as authoritative by later times.

When does it end? Possibly with the Islamic Conquest (634–41). For the Miaphysite*, Oriental Orthodox* churches, it ends with the third ecumenical* council at Ephesus* (431) and the separation from the Eastern Orthodox churches (451). For the Eastern Orthodox churches, the formative period is that of the seven ecumenical* councils (the last of which was in 787). For many Protestants, it ends with the Council of Chalcedon* (451). In the Western churches, in which the predominance of Greco-Roman culture is taken as its defining characteristic, it ends with the decline of vernacular Latin (6th c.).

EUGENE TESELLE

Patristic Thought. Traditionally the term refers primarily to the contribution of the authoritative church leaders, the "church fathers" (Lat patres), to the development of Christian doctrine. More broadly, patristic thought embraces the entire literary output of Christian theological writers of the first millennium, including apologetic, exegetical, doctrinal, polemical, moral, ascetical, pastoral, homiletic, epistolary, and historical works.

Before the Edict of Milan (313), Christians in the Roman Empire were often persecuted by the state. The Apologists*, such as Aristides, Justin*, Tatian*, Athenagoras, Theophilus*, Minucius Felix, Tertullian*, Clement*, and Origen* of Alexandria, challenged the pagan worldview and defended Christianity against popular misconceptions and philosophical objections. The polemic against Judaism*, the struggle of orthodoxy* against heresy*, and the protection of church unity against schism all contributed to the formation of Christian identity and the development of doctrine. During this period, liturgical* practice and theology*, biblical canon* and methods of biblical exegesis*, as well as early creeds* began to take shape.

Under the patronage of Emperor Constantine* (d337), Christianity underwent considerable sociopolitical transformation. From the religion of a persecuted minority, Christianity was transformed into a religion of political establishment; worship acquired more public character; the social standing of the clergy increased significantly; and mass conversions became common. Local and ecumenical church councils* became major vehicles for dealing with controversial doctrinal and practical issues. The Council of Nicaea* (325) addressed the Arian* crisis by promulgating the creed stating that the Son of God was equal, or "of the same essence" (homoousios), with God the Father. The second ecumenical council endorsed the teaching of the Cappadocian Fathers (Basil* of Caesarea, Gregory* of Nazianzus, Gregory* of Nyssa) regarding the Trinity* and affirmed the Son's full humanity. The Council of Ephesus (431) was summoned in response to the Nestorian* controversy and acknowledged Mary* as the God-bearer (Theotokos*). Faced with the Miaphysite*/Monophysite* controversy, the fathers of the council of Chalcedon* (451) issued a definition affirming that Christ was one person in two natures. The fifth ecumenical council (Constantinople* II, 553) returned to the emphasis of Ephesus on the unity of Christ's person. The sixth ecumenical council (Constantinople* III, 680–81), following Chalcedon, emphasized the distinction of two natures in Christ by affirming the doctrine of two wills*. The seventh ecumenical council (Nicaea* II, 787) upheld the theological legitimacy of the veneration of religious images (icons*).

PAVEL L. GAVRILYUK

Patristic Thought in Orthodox Christianity is explicated in the writings of Athanasius*, John* Chrysostom, Basil* of Caesarea, Gregory* of Nazianzus, and Gregory* of Nyssa in response to the Arian* and Eunomian* controversies.

"It is not for all to theologize," says Gregory* of Nazianzus, but only for the pure of heart who are masters of meditation and prayer. Personal experience of the Triune God is the basis for theology, but only within the context of the church and its traditions of dogma and worship.

Holy Scripture*, the divinely inspired guide to the spiritual life, is authoritative in all its details but is revelation "through a glass darkly." Unable to describe God's essence, it reveals the divine energies. The deeper teachings of Scripture are sometimes beneath the mere letter, which in its plainest sense can at times be unworthy of God (e.g. allusions to God's "wrath*" or "repentance"). Rationalistic speculations about God are an impiety; still, in pagan culture and philosophy, discerning Christians can find some spiritual profit (see God, Christian Views of, Cluster: Introductory Entries).

In Orthodox patristic thought, Truth is ultimately not an idea but the person of the incarnate* Word*. Christology* and soteriology* are inextricably connected. The church, as an outgrowth of the Incarnation, communicates Truth to all creation. Its teachings, mysteries*, canons, and liturgy are viewed chiefly in therapeutic terms: salvation* is the healing of fallen humanity, the restoration* of God's likeness through union with the divine energies. See also BIBLE INTERPRETATION CLUSTER: IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY; FLOROVSKY, GEORGES.

B. MARK SIETSEMA

Patronage, the authority to nominate or "present" persons for ecclesiastical office. This authority of feudal* lords was questioned during the investiture* controversy. After the Reformation, when ministers were to be called by congregations in an egalitarian way, patronage (pejoratively called "intrusion") was exercised by rich landowners (the chief source of financial support for ministers) who imposed ministers on congregations. In Scotland, patronage disputes led to the Disruption* of 1843, a schism from the Church of Scotland. See also ADVOWSON.

Patronato, Padroado. Through the policy of royal patronage – Patronato Real (Spanish) or Padroado Régio (Portuguese) – the Roman Catholic Church granted sovereignty over newly discovered lands to the Roman Catholic monarchs of Portugal* and Spain*. A series of papal bulls (15th–16th c.) authorized Iberian kings and queens to conquer lands not already under Christian rule, charged them with evangelizing the inhabitants of these newly conquered territories, and ultimately ceded to the monarchs administrative control over the colonial Church. The unprecedented intermingling of papal authority and secular, royal power institutionalized in the Patronato formed the basis for the Iberian colonial project in Africa, Asia, and Latin America (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions; Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions).

The rights and responsibilities encompassed by the system of royal patronage were extended gradually and incrementally, first to the Portuguese in the mid-15th c. as a result of their exploration of the coast of Africa. After Columbus's discovery (1492), Spain pushed for and won rights to the Indies, granted by the papal bull Inter Caetera (1493), which ceded to Spain the greater part of the Americas. The Treaty of Tordesillas (1494) created a line of demarcation affirming Portugal's right to lands to the east of the dividing line (i.e. Africa and India) and effectively extending to them a large portion of the east coast of South America (later Brazil).

The Spanish monarchs had achieved almost complete authority over the local Church in the New World when Rome, daunted by the task of evangelization and colonial administration, issued another series of bulls (early 16th c.). These relinquished Church tithes to the crown, granted the monarchs the right to build and fund churches and cathedrals, and, finally, allowed the king and queen to nominate bishops and archbishops. The Patronato was administered by the Council of the Indies in Spain and by the audiencia judicial system in the Americas.

JENNIFER S. HUGHES

Patron Saint, saint who is considered the special protector or advocate of a person, place, ethnic group, nation, or occupation.

Paul, Acts of. See APOCRYPHA CLUSTER: APOCRYPHAL ACTS OF APOSTLES.

Paula (347–404). As a widow*, she was guided in celibacy* by Jerome* and founded monasteries* in Bethlehem (386), where she died.

Born in Rome to a noble family, Paula married and had five children. After her husband's death, she devoted her life to asceticism* under the direction of the famed ascetic Jerome. As part of a group of Roman noblewomen, Paula studied Scripture with Jerome, excelling especially in Hebrew. With her daughter Eustochium*, Paula followed Jerome to Palestine, where she toured the holy sites, then visited Egyptian monks. She settled in Bethlehem, where she founded two monasteries – one for men and another for women – and built a hospice for pilgrims.

According to Jerome (Epistle 108), Paula was the perfect model of female asceticism. She spent her fortune to support ascetics, bishops, and the poor. She lived a humble and disciplined life, adopting simple clothing, practicing rigorous fasting, studying Scripture*, and lamenting the slightest sin with voluminous tears. She was praised for her ascetic leadership, guiding the women in her monastery in equally strict lifestyles until her death.

KRISTI UPSON-SAIA

Paul the Apostle, a highly influential figure in 1st-c. Christianity and throughout church history, and a bold missionary who opened the church to the “nations,” Paul has been criticized by some as a dangerous innovator (cf. 2 Pet 3:15–16) and a divisive church leader, evoking passionate opposition but also, for many, deep-seated loyalty. This ambivalence derives from the fact that there were at least five distinct “Pauls.” While there are fundamental disagreements about what Paul taught, there is a general agreement regarding his life.

Paul's Life. Paul was a Jew of the tribe of Benjamin (Phil 3:5), a Pharisee raised in Tarsus (Acts 21:39) with a solid Hellenistic and Jewish education, who zealously persecuted the church (Gal 1:13–14; Phil 3:5–6). Paul was “converted” c33/34 (Gal 1:15–16; Phil 3:7–9; 1 Cor 9:1, 15:8–11). “After fourteen years” (Gal 2:1) of mission work with Barnabas in Syria and Cilicia (Gal 1:21) and independently in Macedonia and Achaia (Corinth) (c39–c51, when he wrote 1 Thessalonians*), Paul went to the “Jerusalem conference” (c51), where he agreed with James, Cephas/Peter, and John (Gal 2:1–10 = Acts 18:22) that the mission could have two thrusts: one to the Jews/Judeans (led by Peter) and one to the nations/Gentiles* (led by Paul and Barnabas), and that the churches from the nations would support the “poor of Jerusalem.” Should Gentile Christians become Jews and practice circumcision and eat kosher? This undecided issue came to a head in Antioch, where Paul confronted Peter about his ambivalent attitude (Gal 2:11–14). Barnabas and other Jewish Christians separated from Paul, who nevertheless remained confident that Gentile* and Jewish Christians could work together. Accordingly, during his subsequent missions in Asia Minor and Greece (c51–c56, when he wrote the rest of his letters), Paul gathered a collection for the church in Jerusalem that he brought to Jerusalem (c56/57; Rom 15:25–28), where he was arrested; he was then imprisoned in Caesarea (c57–59; Acts 23–24) and Rome (c61; Acts 28:16). Later traditions (Clement* of Rome, Ignatius* of Antioch, Acts* of Paul) suggest that he died a martyr in Rome (c62).

The positive and negative responses to Paul reflect different interpretations and assessments of his bold views regarding (1) the “gospel* of Jesus Christ” (instead of “the gospel of the Kingdom*” that Jesus proclaimed); (2) the human predicament addressed by God according to this good news; (3) the church* and the place of Jews and Gentiles/nations in it. One should distinguish the distinctive portrayals of Paul by Luke* and “Paul's school” (in the Deutero-Pauline* letters), as they sought to defend him against early opponents, from the self-portrayal of Paul in the undisputed letters, although biblical scholars propose three different “historical Pauls.”

Paul and His Early Interpreters

Paul 1: The hero of the Acts of Apostles, according to Luke. Against those who distrusted Paul's gospel and apostleship, Luke portrayed Paul as an apostle* (14:1–4), a witness (22:15, 26:16), a “chosen instrument” (9:15; Jer 1:5), and “light of the Gentiles” (13:47; like Jesus, Luke 2:32; cf. Isa 49:6). For Luke the predicament addressed by the gospel was that Gentiles were unduly excluded from the people of God by “the Jews.” Through Paul's gospel, they were now included. Luke emphasized Paul's “road to Damascus experience,” presenting it three times. In Acts 9:1–31 this event can be viewed as a “conversion from Judaism” (and thus as a rupture with Judaism posited as an erroneous religion); in Acts 22:6–21 and 26:1–32 it is not the case. Luke presents this event as a prophetic call to go “for the sake of the hope of Israel” (28:20) and preach to Gentiles (22:21, 26:17–18) the fulfillment of Jewish messianic and resurrection expectations (22:3–4, 23:6, 24:14–21, 26:4–11).

Paul seeks to include “the Jews” in the church, but with limited success. He consistently begins his mission in local synagogues, turning to Gentiles after “the Jews” reject his inclusive proclamation (Acts describes Paul in conflict with “the Jews” some 70 times).

Paul 2: The orthodox teacher according to his school. Followers of Paul wrote the Deutero-Pauline letters in the name of their teacher (an appropriate practice in the culture): Ephesians*, Colossians*, the Pastoral* Epistles (1 and 2 Timothy, Titus) (and possibly 2 Thessalonians*). They present Paul’s gospel as an “orthodoxy” by emphasizing adherence to the proper doctrine (Eph 1:3–14; Col 1:15–23) revealed by God through Christ. Erroneous beliefs, including deviant teachings of heretics* (e.g. Eph 4:25; Col 2:16–23; 1 Tim 1:3–11, 4:1–5, 6:3–10), are the predicament. Church members are those who hold orthodox beliefs; life in Christ involves rejecting pagan ways of life (e.g. Eph 5:3–20), but also conforming to the order of life in Roman imperial society reflected in the household* codes (Eph 5:21–6:9; Col 3:18–4:1; 1 Tim 2:8–3:13; Titus 2:1–10), which normalize the submission of women to men and of slaves to their masters as integral parts of the Christian way of life.

Paul and His Modern Interpreters. In their quest for the “historical Paul,” modern scholars focused on the undisputed letters – Romans*, 1 and 2 Corinthians*, Galatians*, Philippians*, 1 Thessalonians*, and Philemon*. This quest yielded three different “Pauls,” which can be called “Paul the Theologian” (with variants of it found, at least since Augustine*, in the Roman Catholic Church, Luther*, and Protestantism*), “the pastoral Paul” (with similarities with the Paul of Acts), and “the apocalyptic/messianic Paul” (variants found in the Greek fathers, Orthodox* and Charismatic* churches, and Liberation* theology), each with distinctive views of the gospel, the predicament it addresses, and the church and the place of Jews and Gentiles in it.

Paul 3: The theologian proclaiming justification through faith. Here Paul’s gospel is understood to address theological problems arising in different church contexts, by providing the proper theological understanding that characterizes the true faith (see Faith #3; Augustine’s* fides quae creditur). This first “historical Paul” is elucidated through philological* studies of the theological arguments of Paul’s letters. The gospel addresses the question: How are sinners (all humans) saved from God’s just condemnation? Pharisaic Judaism answered incorrectly: through “work righteousness” (justification* by works of the Law, e.g. Gal 2:21, a view which, for many scholars, shows that Paul had a distorted view of Pharisaism – a distortion that gave rise to anti-Judaism). Paul’s gospel answers: through faith in Jesus Christ (justification through faith, e.g. Gal 3:8); one is graciously “justified” (forgiven) by faith in God’s intervention in Christ’s death and resurrection (see Atonement #2). Thus the road to Damascus event is a “conversion” from Pharisaic Judaism; without faith in Jesus Christ, Jews remain under God’s condemnation.

Paul 4: The pastor with a ministry to the Gentiles. For the scholars of the “new perspective,” Paul’s gospel is the good news that through Jesus Christ’s faithfulness (death and resurrection), Gentiles are “justified,” i.e. “set in a covenantal relation with God” similar to that of the Jews, participating in the covenant* through a faith/faithfulness (see Faith #1) comparable to that of Jesus (see Atonement #3). Paul’s letters address a pastoral problem, the tense relationships between Jewish and Gentile Christians, and help the latter assume their responsibilities as part of the people of God. This “new perspective” on the “historical Paul” is elucidated through rhetorical* and socio-historical studies of the letters as discourses through which Paul seeks to convince his readers to change their behavior toward each other. The predicament addressed by Paul’s gospel is the exclusion (inflicted by others or self-exclusion) of people (especially Gentiles) from the covenantal relationship with God. Through Christ, believers are reconciled with God and each other and are called to participate in the ministry of the people of God (Jews and Gentiles), namely to bring all peoples to God. The road to Damascus event is a “prophetic call” from God. Jews as Jews remain a part of the people of God (God’s call is irrevocable; Rom 11:29), in which they are now joined by Gentiles.

Paul 5: The apocalyptic/messianic apostle. Here the gospel as “power of God for salvation*” (Rom 1:16) is the good news that God’s promises have been fulfilled in Jesus the Messiah and that the resurrected Lord (and the Spirit) continues to fulfill God’s promises in the present; believers, through faith (see Faith #5), can recognize these new powerful interventions of God in their experience. From this third historical perspective, Paul’s letters seek to convey this faith to the readers through a religious, apocalyptic* symbolism that scholars elucidate by a combination of history* of religion and ideological and rhetorical* studies of the letters, with close attention to the power relations. The predicament that necessitates these ongoing divine interventions is sin*, a power that keeps all humans (the nations as well as the Jews) and the entire creation in bondage to idols* and powers that enslave them. Through the resurrected Lord's interventions, believers are freed from these powers, redeemed (see Atonement #1; Redemption), and enabled to serve and glorify God. The road to Damascus event is the redemption of Paul from his overzealous Judaism and a "prophetic call" from God to become in turn a Christ-like agent of redemption for others, as in turn all believers are called to be through their own redemption, by remaining where they were, among Jews if they were Jews and among the nations if they were Gentiles.

Each of these views of Paul and his teaching is historically plausible (according to which textual features one selects as most significant). As their appropriations through history show, each has been chosen as the scriptural teaching proclaimed by different theologians, movements, and churches as a Word to live by, for religious and contextual reasons. Yet interpreters have to assume responsibility for their choices of interpretations and how they affect others (see Scriptural Criticism). See also HELLENISTIC RELIGIOUS TRADITIONS AND CHRISTIANITY'S SELF-DEFINITION; INCULTURATION CLUSTER: OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE GRECO-ROMAN WORLD; MARCION.

DANIEL PATTE

Paulicians, members of a Christian movement founded by Constantine of Mananalis (Constantine Silvanus) in Kibossa, Armenia* (mid-7th c.), who were severely persecuted by Constantine III, Justinian II, and later emperors. The group suffered from internal strife and schisms over succession throughout most of its history. Under the leadership of Sergius Tychicus (early 9th c.), the Paulicians expanded into Cilicia and Asia Minor; their numbers and influence were greatest until 872, when an expedition sent by Basil I broke their military resistance. Many Paulicians were then forcibly settled in Thrace, where their religion survived until at least the late 11th c. and influenced the Bogomils'* ideas and practices.

The Paulicians' fundamental doctrine – concerning two principles, an evil god who created and rules the present world and a good god who rules the one to come – may have been partly inspired by the dualism* of Marcionism* and Manichaeism*. Yet they based their doctrines and practices on the Gospels, especially Luke, and Paul's epistles, rejecting the epistles of Peter and the OT. They rejected rituals and the sacrament* of the Eucharist* (and, to some extent, baptism*); they refused to worship Mary and did not accept the divinity of Jesus. They emphasized spiritual communion in "prayer houses" and were opposed to traditional church hierarchy.

GUNNER BJERG MIKKELSEN

Pauline Privilege, Paul's concession (1 Cor 7:15) that a married person, upon becoming Christian, might separate from a non-Christian partner (see Divorce).

Paulinus of Nola (355–431), poet, letter writer, bishop; renounced great wealth to adopt an ascetic* life with his wife, Therasia. He was born and educated in Southern France, served as governor of Campania, was ordained in Barcelona, and moved to Nola near Naples, where he founded a monastery at the tomb of St. Felix (395). Committed to the ideal of Christian spiritual friendship*, he was a friend of Martin* of Tours, Ambrose*, Augustine*, Jerome*, Melania* the Elder, and Melania* the Younger, maintaining many friendships by letter, of which about 50 are extant. He also wrote a series of poems, the so-called Natalicia (dedicated to Felix), biblical paraphrases, and poems to friends.

CAROLINNE WHITE

Paul of Samosata (3rd c.). Elected bishop of Antioch when Queen Zenobia of Palmyra controlled the city (c260), he also held a governmental position. A letter from six bishops (264) raised questions about his orthodoxy, and a synod (268) deposed him, issuing an encyclical* letter that condemned Paul's mode of life and doctrine. It asserts that Paul denied that the Son of God came down from heaven, making him merely human. The acta, the minutes of the synod (held by some to be a 4th-c. forgery), quoted in later christological* controversies, suggest that he was not an Adoptionist*. He asserted that the Word came forth before the ages, in connection with creation, and was even to be called God's "offspring." Yet he avoided using the word "Son" for the preexistent Word, not wanting to speak of "two Sons."

When the synod appointed a new bishop, Paul refused to yield the church properties. After Zenobia's defeat (272), the new bishop appealed to the (pagan) emperor Gallienus, who decreed that the “house of the church” should be given to the group in communion with the bishops of Italy and Rome. This was the church’s first appeal to the emperor, and the political overtones, including the appeal to Roman patriotism, are significant. EUGENE TESELLE

Paul VI, Pope (1963–78), born Giovanni Battista Montini (1897) in Concesio, educated at home, ordained (1920); he went to Rome, entered the secretariat of state, and for a few months served in the Warsaw nunciature. He was appointed archbishop* of Milan (1954), a role he filled energetically. The obvious candidate for the papacy in 1958, he was passed over because he was not a cardinal, which John* XXIII rectified almost immediately. Initially suspicious of the Second Vatican* Council, he committed himself to implementing its decrees. He was especially eager for Christian unity – receiving the archbishop of Canterbury (1966) and visiting the patriarch of Constantinople – and made an impassioned plea for peace (1965) before the UN. His important encyclicals* include Populorum Progressio (1967) and Humanae Vitae (1968), his (in)famous decision to ban artificial contraception*.

MICHAEL J. WALSH

Payne, Daniel Alexander (1811–93), bishop of the American Methodist Episcopal Church, educator, historian. The son of free blacks in South Carolina, he opened a school for African American children. When this school was declared illegal, he studied at the Lutheran Theological Seminary (Gettysburg, Pennsylvania) and was ordained in the Lutheran Church (his ordination oration was entitled “Slavery Brutalizes Man,” 1839). He joined the African Methodist Episcopal Church (1841), became a bishop (1852), and then the first African American to head a college, as president of Wilberforce University, Ohio (1863–76), where he dedicated himself to the education of African Americans. A historian, he wrote The History of the A.M.E. Church. See also AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL (AME) CHURCH. DENNIS C. DICKERSON

Peace Churches. The term has been used to characterize the Church of the Brethren*, the Society of Friends* (Quakers), and the Mennonite* churches, which share a witness against war. In 1935 in a conference in Newton, Kansas, they shared their witness with other Christian bodies and with the US government.

Since that time, the group of peace churches has broadened and have met with European churches. See also PACIFISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Peace Movements. Throughout Christian history, there have been three basic views of war*. War as a crusade* or holy war was fought under the assumption that it was led by God. The just war doctrine (developed 2nd–3rd c.) acknowledged that war was wrong, but that under certain circumstances it could be justified morally; it provided the primary Christian theological justification for war over the centuries (see War, Christian Attitudes toward). In sharp contrast, Christian pacifism contends that war is not justifiable by Jesus’ teachings or other NT writings; long a part of the monastic tradition, it has been embraced by various Christian peace movements within both Protestant and Catholic churches.

Christian peace theologians emphasize the ethical authority of the NT over the war stories in the OT. Peace advocates argue that Jesus’ teaching in the Sermon* on the Mount to love one’s enemies, to refrain from retaliation, and to do good to one’s opponents is a clear ethical statement that forms the heart of the Christian gospel. They also argue that Jesus’ life and nonviolent response to torture on the cross are models for peacemaking. Many Christian pacifists argue that an ethic of nonviolence is the core teaching of the Christian gospel.

Christian peace movements vary considerably in their understanding and expression of pacifism. Some groups, such as the Amish* and Old Order Mennonites*, emphasize a quiet nonresistance and refuse to join the military or to use force in daily life. Catholic and Protestant peace groups support active protests against government policies that endorse violence; some groups engage in civil* disobedience in the name of Christian faith. Christian peace groups typically emphasize the importance of nonviolence in all arenas of life, including family relations, employment, civic life, and entertainment and media, as well as international affairs. They often associate peacemaking with social justice*, arguing that peace is impossible if injustice prevails.

In 1935 three churches, those of the Mennonites, Brethren*, and Quakers*, were recognized as historic peace* churches because of their sustained opposition to war. The Church of the Brethren declared that “all war is sin.” At the outset of World War II, the US government recognized the official status of conscientious* objectors and permitted them to serve in alternative service projects that benefited the national good, in lieu of military service. During the Vietnam War, the nuclear arms race of the 1970s and 1980s, the Gulf War of the 1990s, and the Iraq War, numerous Christian peace movements and coalitions have contested Christian support of and participation in war.

DONALD KRAYBILL

Peace and Peacemaking. Throughout history, Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, and Protestant traditions have described peace as a dynamic force of holistic flourishing that inaugurates and sustains harmonious relationships between individuals, communities, and creation, as envisaged by YHWH's covenant* with Israel (e.g. Isa 54:10; Ezek 34:35, 37:26) and later proclaimed in Jesus' announcement of the Reign (Kingdom*) of God (Matt 5). Peace is not a narrowly circumscribed sense of individual equanimity or the mere absence of conflict.

This understanding of peace derives from the Bible, where references to shalom in the Psalms (85:7–11) and prophets (Isa 48:18, 60:17), as well as eirene in the Gospels (Luke 7:50) and Pauline Epistles (Rom 14:17–19) consistently evince a reciprocal relationship between peace as an aspect of salvation* and peace as requiring a just socioeconomic and political order.

Accordingly, the churches' wider deliberations about the nature and scope of peacemaking included preserving and edifying a greater sense of the common good. Nevertheless, differing approaches to peacemaking have developed. Beginning with Constantine's* conversion to Christianity and the subsequent "Christianization" of the Roman Empire and "Constantinization" of the church (early 4th c.), churches have often been influenced by ideologies* of crusade*, right of state, and nationalism*. Yet reflection on peacemaking has predominantly focused on pacifism* and the just war* traditions. Both usually contend that peacemaking must include a set of practices to ameliorate and rectify oppressive* societal injustices that create violence*. Furthermore, both acknowledge that violence is a fundamental violation of the holistic flourishing that peace prescribes. However, contrasting hermeneutical strategies (conceptions of eschatology* and of political* responsibility) led pacifists and just war advocates to diverging conclusions on whether it is morally permissible to engage in violence to make peace. Pacifists claim that it is not, while just war traditionalists assert that it is, provided that the prosecution of violence abides by the criteria stipulated in the principles of just war.

More recently the churches' thinking on peacemaking has been influenced by thinkers responding to the threat of nuclear war and of post-cold war crises like global terrorism, intra-state ethnic conflict, mass displacement, and genocide. Christian ethicists (including Yoder, Stassen, Thistlethwaite) have advocated that the church needs a new paradigm to help focus public discussion on proactive practices that work for justice* and peacemaking, without supplanting pacifism's and just war's different paradigms regarding the legitimacy of waging war.

As a result, a third paradigm, just peacemaking, does not debate whether war is legitimate (its advocates are both pacifists and proponents of just war). Rather, it focuses on proactive practices effective in preventing many wars, with biblical grounding in the passages cited earlier, and also in gospel and Pauline texts where Jesus and Paul articulate transforming initiatives whose moral thrust is proactively to deliver individuals and communities from destructive cycles of hostility and violence.

Just peacemaking translates these biblical transforming initiatives into concrete peacemaking practices: (1) supporting nonviolent direct action; (2) taking independent initiatives to reduce the threat of war*; (3) using cooperative conflict resolution or transformation; (4) publicly acknowledging moral responsibility for injustice and seeking repentance* and forgiveness*; (5) advancing human* rights, religious liberty, and democracy*; (6) fostering just and sustainable economic development; (7) working with cooperative forces in the international system; (8) strengthening the UN and other international political bodies that promote cooperation and human rights; (9) reducing the number of offensive weapons and the international trade of weapons; and (10) encouraging grassroots peacemaking groups and associations.

Just peacemaking seeks to integrate these practices into one multilevel paradigm. Various Christians work on one or more of these, sometimes publicly discussing whether their government, which claims to be seeking peace, is actually doing so. See also PACIFISM AND CHRISTIANITY; PEACE MOVEMENTS.

NICHOLAS CANFIELD READ BROWN

Peasants' War (1524–26), German peasants' rebellion. The peasants resisted by two means: localized, spontaneous, and popular revolts appealing to traditional rights and customs; and more organized but far from popular supranational conspiracies, appealing to "divine law" (göttliches Recht). The series of revolts, called the German Peasants' War, resulted from a combustible combination of religious, social, economic, and political factors. The Reformation provided a broader basis to appeal to "divine law." Encouraged by the Reformation doctrine of the priesthood* of all believers, which was interpreted to mean increased social equality, and by Thomas Müntzer's* apocalyptic* visions, the peasants rebelled against the authorities by looting and burning castles and monasteries. About one-third of the German territory, especially Swabia and Thuringia, was affected by mixed groups of serfs, farmers, townspeople, and minor clergy who dictated their grievances in the "Twelve Articles" (Memmingen, March 1525). Among the peasants' demands were the right to appoint their own pastors*; control over tithes*; abolition of serfdom (see Feudal System); rights in matters of fishing, game, and woodcutting; just conditions of work and rent; justice* in the courts; and abolition of Todfall ("death duty," a heavy tax on the estate of a serf collected by the lord). The military forces of the Swabian League of Protestant Princes defeated the rebels and ended the movement.

Many of the Reformers were initially sympathetic to the demands of the peasants. But Martin Luther* as well as Melancthon*, Bucer*, and Zwingli*, declared their allegiance to the civil authorities. Nonetheless, Christoph Schappeler, pastor in Memmingen, helped compose the written demands of the peasants of his area, and he certainly was not the only priest or pastor who, although under Luther's influence, supported the peasants. Meanwhile, Johann Brenz* and Johann Eberlin wrote against pastors in their areas who were urging the peasants to revolt.

ESTHER CHUNG-KIM

Pecock, Reginald (c1390–1461), Welsh bishop of St. Asaph and a theologian who trained at Chichester, Oxford, argued that the church should combat heterodoxy with reason, not force. Using Aquinas* and Scotus*, he constructed a vernacular program of Christian education to refute the bibliolatry* of the Lollard* Movement. Because his arguments downplayed ecclesiastical authority in favor of reason, he was forced to recant (1457) and was confined until his death. His Repressor of Overmuch Blaming of the Clergy argued that God inscribes the "moral law of kinde" in human hearts as a truth more fundamental than Scripture.

STEPHEN E. LAHEY

Pectoral Cross, cross with precious metals, worn on the breast, suspended on a chain around the neck.

Pelagius, Pelagianism, Pelagian Controversy. Pelagius (c355–c425), born in Britain, went to Rome c380. He was an ascetic* in active contact with the world, manifesting the zeal of a reformer. His chief concern was Christian practice and its basis in free choice.

For Pelagius the issue of free choice was rooted in his basic convictions regarding human nature and sin*. Adam's* sin did not affect the abilities of later human beings, who become like Adam through imitation, not through generation. Thus believers have free choice in the practice of their Christian life. Others, including Rufinus* the Syrian, Caelestius*, and Julian* of Eclanum, took a more speculative position, asserting that death is not a consequence of Adam's sin.

Pelagius reacted angrily in the presence of a bishop (probably Paulinus* of Nola) to a passage in Augustine's Confessions that spoke of the need for grace*; this may have been the occasion for Pelagius's writing On Nature, arguing that Augustine had departed from his own earlier position on the freedom* of the will*. Shortly afterward (c405–9), Pelagius wrote his commentary on Paul's epistles, dealing cautiously with the disputed issues (e.g. he merely reported the questions raised by Rufinus and Caelestius about original* sin, without affirming their position). His own emphasis was that human nature has a permanent capability for sinlessness; wrong decisions cannot alter human nature. This capability, because it is natural and a gift of creation, endures, although he concedes that it must be burnished by the file of the law*, the hammer of Christ's example and teaching, and the fire of the Holy* Spirit.

When Alaric and the Goths* approached Rome (409), Pelagius and Caelestius went first to Sicily, where they gained new adherents, and then to Africa. Controversy focused not on Pelagius, with his emphasis on freedom, since he soon left for Palestine, but on Caelestius, who questioned original sin. He was accused of heresy* by Paulinus of Milan, without Augustine's participation, at a local council in Carthage (411), which reasserted the African tradition of original sin. Augustine seemed reluctant to attack Pelagius; his tone intensified after controversies led by Jerome* in Palestine.

Concern arose in Sicily over the radical social views of at least some members of the Pelagian

movement. Quite in keeping with their perfectionism* and reforming zeal, they emphasized good works, stressed discipleship* in an almost Franciscan* fashion, and criticized the corruption of government and society. Because of these writings, the imperial court in Ravenna condemned Pelagius and Caelestius as heretics and a danger to the public peace. The pope, Zosimus, followed suit in an encyclical letter sent throughout the East (418).

The theological and political controversy was resolved in a few years (415–18). Julian* of Eclanum became the leader of the opposition, asking that a council* be convened to discuss the issues on their merits. Questions continued to be raised in Gaul over so-called Semi-Pelagianism* (the view that “the beginning of faith” comes from the human being); they were resolved only at the Second Council of Orange* (529), and there continued to be differences of interpretation even among those who followed the Augustinian position. Yet Pelagianism survived in many forms through the centuries, whenever the doctrine of original* sin was contested or ignored (see Anthropology Cluster).

In the Eastern Church, i.e. in areas not influenced by the African doctrine of original sin or by Augustine’s approach to grace* and free will*, the entire dispute, including the condemnation of Pelagius, was and is questionable and beside the point.

EUGENE TESELLE

Penance and Forgiveness. Penance is the Christian practice through which Christians who sin are forgiven, i.e. are reconciled with God and reunited with the church*. The emphasis on penance and forgiveness presupposes a juridical view of atonement (see Atonement #2), a central concern for the Western churches. From this perspective, one may ask the following questions: Is the church a “club for saints” or a “refuge for sinners”? Is the church the “body of Christ” that manifests God’s presence in the world or the sanctuary where sinners are saved from God’s wrath? (see Anger or Wrath of God). The relative weight given to these alternatives has varied throughout the history of Christianity.

What Does the NT Say? The church was given the “power of binding and loosing” (Matt 16:18, 18:18), and Christians were told to forgive sins against each other “seventy times seven” (Matt 18:22; cf. Luke 17:6). Yet in a countertradition, the purity of the church is essential: members who sinned were excluded (Mark 3:29; 1 John 5:16; Heb 6:4–8, 10:26–31), “delivered to Satan”

(1 Tim 1:20; 1 Cor 5:5), with perhaps the hope that they would be saved “as through fire” (1 Cor 3:15).

Public Repentance after Baptism. The opportunity for a single repentance of major sins after baptism* was presented by Hermas* as a new revelation; this, not the NT, shaped the church’s practice for several centuries. There came to be a technical distinction between “remission” (aphesis) of sins committed before baptism and “repentance” (metanoia) for those committed after baptism. Those guilty of apostasy, murder, or fornication were excommunicated*, confessed publicly, performed acts of humiliation, and eventually were received back into the church, but only for that one time. Even this one occasion for repentance was opposed by the Montanists*, but the church at large defended it. The procedures for penance were tested and gained new definitiveness when it became necessary to deal with the lapsed* during the 3rd-c. persecutions (see Cyprian of Carthage), and they remained intact until the 6th c. The purpose of public penance was to maintain the church’s purity so that it might fulfill its role as the body of Christ in the world.

Private Penance. This originated in monasticism*. The monastic life was regarded as itself a penance and always included provisions for private confession and spiritual direction. In Celtic* Christianity, this monastic practice was gradually extended to all Christians. Contrition and deeds of “satisfaction” led to eventual reconciliation with the church as a sanctuary where sinners were saved from God’s wrath. The Celtic “penitentials*” prescribed periods of penance for various sins.

In the Eastern Church, there was a parallel tendency to seek spiritual direction from monks, but the transition to private penance was easier because of an emphasis on reconciliation with the church as the body of Christ manifesting God’s presence in the world.

With Columbanus* the Celtic practice was brought to the Continent; in England, Theodore* of Tarsus blended the Celtic system with that of the Eastern Church. The Celtic system of private penance made its strongest advance during the time of Charlemagne*, probably through the influence of Alcuin*, and was reinforced by the appearance of a French penitential (c830). In Italy the older system of exclusion and readmission was retained until the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), which, following the 12th-c. Scholastic view of penance as a sacrament, required confession to a priest at least once a year and imposed on the priest the seal* of secrecy.

Penance as a Sacrament. The earlier sequence of contrition, satisfaction, and reconciliation was replaced by the new sequence of contrition, confession and absolution, and satisfaction. With respect to satisfaction, it was increasingly possible to substitute penances such as prayer, saying psalms, fasting, going on a pilgrimage, going on a crusade*, or furnishing equipment for another crusader.

A new view of confession and absolution made penance a sacrament*: since these acts are an outward sign that grace is imparted, there is no need to wait for reconciliation until satisfaction has been completed; “eternal penalty” (damnation*) is canceled, and “temporal penalty” (purgatory*) may be relaxed through penances and through indulgences* offered by the church. Genuine contrition* (“filial fear” of God) became central, since it was sufficient for absolution, although a place was made for “attrition”* (“servile fear,” fear of punishment). In Scholastic* theology, the development of moral* theology was stimulated by the need for priestly discernment during the penitential process.

The Protestant Debt to Roman Catholicism. This medieval development was crucial not only for Catholicism but for Protestantism, which adopted the framework of confession and forgiveness but transformed it with the doctrine of justification by faith (see Justification, Theological Views and Practices, Cluster: A Central Doctrine for Western Christianity). The development of Evangelicalism* and revivalism* builds on the same assumptions.

The Problem of “Cheap Grace.” Private penance encourages constant self-examination, with the expectation that one will constantly find within oneself struggle, failure, and hope for transformation. Yet both the Roman Catholic and the Protestant traditions can be criticized for opening the way to “cheap grace,” offering forgiveness too easily and placing confession and penance behind the veil of confidentiality, quite in contrast to the early church (see Forgiveness, Christian Discourses of). Now, under conditions quite different from those that prevailed during the era of Christendom*, we must ask how both forgiveness and justice* are to be played out in the private life of Christians and in the life of the church, whether it is viewed as a “refuge of sinners” who seek forgiveness and struggle for justice, or as the “body of Christ,” which manifests both God’s forgiveness and justice in the world.

EUGENE TESELLE

Penitential Books, Penitentials include directions for confessors and penances for various sins. The use of penitentials began in the Celtic* Church and spread to the Continent in the early Middle Ages.

Penitential Psalms, Ps 6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, 143. See also PENANCE AND FORGIVENESS.

Penitentiary, a place for confining penitents in special areas for the punishment of their sins. Such confinement began within monasteries, and entered secular law in Florence (c1300), perhaps because in an increasingly commercial society, depriving someone of the ability to work was a severe form of punishment. It was subsequently championed by 18th-c. reformers in Italy, England, Western Europe, and the USA. A spirit of vengeance often overrides the intended penitential, corrective, or restorative function.

Penn, William (1644–1718), Quaker minister and founder of Pennsylvania. Son of a naval admiral; studied at Oxford and Paris; committed Friend* from about 1667; twice married. He wrote prolifically in defense of George Fox* and the Quakers* and was imprisoned in the Tower of London for blasphemy after the publication of Sandy Foundation Shaken (1668). His most well known work, No Cross, No Crown, published in 1669 and written in the London Tower, espoused the submission of one’s life to God.

In 1680 Penn received a grant of land in the New World from the British king for a debt owed his father. He attempted to create a “holy experiment” in this colony.

One of the Quaker leaders, Penn helped guide the Society of Friends through its period of prosecution, and was himself tried in the well-known Bushell case (1670) for violating the Conventicle Act. He made a great effort to win respectability for Friends. He wrote an introduction to Fox’s* Journal (1694), in which he envisioned Quakers championing a return to primitive Christianity, a position he stressed four years later in Primitive Christianity Revived: “the light of Christ within man,” he wrote, was what fundamentally distinguished Quakers from other Christians and empowered God’s servants to live in obedience. H. LARRY INGLE for the “five books” (“the Five Books of Moses”) that form the first section of the Bible, called Torah* in Hebrew: the books of Genesis*, Exodus*, Leviticus*, Numbers*, and Deuteronomy*. It combines prose, poetry, and law in the framework of a narrative that can be subdivided into six parts (Friedman): the primeval history (Gen 1–11), the patriarchs (Gen 12–50), the liberation from Egypt (Exod 1–16), the stay in Sinai/Horeb (Exod 17–40; Leviticus), the journey (Numbers), and Moses’ farewell (Deuteronomy).

Pentateuch (Gk pentateuchos), the name in the LXX* (and commonly used today by scholars)

Pentecost (Gk “50th day”), Feast of Weeks, 50 days after Passover*; day the Holy* Spirit descended on the apostles (Acts 2:1). See also LITURGICAL YEAR.

Pentecostal Movement. Classical Pentecostalism is numerically the smallest of the three major groups of the Charismatic Movement (c65 million Pentecostals in 2000). Sometimes Pentecostals are categorized as the “first wave,” in contrast to the “second wave,” or Charismatics in the historic mainline churches, and the “third wave,” or independent Charismatics, who gather in indigenous, nondenominational congregations that they call “peoples of the Spirit*” (see Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster).

Most historians of the Pentecostal renewal consider it to have originated on January 1, 1901, at Charles Fox Parham’s Topeka Bible School, USA. Parham asked his students to study the Bible for evidence of Spirit baptism*. After reading Acts 2, the account of the day of Pentecost, they concluded that glossolalia*, speaking in tongues*, was the confirmation of Spirit baptism. In the revival that followed, Pentecostalism spread to Kansas, Missouri, Texas, and Arkansas.

In 1906 the second phase of North American Pentecostalism was ushered in at Azusa Street, Los Angeles. William Seymour*, Parham’s student, carried the message of Pentecost to Los Angeles, where he began a revival among ethnic minorities in one of the poorest sections of the city. Blacks, whites, and Hispanics worshipped together. Men and women shared leadership responsibilities. The barrier between clergy and laity vanished, because it was assumed that endowment with spiritual power in order to practice ministry was intended to be received by all, not just pastors.

The racial harmony of Azusa Street waned within a few months, with the result that Pentecostalism remains racially divided, and very little progress has been made toward reconciliation. Women’s freedom to participate actively in ministry also faded, with few exceptions. In addition, theological issues divided the movement. Questions involving the nature of sanctification*, the gift of tongues, and the Trinity* generated tensions that have remained.

From Azusa Street, the revival spread throughout the USA. Pentecostals ranged from Wesleyan-Holiness, to Reformed*, and Unitarian*. Holiness leaders from the already existing Church of God in Christ (Memphis, Tennessee), the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), and the Pentecostal Holiness Church (Georgia and the Carolinas) were present at Azusa and carried its message back to their churches (see Holiness Movement). Pentecostalism soon spread beyond the Holiness Movement. Most notable was the Assemblies* of God, formed in 1914 in Hot Springs, Arizona, to serve those with a Baptist background. The Assemblies, which always had a strong distrust of organization, had a nationwide base and grew rapidly to become the largest classical Pentecostal body in the world.

In 1916 the young Assemblies of God (AG) organization was torn by a disagreement over the Godhead known at that time as the “New Issue.” Adherents of the “Jesus Name” group baptized in the name of Jesus “alone” (following Acts 2:38), rather than in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Those who left the AG formed “Oneness” denominations, later known as the United Pentecostal Church and the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World, among others.

Another “new wave on the shore,” the so-called Latter Rain Movement, ignited controversy in the Pentecostal ranks. Originating in Canada and the Northern USA, this bore a distinct resemblance to the Azusa Street revival, with which certain of the classical Pentecostal churches no longer claimed as strong a common identity.

From its beginnings, North American Pentecostalism placed an emphasis on evangelism and missions. Pentecostal missionaries were sent throughout the world from Azusa, soon reaching Canada, England, Scandinavia, Germany, India, China, Africa, and South America. While opposition was often severe and expansion was slow between the world wars, Pentecostalism experienced rapid growth in the postwar period.

The period after 1945 also saw the beginnings of Pentecostal ecumenism. In 1928 Pentecostals were “disfellowshipped” by organized fundamentalism*. At the same time, relations improved with the more moderate Evangelicals, who also distanced themselves from the fundamentalists. By 1942 the Pentecostals were admitted as charter members of the National* Association of Evangelicals, and the Pentecostal Thomas F. Zimmerman, general superintendent of the Assemblies of God, was elected its president in 1960.

In 1948 North American Pentecostals formed the Pentecostal Fellowship of North America. Black Pentecostals did not join, and Oneness Pentecostals were excluded. In 1994 the Fellowship was disbanded in favor of a new, racially integrated organization known as the Pentecostal/Charismatic Churches of North America. Most North American groups also were involved with the Pentecostal World Conferences, first convened in 1947.

Pentecostalism is growing far more rapidly outside than inside Europe and North America, yet in most instances it takes the form of independent Charismatic* churches, rather than that of classical Pentecostalism. Megachurches* have been built in the non-Western world, in, among other places, Korea* (the largest megachurch is David Paul Yonggi Cho's Yoido Full Gospel Church in Seoul, with nearly a million members), Africa, and Latin America. At present, Brazil has the largest number of self-described "Pentecostals" (c24 million in 2000, yet many of these are best designated as Charismatics*; see Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster: In Latin America: Brazil), with the USA a distant second (c5 million in 2000).

STANLEY M. BURGESS

Pentecostal Worship tends to proceed in a less linear fashion, appearing to be less programmed and more spontaneous, than most Christian liturgies. Yet it is ritually structured. "Worship in song," "the Word" (a pastoral message), and "altar response" are foundational rites that form a flexible framework for a rich variety of "micro-rites," e.g. testimonies, charismatic* words, congregational glossolalia*, anointing and prayers for healing*, raising hands, clapping, dancing, and falling under the Spirit.

The ethos of Pentecostal worship greatly depends on the sensibilities – embodied attitudes and affections – that enliven and give a sense of purpose to acts of worship. For example, the altar response may have a repentant or celebratory mode, or an efficacious mode (orienting prayers for healing), or it may involve ecstasy (with Spirit* baptism). The same diverse types of sensibility (repentance, celebration, efficacy, and ecstasy and, beyond these, contemplation, improvisation, and ceremony) are also found in "worship in song" and "the Word."

For Pentecostals, worship in the Spirit must be rooted in and dependent on "the Word." Scripture* both grounds and arbitrates their worship. The belief that God "still speaks today" frames the doctrine that all Scripture is inspired and profitable, although the Book of Acts and Pauline teachings concerning the Holy* Spirit, Spirit* baptism, and the charismata* are most important.

Pentecostal worship is highly participatory. Liturgical leadership and liturgical roles can be shared by many because the true leader is God's Spirit. Furthermore, the belief that God is present as both leader and object of worship arouses expectations of manifestations of the supernatural, provides a context for encountering the Holy, and calls for an attentive receptivity to God.

Pentecostal worship contextualizes and sensitizes worshippers to the concrete needs of believers and nonbelievers alike. For worshippers the Spirit seeks to sanctify, to provide gifts, and to empower believers so that they might minister to others. This ministering can take the form of healing prayers (which is commonly the case) or of evangelism* – being God's witnesses, through the worship service as a whole and through testimonies and evangelistic messages. What begins in church unfolds into the world, as believers also deal with people's concrete needs.

Pentecostal worship cuts across cultural boundaries. It flourishes both in North Atlantic cultures and in very diverse cultures around the world, readily taking diverse inculturated* forms, because of its adaptable, mobile, and oral nature. For Pentecostals these inculturated forms of worship are the work of the Holy Spirit both in worship and in the world.

DANIEL E. ALBRECHT

People of God, generic description of Israel* and the church*. Hebrew Scriptures refer to "people of YHWH" (e.g. Exod 3:12; Num 11:29); "Holy [to YHWH]" (Jer 2:3; 1 Pet 2:9); the "chosen people" (Deut 4:37; Amos 3:2; Isa 45:4; Acts 13:17); and saved by God (Hab 3:13). No other nation is like Israel (Deut 4:7; 2 Sam 7:23; Ps 147:20). In the NT, laos sometimes designates Israel (Acts 4:10, 5:34) or the Jewish Christians (Acts 18:10). The covenant* with Israel is eternal (Rom 9–11). The church is a "chosen race" (1 Pet 2:9; Tit 2:14; cf. Rom 8:29–30), already in the Kingdom (Matt 13:38, 43), as a fulfillment of promise (Gen 12:2–3; Isa 19:24–25), for Christ is “with them always” (Matt 28:20). In keeping with these various citations, the NT sometimes describes the church as the renewed Israel (Gal 6:16; Rom 9:6; Jas 1:1; 1 Pet 1:1; Heb 4:9, 11:1–39, 13:12–14), at other times as a new people superseding and replacing the old (Mark 12:9, par.; Matt 27:25). This supersessionist*, and thus anti-Jewish, view of the people of God was incorporated in the view of “manifest destiny” of certain Christian nations (including the USA; see Racism and Christianity Cluster). Vatican* II used “people of God” as the basic image for its doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church. See also ISRAEL, PEOPLE OF; NATIONALISM AND CHRISTIANITY. ANDRÉ LACOCQUE

Pépin, Pippin. (1) Pippin of Héristal (d714), “mayor of the palace” of the French kings, father of Charles Martel. (2) Pippin the Short (714–68), son of Charles Martel and father of Charlemagne*, declared king (751) by the pope, with the support of Boniface*.

Perfection. In ancient Israel, to be perfect (Heb tamim; also shalom) was to be complete, to be unblemished, or to have integrity; the Greek term (teleios) used to translate the Hebrew terms in the LXX* meant “being undivided” in one’s relation to God and neighbors, a meaning retained in the NT. Jesus calls on his followers to be perfect as God is perfect (Matt 5:48), but Luke substitutes “merciful” (Luke 6:36), emphasizing undivided relations with others. Perfection belongs first to God, and it is to be received with gratitude and trust; the human response is best characterized by love for God and neighbor (Mark 12:28–34, par.; Rom 13:9; Gal 5:14; Jas 2:8; 1 John 4:7–21).

The “counsels” of perfection” were important to the monastic* movement; its emphasis on celibacy* or singleness was interpreted to mean singleness of mind, free from the concerns of marriage and life in the world. In Protestantism*, the doctrine of justification* by faith diminished the striving for perfection, but sanctification* remained an expectation for the Christian life; assurance* of salvation through election* and grace* took the place of perfection. In the Wesleyan* Movement (Methodism*), it was expected that at some time after conversion, one might receive the conviction that sin* had been rooted out and one had been restored to the original image* of God, feeling nothing but love.

Perfectionist Ethics is an approach to ethics that emphasizes the formation of the self as moral agent. Noting the remoteness of (deontological*) moral principles from concrete situations and the difficulty of achieving the goals of consequentialist* ethics, perfectionist ethics underscores the need for moral discernment or “practical wisdom” (Aristotle) as one applies moral principles. A moral agent needs “virtues” – the know-how to address moral issues in concrete situations – which one acquires by learning “practical wisdom” through imitation of a teacher. For example, a disciple is formed through imitatio Christi. See also CONSEQUENTIALIST ETHICS; DEONTIC, DEONTOLOGICAL ETHICS.

Performatory Language. Often speaking is itself an action. When we say, “I promise,” the saying is the doing; when it is not said, it is not done. The speaker “stands behind” the words, is self-involved, and enacts a new relationship. Much biblical and traditional language is performatory: promise or threat, command or encouragement, or prayer. The sacraments* usually contain performatory language that accompanies physical actions: in a wedding, the joining of hands and the saying of the vows; in baptism*, the use of water and the declaration, “I baptize you . . .”; and in the Eucharist*, the physical action characterized by the statements “This is my Body,” “This is my Blood.” Like the beatitudes (“Blessed are . . .”) and curses (“Woe to you . . .”) (Matt 5; Luke 6), a priest’s or pastor’s blessing (“May the peace of God be with you”) is performatory, conveying or calling forth a new reality. For Protestants, at least in intent, preaching is performatory language, speaking on God’s behalf.

Pergamum, city near Asia Minor’s western coast, famous for its altar to Zeus, temple to Athena, and shrine of Asclepius; one of the seven churches addressed in Rev 1:11, 2:12–17.

Perkins, William (1558–1602). Internationally recognized Calvinist* theologian of the Church of England*, fellow of Christ’s College, Cambridge (1584–95), and popular preacher, he represented the Reformed* piety and theology prevalent in late Elizabethan England. His Golden Chaine (Latin, 1590; English, 1591) described the process of salvation* and the covenants* of works and grace*. He defended the doctrine of predestination* and employed the new Ramist* logic. His theology was practical: it was focused on conversion*, sanctification*, and the search for assurance of salvation*, encouraging systematic though warmhearted introspective piety. His influence on Puritan* preaching, theology, and pastoral care was important and extended to later Evangelicalism*.

DEWEY D. WALLACE, JR.

Perpetua and Felicitas, North African women (Perpetua, c180–203; Felicitas, d203) martyred in the Roman amphitheater in Carthage (March 7, 203). The Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas, a 3rd-c. Latin text with a debatably Montanist* slant, details their experiences. The section devoted to Perpetua's imprisonment reportedly comes from her own diary, making it the earliest writing attributed to a Christian woman; she describes a series of visions, her anxiety over her disapproving father and her infant son, and her efforts as an intercessor for both her deceased brother and fellow prisoners. The Passion also depicts the slave Felicitas prematurely giving birth in prison moments before her martyrdom*.

PAMELA MULLINS REAVES

Persecutions

Persecutions by the Roman Empire. Christians were condemned and sentenced by officials of the Roman Empire from the 1st to the 4th c. The reasons for the persecutions and their basis in Roman law remain controversial.

Jesus had been executed by a Roman procurator using a Roman means of execution, probably as a revolutionary, mockingly described in the inscription on the cross as “the king of the Jews.” The term “Christian*” has a Latin suffix, suggesting that the movement in its early years was suspected of being a political faction. The Romans repeatedly reassured themselves, however, that the movement was not an overt political threat. Yet the opposition between Kyrios Christos and Kyrios Kaisar (and the imperial cult) emerged, possibly as early as Paul’s* letters and the Gospel of Mark*.

On what legal basis were the Christians persecuted? The procedure was known as cognitio: governors heard complaints, made judgments, and ordered appropriate action after hearing individual accusations by private persons. Jesus’ followers were accused and prosecuted “as Christians” (1 Pet 4:14–16). The very name or identity, the nomen christianum, was prohibited, probably not by statute but by precedent, and in trials followers of Jesus were urged to abandon it. Why? Because of the Christians’ perceived crimes, immoralities, and “atheism*.” Yet it was clear that the nomen itself was outlawed. When Christians renounced their identity, they were not held liable for these past offenses; the crime was being a Christian, not having been one (as Geoffrey de Ste. Croix says).

For the Romans, the jurisdiction of the state extended to religious affairs. The Christians shifted religious authority from the state to the individual conscience. In an era when the concept of religious freedom was largely unknown, Christians created it by deciding which obligations to accept or reject. The persecutions were sporadic, based on the emperors’ temperament or the crises of the time (famine, plague, or invasion) that stimulated the quest for scapegoats. After the persecution under Nero* (64–68), we next hear of one under Domitian* (c95). Scattered hearings continued, as we know from Pliny’s letter and from the case of Ignatius* (c110–15). The first widespread persecution came during Marcus Aurelius’s reign (161–80), partly because of his sense of tradition, partly because of plague and invasion. Victims included Justin*, Polycarp*, and the martyrs of Lyon and Vienne.

Under Decius*, who required all persons to sacrifice to the traditional deities and obtain certificates (249 or 250), persecutions were for the first time empire-wide. The Decian persecutions created a major dispute within the church, centered on Cyprian*, concerning what to do about the lapsed*. However, there was also popular revulsion against the persecutions. Under Valerian (257–58), all public meetings were prohibited and all clergy were required to make sacrifices. Following his defeat and captivity in Persia (260), there was another period of peace.

When Diocletian* became emperor (284), he maintained the tacit toleration of Christianity, although he remained loyal to Roman traditions. However, under pressure from intellectuals loyal to Greek traditions (possibly including Porphyry*), Diocletian issued four edicts, with increasing severity. After his abdication, persecutions stopped in the West (Constantius was never a persecutor; Maxentius made peace with Christians in 306). But persecutions continued in the East, where Christians were much more numerous, under Galerius and Maximinus. Sacrifice was ordered (306, 308); resisters were sent to the mines with one eye blinded and the tendons of one foot severed (a number of these “confessors” would come in this condition to the Council of Nicaea*, 325). Maximinus’s defeat by Licinius (313), following Maxentius’s defeat in the West by Constantine* (312), was the setting for the Edict of Milan*.

After 320, in the East Licinius turned against the Christians, but Constantine defeated him, becoming sole emperor (324). His encyclical letter to the provinces of the East, a new edict of toleration, still gave "equal privileges" to all religions on the principle that adherence to the Christian faith should be voluntary.

Persecution of Christians Outside the Roman World up to the Middle Ages. While Roman persecution of Christians ended in the 4th c., there were moves against Christians in other areas.

In Persia, persecution was triggered by Constantine, who took it upon himself to protect Christians everywhere and shortly before his death (337) indicated that he planned to conquer Persia. In 339 Shapur imposed a double tax on Christians, destroyed churches, and required, in Zoroastrian style, veneration of the sun, with refusal punished by death; martyrs numbered in the thousands or tens of thousands. When Julian the Apostate invaded Persia (363), losing his life, there were new pressures against Christians, and many of them, including Ephrem*, fled to Edessa* in Roman territory.

Christianity was tolerated in Persia in 409, and as time went on, it became clear that the Church* of the East (commonly known as the Nestorian* Church, a misnomer) held a different view of Christ than the churches within Roman territory, making them seem less like a Roman "fifth column."

When Christianity spread to the north, through traders and Christian captives, and especially because of Ulfila* (the "apostle to the Goths", c311–83), the Goths* adopted Christianity in its Arian* form, which was at odds with the Christianity of the Roman Empire. There was relatively little persecution, because it was assumed that Latin speakers would remain Catholic and that Teutonic speakers would remain Arian.

The Islamic conquests in the Middle East had mixed results. They ended persecution of Monophysites*/Miaphysites* and of Nestorians* by the Byzantine Empire, and of Christians by Zoroastrians in Persia; they gave Christians the cohesiveness of a *millet, a recognized and self-controlled Christian community responsible to the ruler; and Christians were often sought out by the Islamic rulers as traders, physicians, scholars, and architects. But Christians were forbidden to seek converts, ring bells, or display crosses in public; and all men had to pay a special tax. From time to time, there were attacks on Christians as a result of local factors.

See also HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

EUGENE TESELLE

Person, the Trinity, and the Self. Prosopon (Gk) and persona (Lat) originally applied to the actor's "mask." These terms came to mean the role played, the character depicted; hence it could also be asked whether one was acting in one's own or another's "person." In the ancient world, "person" did not mean a personal center of consciousness – as it later came to be viewed – although it could mean the "presented self" (as in the modern psychological term "persona"). But the ancient view of person should not be ignored today, especially as we become aware of the cultural character of this concept.

Tertullian* was the first to speak of the Trinity* as three persons, meaning three modes or expressions of the one Divinity; in the East, the Trinity was more often called three hypostases*, although three "persons" was sometimes used. In Christology* the notion of "two sons" (divine and human) was generally condemned. The Antiochenes* also insisted, however, that each nature has its prosopon (person, in the sense of activity). They went on to say that these different modes of activity are harmonized, by a conjunction of wills, in a single prosopon (person, in the sense of manifestation) with neither division nor confusion.

After the Council of Chalcedon*, it became a commonplace to say that God is one nature in three persons or hypostases, while Christ is of two natures in one person or hypostasis; in the Trinity, then, there is a difference of persons but not of natures, while in Christ there is a difference of natures but not of persons. All of these reflections led to the definition proposed by Boethius*: a person is "an individual substance [i.e. hypostasis] of a rational nature."

The "turn to the subject" associated with Augustine* and especially Descartes* encouraged a new emphasis on consciousness and freedom in understanding personhood. If God was to be understood as "personal" in this sense, did it mean that God is one "personality" in the three modes of immediacy, self-concept, and will (as in Augustine), or is God three personalities in a social unity (which tended to be the view of the Cappadocians*)? Disagreement over this continues into the present. The ancient meaning of "person" was not entirely lost, however, for Western philosophers and theologians; Hobbes and Spinoza* denied that God is a "person" in the sense of a delimited form and visage, and Tillich* later took a similar position.

New issues were raised by Locke* and Hume* when they pointed out that subjective activities and experiences do not necessarily imply an underlying “substance.” Process* thought sees the “self” as an ongoing series of events whose consistency results from inheritance and reenactment, not substantial continuity. Social theories of selfhood and also community-centered culture suggest that personhood is shaped by interactions with other selves (in the community). See also AUTONOMY; HETERONOMY; RELATIONALITY. EUGENE TESELLE

Personalism, Christian. See BERDYAEV, NIKOLAI ALEKSANDROVICH; MARCEL, GABRIEL.

Peru lies at the heart of the Andes and was the home of the Inca Empire; it was also the center of Spanish power in South America until the 18th c. Christianity in Peru reflects the country’s multiethnicity (white, 15%; mestizo, 37%; Quechua, Aymara, and other indigenous peoples, 45%; black and Asiatic, 3%), multilingual nature (Spanish, Quechua, Aymara, 12 major languages in the Amazon region), and geographic extremes. The Andes mountain range divides the country in half. To the southeast a vast, barren altiplano, with Lake Titicaca in the middle, connects Peru to Bolivia*. The capital, Lima, is located midway along a dry coastal desert that runs from Chile to Ecuador, and a huge tropical rain forest covering half the country extends in the east from the Andes to Brazil. Although Christianity and Christian symbols confer on Peru a definite cultural unity, differing religious practices and customs also reflect this great cultural and geographic variety.

Roman Catholic Christianity arrived with the Spanish Conquest in 1532. The first religious – Franciscans*, Augustinians*, and Dominicans* – practiced mass baptisms, and at least on a superficial level, the native populations accepted Christianity. In 1572 Viceroy Francisco Toledo accelerated the evangelization process by ordering all indigenous people to live in “reductions*” (Christian towns), under the supervision of a royal official. For the next 300 years, the inhabitants of these towns attended Sunday Mass and memorized catechism lessons. Although ordinary native people did not read or write, and the Bible was not accessible, the residents of the reductions put on biblical and morality plays to represent the great biblical truths. The most widespread ritual that survives from that time is the Passion* of Christ, which is reenacted every Holy Week in countless towns throughout the Andes. The Jesuits*, who arrived with Toledo, were entrusted with the education of the sons of native chiefs.

By the middle of the 17th c., most of the major devotions* that make up popular* Roman Catholicism in Peru had emerged. These devotions reflected the new cultural patterns and realities that had arisen since the Conquest. The strong appeal of these devotions is attested by the fact that most of them were very much alive in the 21st c. Colonial Lima had a distinct Spanish-Creole (a Creole being a white born in the New World) identity, although it also had a large native and black population. Two of the most popular saints today are St. Rose* of Lima and St. Martin of Porres. St. Martin, a mulatto Dominican, endeared himself to the people by his works of charity and is especially popular among black Roman Catholics. The major devotion remains the Lord of Miracles procession*, which takes place three times during the month of October. The origins of the procession can be traced to the survival during an earthquake in 1655 of an image of the crucified Christ painted on a wall by an anonymous slave (1651). The first procession was held in 1687. Over time it grew until it became one of the largest processions in the entire Catholic world. Thousands of devotees, many dressed in purple as a sign of penance*, accompany the image through the streets of Lima. The confraternity of the Lord of Miracles is made up mainly of Afro- and mestizo-Peruvians. The devotion has spread to other Peruvian cities, and Peruvians in New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles annually hold their own, smaller Lord of the Miracles processions.

In the southern Andes, pre-Conquest rituals were incorporated into Roman Catholic feasts and ceremonies. In Cuzco the main feasts are Corpus Christi and the Lord of Tremors. Although the image of Christ is Spanish, these processions attract Peruvians of all races and social classes. One hundred miles to the east, a much more Andean devotion has increasingly attracted attention: the Lord of Qollur Rit’i (“snow star” or “bright snow”), which began around 1780. Each year thousands of pilgrims (50,000 in 2002), wearing brightly colored clothes, dance and sing as they walk up to a mountain valley 16,000 feet above sea level. There, under the shadow of Ausangate, one of the highest peaks in the Andes, they pay homage to an image of Christ painted on a rock. Dancing is accompanied by songs of praise in Quechua. Men dressed as mountain bears bring ice from the mountain to the main plaza of Cuzco, a gift of the Lord of Qollur Rit'i to the city.

Another deeply revered figure is the Virgin Mary*. In many Andean towns, she replaced, or became the Christian manifestation of, the Pachamama, the mother earth, a pre-Conquest cult still very much alive. The Virgin of the Candle Stick (la Candelaria) is venerated in Puno and throughout the altiplano, along with Our Lady of Carmel. In Arequipa, a city located between the altiplano and the coast, there is strong devotion to Our Lady of Chapi.

In 1780 Tupac Amaru led the greatest rebellion of indigenous peoples in the history of South America. The native leader, a graduate of the Jesuit school for Inca nobility in Cuzco, cited the Bible to justify the rebellion. His movement was crushed in 1781. Many Creole priests supported the cause of independence, which was won in 1821. But in the 19th c., the Peruvian Church became increasingly conservative. It also experienced a sharp decline in the number of vocations.

After Vatican* II, Roman Catholicism in Peru experienced major changes. Under Cardinal Juan Landázuri, the Church became one of the most progressive in Latin America. Gustavo Gutiérrez (1928–) became one of the main founders of Liberation* theology. Born in Lima, he studied medicine, pursued studies for the priesthood in Santiago (ordination, 1960), then at Louvain, and received his doctorate from the Université Catholique in Lyon. Subsequently, he served as moderator of the Union of Catholic University Students. His book, A Theology of Liberation (1971), and many later works, had a major impact on Christian thought. Although subjected to questioning by Rome, he always remained loyal to the Church and entered the Dominican* order in 2000. Because of Gutiérrez's conciliatory style, Liberation theology had a major impact on Christians in university circles, in the pueblos jóvenes (shantytowns) surrounding the cities, and throughout the Andes and in the jungle. During the Shining Path years (1980–92), Liberation theology inspired thousands of poor who were victims of terrorism and government forces to stand together in defense of their communities.

Contemporary Roman Catholicism in Peru is multifaceted. Churches in the center of the cities tend to be traditional, with little lay participation in the liturgy. But participation in modern middle-class parishes is noticeably greater. In the poor districts surrounding the cities, there is a blending of traditional customs and Liberation theology. Yet under Pope John Paul II, the episcopate has become increasingly conservative. Opus* Dei is very influential among the upper classes (8 of 46 bishops are members), and the archbishop of Lima, Juan Luis Cipriani, is the only Opus Dei cardinal in the world. Sodalitium* Vitae Christianae, another conservative movement, founded in Lima in 1971, attracts many middle-class youth. The Catholic Charismatic* Movement, founded in the 1970s, reached a peak and has stabilized. But Charismatic healing Masses, including those celebrated by Father Manuel Rodríguez in Lima at the beginning of the 21st c., are very popular. Although Liberation theology no longer has the appeal it once did, progressive Catholics are still influential at the Catholic University, in human rights groups, and in parishes among the poor.

The few Protestants in Peru after independence (1821) were Anglicans, mostly diplomats or merchants. Diego (James) Thomson, a representative of the British Bible Society, visited Peru after independence and was well received by the liberal clergy of the period. But the Roman Catholic Church grew increasingly conservative and opposed religious toleration. In 1890 Francisco Penzotti, a Methodist and representative of the American Bible Society, was imprisoned for public proselytizing. Following many protests, he was freed. Finally, freedom of religion was granted in 1915. Two groups made noticeable inroads: the Methodists*, who founded several schools in Lima and Callao, and the Adventists*, who founded many schools and clinics for indigenous peoples in the altiplano bordering Lake Titicaca. Two important figures of this period were John Mackay*, a missionary of the Free Church of Scotland, and John Ritchie, a Scottish Baptist, who founded the Evangelical Church of Peru (1922), a confederation of several denominations (with c15,000 members in 1930). In 1940 the principal Protestant churches in Peru founded CONEP, the National Protestant Council of Peru.

Since the 1960s, churches with Pentecostal or Charismatic* orientation have grown rapidly. Currently, among the four largest Protestant denominations – the Evangelical Church of Peru, the Assemblies of God, the Church of God, and the Pentecostal Church of Peru – only the first is not Pentecostal or Charismatic. The Adventist* Church (now part of CONEP) is the second-largest non-Catholic denomination. The humanitarian and educational work of the Adventists in the altiplano drew praise from intellectuals and native rights advocates.

An important figure in early Adventist history was Ferdinand Stahl (1874–1950), who founded schools and clinics.

An organization that has drawn much attention is the Evangelical Association of the Israelite Mission of the New Universal Pact, or simply, the Israelites of the New Universal Pact, founded in the 1960s by Ezequiel Ataucusi (1918–2000), a Quechua-speaking peasant who was influenced by Adventists. The Israelites combine Andean mountain elements with the OT. Now constituting a significant movement (more than 200,000 members in 2002), the Israelites have adopted OT customs: beards for men, veils for women, and animal sacrifices.

In the 1990s, some Protestant churches and the Israelites entered politics, a sign of their growing influence. Relations between Protestants and Roman Catholics have improved considerably since Vatican* II, but are still very limited. Fundamentalist* groups continue to harbor anti-Catholic sentiments. See also ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: PERU.

Statistics: Population (2007): 29 million (M). Christians, 28.1 M, 97% (Roman Catholics, 23 M; Protestants, 2.7 M; Baptists, 0.3 M; Assemblies of God, 1.3 M; Adventists, 0.5 M; Israelites of the New Universal Pact, 0.2 M; Jehovah's Witnesses, 0.08 M; Mormons, 0.05 M); nonreligious, 1.4%. It is estimated that only 10% of Roman Catholics regularly attend Mass. (Source: 2007 census.)

JEFFREY KLAIBER, SJ

Pesher (plural, Pesharim), Hebrew term used to refer to a distinctive kind of "interpretation" in commentaries on biblical prophetic texts (including Psalms) found among the Dead* Sea Scrolls. Pesharim (e.g. the Habakkuk Pesher) stressed the fulfillment of the prophecies; through the Holy* Spirit, God revealed to the interpreter the "secret mysteries" of the words of the prophets, namely God's role in the events surrounding the Qumran* community. Their use of Scripture* is similar to that of Matthew* and Paul*.

Peshitta (Syriac, "simple," "straightforward"), the name for the translation of the Bible into Syriac (Late Eastern Aramaic), probably composed by Jews (who possibly converted to Christianity) in Edessa* (second half of the 2nd c.). The OT Peshitta, a translation of a Hebrew text (though some books show the influence of the LXX* and the Targum*), was the biblical version known to early Syriac authors such as Ephrem* and Aphrahat*. For biblical scholars today, it offers a window into the state of the 2nd-c. Hebrew text. More important, the Peshitta preserves an interpretation of the HB, such as in 2 Sam 15:32 and 16:1, where it presents David as a person of prayer. A critical edition is available and an English translation (The Bible of Edessa) is forthcoming. The Peshitta NT, the standard Syriac NT, is an early-5th-c. revision of an older Syriac version that brings the Syriac translation into closer line with the Greek text; it lacks 2–3 John, 2 Peter, Jude, and Revelation. The book series Das Neue Testament in syrischer Überlieferung provides an interlinear edition of the Peshitta and the later Harklean Syriac versions for the Pauline and Catholic letters. Today, the Peshitta is the authoritative text for the Syriac* churches.

CRAIG E. MORRISON, O. Carm.

Peter (c10–c64), Simon, son of John, Galilean fisherman and prominent disciple of Jesus* of Nazareth, reestablished the Jesus movement in Jerusalem after the Crucifixion; he later traveled as a missionary and was martyred in Rome under Nero*.

Jesus nicknamed Simon "Cephas" (Aramaic, "stone," "rock"), which when translated into Greek became "Peter." Although he denied being a disciple after Jesus' arrest, Peter was one of the first to have a vision of the risen Jesus. The leader of the Jerusalem community (Acts*), where Paul* later met him (Galatians*), Peter subsequently shared leadership there with James* and John* and engaged in negotiations with Paul and Antioch Christians over the status of non-Jewish believers. Nothing is known of his travels or eventual arrival in Rome, where he was martyred. A monument in an ancient necropolis under St. Peter's Basilica has been venerated as his burial place (since the 2nd c.).

Matthew 16:17–19 interprets the name "Peter" as Jesus' promise that Simon Peter will be the foundation stone of his community. The keys entrusted to Peter (and to the community; Matt 18:18) represent the authority to decide how Jesus' teaching will be applied. The debates over the status of non-Jewish believers (Gal 2; Acts 15) show that Peter did not have sole authority. He acted in consultation with other apostles. John 21:15–19 reflects another tradition, in which the risen Jesus rebukes Peter for his betrayal, entrusts him with care of Jesus' flock, and predicts Peter's martyrdom.

Two letters in Peter's name evoke his role as a shepherd (pastor*) and authoritative teacher:

1 Peter*, sent from Rome to suffering believers in Asia Minor, and 2 Peter*, written to shore up waning belief in Jesus' second coming. By the 2nd c., the Gospel of Mark* was thought to preserve Peter's teaching about Jesus to Christians in Rome. An apocryphal Gospel of Peter (2nd c.) expanded on the Passion and Resurrection stories (see Peter, Gospel of). An apocryphal* Acts of Peter described his abilities as a missionary and miracle worker, his defense of Christianity against the false prophet/magician Simon Magus (Acts 8), and the story about his insistence on being crucified head down. For Jewish Christians, Peter was the heroic opponent of Paul. Although some Gnostic* Christians cast him as their unenlightened opponent, others composed apocalypses and acts in which Peter conveys Gnostic teaching. Considered the founding bishop of the Roman See*, Peter became the guarantor of both governing and teaching authority for the Roman Catholic popes* during the Middle Ages and especially after the Reformation.

PHEME PERKINS

Peter, Acts of. See APOCRYPHA CLUSTER: APOCRYPHAL ACTS OF APOSTLES.

Peter, Apocalypse of, short pseudonymous Christian Gnostic* document written when the distinction between orthodox and heretic*/Gnostic was clearly drawn (3rd c.) and found in the Nag* Hammadi library. Following the apocalyptic literary genre, it is organized around three visions explained by the Savior. It posits a radically dualistic worldview contrasting the material, mortal, and counterfeit with the spiritual, immortal, and true. Interpretations of the three visions – visions of the “blind ones,” priests and people ready to kill Jesus and Peter; of the crucifixion of Jesus, “glad and laughing on the tree”; and of the living Savior (filled “with a Holy Spirit”) – oppose immortal souls (the Gnostics) and mortal souls (false teachers, non-Gnostics, presumably the nascent orthodox church, as well as other Gnostic groups). The Apocalypse of Peter is a good example of docetic* Christology, which emphasizes that Jesus is the manifestation of a preexistent* divine being and that his humanity was merely apparent.

DANIEL PATTE

Peter, Gospel of, lengthy but fragmentary story of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection told by Peter* in the first-person singular (“I, Simon Peter”) and plural (“we, the twelve disciples”). The text in a parchment codex was discovered in 1886/87 in a monk's tomb in Upper Egypt.

Most scholars accept that it is the Gospel of Peter that Serapion, bishop of Antioch (190–209), knew, classifying some of its passages as docetic* (Jesus' humanity was simply apparent). The relationship of the Gospel of Peter with the NT Passion stories, especially with Matthew's special material, is self-evident. The attempt to distill from the Gospel of Peter the oldest, independent stratum of these traditions does not withstand close scrutiny. The arguments that the Gospel of Peter is a later stage of tradition-history are overwhelming: e.g. Jesus is consistently called “the Lord”; Jewish customs are ignored; and responsibility for Jesus' death is transferred from Pilate to Herod and the Jews.

A driving goal of the narrative is the intensification of apologetic* motifs; eyewitnesses of the Resurrection (among the Jews and the Roman soldiers) are produced. The miraculous elements are equally emphasized, with enormous angelic beings and a cross that speaks. The evidence for docetism is not so clear, although the crucifixion scene itself is open to a docetic reading. See also APOCRYPHA CLUSTER: APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

HANS-JOSEF KLAUCK

Peter, 1 and 2 Epistles of. While both “letters” claim Petrine authorship, most scholars agree that 2 Peter is pseudonymous* (written by Peter's followers c90–125 in Rome, Asia Minor, or Egypt), and many also debate the authorship of 1 Peter (written either c62 if by Peter or c73–92 if by his followers, probably in Rome, called “Babylon”).

1 Peter addressed five Asia Minor communities that were experiencing persecution*. Called “exiles,” “a chosen race, royal priesthood, holy nation,” and “aliens and strangers,” they were admonished to honor government officials, “do good,” withstand suffering (a “fiery ordeal”), and follow a household* code within their communities. 1 Peter 3:19, Jesus' “proclamation to the spirits in prison,” is the basis for the creeds' affirmation of Jesus' “descent into hell” (see Descent into Hell; Hell).

2 Peter includes a list of virtues, the author's claim to be the last of the apostolic witnesses, and a mention of Paul's* letters as “writings” (Scripture*). 1 Peter appears to draw on sermon, baptismal, and/or catechetical material, including quotations of hymns and Scripture. 2 Peter, a “farewell testament,” is heavily dependent on Jude* (cf. 2:1–18, 3:1–3) and is similar in style and vocabulary to 1 Clement* and Shepherd of Hermas*.

1 Peter seeks to establish continuity with, yet supersession* over, the promises and Scriptures of Israel, and portrays Christ's sufferings as worth emulating. 2 Peter is concerned with false teachers who twist the words of Paul and others and with the eschatological Judgment*. 1 and 2 Peter, rarely a part of lectionary readings, attest to the importance of Peter and his tradition. 1 Peter's "royal priesthood" became the basis for Luther's* "priesthood* of all believers." Attributing Christ-likeness to suffering both encouraged those in abusive situations and led to the belief that suffering* should be passively accepted, which has done much harm over the centuries.

JENNIFER BIRD

Peter, Preaching of (Kerygma Petrou), an early (late 2nd c.?) Apologetic document (see Apologists). According to the only extant fragments quoted by Clement* of Alexandria, it depicted Peter as an authoritative Christian missionary preaching on monotheism, on the dangers of paganism and of Judaism, and apparently on Christology, using OT passages to defend the Christian interpretation of Jesus' death and resurrection. Origen* does not view it as part of the legitimate Christian writings. Eusebius* listed it among the noncanonical writings.

Peter of Callinicus (c540–91), theologian, patriarch. Born in Callinicus, present-day al-Raqqah (Northern Syria); ordained patriarch of Antioch (581). Versed in both Greek and Syriac, he is credited with having written numerous theological works (mainly on the doctrine of the Trinity*), treatises, and letters. Involved in a stormy controversy (c586) with his patron, Damian*, patriarch of Alexandria (578–605), he wrote his magnum opus, Adversus Damianum. Peter rebuts Damian's thesis (developed against the tritheists) that the characteristic properties of the divine persons, i.e. fatherhood, sonship, and procession, are the hypostases* themselves. Peter's argument concentrates on the Trinity, the single substance, and the three hypostases, explicitly condemning Sabellianism* and tritheism*, especially the views of its prominent advocate, John Philoponus (c490–575).

RIFAAT EBIED

Peter Damiani (1007–72), Italian reformer. A monk at Fonte Avellana near Gubbio, he became prior because of his ascetic discipline. A member of the reforming party around Hildebrand (later Gregory* VII), he denounced immorality among the clergy, and his Liber Go- morrhianus was a dramatic attack on homosexuality*. In the debates over simony*, he opposed the rigorist and nearly Donatist* position of Cardinal Humbert, defending the validity of sacraments administered by simoniacal priests.

Peter the Fuller (d488), patriarch of Antioch. A monk in the Sleepless Monastery in Constantinople sympathetic to Nestorianism*, he was expelled for his Monophysite*/Miaphysite* tendencies. With the emperor Zeno's support, he became bishop of Antioch (470), then was deposed and reinstated several times. In the history of liturgy, he is significant for adding the "theopaschite* supplement," "crucified for us," to the Trisagion and for instituting the recitation of the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed during the Eucharist*.

Peter Lombard (c1100–60), author of the standard textbook of systematic theology used in the later Middle Ages, the Sentences (1155–58). Born in Lombardy, he studied in Italy, Reims, and Paris, where he was a master who taught in the cathedral school from c1143. He became bishop of Paris in 1159.

In the 1140s, Peter Lombard lectured on the Bible. His commentaries on the Psalms (before 1148) and the Pauline Epistles (after 1148) survive. At the trial of Gilbert, bishop of Poitiers, for heresy about the Trinity* (Council of Reims, 1148), he was one of Gilbert's opponents. He was himself a subject of criticism. Walter of St. Victor accused him of heretical teaching on the Trinity in a treatise The Four Labyrinths of France.

He was first and foremost an organizer of material. In the Sentences, he brought together systematically the opinions of (mainly Western) patristic authors under topic headings in four sections: Trinity*; creation* and the Fall*; Incarnation* and the living of a good life; and sacraments* and the end of the world.

He became caught up in two contemporary controversies over the Trinity. Joachim*, the controversial abbot of Fiore, attacked one of the views Peter Lombard had listed; an attempt was made to get Peter Lombard condemned at the Fourth Lateran Council. In the event, it was Joachim who was condemned, and once the Sentences had the Council's approval, this very useful book began to be adopted widely in theology courses.

At a time when theology was beginning to take shape as an academic discipline, Peter Lombard was concerned chiefly with providing students with materials for discussion, rather than putting forward pioneering theological arguments of his own. His Sentences were commented on by the majority of theologians during the next few centuries, with the emphasis shifting as different issues became topical. It was not generally superseded by the Summa Theologiae of Thomas Aquinas until the 16th c.

GILLIAN R. EVANS

Peter the Venerable (1092/94–1156), abbot of Cluny*. His promotion of study in the Cluniac monasteries led to controversy regarding the role of possessions, including servants and land, with his friend Bernard* of Clairvaux, who wanted the monastic life to be one of prayer and manual labor. He also gave shelter to Abelard* while the latter was under attack by Bernard. He sponsored the first translation of the Qur'an* into Latin and wrote against both Islam and Judaism.

Petrarch, Francesco (1304–74), along with Dante* and Boccaccio, a founding figure of the Christian humanism of the Italian Renaissance*. His Christian allegorical interpretation of his ascent of Mount Ventoux near Avignon (1336; in Rerum familiarium) as a metaphor of the vita beata (blessed life) is particularly suggestive of the religious and specifically Augustinian orientation of his thinking. His Secretum is written as an intimate dialogue with Augustine* that develops the discovery of the interiority of the subject (a dimension of interior transcendence explored by Augustine in the Confessions, originally through his dialogue with God). At the same time, Petrarch secularizes the Christian outlook by interpreting this transcendence in a subjective and worldly register of thought and feeling, most powerfully in his lyric poetry (Il canzoniere). His poetry of love for Laura is replete with religious motifs translated into terms of a profane love pivoting on the affirmation of an autonomous (and ultimately empty) human self.

Petrarch was deeply affected by his brother Gherardo's entry into a Carthusian* monastery. His Latin humanist writings (notably De vita religiosa, De otio religioso, and De vita solitaria) probe the question of how to live in order to become happy and blessed, and are strongly tinged with a Christian ascetic* sensibility.

WILLIAM FRANKE

Petre, Maude Dominica (1863–1942), laywoman, author of 14 books and more than 90 articles, member of the Society of the Daughters of Mary (1890–1908), participant in an informal network of people concerned with renewal in the Roman Catholic Church, including George Tyrrell*, Friedrich von* Hügel, and Alfred Loisy*. The movement known as Modernism* was condemned by Pope Pius X (1907). When Tyrrell died (1909), Petre, his literary executor, edited and published a number of his works, including Christianity at the Crossroads (1909) and a two-volume Autobiography and Life of George Tyrrell (1912). One of the first to write a history of Modernism (1918), she refused to take the anti-Modernist oath; ecclesiastical censure deprived her of the sacraments in her home diocese. In her autobiographical My Way of Faith (1937), she described Modernism as “a movement of genuine Catholic believers . . . who held to their religious faith, and were endeavoring to answer their own difficulties as well as those of others.” Her life and writings reflect a critical approach to authority*, an insistence on spiritual independence, and respect for pluralism*.

ELLEN M. LEONARD

Pew, fixed wooden bench that seats a number of worshippers in a church. The use of pews began during the Middle Ages and increased after the Reformation, owing to the emphasis on preaching.

Pharisees (2nd c. BCE–1st c. CE), a group of Jews known for their meticulous observance of the Torah* according to the interpretive traditions received from their ancestors. This observance emphasized the proper sanctifying of the Sabbath*, full tithing*, and the application of the priestly laws of ritual purity to the preparation and consumption of the ordinary food that they ate each day apart from the Temple. The latter two concerns were reflected in the exclusiveness of their communal table fellowship. Many of their legal interpretations differed substantially from those of the Sadducees* and from the often more stringent ones of the Qumran Essenes*. The Pharisees did not separate themselves from society, but sought to reform society to conform to their understanding of divine law. Although the NT Gospels share some beliefs (including resurrection*) with the Pharisees, they mount some vehement polemics against what they portray as the Pharisees' self-righteousness and hypocrisy (e.g. Matt 23). These invectives, however, are tendentious reflections of 1st-c. tensions between sectors of the emerging church and Pharisaic Judaism, and should not be read as accurate generic descriptions of Pharisaic religion.

GEORGE W. E. NICKELSBURG

Phenomenology and Christianity were first connected through Hegel* (who popularized the term). Yet phenomenology is associated primarily with Edmund Husserl and Martin Heidegger*. Phenomenology is the science (logos) of phenomena (what is manifest or visible, from Gk phaino); it tries to ground all knowledge in what appears. Such an experiential foundation requires a “reduction” (Husserl), i.e. a turning off of our natural beliefs in an external world independent of experience and in all that we consider to be transcendent to our experience, including God. Phenomenology as a kind of atheism* echoes Nietzsche*, but it is consistent with Christianity’s belief in a God who is able to die.

Since phenomenology brackets out the transcendent, it is a philosophy of immanence*. But immanence is not alien to Christianity. The Incarnation* means that the transcendent God becomes a human who exists within (“immanent” to) our experience. Thus phenomenologists (especially Heidegger) attempt to speak of the divine within experience. But the divine always exceeds any experience of it and is therefore un-presentable, what we are not able to make appear. Similarly, when Husserl described the experience of the other, he recognized: I can never intuit the internal life of another; my access to it is always mediated. Yet Husserl recognized that experience consists in intentions determined in language; “meaning intentions” can be fulfilled with an intuition, which would make the meaning intention true. “Meaning fulfillment” has a temporal sense: the fulfillment is to come just as the returning Savior is to come; truth is promised in the future. Therefore, phenomenology can always be associated with the messianism that defines Christianity (and Judaism, as well as strains of Islam).

Messianism always implies waiting (see Messiah). Because we are not able to make God be present, we find ourselves always waiting. The image of Jesus returning “like a thief in the night” implies (as Heidegger noted) that we must be prepared; he may come at any moment, in the place called “home.” Taking up the idea of place, more recent phenomenologists (or “post-phenomenologists”) like Derrida and Levinas* have spoken of hospitality*. This is perhaps the most crucial intersection between phenomenology and Christianity. Beyond Husserl’s (and Merleau-Ponty’s) description of intuition as passive capacities, Derrida and Levinas tried to find ways to make these passive capacities active. That we must receive sensations is a sign of our weakness; we have no choice but to “turn the other cheek.” Yet this weakness is a capacity; we have the power to open the door as wide as possible; (passive) waiting becomes (active) welcoming. Welcoming is to be prepared for the coming of the Messiah*. LEONARD LAWLOR

Philemon, Epistle to, shortest and most personal Pauline letter, whose authenticity has never been doubted. Written to a Christian assembly (ekklesia) in the house of Philemon, Apphia, and Archippos, the letter is placed (by references in it) in the Lycus valley, near Colossae, mid-50s.

Since antiquity, the traditional interpretation has been that Onesimus is a slave* who has run away from Philemon’s house, has met Paul* in prison, and has been baptized by him (9–10). A more recent interpretation by Lampe suggests that he is not a runaway, but has gone legally to Paul for intercession. Another interpretation by Callahan is that Onesimus is not the slave but the abused brother of Philemon (16). Whatever the case, Onesimus comes from the household of Philemon, all is not well between the two men, everyone else in the assembly knows about the situation, and Paul intervenes to bring about reconciliation.

The letter is a masterpiece of deliberative rhetoric that gives a glimpse of real relationships and problems in a 1st-c. house* church. The institution of slavery continued to be accepted by Christians but was modified by insistence on just treatment and relationships. Paul probably intended that Philemon manumit (free) Onesimus, yet slavery remained part of the Christian household (Col 3:33–4:1; Eph 6:5–9).

CAROLYN OSIEK

Philip. (1) Name of one of the apostles (listed among the Twelve*; Mark 13:18, par.); Philip the Apostle, like Andrew* and Peter*, was from Bethsaida (John 1:43). (2) One of seven deacons* chosen to minister to the Hellenists* (Acts 6:5). He is often called “the Evangelist” because he visited Samaria* (Acts 8:4–8), baptized the Ethiopian* eunuch (Acts 8), and had four prophet* daughters (Acts 21).

Philip, Acts of (c4th c.). Composed of 15 numbered “acts” and a martyrdom story, written in Greek, it probably originated near Hierapolis, Phrygia. This text was familiar to the ascetic* movements of Asia Minor condemned by the Cappadocian* Fathers and the Synod of Gangra (mid-4th c.).

The majority of the text has been condemned for violating the orthodoxy of the time; however, the last part, the martyrdom story, has been detached, revised, and used as a liturgical document for the Feast of Saint Philip (November 14).

In this text, Philip* the Evangelist (Acts 6:5, 8:4–40, 21:8) and Philip* the Apostle (Matt 10:3, par.; Acts 1:13) are merged into one figure. Acts of Philip 1–7 are concerned with activities recalling the evangelist, which are presented in several cycles of stories of miracles and conversions. Acts of Philip 8–15 and the martyrdom story deal with the apostle's destiny, forming a single, long travel narrative from Christ's commission through Philip's martyrdom in "Ophyoryme," most likely Hierapolis, Phrygia. During this missionary trip, Philip is accompanied by his sister Mariamne, who is probably Mary* Magdalene, and, as in the synoptic list of disciples, by Bartholomew. Symbols* ("signs") of eschatological reconciliation, such as a leopard and the kid of a goat, both having been converted to the good news, accompany the apostolic procession.

This text is important for what it promotes: a spiritual type of encratism* (through purity one can see God); the idea that women can preach and baptize (with Mariamne/Mary Magdalene as the model); the offer of salvation to wild animals; and archaic forms of prayer (see Acts of Philip 1, reusing the hymn of Christ of the Acts of John).

FRANÇOIS BOVON

Philip, Gospel of, third treatise in the second Nag* Hammadi codex called the "Gospel of Philip," presumably because Philip is the only male apostle mentioned. Epiphanius* quotes from a Gnostic Gospel of Philip in Greek. The Coptic text shows affinities to Valentinian* Gnosticism* and may have been composed (c200) in Syria (some etymologies make sense only in Syriac). The Gospel of Philip, based on NT material, including John and Paul, seems to be a collection of excerpts or notes, progressively becoming longer. Nevertheless, some compositional threads run throughout the text. The opening paragraphs describe a way of conversion that leads from being a Gentile to a proselyte to a Hebrew to a true (Gnostic) Christian believer. A fine example of the reuse of canonical episodes is the figure of Mary* Magdalene, seen as the beloved* disciple and the true syzygos (spiritual twin?) of Jesus. Of interest is the sacramental* theology of the Gospel of Philip, which tries to find a middle course between the rejection of all material things and a ritual praxis that cannot do without them. Notable concepts include baptism* (cf. the metaphor* of God and Jesus as "dyers"), anointing* (who has received it "is no longer a Christian but a Christ"), and "the bridal chamber," possibly connected to the Eucharist* by the wedding feast metaphor.

HANS-JOSEF KLAUCK

Philippians, Paul's Letter to the, written during one of Paul's several imprisonments (1:12–14; 2 Cor 11:23), sometime in the 50s. Paul expresses appreciation for the financial support of the assembly he established in the Roman colony of Philippi, Macedonia (4:10–20). Although others question Paul's ministry (1:15–18), the Philippians remained loyal. Paul exhorts them to remain unified despite opposition (1:27–30). He cites himself as an example of someone who experiences joy despite difficulty (1:12–26, 2:17), as well as the examples of Timothy, his close colleague (2:19–24), and Epaphroditus, who has become seriously ill while visiting Paul on the Philippians' behalf (2:25–30).

Yet Paul depicts Jesus as the prime exemplar, using a striking early Christian hymn (2:5–11). Jesus abandoned heavenly glory and "humbled himself" on behalf of humanity, but has been exalted as the Christ. With this "Christ hymn," Paul encourages the Philippians; although suffering is the believer's lot (1:29), ultimate vindication is imminent. Thus Paul invokes eschatological traditions about the return of Christ. These traditions have a hortatory role, but also exemplify Paul's anti-imperial stance. Jesus is exalted as Lord (kurios) and Savior (soter), terms associated with the Roman emperor. In a context in which local authorities sought to placate their Roman overseers through the imperial cult, belief in Jesus as Lord and Savior caused conflict for Paul's followers. Paul calls these opponents of the faith "dogs" (3:2) and urges his followers to seek out a "heavenly citizenship" over against the coveted Roman citizenship (3:20).

The letter promotes a high Christology* to unify a conflicted community. Local leaders like the women Euodia and Syntyche are called to model that unity and heal personal rifts (4:2–3). All believers are called to a spirit of joy and excellence in moral virtue (4:4–9).

Traditional readings of this letter often focus on the Christ hymn as its central theological contribution, but the context of imperial domination has been highlighted more recently to show Paul's anti-imperial ethic.

EFRAIN AGOSTO

Philippine Independent Church, now called the Iglesia Filipina Independiente, prides itself on being a nationalist church and considers itself the only one that can teach Filipinos love of country. It is romantically viewed by its members as the "remaining tangible result of the Philippine Revolution" (1898), because its first leader was Gregorio Aglipay, a hero of the Revolution. In fact, the Church was instituted on August 3, 1902, by Isabelo de los Reyes, Sr., at a meeting of the Union Obrera Democratica, the first labor federation in the Philippines.

At first prominent laypeople and priests denied their involvement in the Church, but peasants, laborers, fishers, women, local elites, journalists, Protestants, and expatriates soon joined it. Gregorio Aglipay declined to participate in the Church leadership until October 1, 1902, when he signed the Temporary Constitution and Canons, becoming the first obispo maximo (supreme bishop). The Doctrinas y Reglas Constitucionales was adopted a year later (1903), stating that the Church was "Catholic as it considered all men [sic] equally children of God, but in that said universality, it accepts servility to no one." Shortly thereafter, at least 25% of the Filipino population had joined the Philippine Independent Church. Yet many refused to follow the Supreme Court's order (1906) to return church properties to their legal owner, the Roman Catholic Church, because many members of the Philippine Independent Church wanted to continue worshipping in what they viewed as their own sanctuaries. After Church membership declined to 14% of the population in 1918 and continued to decline until the 1960s, in part because of lack of trained clergy, it is once again rapidly growing; the Church claimed to have more than 4 million members in 2000.

Many of its songs and prayers implore the Almighty to allow the "rising of the joyful day of national freedom, independence and abundant life." The official liturgical book, the Oficio Divino (1906), was complemented by the Misang Parangal sa mga Bayani ng Himagsikan (Mass in honor of the heroes of the Revolution, 1910) and the Pagsisiyam sa Virgen ng Balintawak (Novena for the Virgin of Balintawak, 1926). Gregorio Aglipay later leaned toward Unitarianism*, but many bishops rebuffed him.

Under the leadership of Isabelo de los Reyes, Jr., the Church returned to mainstream Christianity when it adopted the Declaration of Faith and Articles of Religion in 1947, entering into relations with the Episcopal Church of the USA, and other churches in the Anglican Communion; this was the beginning of many other ecumenical endeavors. The priests of the Iglesia Filipina Independiente are now trained at St. Andrew's Theological Seminary, an Episcopal seminary, even as the Church maintains and recaptures its nationalist heritage. See also ANGLICANISM CLUSTER: IN ASIA: EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE PHILIPPINES.

APOLONIO M. RANCHE

Philippines. Christianity arrived with Ferdinand Magellan's expedition (1521; which included priests) and with Spanish colonization, which took place in earnest from 1565 until 1898 on this archipelago of 7,107 islands in Southeast Asia. In 1565 Augustinian* missionaries arrived, followed by Jesuits* (opening their first college in 1595, the Colegio de Manila) and Dominicans* (who established the Colegio de Santo Tomas [University of St. Thomas], 1611). From these beginnings, Roman Catholicism spread throughout the Philippines (with the exception of Mindanao, which remained primarily Muslim). Filipino Catholicism had a Spanish character even though, in periods of resistance, revolt, and ultimately revolution (1896) against the Spanish colonial power, there were moves to "Filipinize" the Roman Catholic Church. The Iglesia Filipina Independiente (Philippine* Independent Church) was created before the multiplication of churches that took place with the arrival of Protestant missionaries in association with US colonization (and neocolonization after World War II). These Protestant missionary churches would together form the United Church of Christ in the Philippines (UCCP). Subsequently, other churches were established: Filipino independent churches, including the Iglesia ni Cristo (Church of Christ, since 1914) and, after World War II, many Charismatic* churches.

The Filipino Geographical and Historical Context. The Philippines is an archipelago of 7,107 islands in four groups, from north to south: (1) the large island of Luzon, where the capital, Manila, is located; (2) the central Visayan Islands; (3) the large island of Mindanao; and (4) the Sulu Archipelago. The islands were under Spain for three and a half centuries (1565–1898) and then the USA (1899–1946); they became an independent republic in 1946. Japan invaded the islands in 1941 and imposed a harsh occupation, which ended in 1945 with a bloody campaign of liberation by US troops, which resulted in the massive destruction of Manila and other cities. Democratic government was suspended in 1972 when President Ferdinand Marcos imposed a dictatorship under martial law, but he was ousted by a bloodless “people power” revolution in 1986.

The population (c88 million in 2007), mainly from the Indo-Malay stock, includes a small semi-nomadic tribe called the Aetas, considered aboriginal, and a mestizo* populace evolving from trade relations with and colonization by Chinese, Japanese, Arabs, Spanish, and North Americans. While Filipino (mainly Tagalog) and English are the official languages, about 8 languages and more than 100 dialects are spoken.

Christian Origins and Development in the Philippines. The Philippines are now predominantly Christian. But when Christianity arrived with the Spaniards, it encountered both animistic people and Muslims (primarily in Mindanao).

Most precolonial Filipinos were animistic*. Their belief system included a world filled with spirits and supernatural beings. Ancestor* worship (or veneration) was practiced in many of the tribes, with the belief that the spirits of the dead continue to coexist with the living, albeit in another dimension. In some areas and among some tribes, specific supreme deities, such as “Bathala” among the Tagalogs, “Kabunian” among some Cordillera tribes, and “Magbabaya” in Bukidnon, were worshipped. Both women and men exercised spiritual leadership. Women priestesses and shamans*, known as babaylans, were especially popular in the Visayan Islands. Some have theorized that the strong attachment to the Virgin Mary* in the Philippines is a latent evocation of the regard for the babaylans, who were consulted by political leaders (chieftains and monarchs known as datus and rajahs).

Islam* predated Christianity in the Philippines. It first arrived with Arab and Malay traders and merchants (c1380) in the Sulu Archipelago. The first Muslim sultanate was established in Sulu (1450); later, other sultanates were established on the larger Mindanao Island (c1475). In the 16th c., a Muslim sultanate was already in existence in the Manila area under Rajahs Sulayman, Lakandula, and Matanda, when the Spanish conquistadores arrived. Spanish wars against the Moros (Philippine Muslims) progressively pushed them back, so that they became a minority in Mindanao itself (see Islam and Christianity Cluster: In Asia: The Philippines).

Ferdinand Magellan, a Portuguese navigator serving under the king of Spain, claimed the Philippine Islands for Spain*. The king of Spain was a devout Roman Catholic who recognized the leadership of the Roman pope in spiritual matters; hence evangelization was one of the justifications for colonizing the islands (see Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). But it was only after 1565 (Legazpi expedition) that the spread of Christianity really began.

The different religious orders were assigned to different parts of the country for the purposes of evangelization. (The same strategy would be adopted three centuries later by North Americans in spreading the Protestant faith in the Philippines, following what is known as the “comity* principle.”)

The Spanish friars were not only missionaries and evangelizers; they also played an active role in the Spanish pacification process. This gave rise to the saying commonly repeated at that time: “In every friar, the Spanish king had a captain and an army” (see Mission Cluster: Thematic Issues: Imperialism).

Despite the role of exceptional Spanish administrators and local priests, the Spanish response to the growing Filipino nationalism and religious consciousness came to be more oppressive and repressive.

The legacy of the Spaniards in the “Christianization” of the Philippines has been appropriately summed up by John England, Jose Kutianimattathil, John Mansford Prior, and Lily A. Quintos (Asian Christian Theologies, Vol. 2). That legacy was primarily religious syncretism* (or inculturation*). Under Spanish colonial rule, Filipinos in most islands “had experienced rapid ‘Christianization,’ along with widespread oppression and destruction of their culture.” But despite the widespread destruction of indigenous culture and religious practices (including native scripts and literature), “many Catholic practices blended well with indigenous myth, ritual and art-forms” that became vehicles for Christian practices. Conversely, “the best of Spain’s traditions in law and scholarship, in the arts and in devotion would continue to be valuable sources for Philippine society and church.”

Thus as several authors (England, Kutianimattathil, Prior, Quintos) emphasize, the Roman Catholic theology that evolved in the Philippines in the Spanish period was “a Catholicism that had come to blend elements of native animistic religion with the teachings of catechism.” They further observe that “the introduction of the Catholic cult of the saints*, many of the roles and functions of spirits still recognized in nature were transferred to the saints, while in ‘folk Catholicism’ the indigenous belief in a spirit world remained basically intact.”

Secularization Movement and Nationalism.

Filipino nationalism grew together with religious consciousness. Consequently, the Spanish response to the growing Filipino nationalism, a response that came to be more oppressive and repressive, deeply affected the Roman Catholic Church.

In the 19th c., as there were more secular* priests (i.e. priests who did not belong to religious orders), including more Filipinos, there was a movement demanding that these priests rather than the friars (i.e. regular* priests who belonged to an order and came from Spain) be assigned to the parishes. This secularization movement came at a time of growing unrest over Spanish rule and a growth of national consciousness. Three Filipino priests, all graduates of the University of St. Thomas, Fr. Mariano Gomez, Fr. Jose Apolonio Burgos, and Fr. Jacinto Zamora, headed the secularization movement, which also called for more liberal laws. In addition, Gomez, a parish priest in Bacoar, Cavite, founded a newspaper, La verdad (The truth), which described the deplorable conditions of the country and printed the liberal articles by Burgos. All these activities were viewed as hostile by the Spaniards, who called Gomez, Burgos, and Zamora Filibusteros and executed them by garroting (1872). José Rizal dedicated his second novel to them (El filibusterismo, 1891), and the martyrdom of Gomburza (an acronym of their three names) became a cause célèbre of the rising underground revolutionary movement, the Katipunan (from 1892). Another catalyst for the revolution was the execution (1896) of José Rizal, a leader of this revolutionary movement and a Philippine national hero, well known for his writings (including his first novel, Noli me tangere, 1887) advocating social reform.

On June 12, 1898, the Republic of the Philippines was born. It was a short-lived republic, however, for the USA, using the Spanish– American War as a pretext, took over the Philippines as its colony in 1898.

In the meantime, with the outbreak of the Philippine Revolution of 1896, there was a move to “Filipinize” the Roman Catholic Church. Upon the suggestion of Apolonario Mabini, the “brains” of the Katipunan, that an independent national church be formed, Isabelo de los Reyes, Sr., the leader of the first labor union of the Philippines (Union Obrera Democrática), initiated the creation of the Iglesia Filipina Independiente (1902; see Philippine Independent Church) and named Monsignor Gregorio Aglipay the supreme bishop. Aglipay, though reluctant at first, eventually accepted the leadership of the new church. Within a short time, the Philippine Independent Church constituted at least 25% of the Filipino population. The percentage declined until the 1960s, when it once again began to increase rapidly; the Church claimed to have more than 4 million members in 2000 (although the census identifies slightly fewer than 2 million), making it the third-largest church in the Philippines (after the Roman Catholic Church and the Iglesia ni Cristo [Church of Christ]).

In 1898, North American Protestants began arriving. It was clear that they supported the annexation of the Philippines by the USA and saw it as God-sent opportunity to evangelize.

Nationalism and the leadership of churches by Filipinos became thorny issues in the relationship between North American missionaries and Filipino converts. There were several schisms, which resulted in the formation of churches such as the Iglesia Metodista en las Islas Filipinas, a number of local churches that separated from the missionary-led churches, eventually forming the Iglesia Unida de Cristo and the Iglesia Evangelica Cristiana Independiente.

Iglesia ni Cristo (Church of Christ) is another national church, with exclusively Filipino leadership. Established in 1914 by Felix Manalo, it is known as a non-trinitarian church. Felix Manalo was baptized a Roman Catholic, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, transferred to the Christian and Missionary Alliance, and became a Seventh-day Adventist. Felix Manalo is believed by Iglesia ni Cristo adherents to be a messenger sent by God to reestablish the Church of Christ. While not adhering to the divinity of Christ, Eraño Manalo (who succeeded his father as the head of the Church) underscored in the Fundamental Beliefs of the Iglesia ni Cristo that the Church affirms Christ as the Son of God, a mediator, and the Savior who will return; his second coming will be “the great day when the Church of Christ will receive the reward promised by God – the everlasting home for God’s chosen people.” Thus the Church of Christ, which defines itself in contradistinction to the Roman Catholic Church, claims that there is no salvation* outside the Church of Christ, which demands strict discipline from its members – a “new life” requiring regular attendance at worship services and giving “thanksgiving offerings” to support the needs of the Church. To fulfill these obligations, “and to love one another as true brothers and sisters,” is to lay “a good foundation for the attainment of eternal life.” In addition to these fundamental beliefs is the conviction that each member should do missionary work, calling people to enter the Church of Christ, a social order parallel to that of the world. This explains its rapid growth, which is apparent from the proliferation of its distinctive church buildings (with narrow, pointed spires): it has an estimated 2–3 million members, according to the 2000 census (the Church does not publish statistics; other estimates vary from 3 to 10 million worldwide). The church owns and operates near Manila the New Era University, the New Era Hospital, and many other institutions; it publishes two magazines, Pasugo and God’s Message, and has its own radio and television stations. It is a powerful political force in the Philippines because of the “bloc voting” of all members in Philippine elections, following instructions from the leadership of the Church.

In culture, society, and religion, evidence of the “syncretism” that is a legacy of US colonization remains. Many aspects of Filipino culture and identity “further decline[d] in the decades of US control, despite positive advances in education, livelihood, and social welfare for sections of the Filipino people. Economic exploitation and cultural domination...also continue[d]” (England, Kuttianimattathil, Prior, and Quintos).

Ecumenical Movement among Non-Catholic Churches. The history of the ecumenical movement in the Philippines parallels and is linked with the history of the United Church of Christ in the Philippines (see United Church of Christ in the Philippines). The Evangelical Union formed by the missionaries in 1901 agreed to move toward the establishment of one, and only one, evangelical church in the Philippines. The formation of the United Church of Christ in the Philippines (as well as, earlier, the United Evangelical Church in the Philippines and even the Evangelical Church of the Philippines foisted on Christians by the Japanese) is a testimony to this ecumenical effort. But since not all of the Evangelical/Protestant churches joined the organic union, and many newer mission groups, which began arriving after World War II, did not adhere to or respect the comity* principle, a newer form of unity was sought that did not make organic union one of its main aims. There was also an attempt to attract the Iglesia Filipina Independiente (Philippine Independent Church) and the Philippine Episcopal Church into the ecumenical movement. This conciliar movement eventually formed the National Council of Churches in the Philippines (1963). The Council is the result of earlier attempts at unity, including the Evangelical Union (1901), followed by the National Christian Council (1929), the Philippine Federation of Evangelical Churches (1938), the Federation of Evangelical Churches in the Philippines (1942, wartime Japanese-sponsored federation), and the Philippine Federation of Christian Churches (1949).

Filipino Religious Psychological Makeup. Fr. Gerry Bulatao, SJ, writing in the 1960s, called the religious consciousness of Filipinos “split-level Christianity,” in that there seems to be one kind of behavior that Filipinos adopt for “Christian occasions” – e.g. attendance at Sunday Mass and celebration of religious holidays (for patron saints, Holy Week, Christmas) – and another kind of behavior for the rest of life (business dealings, politics, relationships with others); this is a way of living in two harshly conflicting worlds. “Split-level” can be defined as the coexistence of two thought and behavior systems within the same person or even within the same culture, without guilt, even though these two systems are inconsistent with each other. So while the Philippines prides itself on being the only Christian nation in Southeast Asia, it also is one of the most corrupt societies.

It is also because of this “split-level” mentality that Filipinos can be Christian and yet continue to practice customs and tradition that are steeped in animistic or ancestor* worship practices and belief systems; e.g., they can do a novena for a dead relative and, at the same time, set aside a meal and offer it in front of a picture of this relative.

Leonardo N. Mercado, SVD, writing on Filipino theology and Filipino religious psychology, observes that the sacred and profane are intertwined. God and spirits are often inseparable from planting and harvesting. Religious ceremonies are integral to agriculture, fishing, hunting, and everyday life. These are so blended, he observes, that anthropologists do not know how to draw the line between the social and the religious. He also noted that Philippine languages have no original or non-loaned world for “religion” or “sacred.” For him this means that Filipinos do not stress the distinction between the sacred and the profane, between grace and nature. See also ANGLICANISM CLUSTER: IN ASIA: EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE PHILIPPINES; HUMAN RIGHTS CLUSTER: AND THE CHURCHES IN ASIA: THE PHILIPPINES; ROMAN CATHOLICISM IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Statistics: Population (2007): 88 million. Christians, 92.5% (Roman Catholics, 80.9%; members of Iglesia ni Cristo, 2.3%; members of Iglesia Filipina Independiente, 2%, members of United Church of Christ, 1.2%; Evangelical, Charismatic, and other Christians, 6.1%); Muslims, 5%; others, 2.5%. (Based on 2000 Philippine National Statistics Office Census.)

REUEL NORMAN MARIGZA

Philip II (1527–98), king of Spain and supporter of the Catholic* Renewal. Son of Holy Roman Emperor Charles V and Isabella of Portugal; married (1543) Maria of Portugal, who died two years later while giving birth to their son, Charles; remarried (1554) Mary I of England. He reigned as king of Spain after the abdication of his father, Charles (1556). He inherited a powerful empire, including Spain, the Spanish Netherlands, Naples, and the Americas, which he attempted to expand through marriage and military campaigns. Roman Catholicism became an important tool in maintaining order in such a vast territory. He organized the Holy League (1560) – an alliance of Spain, Venice, Genoa, the Papal States, and other countries – to counter the threat of the Ottoman advance, culminating in victory at the Battle of Lepanto (1571) and stabilization of the Mediterranean region. His ongoing influence over the increasingly militant Roman Catholic Church in Spain is evidenced by his support of the reform of religious orders* throughout Spain; his attendance at public autos de fe of the Spanish Inquisition* (1559); his support of enforcing the decrees of the Council of Trent* in Spain; and his support of ongoing missionary efforts in the Americas. See also SPAIN; SPANISH EXPLORATIONS, CONQUESTS, AND MISSIONS.

GILLIAN T. W. AHLGREN

Philo of Alexandria (c20 BCE–c50 CE) is the most significant witness to the exegetical traditions and practices of the Diaspora* in Second Temple Judaism*. A member of an eminent family of the Alexandrian Jewish community, Philo had received both a good education in his ancestral traditions (either at home or in a school attached to a house of prayer) and a full Hellenistic education (gymnasium and ephebate and beyond, for advanced training in rhetoric and philosophy). He made at least one pilgrimage to the Temple in Jerusalem. He may have operated a private school of exegesis where he taught and wrote. He led the first Jewish delegation to Caligula following the pogrom that broke out during Agrippa I's visit in 38 CE (Embassy 370; Josephus, Ant. 18.257–60).

A prolific author, Philo wrote more than 70 treatises (about two-thirds have survived in some form). Philo wrote three series of commentaries on the Pentateuch. (1) The Questions and Answers works through the texts of Gen 2:4–28:9 and Exod 6:2–30:10. (2) The Allegorical Commentary is a series of consecutive treatises that emphasize the allegory of the soul in the interpretation of Gen 2:1–41:24. (3) The Exposition of the Law is a thematic commentary on the law that spans the entire Pentateuch. His two-volume Life of Moses was probably an introduction to the Pentateuch. He also wrote philosophical treatises (an arithmology, Numbers; two dialogues, Animals and Providence; a thesis, Eternity; and a discourse, Good Person) and apologetic treatises in the aftermath of the pogrom (Contemplative Life, Hypothetica, Flaccus, and Embassy).

Philo was not a systematic thinker but an exegete*. He read Moses largely through Middle Platonism*, although he incorporated Stoic* and Neopythagorean concepts as well. He used allegory* as a hermeneutic* to read his ancestral Scriptures* in terms of Hellenistic philosophy. He believed that both Moses* and Plato saw the same realities, but that Moses saw them more fully and clearly (Virtues 65). He represents the apex of the rich exegetical tradition of the Alexandrian Jewish community that began in the 3rd c. BCE and continued until the destruction of the community (115–17 CE). At some point before the destruction of the Alexandrian Jewish community, his works made their way into Christian hands. Christians not only preserved them, but later gave Philo a posthumous baptism and, in some circles, even thought of him as a bishop. His work was particularly important for Alexandrian* Christianity and those influenced by it.

GREGORY E. STERLING

Philokalia (Gk “Love of the Beautiful”), a collection of ascetic* and spiritual writings (between the 4th and 15th c.; compiled and published in the late 18th c.) by masters (including Gregory* Palamas) of the Eastern Orthodox* hesychast* tradition centered on Mount Athos*.

Philology, study of the way in which language* is used in literature through historical comparisons with earlier texts. Philology is applied to biblical studies mainly as a means of establishing the specific theological meaning of biblical terms.

Philosophy and Christian Theology. Literally “the love for wisdom,” philosophy is the discipline that deals with the most general characteristics and principles of things, also asking how these can be known and put into words. The use of human reason* and experience is authorized in the wisdom* writings in the OT and Apocrypha, and by a number of passages in the NT (Rom 1:19–20, 2:14–15; Phil 4:8; Acts 17:27–28), although these texts also suggest that human wisdom is based on and completed by divine wisdom. Many kinds of philosophy take their departure from religious myths, symbols, or doctrines, attempting to understand them in connection with more generally accessible human experience and reason. Still, philosophy is usually more careful in its methods and more cautious in drawing conclusions than the doctrine* and theology* of Christianity or other religious traditions.

In the Christian tradition, philosophy influenced theology in several distinct episodes.

1. Patristic Theology was influenced by Platonism*, often with the addition of Stoic* motifs. Justin* Martyr and the Logos* theology thought of God as the “Father and Maker” (Plato’s Timaeus 31b, 50d) who created the world by uttering the Word, identified with Plato’s “intelligible world.” This theme was important in the development of the doctrine of the Trinity*, along with determinative elements drawn from the Bible. Platonism also placed great importance on the human soul*, its quest for wisdom, and its need for divine illumination; these concerns are reflected in Christian thinkers like Origen*, Gregory* of Nyssa, and Augustine*. The Platonist heritage continued to be the primary one into the Middle Ages. This philosophical influence is assessed in different ways (see Patristic Thought; Patristic Thought in Orthodox Christianity; Platonism and Christianity).

2. During the Middle Ages the thought of Aristotle* became more influential. The simpler writings on logic (the so-called old logic) were supplemented by the “new logic,” more complex works dealing with syllogisms (early 11th c.), and then by the “physical books,” works that dealt with the nature of the world and its divine cause in a rational way, with little religious concern and without dependence on religious traditions (see Metaphysics and Christian Theology). Aristotle’s philosophy was the 12th- and 13th-c. “secular humanism,” a way of thinking independent of biblical revelation that had been introduced in Christian Europe through Arabic translations, interpreted by Muslim thinkers. The rediscovery of Aristotle stimulated both “natural philosophy” and “natural* theology.”

3. In the Early 17th Century a new approach to philosophy began with the natural science of Copernicus* and Galileo* (which questioned many features of Aristotelian physics) and the philosophy of Descartes*, which encouraged methodological doubt*, moving from the self to God to the physical world. While several 17th-c. theologians, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, were self-proclaimed Cartesians, Descartes’s approach tended to direct attention away from revelation toward rational* theology. British empiricists like Locke* and Hume* probed the extent of human knowledge, and Kant* argued that our understanding of the world is finally determined not by experience but by our own concepts, making it impossible to know God through the natural world.

4. Hegel (1770–1831) bridged the chasm between consciousness and the world that had been created in one way by Descartes and in another way by Kant. Hegel* asserted that the real is the rational, such that knowledge is being’s returning to itself. Hegel himself thought in terms of a pantheistic* development through which Spirit finally comes to itself in human art, religion, and philosophy. Theologians suggested a more orthodox approach in the doctrine of the Trinity*, for which God is always self-related and acts freely in creation* and reconciliation*. The priority of consciousness, both human and divine, was asserted in various kinds of “Personalist” philosophies (see Berdyaev, Nikolai; Marcel, Gabriel).

5. In the 20th Century there was a shift of attention away from metaphysics and toward human experience in phenomenology* and existentialism (see Bultmann, Rudolf; Kierkegaard, Søren Aabye), hermeneutics* (see Ricoeur, Paul), and linguistic philosophy (especially under the manifold influence of Wittgenstein*). These trends made a place once again for the role of belief and doctrinal traditions* in attempts to gain a comprehensive understanding of the human situation. Yet they were challenged by the more “deconstructive” analyses of language and experience linked with Michel Foucault and Jacques Derrida. Process* thought was also influential, especially in the USA. Taking seriously the evolutionary* understanding of the world, it thought of God as acting through “persuasion” rather than control, and it placed a new emphasis on God’s receptivity and sympathy as well as active influence on the world (see Process Theology). EUGENE TESSELLE

Philosophy of Religion. While theologians seek to clarify and defend religious convictions* (beliefs that are self-evidently true for believers), contemporary philosophers of religion seek to determine through critical analysis the extent to which these religious beliefs can justifiably be considered true.

For this purpose, philosophy of religion examines such issues as religious experience, religious ethics*, religion and science*, arguments for God’s* existence, divine attributes, personal immortality*, and world religions*. It also ponders specific topics, including the problems of evil* and theodicy*. How is it possible to justify the affirmation of a belief in the existence of an all-powerful, all-knowing, perfectly good God given the nature and amount of horrendous evil we experience in a world allegedly created and controlled by God? Religious diversity is another problem that has received increasing attention. Seemingly sincere, knowledgeable individuals continue to differ on almost every significant theological issue. But if this is so (not all grant that it is), under what conditions can proponents of a given perspective continue to justify their belief that their perspective is the correct one?

Philosophers of religion who start from Western Christian premises pay particular attention to two of God’s attributes: power and knowledge. Regarding God’s power, theological determinists (e.g. Leibniz, Piper) claim that God unilaterally controls all. By contrast, free will theists* (e.g. Wesley*, Hick*) claim that while God could unilaterally control all, God voluntarily gives up control when granting us true freedom*. Yet for Process theists* (e.g. Hartshorne*), who step out of these traditional Western concerns, it is inappropriate to conceive of God as possessing the capacity for unilateral control; while God contributes to the becoming of each event, God does so interactively, never coercively.

Regarding God’s knowledge, also starting from Western Christian premises, some (following Origen*, Augustine*, and the Jesuits* Molina*, Bellarmine*, and Suarez*) claim that God knows not only all that has occurred, is occurring, and will occur but even (with “middle* knowledge”) all that would happen, including what we would freely do, in every conceivable set of circumstances. Others (e.g. traditional Thomists*) deny that God possesses middle knowledge, although they do maintain that God knows all that will actually occur in the future, including what all humans will freely do. Open theists (e.g. Pinnock) deny that God knows infallibly what will occur in those future contexts involving free choice. Still others (e.g. Boethius*) are uncomfortable with any attempt to conceive of God’s knowledge in terms of our temporal understanding of past, present, and future. They hold that God’s knowledge, whatever its extent, is best understood as “timeless” (outside of time).

Historically, many Western Christian philosophers believed that such questions could often be settled conclusively by careful consideration of the relevant evidence (e.g. Aquinas*, Anselm*). But the majority of contemporary Western philosophers of religion now accept that there exist no neutral, non-question-begging criteria in relation to which competing belief claims on most, if not all, religious issues can be settled with certainty. Accordingly, among philosophers starting with Western premises, most current discussions of competing perspectives on religious issues center on what is necessary for justified belief. One group of contemporary Western philosophers of religion, reformed epistemologists (e.g. Plantinga), deny that positive evidence of any sort is necessary for a justified religious belief; a successful defense against negative evidence is sufficient. However, critical rationalists (e.g. Alston, Quinn), the majority of contemporary philosophers of religion, acknowledge that the continuing affirmation of one of these competing perspectives can be considered rational or justified, even in the absence of positive evidence convincing to all. But they also hold that, since what can seem true changes over time and since our beliefs have practical consequences, the relevant evidence for or against the relative value of a religious belief should always be critically assessed.

DAVID BASINGER

Philostorgius (c368–c439), Arian* historian, follower of Eunomius* who lived most of his life in Constantinople. His Church History deals with the period 300–430 from the Arian perspective and describes several of the leading Arians.

Phoebe, woman commended by Paul in Rom 16:1–2 to the letter's recipients; she was probably the bearer of Paul's letter to Rome and therefore its interpreter with full authority from Paul. He called her diakonos (servant, minister, agent) and prostatis (benefactor, patron). The term diakonos was also used figuratively in early Christian circles for ministers of the gospel (2 Cor 5:18) and was not gender specific. (Diakonia came to designate a more specific ministry in Acts 6:1, 2, 4.) As diakonos of a particular local church (Cenchrae, near Corinth), Phoebe was probably its representative; she is the only person in the NT named as deacon of a particular church. As a prostatis to Paul and many others, she was a provider of hospitality*, financial support, and networking. See also DEACON, DIACONATE; DEACONESS.

CAROLYN OSIEK

Phos Hilaron (Gk "Gladsome Light"), evening hymn sung in the Eastern Church, at least since the 4th c.

Photios (c810/20–c892/95), patriarch of Constantinople*. One of the most learned persons of his time, and a teacher at the university in Constantinople, the emperor made him patriarch while he was still a layperson (858). He compiled a (second) version of the Nomocanon (combining both canons of the church and imperial laws, affirming the close relationship between church* and state in the Eastern Orthodox Church). He was removed from office (867), reinstated (877), and once again forced to resign (886). He is remembered chiefly for his controversies with Rome and the equally strong minded pope Nicholas I. Photios challenged Rome's jurisdiction in Bulgaria*, denied the pope's right to approve the election of the patriarch, and condemned several Latin practices and beliefs (especially the *Filioque). The controversies of his time were revived with the schism between East and West (1054) and the failed attempts at reunion (1274, 1439).

Phyletism, the division of Christians into separate churches along lines of nation, race, or ethnicity. Condemned by the 1872 Orthodox Constantinople Synod.

B. MARK SIETSEMA

Pietà (Italian, "pity," "piety"), a representation, often sculptured, of Mary* holding Christ's dead body. The most famous is Michelangelo's in St. Peter's, Rome.

Pietism. Pietism is best known as a movement of spiritual and theological renewal within the Lutheran Church of Germany during the post-Reformation Era. It was chiefly represented by Philipp Jakob Spener* (1635–1705), pastor in Frankfurt am Main and later preacher at the court of Brandenburg/Prussia, Prussia in Berlin. This school of Pietism developed a comprehensive and massive program of education*, philanthropy, and world evangelization* under the leadership of August Hermann Francke* (1663–1727), theological professor at the University of Halle. Founded under the auspices of the emerging Prussian nation, Hallensian Pietism offered a revivalist*, spiritually transformative ethos* that would counter the influence of the Prussians' political adversaries. These were German nobles who, intent on preserving their traditional privileges, were allied to an intellectualized and socially stratified form of post-Reformation religious culture known as Protestant Orthodoxy. Francke's evangelistic, philanthropic, and educational program had a pervasive impact on all strata of Prussian society. It involved the education of youth from all social classes and genders, the deployment of the converted in massive Bible distribution, care for orphans, and the beginning of evangelistic missions* to populations beyond Europe. Funding came from the entrepreneurial efforts of converted Prussian laypersons. Both Spener and Francke had been influenced by the classic work of Lutheran devotional thought, the True Christianity of Johann Arndt* (1555–1621), pastor and superintendent at Braunschweig, who interfaced motifs from medieval German mystical texts with those from Lutheran doctrine.

Lutheran Pietism traces its inception to Spener's Pia Desideria (1675), which called for conventicles intent on personal spiritual renewal (the collegia pietatis). Influenced by his encounter in Geneva with the separatistic conventicles of the erstwhile Huguenot Labadie*, Spener believed that pastors could not effectively implement the Lutheran "priesthood of all believers" without enlisting the aid of consecrated laypersons. His work included a diagnosis of the corrupt conditions he perceived within the ecclesial and civil "estates," as well as the demoralized state of the general laity*. This critique was followed by proposals for correcting these conditions, including affective biblical preaching and relating sacraments to the “new birth” in Christ rather than administering them by rote, ex opere operato. Spener balanced justification* with sanctification*, understood to be the renewal of the image of God in the pardoned sinner*, effected by Christ through the indwelling Holy* Spirit.

Francke placed more emphasis on the active role of the human will* in effecting conversion* through heartfelt repentance*. Conversion must occur through human discernment and appropriation of God-given “hours of grace*.” One of his Halle students, Count Nicholas von Zinzendorf* (1700–60), developed an extensive missional focus based on adoration of the crucified Lamb of God. He transformed his inherited estate, within the territory of a Lutheran parish, into the Moravian* community of Herrnhut, of which he became a bishop, in the line of the venerable “Unitas Fratrum.” An authoritarian leader, he structured his community into “choirs” and instituted a rich tradition of hymnody and liturgy. Zinzendorf sought dialogue with disparate church traditions, although others tended to view the count’s intentions with suspicion. That became apparent in his abortive effort to unify the disparate Pennsylvania German sectarians into a “congregation of God in the Spirit.” Zinzendorf saw his missionaries, sent forth from Herrnhut under an intercessory prayer watch, as the seed of the gospel to be dispersed throughout the world. Their influence on the young John Wesley* was instrumental in that evangelist’s conversion, hymnody, and shaping of the class structures of Primitive Methodism*.

In Württemberg the focus on biblical theology reached its zenith in the commentaries of Albrecht Bengel* at Tübingen.

Parallels to Pietism can be traced among the Dutch and German Reformed, including the work of “precisianists” (William Ames, 1576–1633, and Jodocus van Londenstein, 1620–77) and federal theologians (Johannes Cocceius*, 1603–69, and Friedrich A. Lampe, 1683–1729), who replaced Aristotelian philosophy with logical reasoning based on scriptural premises (“Ramist* logic”) and the theology of the covenant. Underlying Pietism in the Reformed Church was the irenic impulse of the Heidelberg* Catechism (1563). Herborn Academy (established in 1584) was the center of Pietism in the Reformed Church in Germany.

Radical Pietists include the church historian Gottfried Arnold, author of an “unpartisan history of the church,” in which Arnold stated his preference for the legacy of uncoerced Christian mystics* over the Constantinian church tradition. Linked to the speculative theosophy* of Jacob Boehme*, including his desire to recover a lost androgynous humanity, radical groups proliferated (c1690–1750); among these were Millennialist* societies (Philadelphians) and sectarians (e.g. Dunkers, Ephrata* cloister) in the German Rhineland (especially the Wittgenstein region) and in Pennsylvania.

As a whole, Pietism, developing alongside the Enlightenment*, gave birth to awakenings*, world mission* and ecumenical* efforts, new denominations, and modern Protestant theology.
J. STEVEN O’MALLEY

Pietism in Scandinavia. With emphasis on conversion*, personal piety, Bible reading, and a committed life, Pietism* gained a foothold in Scandinavia, where it met and merged with domestic and Anglo-Saxon revivalism* and influenced churches and society from the 1680s to the present.

The way for Pietism in Scandinavia was prepared by earlier spirituality and books (Thomas* à Kempis, Arndt*). The influence of Spener* and Francke* came through direct and indirect contacts with Pietists in Germany (travels, letter writing, literature) and, after the Great Northern War (1700–21), through prisoners of war returning to Sweden-Finland from Siberia, where many had become Pietists. This moderate Lutheran Pietism won adherents among both nobility and clergy. The first missionaries from Scandinavia were Halle-trained Pietists sent from Denmark to the Danish colony in India. Moravian Brethren*, influenced by von Zinzendorf’s* evangelical Pietism, were sent to Lapland and Greenland. Pietists also promoted Scandinavian missionary* societies for both foreign and domestic mission and created social-work and educational institutions welcoming both men and women.

Because it questioned religious formalism and ritualism, Pietism became a target of state censorship. Though forbidden in both Sweden-Finland (1726) and Denmark-Norway (1741), characteristic Pietist conventicles continued. Separatist groups, opposed to the state church and emanating from early contacts with radical spiritual Pietism (Arnold, Dippel), were expelled from Sweden-Finland in the 1730s and 1740s. Egalitarian and individualistic, uniting “believers” regardless of gender or social class, and stressing individual piety and lay activity. Pietism was an early advocate of freedom of religion and ecumenical* approaches. As a result of domestic revival movements (in Norway*, Haugeanism; in Denmark*, the Inner Mission; in Sweden*, Conservative Pietism, Schartauanism, Rosenian Evangelical Pietism, and certain free churches; in Finland*, Old Pietism, Evangelism, Laestadianism, and neo-Pietism, all within the Folk* Church), Pietism has been and is a complex spiritual, sociological, and political force, theologically conservative, but sometimes politically radical.

RUTH FRANZEN

Pietism and Women. Laywomen and laymen played an active role alongside prominent theologians at the beginning of the Pietism Movement. There were so many women involved in the 17th c. that some supporters of Pietism saw them as a sign of divine grace expressing God’s favor for this reform movement, while opponents of Pietism, fearing disorder in the church and public life, saw them as a sign of decline. During the 18th c., the role of laywomen and laymen declined but remained significant.

Laywomen and laymen justified their involvement in Pietism mainly on the basis of the biblical and Reformation notion of the priesthood* of all believers. With this understanding of the Christian vocation*, differences in gender, social status, education, and profession lost their importance; all Christians were equal. Some Pietist groups simply combined traditional church structures and a renewed spiritual priesthood, so as to tamper as little as possible with the hierarchical order of priestly office and congregation. Spener* and Franke* belonged to this group. Others advocated a more radical version of spiritual priesthood (1 Pet 2:5–9) by connecting it with texts such as Joel 3:1, Gal 3:28, and 1 Thess 5:19. In line with the biblical and early Christian traditions, they insisted that there should be no restriction of women because of their gender at the ecclesiastical and social level. Gottfried Arnold was one of the prominent advocates of this position. This model, however, could also be considered to serve the interests of a new elite marked by a divine call rather than by gender, social status, or office. Johanna Eleonora Petersen advocated such an interpretation, seeing herself as someone directly called by God to bring God’s messages to her contemporaries.

The egalitarian beginnings of Pietism are apparent in the so-called collegia pietatis, typical Pietistic groups that discussed the Bible and the members’ faith experiences. In these meetings, mutual exchange was most important and was fostered through the Pietistic culture of letter writing and friendship*. In circles influenced by Spener, hierarchical structures were preserved even in such communication networks, whereas other groups experimented with new forms of friendship and living that partially overcame barriers of gender and social status.

Pietism spread in the period following the destruction of the Thirty* Years’ War (1618–48). The lower nobility, in particular women, who were receptive to this reform movement, had lost its economic and political influence. Of the women active in the early period of Pietism, the number of those who belonged to the lower nobility is striking (although we have very little information about women and men of the lower classes). Johanna E. Petersen, née von Merlau, is a good example of such a woman. Pietism stressed that education was required for a proper understanding of the Bible. Thus several Pietistic women acquired broad theological knowledge. Although the greater part of Pietistic literature was produced by men, women were also active. Besides spiritual lyric poetry and autobiographic texts, they composed theological works. In a time when scholarship was not yet considered to be the province of those with a university education, women who published poems and songs might also be thought of as scholars. This stress on the equality of all before God, on spiritual equality beyond boundaries determined by gender and social status, and the original impulse for reform were lost to a great extent with the consolidation of the Pietism Movement, which became theologically and socially conservative.

RUTH ALBRECHT

Pilate, Acts of, an extended account based on the canonical Gospels’ narrative about the trial, crucifixion, and resurrection of Jesus. It owes its name to the initial episode, in which the intriguing figure of Pontius Pilate* and his activities are elaborated on, as are those of Nicodemus* (thus it is sometimes called the Gospel of Nicodemus). Although Justin* Martyr and Tertullian* mentioned (but did not quote) such a work, the text we know from 12th-c. manuscripts (in two versions) apparently was written in the 3rd c. (Eusebius* mentioned a “forgery” of the Acts of Pilate) or later. By presenting Pilate in a more positive light than the canonical Gospels do, the Acts of Pilates attributes to the Jews greater responsibility for Jesus' death. See also ANTI-SEMITISM. DANIEL PATTE

Pilate, Pontius, appointed by Rome to govern Judea in 26 CE. Pilate maintained order with the 3,000 Roman soldiers whom he commanded, as well as with the help of the high priest who, as the official representative the people of Israel, cooperated with him as a prudent political strategy for the sake of the people. The Gospels are often read as absolving Pilate of guilt for ordering Jesus' execution. Scholars debate the issue, however, and it seems clear that in the period of the patristic writings directed against the Jews (the adversus Judaeos literature), early interpretations would have exaggerated any such tendencies in the Gospels. Both Josephus* and Philo* remember Pilate as an exceptionally cruel and provocative Roman official. See also ANTI-SEMITISM. NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Pilgrim, Pilgrimage (from Lat peregrinus; French pèlerin). The original meaning of "pilgrim" in the Greco-Roman world was "sojourner*," describing the status of Christians as citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem* (Gal 4:26; 2 Cor 5:6–7; Phil 3:20), not fully at home in the world, like Abraham before them (Gen 12:1–8; Heb 11:8–12). This meaning was preserved among Celtic* monks, for whom wandering for Christ was a way of self-denial, detachment, and reliance on God's guidance. The sense of not fully belonging has been revived in our own time, as indicated by the use of the term "sojourners."

After Constantine* and Helena*, pilgrimage came to mean journeying to holy places, first to Jerusalem (see Egeria*) and later to the tombs of martyrs, most notably those of Peter* and Paul* in Rome. Pilgrimage in this sense grew steadily during the Middle Ages, when Compostela (Spain) became a major destination; many Italian, French, and English cathedrals became pilgrimage sites because they contained famous relics*. Pilgrimage was one means of making satisfaction for sins in the sacrament of penance*.

The term also has broader connotations. In the framework of cultural anthropology, "pilgrimage" often has the character of liminality, separation from the ordinary and the achievement of a new degree of community and spiritual integration. Pilgrimage is often a metaphor for the inward journey toward God and eternal* life.

The Crusades* began as a form of armed pilgrimage to the Holy Land. The Age of Exploration was a secularized kind of sojourning or pilgrimage, justified by its professed goal of converting peoples to Christianity.

Both Erasmus* and the Reformation* criticized the abuses and superstitions* connected with pilgrimage. In modern times, pilgrimage is practiced mostly by Roman Catholics and Eastern Orthodox. Well-known destinations include Loreto (Italy), Lourdes*, and, in the New World, Guadalupe* Hidalgo; among the Orthodox, they include monasteries such as Mount Athos*.

In the contemporary world, mass pilgrimages function as acts of national penance, public testimony, or group identity. See also POPULAR CHRISTIAN PRACTICES CLUSTER.

EUGENE TESELLE

Pilgrims (North American). See PLYMOUTH BRETHREN; PURITANS, PURITANISM.

Pillars (Dutch, zuilen), in the Netherlands*, four subcultures (Liberal, Socialist, Protestant, Roman Catholic) that have their own clubs, news media, and political parties. Their cohesiveness began to decline in the 1960s.

Pisa, Council of (1409). The cardinals who had elected two rival popes called this council in order to end the Great* Schism (in the West). It deposed both popes and elected a new pope. The council failed to end the schism – there were now three popes – and its validity was questioned by many because it had not been convened by a pope. But it prepared the way for the Council of Constance* (1414–18), which resolved the crisis.

Pistis Sophia, a 3rd-c. Gnostic* "revelation dialogue" between Jesus, the risen Savior, and his disciples, which is preserved in a single manuscript, Codex Askewianus. The text, consisting of four books, seems to be a compilation of Gnostic teachings. Books 1 and 2 concern the repentance of the fallen Sophia and the deliverance of Pistis Sophia; Book 3 addresses how authentic knowledge is preached to the world and to whom the forgiveness of sins and access to the light are granted. Included later, Book 4 has a different dialogue setting; it reveals the punishments of evil archons and the divine mysteries by which the disciples can escape judgment*. In all of the books, Mary* Magdalene has a dominant role in the dialogues between Jesus and his disciples. This causes tension between her and some of the male disciples, especially Peter. ANTTI MARJANEN

Pius IX, Pope (1846–78), born Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti (1792) in Senigallia. He served as nuncio* in Chile*, ran an orphanage in Rome, was appointed bishop of Spoleto (1827), then of Imola (1832), and made a cardinal (1840). Although he was seen as having liberal sympathies and supporting Italian nationalism, his refusal to help drive Austria out of Italy (1849) turned Rome against him. When Rome fell to the forces of the new Kingdom of Italy, Pius became “the prisoner of the Vatican.” He oversaw the First Vatican* Council (1869–70), expanded Roman Catholic missions, and increased the centralization of the Church’s administration. His conservatism was displayed in the Syllabus* of Errors (1864). He was beatified* in 2000. MICHAEL J. WALSH

Pius X, Pope (1903–14), born Giuseppe Melchior Sarto (1835) in Riese. The son of a village postman, he studied for the priesthood (Padua), served in the cathedral of Treviso, and was made bishop of Mantua (1885) and patriarch of Venice (1893). His insistence on the rights of the church against the state (see Church and State Relations Cluster) led to a breakdown of relations with several countries. He backed a campaign against those accused of “Modernism*” within the Roman Catholic Church and focused on a renewal of the liturgical and spiritual life of the Church (e.g. allowing children of the age of reason [usually age seven] to receive Communion*). He began the codification of canon* law (completed in 1918). Pope Pius* XII declared him a saint. MICHAEL J. WALSH

Pius XI, Pope (1922–39), born Ambrogio Damiano Achille Ratti (1857) in Desio. He studied in Milan and Rome, and after ordination (1879) taught at Padua’s seminary. He was appointed librarian to Milan’s Ambrosian Library and to the Vatican Library (1911). He was named a prefect in 1914, and shortly thereafter was made a cardinal archbishop in Milan. As pope, he entered negotiations with the Kingdom of Italy over the Vatican (Lateran* Pacts, 1929), establishing the Vatican city-state. His encyclical* Quadragesimo Anno further developed Leo* XIII’s social doctrine, and his encyclical Mit brennender Sorge (1937), condemning Nazi atrocities, was smuggled into Germany. He was preparing an encyclical condemning the persecution of the Jews when he died. MICHAEL J. WALSH

Pius XII, Pope (1939–58), born Eugenio Maria Giuseppe Giovanni Pacelli (1876) in Rome into a family with a long tradition of papal service, chiefly as lawyers. Pacelli was ordained

(1899), assisted in the codification of canon* law, was named nuncio* to Munich (1917) and the Weimar Republic (1920), and was made a cardinal (1929) and secretary of state (1930). He was involved in negotiating the concordat* with Germany (1933). As pope, he maintained careful neutrality during World War II, leading to his being accused of keeping silence in the face of the Jews’ persecution. His encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943) encourages the scientific study of Scripture, although his Humani Generis* (1950) expresses alarm at current theological trends; he encouraged discussions between Roman Catholics and other Christians on theological matters. MICHAEL J. WALSH

Plainsong, or plain chant, unison vocal music, especially as developed in the Western or Roman Catholic Church. Changes of pitch are gradual, without large intervals; rhythms are free, followings the texts (the Mass*, psalms*, canticles*, and short traditional verses). This style of singing had Jewish roots and was influenced by the early Greek-speaking church. In the West, several different styles developed, with the Gregorian most widely used. The style was revived (19th c.) by the Benedictine* monks of Solesmes.

Plato. See NEOPLATONISM AND CHRISTIANITY; PLATONISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Platonism and Christianity. Christianity, as a social and intellectual phenomenon, began to impress itself on the surrounding environment in the late 1st c., largely as a result of Paul’s missionary travels. Yet it did not come to the notice of Platonist philosophers until much later.

The first philosophical influences on Christianity seem to be Stoic* rather than Platonist; in matters of ethics at least, Paul* seems to have been somewhat influenced by the flourishing Stoic school of Tarsus. Even the Logos* doctrine of the Gospel of John* is primarily Stoic, although it might have been influenced by a Stoicizing Platonism emanating from Antiochus of Ascalon (1st c. BCE) and mediated through the Platonizing Jewish philosopher Philo* of Alexandria (c20 BCE–45 CE). John’s Logos is, after all, the world-immanent representative of a transcendent God, which is not the case with Stoicism, where God is also immanent in the world and material (pure fire).

Only with the 2nd-c. Christian Apologists*, such as Justin* (c100–65), is some degree of engagement with Platonism discernible. Justin, a Hellenic intellectual, claimed in Dialogue with Trypho to have tried out all the philosophical schools, culminating in Platonism, before converting to Christianity. His ethical position remained primarily Stoic, advocating the extirpation of the passions, but that was also a position adopted by some Platonists (e.g. his contemporary Atticus) and maintained by Philo as the correct position for a wise person. In metaphysics*, Justin, again like Philo, adopted the originally Stoic (but now Platonized) doctrine of the Logos of God as a means of characterizing the role of Christ, while he adopted the originally Aristotelian (now also Platonist) view of God as Unmoved Mover, “remaining in his own place” above the universe.

Yet Justin was no crypto-Platonist. In Dialogue (Chaps. 3–6), he allows the Old Man to criticize both Platonic intellectualism (the view that only through intellectual activity can one attain knowledge of the truth and of God) and the doctrine of the eternity* and reincarnation of souls*. He also advances a consoling theory (first propounded by Philo and later taken up by the Alexandrian theologians Clement* and Origen*) that all Greek wisdom is derived from Moses; specifically, Pythagoras studied for some time with followers of Moses on Mount Carmel and passed on what he had learned, ultimately, to Plato, Aristotle, and the Stoics. This theory motivates Philo’s bold allegorizing* of the Pentateuch, and Christian thinkers’ allegorizing of the Prophets and the NT, especially the Gospel of John and the Pauline Epistles.

After Justin’s martyrdom (Rome, 165), his positions were taken up and greatly elaborated in Alexandria, by Clement* (c150–215) and Origen* (185–254). Clement exhibited a wide knowledge of Greek philosophy and adopted a good deal of Platonism in his many writings, on the same lines as Justin: a belief in the Platonic tripartite soul*, the extirpation of the passions, and the Christ as the Logos of God. But above all, there emerged in Clement the idea that Christianity is itself a philosophy, to be argued for rationally, and not simply accepted on the basis of faith.

This position was carried further by Origen* (who, unlike the previous two thinkers, was a Christian by birth, his father Leonidas having been martyred in 205). Of his many works, his commentaries on Matthew and on John are showcases of his allegorical method, while his treatise On First Principles is arguably the foundation of Christian philosophy. There he deals comprehensively with the natures of God*, Christ (as the Logos, and firstborn of the Father), and the Holy* Spirit, angelology, the soul*, and fate, providence, and free will*, presenting in all cases a doctrinal position deeply influenced by Platonism (including the Pythagoreanizing version of Platonism earlier propounded by Numenius of Apamea), but buttressed at every stage by proof-texts from the Bible.

Origen subsequently fell foul of the ecclesiastical authorities precisely because of certain of these Platonist influences. Specifically, he was condemned for subordinating Christ to God the Father as the “firstborn of all creation” (influenced by Numenius’s doctrine of the Demiurge as a secondary deity) and for holding not only that the human soul preexisted embodiment and might undergo a series of incarnations in order to work its way back to total purification, but even that the devil* himself would ultimately be saved, since the doctrine of eternal punishment seemed to him to derogate from God’s infinite goodness and power. For him, the Pauline tag “Christ will be all in all” signified the ultimate reassumption of all creation into the Divinity.

Platonism provided early Christianity with a strong philosophical underpinning, enabling it to commend itself to the wider intellectual world of late antiquity, but it also held within itself certain threats to faith*, which emerged in due course as heresies*. See also NEOPLATONISM AND CHRISTIANITY. JOHN M. DILLON

Plotinus (204–69 CE). See NEOPLATONISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Pluralism, Religious, and Christian Theology.

For most of Christian history, religious pluralism was not an issue. Early Christians understood their own religion to have superseded* Judaism* and surpassed pagan* religions. Those who did not share the Christian faith, or even a particular version of the Christian faith, were generally deemed to be outside God’s favor, despite some ambivalence regarding pagans such as Plato*, whom Augustine* called “almost Christian.” Cyprian’s* 2nd-c. dictum, “outside the church there is no salvation,” was the dominant Christian view, with several notable exceptions.

In 1076 Pope Gregory* VII stated that Christians and Muslims worshipped the same God in different ways, and in Dante’s* Divine Comedy (13th c.), virtuous pagans are given a place in Limbo*, just outside the gates of hell*. Mystic* forms of Christianity, e.g. Nicholas* of Cusa’s The Peace Between Different Forms of Faith (15th c.), envisaged reason* as a unifying basis of all religions, a theme also found in Enlightenment* figures. Gotthold Lessing's Nathan the Wise (18th c.) portrays Judaism, Christianity, and Islam as valid before God, each in its own right.

In the 19th c., history* displaced reason as the unifying force underlying religions. Hegel* developed an evolutionary theory according to which the various world religions are stepping stones of the Spirit to subsequent, more complete revelations, culminating in Christianity. Troeltsch* proposed a more fully developed historical view. Every religion, including Christianity, is molded by its context of place and time; every religion, including Christianity, tends toward forms of its own absoluteness. Troeltsch wrestled with the notion of Christian superiority, finding it in some sense through the personalism he identified with Christianity, but ultimately even this fell to the historical relativity by which each religion tends to see its own forms as superior and to use its own norms to evaluate the norms of others. Troeltsch, like Hegel, finally saw a transcendent God at work in all religions, but unlike Hegel, he could not view these religions as stepping stones to the one final religion. Each religion is final to its own adherents.

World wars and the rise of Barth's* neo-orthodoxy overshadowed Troeltsch's work. For Barth, Christianity in its deepest sense is not a religion; it is the revelation of God and thus stands outside all comparison with religions per se. But after World War II, theologians again raised the question of Christianity's place among world religions, usually in ways that made Christianity the norm by which all religions were judged. The most notable example was Rahner's* notion of "the anonymous* Christian" (1961). God, as the transcendent horizon of being, is present to every person, calling that person to righteousness. When persons respond to this call, the response is itself a yearning toward God that constitutes a "baptism by desire," making the person a Christian within the depths of his or her being, albeit unknowingly.

John Hick's God and the Universe of Faiths (1971) marks a universalism that decenters Christianity by positing a transcendent "The Real" to which all religions point and that some religions name God. Paul Knitter's No Other Name? A Critical Survey of Christian Attitudes toward the World Religions (1985) sparked a major interest in the issue, which moved it to a more central place in theological studies. Knitter gives a typology of three Christian approaches to religious pluralism: (1) exclusivism: asserting that other religions are not ways of salvation; (2) inclusivism: embracing other religions under the normative superiority of Christianity; and (3) pluralism: like Troeltsch, recognizing the historical nature of religions and the validity of each within its context. See also AFRICAN RELIGION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; CONFUCIANISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; DAOISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; HINDUISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; SHINTO AND CHRISTIANITY; SIKHISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

MARJORIE HEWITT SUCHOCKI

Plymouth Brethren, movement originating in early-19th-c. England and Ireland in reaction against the established church. In the 1830s, groups of Brethren gathered to restore the primitive practices and teachings of the NT church that they believed the Anglican Church neglected, including simplicity of worship and leadership based on spiritual experience rather than clerical title or education. Beginning in the 1840s, the movement divided into "Open" and "Exclusive" factions over membership standards and whether those outside the movement could receive Communion, which was offered weekly. Theologically, the Brethren emphasized biblical prophecy. A founder and leader was former Anglican minister John Nelson Darby*, whose Dispensationalist* interpretation of Scripture shaped Evangelical and fundamentalist* movements and influenced various writings from the Scofield Reference Bible (1909) to the popular Left Behind novels (1990s–2000s). Through devout missionary work, Brethren spread from the United* Kingdom to various European countries, in addition to Africa and India. In 2003, there were 86,000 Open Brethren living in the USA.

JAMES P. BYRD

Pneumatology, doctrine and discussion of the Holy* Spirit in relation to God, human history, and salvation.

Pneumatomachi (Gk "Spirit fighters"), those who denied (4th c.) the divinity of the Holy* Spirit. This question had been left unanswered by the Council of Nicaea*, and it was not explicitly debated until Eustathius* of Sebaste supported the position of the Pneumatomachi (373). The argument advanced by Didymus* the Blind for the divinity of the Holy Spirit was that the holiness of the church and of individuals must be grounded in divine reality. While the Council of Constantinople* (381) condemned the Pneumatomachi, it claimed only that the Spirit is “worshipped and glorified” with the Father and Son, not that it is “of the same essence.”

Pogrom (Yiddish, from Russian), organized violence against helpless people, especially Jews; a violent attack involving the destruction of property, murder, and rape perpetrated by local non-Jewish, often Christian, populations on Jews in the Russian Empire and in other countries. See also ANTI-SEMITISM; HOLOCAUST, JEWISH (OR SHOAH).

Poland. The distinctive features of contemporary Polish Roman Catholicism include its ability to resist laicization*, secularization*, and post-modern liberalism*. This became clear in the 1970s, a turning point in the relations between church* and state, when the totalitarian Communist regime in Poland started to decline.

1. Early Christianization (9th–14th Centuries).

Christianity arrived in the territories that constitute contemporary Poland in two ways. First, Methodius* (c815–85), the apostle to the Slavic people, converted the powerful prince of Wislica (Upper Vistula). The Slavonic liturgical language and the Methodian Rite survived in this region until the 11th c., but failed to influence nearby people and disappeared after the fall of the Moravian Empire (906).

Christianity next arrived among the Polany ethnic group ruled by the Piast dynasty, which ruled the Polish lands from the 9th to the 14th c. The population worshipped gods symbolizing forces of nature (e.g. Swarozyc, the sun, giver of life and material goods; Swietowid, related to war and fertility). Because the Polany territory was crisscrossed by trade routes, the first contacts with Christianity were missionaries who traveled with merchants. To strengthen his state, Prince Mieszko achieved political union with the Czechs by marrying the Czech princess Dabrowka, who arrived in Poland (965) “with a large retinue of clergy and laypeople.” She had a decisive influence on Prince Mieszko’s decision to accept Christianity from Rome; he and his court in Poznan were christened in 966. Thus Poland entered into the family of Christian nations, gaining military assistance from the West in its struggles against both non-Christian princes and the (German) Holy* Roman Empire, which was seeking to absorb Poland under the pretext of spreading Christianity. In the process, Poland was shaped largely by the Western, feudal* style of sacred princely power. Christianity eliminated polygamy*, forbade the killing of wives during husbands’ funerals (a common practice until then), and implemented as norms of social life the principles of the Ten Commandments.

The first known bishops, Jordan (968) and Unger, found it difficult to convince Polany people “to till the Lord’s vineyard.” They were missionary bishops with a see in Poznan under direct papal care (officially after c990). Through this direct connection with Rome, Prince Mieszko protected his nation against raids by neighboring Christian rulers and obtained permission to create a Polish archdiocese (independent of German dioceses).

The archdiocese was actually created in 1000 by Mieszko’s successor, Boleslaw Chrobry (the Brave) (992–1025), with the help of Adalbert (Wojciech, 956–97), a martyred missionary bishop and friend of Emperor Otto III. In 1000 Otto, together with papal legates, cardinals, numerous dignitaries, and rulers, made a pilgrimage to the grave of St. Adalbert, located in Gniezno (Central Western Poland). There the papal delegates announced the establishment of the Polish Archdiocese of Gniezno. The first archbishop, Adalbert’s brother Gaudenty-Razim, had three dioceses: Krakow, Wroclaw, and Kolobrzeg. During the meeting in Gniezno, Otto III placed on Boleslaw Chrobry’s head an imperial diadem, acknowledging him as an ally of the Holy Roman Empire and of the Papal State. A number of years later, Prince Boleslaw’s official coronation as king was a significant recognition by the Holy See.

King Boleslaw Chrobry valued the Western Church and did not spare any efforts to solidify the new faith in his lands and disseminate it beyond the borders of his kingdom. Monks were the primary propagators of the gospel. Three Benedictine* convents were established, in Trzemeszno, Tum, and Wislica (10th–11th c.). The Cameldolese brothers from Italy settled in Miedzyrzecze and led missions in Southwest Poland, ultimately successfully, after five of the brothers (including two Poles) were murdered. Their suffering was described by Bruno of Querfurt (Querfurt), who conducted missions among the Jacwingi (a Baltic ethnic group). He too paid for his activities with his life.

After King Boleslaw Chrobry’s death, Poland went through a political crisis, which led to a religious breakdown. Rivalry among potential successors was also a struggle between non-Christians (inside and outside the kingdom) and Christians (supported by the clergy). The clergy was almost completely wiped out. The Czechs invaded Poland (1039), destroying churches, including the cathedrals of St. Adalbert (in Gniezno) and St. Peter (in Poznan). The situation was finally brought under control by Prince Casimir (Kazimierz) (1038–58), who restored the nation and the Catholic Church. He reintroduced the population to Catholicism with the help of numerous clergy sent by his uncle Herman, archbishop of Cologne. Bishop Aron settled in the undisturbed diocese in Krakow, which, with a considerable library, became the center of cultural and intellectual life.

Casimir's efforts were continued by his son, Boleslaw Smialy (1058–79), who led the Polish Church to participate in Pope Gregory VII's reforms. By helping to install pro-papal kings on the Hungarian throne, Boleslaw Smialy gained numerous concessions from Rome, including a royal crown (1076), the reestablishment of the Archdiocese of Gniezno, and the creation of a diocese in Plock. But the murder of the bishop of Krakow (1079) ordered by the king abruptly severed the good relations with Rome. During the reign of Boleslaw Smialy's successor, Wladyslaw Herman (1079–1102), Poland and its church found itself in the German camp, enemy of Gregory VII's reforms, although they were finally brought into conformity by Herman's successor, Boleslaw Krzywousty (1102–38), and by the archbishop of Gniezno Henryk Kietlicz (1199–1219). The Polish Church was reborn through the efforts of German clergy, including, from the early 13th c., clergy emerging from the German settlers flowing into Poland. As a result, the Polish Church started to lose its Polish character. Except for the Dominicans, convents and monastic orders became so Germanized that Poles were not allowed to become members. Similarly the parish priests were Germans who did not know the language of their flocks. The archbishop of Gniezno, Jakub Swinka, corrected the situation, requiring at least a minimum knowledge of the Polish language by the clergy.

2. Christianity in the Commonwealth of Poland and Religious Tolerance (14th–17th Centuries). With the territorial expansion of Poland along the Russo-Polish and Lithuanian-Polish borders (including Ruthenia), many changes occurred, especially during the reign of Casimir the Great (1333–70). A Roman Catholic diocese was established in the borderlands of Przemysl (1340). Catholic missionaries, mostly from the mendicant* orders (Dominicans* and Franciscans*), flowed into Ruthenia, leading to the establishment of new dioceses in Wlodzimierz, Lvov, and Chelm and an archdiocese in Halych (1375), which was later transferred to Lvov (1412).

The king granted to Ruthenia freedom of religion for the Eastern Orthodox* (1351), appointing a metropolitan in Halych, with four Orthodox dioceses. The king also granted permission to establish a diocese to two groups of Armenian Miaphysites* in Lvov and Kamieniec Podolski, whose most visible monument was the Armenian cathedral in Lvov. The three groups of Christians coexisted with Jews – a freedom of religion that so far had been exclusively reserved for Catholics in Western Christianity. This was the beginning of "Polish religious tolerance," thanks to which Poland never experienced heretics* pyres or inquisitions*. This religious freedom was not caused by a lack of religious fervor; all of the faiths, particularly that of the Roman Catholics (who were socially and politically privileged), sought to increase their ranks.

Poland's great achievement in spreading Christianity was the conversion of Lithuania. The Piast dynasty ended with the death of King Casimir the Great (1370). Following much international intrigue, Jadwiga (Hedvig, in her native Hungarian), Casimir's 10-year-old relative, became "king of Poland" (1384) and married the ruler of Lithuania (and the lands of former Kievan Rus), Wladyslaw Jagiello. Following Jagiello's christening and marriage to Jadwiga, Polish missionaries started the systematic conversion of the peoples of Lithuania, beginning with the controversial campaigns of Teutonic* Knights from the 1230s. During her brief life, Queen Jadwiga was devoted to Christianizing Lithuania, founding churches, and promoting religious practices. After her early death (1399), King Jagiello created two dioceses in Lithuania, in Wilno (or Vilnius) and Miedniki. In the Polish-Lithuanian commonwealth, the distinctive Polish policy of religious freedom continued and applied not only to Roman Catholic and Orthodox Christians but also to Jews and Muslims (Tatars).

Church work was carried out through a network of parishes. The number of parishes in Poland grew from c800 in the 12th c. to more than 3,000 in the early 15th c., and to almost twice as many by the 16th c. This growth was interrupted by the Reformation, but starting again in the 17th and 18th c. Similarly, a well-developed network of Orthodox parishes continued to increase in the East; by the end of the 18th c., there were more than 9,000 Orthodox parishes in the eight dioceses of the Kiev Metropolitanate (see Ukraine).

The Roman Catholic Church also developed elementary schools in the parishes. At the end of the 16th c., more than 90% of parishes had schools; by the 17th and 18th c., education was widespread in urban as well as rural parishes. For a long time, teachers for these schools were educated at Krakow University (founded by Casimir the Great, 1364); education deteriorated after Casimir's death (1370), but was revived by Queen Jadwiga and her husband, Jagiello (1400). Later four additional institutions of higher education were established: the Academy of Poznan (1519), the Academy of Wilno, or Vilnius (1579), the Zamojsky Academy (1594), and the Academy in Lvov (1661).

The Reformation was slow to take hold in Poland because of people's respect for King Sigismund I. After his death (1548), a majority of the nobility and upper classes in the cities, mostly of German descent, joined the Reformation, although the Polish townsfolk and peasants remained faithful to the Catholic Church. The nobility preferred Calvinism* and its democratic structure, which was similar to the Polish parliamentary monarchy (there were more than 500 Calvinist congregations in Poland), to Lutheranism* (there were merely 140 Lutheran congregations, all of them in Wielkopolska, most conducting worship services in German).

Other Reformers arrived in Transylvania and Poland from Italy, fleeing the Inquisition* because of their anti-trinitarian views. With powerful Polish protectors, the Italians Francesco Stancaro (arriving in 1558) and Faustus Socinus* (settling in Krakow, 1579) rejected the dogma of the Trinity*, affirming that there was only one God and that Christ was the "son of God," not by nature but because God shared his divine power with him. Along with their sympathizers among the poorer Calvinist nobles, they became an independent Socinian movement, later called Unitarian*. The definitive break with the Calvinist Reformation occurred in 1562, as a result of both the Socinians' theological views and their social radicalism calling for the abolition of the death* penalty, pacifism*, and the rejection of private wealth*.

Another group of lay Christians and clergy led by Cardinal Jakub Uchanski proposed the creation of a national church, which King Sigismund II Augustus (reigned 1548–72) finally rejected.

The Roman Catholic Church in Poland was reinforced when the conclusions of the Council of Trent* were accepted by the king (1564), posing a threat to the other churches. After the king's death (1572), the Sejm (parliament) included in the oath taken by every elected king a provision that guaranteed permanent peace between the various churches. In this way, freedom of religion was extended to new religious groups. Yet in 1658 the Socinian Movement was refused protection under this law and expelled from Poland for betrayal of the state because it had sided with Sweden during the 1655–56 war. With this exception, during the 16th–17th c., Poland was a nation of religious tolerance, a nation without pyres.

3. The Catholicization of the Polish Commonwealth (Late 16th–Late 18th Centuries). In East Prussian towns (then part of the Polish kingdom), the majority of the population was Lutheran (in contrast to the rest of Poland, which was heavily Roman Catholic). In one of these Prussian towns, Torun, the sons of the local nobility were educated at a Jesuit college. A mob attacked the college, destroying the interior and desecrating its religious objects (1724). Local authorities (the Lutheran mayor and nine citizens) were condemned to death for not ensuring the safety of the Jesuit college. After their execution, the Prussian and Russian courts proclaimed that they guaranteed religious freedom (for Protestants and Orthodox, respectively) in Poland. Russian troops entered Poland under this pretext in 1725.

The Catholic* Renewal in Poland, starting with the king's acceptance of the Council of Trent, was promoted by the influx of new religious orders, particularly the Jesuits, who gained control of middle schools where children of the nobility were educated (including [former] Protestants). Intelligent and religious bishops who were more pastors than politicians exerted a great influence by encouraging the clergy and their parishes through theological writings, pastoral letters, and regular visits. By contrast, the churches of the Reformation declined and almost disappeared, except for the Lutheran churches in Wielkoposka and Prussian cities.

In the eastern portion of the Polish Commonwealth (Lithuania and Ukraine), the Orthodox churches were first placed under the control of Moscow. The fall of Constantinople to the Ottomans (1453) made Russia the world's only sovereign Orthodox nation. Russia had attained full ecclesiastical autonomy in 1589, with the election of the first patriarch of Moscow. But the Orthodox Church in Poland lagged far behind the Roman Catholic Church in the education of its clergy and in vitality. In this situation, encouraged by King Sigismund III, Catholic theologians (the Jesuits Skarga and Warszewski, as well as Frycz Modrzewski and Orzechowski) and bishops (Bernard Maciejowski, among others) advocated the unification of the Polish Orthodox Church with Rome. This was ratified in the Union of Brest*-Litovsk (1596) and accepted by both the metropolitan of Kiev, Michael Ragoza, and Pope Clement VIII, former papal legate to Poland, despite resistance in parts of Ukraine: two of the nine dioceses of Kiev (Lvov and Przemyśl) did not accept the Union until 1693 and 1700, respectively.

A similar union between the Roman Catholic Church and the Polish Armenians, again encouraged by the king, was resisted by Armenian clergy and elders but resulted in a Uniate Armenian Church in Poland, Moldavia, and Walachia, officially established in 1686.

In the late 17th and 18th c., Polish Catholic religious orders, the Jesuits (especially), Dominicans, and Franciscans (including Reformed Franciscans and Capuchins), developed rapidly. The Jesuits gained almost complete control of middle and higher education, and the mendicant orders contributed to parish work (especially in eastern regions).

4. Christianity in Partitioned Poland (1772–1918). The Enlightenment*, cultivated by the royal court and many bishops, led to the downfall of the nation, which was partitioned (1772–95) among Prussia, Russia, and Austria until 1918. Under pressure from the liberal European courts, Pope Clement XIV suppressed the Jesuits (1773–1815). In Poland their colleges were transferred to the Ministry of National Education, reformed in the spirit of the Enlightenment. But because of their educational function in the annexed Polish territories, neither Russia nor Prussia accepted the banishment of the Jesuits (although in 1820 Jesuits were expelled from Russia).

After the partition, Poles recognized that Roman Catholicism and the Polish language were the keystones of their national identity. The Roman Catholic Church was the only institution where the Polish language was used – in the liturgy, sermons, catechism, songs, customs, and religious rituals. Similarly, the cult of Mary* (“the Queen of Poland”), with its pilgrimages* in many locations throughout Poland helped retain Polish identity, as did the celebrations at different churches and sanctuaries associated with martyrs.

The national uprising against Russian occupation (1830–31), supported by most bishops, ended with Czar Nicolas I placing the Catholic Church under the control of the state, creating the Roman Catholic Ecclesiastical Collegium, leaving bishop positions vacant, curtailing contact with Rome, and, most significantly, liquidating the Uniate Church in Lithuania and Belorus by reintegrating 1.5 million believers into the Russian Orthodox Church (1830–38).

In the part of Poland under Prussian control, German bishops were rapidly installed in Polish territories. Yet some (such as the archbishop of Gniezno-Poznań, Leon Przyłuski, 1845–65) resisted this Germanization of the Church by maintaining the use of the Polish language in the Mass. Recognizing the bond between Roman Catholicism and Polish nationalism, the Prussians imprisoned or banished such church leaders.

In response to the Russian efforts to suppress the Polish desire for political independence, Poles initiated the “moral revolution,” i.e. massive participation in religious and patriotic observances during national anniversaries in Poland, Lithuania, and Belorus. Similarly, funeral services, such as that of the archbishop of Warsaw, Antoni Fijałkowski (1856–61), became religious and patriotic manifestations, resulting in this case in the imposition of martial law. With Poland under Russian control, this period was marked by the execution of clergy and their deportation to Siberia; the closing of monasteries; the interdiction of processions and pilgrimages; police surveillance of preaching and even of confessionals; the annulment of the relations with the Holy See; the interdiction to the bishops to attend the First Vatican* Council; and the abolition of all remaining Uniate churches in Poland (1871–75), despite the resistance of believers.

With the deep economic and social changes of the late 19th c. in Western Europe, a new group of extremely exploited people emerged – the workers in large industries. Pope Leo XIII's social* encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891) affirmed the workers' right to form Catholic labor organizations. At that time, Polish workers in Warsaw and Łódź followed what became the Polish Socialist Party (PPS, founded 1892) calling for the “equality of all citizens” and Polish independence. Rather than struggling against Christianity, the PPS included clergy, e.g. Fr. Jerzy Matulewicz (beatified in 1987), theoretician of Christian labor organizations, and Fr. Marcel Godlewski, organizer of secret labor groups, Straz (Guards), and the above-ground Association of Christian Labor. Fr. Wacław Blizinski organized a similar rural social movement.

In territories under Prussian control, Cardinal Przyłuski encouraged resistance to Germanization (*Kulturkampf) through the preservation of Polish and Roman Catholic possessions, and the application of Rerum Novarum to rural areas, also resulting in an economic awakening of the Wielkopolska region. This was achieved in part through the Organization of For-Profit Cooperatives* (Związek Spolek Zarobkowych, initiated by the clergy, especially August Szamarzewski, Piotr Wawrzyniak, and Kazimierz Zimmermann) and the journal Ruch Chrześcijańsko-Społeczny (Christian Social Movement). Archbishops Edward Likowski and Florian Stablewski also promoted the development of Christian social organizations in parishes. Similarly, in Galicia (under Austrian control), the priests developed education along with charitable work as an effort to prevent impoverishment, although the bishops of Galicia did not understand the importance of social action.

5. Christianity in Reunited Poland (20th Century). On November 11, 1918, Poland regained its independence. Although its territory was smaller, it expanded in the wake of uprisings and local wars (1920). In 1921 the population of Poland was 27.8 million, with 17.3 million Roman Catholics (62.2%). 3.3 million Greek Catholics (Uniate) (11.9%), 3 million Orthodox (11%), 1 million Lutherans (3.5%), and 2.9 million (10%) Jews. The Roman Catholic Church had three archdioceses: Warsaw, Gniezno-Poznań, and Lvov. The Greek Catholic Church (associated with the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church) had a metropolitan in Lvov. The Orthodox Church, emancipated from Moscow in 1922, joined the Warsaw–Wolyn metropolitan. The Protestants were organized into three churches: the Augsburg Lutheran, United Evangelical, and Reformed churches. In 1921 the Polish Sejm (parliament) guaranteed freedom of religion for all, although the Roman Catholic Church was “first among equals” and the relations between the Roman Catholic Church and the state were regulated separately by a concordat with Rome (1925).

Cardinal August Hlond, son of a miner, affirmed in a pastoral letter (1932) following Pope Pius XI’s encyclical Quadragesimo Anno that “the nation is for the citizens” and not the citizens for the nation. This criticism of totalitarian regimes was a basis for the call to social action to counteract poverty*. Cardinal Hlond promoted the development of Catholic* Action (legalized in Poland in 1934) to encourage the implementation of moral and religious principles in social life without regard for political parties. The bishops established the Social Council, which sought to delineate new directions for social action by the Polish Roman Catholic Church.

In 1939 two totalitarian nations, Germany and Russia, attacked Poland, occupying it for six years. The Catholic Church played a significant role in helping the nation endure, engaging in various forms of resistance by providing shelter, material assistance, as well as spiritual aid. Convents and parish churches either hid, or organized hiding places for, thousands of Poles and Jews, many clergy paying for these activities with their lives in Nazi extermination camps and Russian camps. Approximately 2,000 priests died at the hands of the Nazis (861 in Dachau). More than 500 priests were killed by the Soviets, and many priests and monks were forced to abandon their parishes and monasteries. The martyr of Auschwitz, St. Maksimilian Kolbe, a Franciscan from Niepokalanów, became the symbol of Christian love opposing totalitarian hatred. All of this took place in the midst of the unthinkable extermination of the entire Jewish population of Poland and of millions of Jews from other nations, Gypsies*, and other pariahs, as well as millions of Polish Christians (see Holocaust, Jewish [or Shoah]).

At the end of the war, Communist rule was established and enforced in Poland by the Red Army. Communists sought to legitimize themselves with the aid of clergy, although they severed the concordat with the Holy See (1945). They also sought to weaken the church from the inside-out, by instituting “patriot priests” and breaking up the solidarity among the clergy in the national church. The Communist rulers also sought to weaken the Roman Catholic Church by confiscating Church property (1950); establishing a state commissar as leader of Caritas, the Church’s charitable organization with 900 preschools, hundreds of orphanages, shelters, and walk-in clinics, supported primarily by donations from North America; closing seminaries and monasteries; banning religious orders; and characterizing Pope Pius XII as a Nazi sympathizer and the bishops as the backbone of the underground resistance against Communism. Cardinal Stefan Wyszyński's efforts to regulate the relations between the Roman Catholic Church and the Communist state led to an "accord" (1950) allowing the Roman Catholic Church to run the Catholic University in Lublin and seminaries; to have monasteries; to have chaplains in the army, hospitals, and prisons; and to teach religion in schools with "respect for the laws and authority of the state" (thus with many restrictions).

In the meantime, Stalin compelled the remaining Greek Catholic Church in Poland (and Ukraine) to become part of the Russian Orthodox Church (1946). Within the framework of the "repatriation" (1945–46), thousands of believers from the Przemyśl Diocese were resettled in the USSR or the "Recovered Territories" (1947). Estates left behind were confiscated. Similarly, the Orthodox Church in Poland was put under the control of the Moscow patriarch (1951) and became a compliant tool for the domination of Poland by the Soviets.

The Catholic bishops protested the ongoing breach of the "accord" by issuing a letter of protest (Non Possumus, 1953), emphasizing their own compliance with the "accord." A month later, Cardinal Wyszyński declared in a sermon, "Give to Caesar what is Caesar's and to God what is God's; but when Caesar sits on the altar we simply say: Forbidden!" The cardinal and several bishops were imprisoned. From prison (until 1956), Cardinal Wyszyński developed a program for a religious rebirth of the nation under totalitarian conditions. The cardinal walked out of prison as a national hero; through his actions, he prevented the useless loss of blood.

After a brief thaw, the Communists found two new areas of conflict with the Roman Catholic Church: the celebration of the 1,000-year anniversary of Christianity in Poland (1966), which the state wanted to be secular; and the proclamation by Polish bishops to the Germans, which concluded with the words "We forgive and beg for forgiveness," with the hope of improving relations between Poland and Germany. The state initiated a media campaign against this proclamation. During that time, the archbishop of Kraków, Karol Wojtyła, stood alongside Cardinal Wyszyński for 14 years. Karol Wojtyła became Pope John Paul II (1978), changing the Vatican's political stance toward the East and contributing to the collapse of the Communist system.

The union between Poland and the Roman Catholic Church over a span of 1,000 years (except for some of the periods noted) has been very powerful, during times of glory and downfall. The Church was especially close to the Polish people in times of crisis, when Poles could feel free to be Poles only in the churches. Conversely, the Polish people stood with the Church when it was threatened, attacked, or persecuted. Thus the Church emerged from such crises empowered and in solidarity with the Polish faithful.

Statistics: Population (2000): 38.8 million (M). Christians, 37.7 M; 97.4% (Roman Catholics, 35.7 M; Orthodox, 1 M; independents, 330,000; marginal Christians, 200,000; Protestants, 195,000); nonreligious, 1 M, 3%; Jews, 6,000. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

TEOFIL WOJCIECHOWSKI

Political Studies of Christianity, identification and interpretation of the relationships between Christianity and political ideas or actions; study of influences of Christian ideas and institutions on political life; study of relationships between religious and political values. Originating in early social scientific studies of religion, political studies of Christianity have increasingly dealt with political norms as well as political behavior.

In the early 20th c., Max Weber* and Ernst Troeltsch* pioneered studies that showed the influence of religious ideas on the sociology of religious organizations and the economic* life of society. Rejecting Karl Marx's* claim that religious ideas merely reflect material causes, Weber and Troeltsch insisted that religious ideas have political and economic consequences, although these consequences are often unintended. Troeltsch connected his "ideal types" of Christian community, which he identified as the church*, the sect*, and the mystic* types, to the political and economic actions of their members.

H. Richard Niebuhr* used this typological method to study the social effects of Christian belief, both in the USA and throughout Christian history. Reinhold Niebuhr* applied a less definite method, but was similarly concerned with the effects of religious ideas on political actions and was sharply critical of those who sought political implications of Christianity in utopian* visions of social transformation or idealized, nonhistorical accounts of Jesus' ethics*.

These political studies consider not only the effects of Christianity on political behavior, but the effects of Christian ideas on the normative ideas of political philosophers and political leaders. Like interpretative methods in sociology, political studies of Christianity attempt to identify connections between Christian beliefs and widely accepted cultural norms and values.

Recent political studies of Christianity by Glenn Tinder and Jean Bethke Elshtain have drawn on Augustine* and Martin Luther* to develop theoretical accounts of the limits of politics. Robert Bellah has identified key Christian ideas that play a normative role in US civil* religion, and he distinguishes its ideas of community from the predominant US individualism. Alongside these studies of normative political ideas, the emergence of politically conservative religious movements gives new impetus to empirical studies of how Christian beliefs influence voting patterns in the USA. Political studies of Christianity in the future will most likely make use of increasingly detailed methods of social and historical analysis to focus attention on particular local connections as well as the broad historical influences of Christianity on politics. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER; DEMOCRACY AND CHRISTIANITY; MARXISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

ROBIN W. LOVIN

Political Theology, theological interpretation of the source, meaning, and purposes of political society. All political theology begins with the absolute claims that the modern state makes for its role in human life. Conservative political theology supports the claims of the state against other historic powers and movements, while critical political theology rejects those claims in favor of a human solidarity that crosses all boundaries between states, social classes, ethnic groups, and other divisions.

After the religious unity of Western Europe ended with the Reformation*, modern states became the organizing centers of loyalty and identity. National churches, especially in Protestant countries, united faith and nationality, and many observers thought that the stability of this new order required religious authority* for the ruler, as well as secular power. Niccolò Machiavelli suggested that princes might make use of religious authority to secure their own positions. Thomas Hobbes developed an account of political power that made the sovereign the sole source of both religious and political authority, the arbiter of doctrine, as well as law. In its earliest forms, then, political theology took the religious authority that a united church once claimed over the divided realms of European princes and transferred it, not to the divided churches that ministered to increasingly privatized religious needs, but to an all-powerful state that claimed authority over every aspect of public life. Religious authority is not merely instrumental to the power of the state. It is a constitutive part of that power.

Philosophers speculated about political theology, but European states rarely practiced it. Most maintained a close relationship between church and state, such as the Prussian "union of throne and altar." Other countries, like the USA, experimented with an unprecedented separation of church and state or developed a civil* religion like those of postrevolutionary France or newly modernized Japan. Only in the early 20th c. did it become possible for conservative thinkers in Western Europe to propose political theology as an alternative to workers' revolutionary movements. Political theology affirmed the nation above the rights of individuals and the interests of social classes, so that service to the state became a religious act and not merely an obligation of citizenship. While political theology was not directly involved in the creation of National Socialism in Germany, it offered a way of thinking that readily supported Hitler's power (see German Christians).

Contemporary political theology takes approaches diametrically opposed to those earlier, conservative forms. Critical political theology probes the connections between political power and class interests, suggesting that the state is no more than an instrument of the wealthy* and powerful segment of the population. Jürgen Moltmann and Johann Baptist Metz make use of Marxist thought in this social analysis, so that their political theologies have more in common with socialism than with the anti-socialist affirmation of the state in previous political theology (see Marxism and Christianity). Critical political theology, however, is not an economic program. Its aim is to understand the actual political functioning of all institutions and movements, including churches, so that no partial, limited interest can present itself as ultimate, eternal, and necessary (see Idol, Idolatry).

Eschatological* political theology likewise opposes the absolute claims of political authority, but with the theological, rather than social, criticism. Oliver O'Donovan argues that Christians must view the state in light of the decisive setting aside of all human authority that had already begun with Jesus' messianic proclamation. Notwithstanding the weakness and division of the church in the modern world, political power must be understood theologically to be responsible merely for creating the conditions under which the church can fulfill its mission, rather than a bearer of religious authority in its own right. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER; DEMOCRACY AND CHRISTIANITY; LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER. ROBIN W. LOVIN

Polity, form of church government, varying greatly from one church or denomination to another, depending on their answers to several important questions.

Who Governs? The NT supports various polities: congregational* (Matt 18:17; 1 Cor 14:23), presbyterian (Acts 20:28; 1 Tim 3:5; 1 Pet 5:1–3), and episcopal* (Acts 20:28; Phil 1:1). By the late 2nd c., most churches had a threefold office: a single bishop* (see Monepiscopate, Monarchical Episcopate), assisted by presbyters and deacons*.

How Are Controversies Resolved? Disagreements between local churches were resolved through mutual consultation (Acts 15), and it became customary to call regional councils* or synods* of bishops to decide issues of doctrine* or discipline*. Councils often adopted canons* specifying beliefs, procedures, and penalties.

Is Authority “Structured”? The consecration of a new bishop required the presence of the metropolitan* and other nearby bishops. In addition, the bishops of churches founded by apostles* (traditionally Antioch, Alexandria, and Rome, then Constantinople as the “New Rome”) gained special authority in their regions. As the role of the pope* in the West increased, there was a countervailing emphasis on the authority of councils, with or without the pope (see Conciliarism).

What Is the Role of the State in Church Government? The first ecumenical* council, at Nicaea*, was called by Emperor Constantine* (325), and its decrees were enforced by him. The role of the emperor was similar for all seven ecumenical councils of the undivided church and was enshrined in the Justinian* Code, which became part of civil law in the West as well as the East. While this role was increasingly contested by the medieval popes, those who did not wish the pope to have sole supremacy in the church kept the role of secular rulers alive (see Erastianism; Gallicanism; Henry VIII; Marsilius [or Marsiglio] of Padua). During the Reformation*, German princes, Swiss cities, and English monarchs played a key role. But when Protestant churches were persecuted by Roman Catholic governments, they had to develop forms of governance totally independent of the state (see France; Scotland). Worldly power found a different role in the practice of patronage*: donors, landowners, and rulers expected to have a part in naming pastors and especially bishops.

What Role Do the Members Have? Administrative authority was vested increasingly in bishops, popes, and patriarchs. A more participatory style of governance developed in the monastic* communities and in the Lay* Piety Movement. During the Reformation*, these impulses bore fruit, sometimes within the congregation alone, sometimes in representative bodies that included laity* as well as ministers. The principle of the Reformed* churches was that no minister has authority over another except through election, usually for a fixed term of office (see Presbyterian Churches). This representative, or “synodal,” form of governance spread to the Lutheran, Anglican, and, with modifications, Roman Catholic churches.

Is Polity a Matter of Divine or Human Law? Debate within the Church of England (16th and 17th c.) raised the question of whether the office of bishop belongs to the “essence” of the Church or merely to its “well-being,” or perhaps is not necessary at all. This continues to divide Catholics (including Anglo-Catholics), who insist on episcopacy as commanded by God, from most Protestants, who take a more functional or pragmatic view of ministry and especially of polity, adapting it to the needs of the times. See also APOSTOLICITY AND APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION; CHURCH, CONCEPTS AND LIFE, CLUSTER: TYPES OF ECCLESIASTICAL STRUCTURES. EUGENE TESELLE

Polycarp (c70–c155/72), bishop of Smyrna; a leading figure in Asia Minor, acquainted in his youth with the mysterious John* and remembered in the next generation by Irenaeus*. He visited Ignatius*, who was on his way to martyrdom in Rome (c106–13), and received a letter from him. His own letter to the church in Philippi may actually be two letters, one accompanying a collection of Ignatius's letters (c110) and one warning against Marcionism* (c135). He visited Rome (c155–60) to defend the Quartodeciman* observance of Easter. Not long after his return, he was tried and executed; the account of his martyrdom is one of the first to survive and the first to mention the veneration of a martyr's relics*.

Polygamy and Christianity. In the African religious tradition, polygamy was an accepted institution of marriage among patriarchal* societies, while Christianity considers monogamy the only valid and recognized form of Christian marriage. Although the Anglican Church withheld baptism from polygamous households starting in 1888, inspired by pastoral concerns it reversed its stand; now baptism is open to members of polygamous households, although under conditions inspired by the monogamous ideal (Nasimiyyu-Wasike).

"Polygamy" commonly means the simultaneous marriage of one man and several women, what anthropologists would call "polygyny." In patriarchal traditional Africa, polygamy fulfilled various social purposes. First, as Mbiti shows, it was (as it still is) every man's ideal to increase the number of his wives (and children) in order to gain and expand "immortality*" for that family. Children were the glory of marriage; a childless marriage was considered meaningless and pushed the man into polygamy (Nasimiyyu-Wasike). Second, the purpose of polygamy was (and still is) to produce male progeny. In patriarchal societies, male children were much more highly valued than female children. Third, in both agrarian and pastoral cultures, production depended on the number of hands available to help; several wives and many children were necessary to work the fields, tend the cattle, and increase the wealth of the man of the homestead. Fourth, strict gender division of labor was maintained by taboos; thus the first wife asked her husband to marry more women to assist her with the workload. Fifth, in some societies women outnumbered men; polygamy ensured that all women would be under the protection and guidance of men: as daughters under their fathers, as wives under their husbands, and as old and widowed women under their sons. Unmarried or childless women were considered incomplete.

Although polygamy is still practiced throughout Africa, the factors on which traditional polygamy was based have drastically changed as a result of the economic transformation of small farms to large machine-operated farms, and of nomadic pastoral life to life in irrigated settlements; it has also changed because of urbanization and industrialization and the greater number of poor and homeless people. Polygamy has always been the privilege of rich men who can afford bride-wealth, but their number is decreasing.

Some Christian ethicists seek to justify polygamy by emphasizing its socioeconomic dimensions. But its religious dimensions cannot be ignored. The institution of polygamy favors men and reduces women to subservient and inferior status, contrary to God's will. Christian marriage* by definition is monogamous and indissoluble. The Bible, particularly the OT, contains stories of polygamy. But rather than interpreting these stories as normative (as certain African* Instituted Churches do), they may read them as warnings and criticism (Gen 16 and 21; 29:30–31; 37; 2 Sam 14; Judg 9:5; Kgs 11:1–4). Furthermore, the metaphor* of marriage that runs through the Scriptures is one of monogamy. For instance, in Hosea, Israel is implored to be faithful to the marriage covenant* with her husband, God; in the NT, Jesus Christ is the bridegroom and the church his bride (Rev 18–22). Thus, against polygamy, most Christians affirm monogamous marriage as the ideal, indeed as a divine gift requiring those who receive it to form a lasting union (Mbula). If a polygamous man sought Christian baptism, he was advised to put aside all his wives but one. This is still the practice among many Christian denominations, including the Roman Catholic Church. Yet, as stated earlier, the Anglican Church has a different approach, as do many African* Instituted Churches. See also FAMILY, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER; MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF, CLUSTER.

ANNE NASIMIYU WASIKE

Polyglot Bibles, Bibles in which the text is written in several languages, in parallel columns. Origen's* Hexapla, with the Hebrew and several Greek translations, is the earliest example. Bibles with Greek and Latin, Greek and Coptic, and Latin and Gothic survive from antiquity. The most famous such Bible was the Complutensian Polyglot, prepared under Cardinal Ximenes*, with the OT in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and the NT in Greek and Latin. Others were subsequently published in Antwerp, Paris, and London.

Polytheism, belief in or worship of more than one deity, widespread throughout the world, perhaps reflecting the multiple powers that influence human life and nature. It was practiced by Israelites, although it is condemned by biblical writings, e.g. the first of the Ten* Commandments (Exod 20:3) and many statements by the prophets. Although Judaism and Christianity are monotheistic* religions, the belief in angels* and demons*, and the veneration of saints*, may be remnants of, or replacements for, polytheism*. The Christian belief in the Trinity* has also been perceived to be polytheistic.

Pontifical, relating to a pope. See also POPES, ROMAN CATHOLIC, AND THE PAPACY.

Pontifical Biblical Commission, body of Roman Catholic scholars appointed by the pope, created by Leo XIII (1902) and reorganized by Paul VI (1971). Until 1971 members were cardinals* with 40 consultants. Until 1933 the decrees confronting Modernism* favored traditional exegesis* over scientific approaches; in 1955 these were declared superseded. Indeed, after 1934 the commission was constructive and gave much freedom to biblical scholars. Starting in 1941, it published documents favorable to historical criticism, including one on the historical truth of the Gospels (1964), which encouraged “form-criticism” (see Bultmann, Rudolf). Since 1971 the Commission has consisted of 20 scholars, with the prefect of the former Holy* Office as president; it issued five documents, including a well-received statement on the practice of interpretation of the Bible in the context of the Roman Catholic Church (1993). See also BIBLE INTERPRETATION CLUSTER: HISTORY OF.

MAURICE GILBERT

Pontificals, liturgical books in the Western Church containing texts for the ceremonies used by bishops (e.g. confirmation*, ordination*, consecration of churches).

Poor. See POVERTY CLUSTER; PREFERENTIAL OPTION FOR THE POOR.

Poor Clares, the Second Order of Franciscans, authorized by Francis* of Assisi with Clare* of Assisi as first abbess (1215) in Italy. Clare’s Rule, approved in 1253, focused on the necessity of poverty*, as did the 15th-c. French Colettine reform. Devotion to the Passion and imitation of Mary* as the compassionate mother* were key to the Clarissan vocation from the beginning. Authors addressing communities of Poor Clares, such as Bonaventure*, recommended a spiritual life focused on humility, obedience, and contemplation of Christ’s humanity. Medieval Clarissan authors Battista da Varano and Catherine of Bologna described spiritual lives nourished by visions and focused on elevating God and distrusting the self. The relative importance of enclosure versus a Franciscan ideal of absolute poverty was contested by Pope Gregory IX, Urban IV, and the male Franciscans who oversaw the new convents. The 16th c. led to greater control of the convents by male Franciscans and a return to the Urbanist Rule. Although monasteries and convents were closed down in England during the Reformation, the Poor Clares saw a revival in the 19th-c. Anglican Church. The Roman Catholic version was transplanted to North America after its suppression in Italy (late 19th c.).

JESSICA A. BOON

Popes, Roman Catholic, and the Papacy. “Pope” (Gk “father”) is a title applied to the bishop of Rome, particularly with respect to his role as the center of communion of the Roman Catholic Church. The term was regularly used for bishops throughout the early Christian world from the 3rd c. When Greek ceased to be a common language of Christianity, “pope” was increasingly applied only to the bishop of Rome; Gregory* VII (11th c.) instructed that it be limited to him. It is, however, still also used for the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria.

It was early acknowledged that the Roman Christian community played a special role in the Catholic Church. However, it is difficult to demonstrate that there was a single presiding bishop in the capital of the Roman Empire until the mid-2nd c. Clement* of Rome, anachronistically called bishop of Rome, wrote a letter (c96) to the Corinthian Christians regarding a dispute, but he did so as if he were the secretary presenting the advice proffered by the whole Roman community. Clement could intervene in the affairs of the Corinthian community because of the special position that the Roman community had within Christianity, owing to its two apostle* martyrs*, Peter* and Paul*. While neither founded the church in Rome – Paul’s letter to the Roman Christians was written to a church he did not personally know – the presence of the apostles provided an all-important direct contact with the preaching of Christ, similarly claimed by the major churches of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch. Of the two, Peter was more important for the subsequent claims of the bishopric of Rome, because he was chief or “prince” (princeps) of the apostles (a term that apparently came into use in the late 4th c.). Christ commanded Peter to strengthen the faith of the brethren (Luke 22:32) and said to him, after the Resurrection, “Feed my sheep” (John 21:16–18). Most significant for papal claims were Christ’s words to Peter (Petros-petras, “rock”) at Caesarea Philippi, “You are Peter and upon this rock I will build my church” (Matt 16:18). Pope Stephen I (254–7) fell back on this verse in an acrimonious letter to Cyprian* of Carthage.

Rome was the Apostolic See* – a term apparently first used by Pope Liberius (352–66) – par excellence. Since the late 4th c., the title “vicar of St. Peter” has been applied to Rome’s bishop. Liberius’s successor, Pope Damasus (366–84), therefore objected when Canon 3 of the Council of Constantinople* (381) declared, “Because [Constantinople] is the new Rome, the bishop of Constantinople is to enjoy the privileges of honor after the bishop of Rome.” Similarly Pope Leo* I (440–61) rejected Canon 28 of the Council of Chalcedon* – a council that otherwise reflected papal views – because it made Constantinople’s point even more explicitly: “We issue the same decree and resolution concerning the prerogatives of the most holy Church of the same Constantinople, new Rome. The fathers rightly accorded prerogatives to the see of older Rome, since that is an imperial city; and moved by the same purpose the 150 most devout bishops [at the Council of Constantinople] apportioned equal prerogatives to the most holy see of the new Rome.”

This contradicted the papal ideology* that presented the Roman bishop as the heir to Peter. For example, Irenaeus* of Lyons (c140–c202) put Peter and Paul at the head of his succession list of Roman bishops. Conveniently, he named 12 bishops between Peter and the current pope, recalling the 12 apostles. The sixth one was suspiciously called Sixtus. This papal ideology was backed by liturgical celebration. By the early 4th c., there were two feasts of Peter: June 29, for Peter and Paul, apparently entered the Roman calendar just after the time of Pope Stephen I; February 22 celebrated the “Chair of Peter.” This odd title, a term used by Cyprian, evokes the role of teacher.

Some who challenged this ideology denied that Peter was ever in Rome and that the papal claims therefore rested on a historical fiction; this claim was initially presented during the 16th-c. Reformation and has since been frequently repeated. It is true that there is no direct literary evidence of Peter’s presence in Rome, although 1 Peter* sends greetings from “Your sister church in Babylon” (1 Pet 5:13), where “Babylon” can only be Rome. But not only do early Christian writers, such as Clement (late 1st c.), take it for granted that Peter was martyred in Rome, the archaeological evidence seems conclusive: Peter was buried under what became (in the 4th c.) St. Peter’s basilica. The cupola, which bears the words, “You are Peter and upon this rock I will build my church,” is immediately over the saint’s grave, located beneath the papal altar.

It is one thing to claim special prerogatives, but quite another to persuade others to accept them. As the clash between Pope Stephen I and Cyprian of Carthage demonstrated, other bishops, especially in the West, thought it proper to refer to the bishop of Rome controversial issues, such as the rebaptism of those baptized by heretics, which Cyprian favored and Stephen opposed. The case of Pope Siricius* (384–99) is particularly illuminating. The bishop of Tarragona submitted to Siricius’s predecessor a number of questions on canonical matters. Siricius responded by drawing attention to his role as the heir to Peter and then gave his rulings. In doing so, he requested that the bishop pass on his decisions to neighboring provinces* of the church. These decisions were couched in authoritative language, like decrees issued by imperial administration. The Pope was legislating for the whole church, or at least for the church in the West.

It would be impracticable to attempt to document the gradual extension of papal authority fully. For much of the 10th c., for instance, the office was in serious decline until it was rescued by the German emperors. Papal authority was much advanced by the imposing figure of Innocent* III (1198–1216), who laid claim to the plenitudo potestatis (fullness of power) over the “whole Church”, which he encapsulated in the use of the title “vicar* of Christ” rather than the traditional “vicar of Peter.” Perhaps papal authority might be said to have reached its apogee under Boniface* VIII (1294–1303), who claimed in the bull* Unam sanctam* (1302) that no one could be saved unless subject to the papacy (see Salvation).

Meanwhile the papacy had become not just a spiritual power, but a temporal one as well, controlling a great swath of land across the middle of Italy and elsewhere, specifically the Comtat Venaissin surrounding Avignon. Successive popes resided at Avignon rather than in Rome (1309–76). When Urban VI was chosen (1378), the election was disputed and an antipope was elected who went back to live in Avignon, thus beginning what came to be known as the Great* Western Schism. From 1378 there were two popes claiming authority over the Church, and from 1409 there were three (the third was appointed by a council in Pisa). The schism was resolved by the Council of Constance (1414–18), where Martin V (1417–31) was elected by a conclave* of cardinals* and representatives of the five “nations,” or language groups, present at Constance. Constance also produced decrees asserting the authority of councils over popes (Haec sancta) and demanding regular councils of the Roman Catholic Church to govern ecclesiastical affairs (Frequens).

The Conciliarist* Movement, represented by these two decrees, presented perhaps the greatest theoretical challenge to its authority the papacy had ever faced. There would be further councils, but summoned by reluctant popes and under pressure from the emperor. It was fear of Conciliarism* that contributed to the papacy’s hesitation to summon a council to address both Church reform and those doctrinal matters in dispute with the Protestant Reformers. The Council of Trent*, meeting spasmodically from 1545 to 1563, finally addressed both topics, and the papacy emerged with its authority enhanced and with a far better structure for governing the Church. The cardinals – who in the Middle Ages had often thought of themselves, if not as an alternative authority to the pope, at least as co-governors with him – were divided among various congregations. These congregations were to, and still do, consider various aspects of the Church’s life – e.g. the liturgy and the preservation of doctrine – but the cardinals henceforward were not to meet as a “college” (although the label “sacred college” is still applied to them) except on the most formal occasions. Their only significant role as a college now is to elect a new pontiff, although individual cardinals play an important role in the administration of the Roman Catholic Church worldwide.

During all this time, the Papal States had survived. Although temporarily overrun during the Napoleonic Wars, they were restored – with the exception of Avignon – at the Congress of Vienna. During the mid-19th c., however, papal territories were gradually eroded as the Kingdom of Italy came into being. Rome, the capital of the Papal States, fell in 1870. As the pope’s temporal authority declined, his spiritual authority increased, in part through the developing concept of the magisterium (teaching authority). Earlier, this term had been used for the teaching of theologians, but in the 19th c. it was applied to bishops and, particularly, to the bishop of Rome. More recently, it has tended to be reserved for papal teaching authority, usually exercised through encyclicals*. Papal authority was given more systematic expression at the First Vatican* Council (1869–70), which defined the pope’s infallibility*, in formal teaching concerning faith or morals, and his primacy over the whole Roman Catholic Church. In a sense, these doctrines were not new. As already pointed out, Rome had had a certain primacy since the Church’s beginning, and even infallibility had been discussed since the late Middle Ages. But in the context of the pontificate of Pius* IX (1846–78), and the extremely conservative set of propositions in his Syllabus* of Errors (1864–80), the last of which claimed that it was anathema to believe the pope should or could accommodate himself to modern civilization, the definitions of Vatican I, including its declaration of papal infallibility*, aroused considerable opposition within and outside the Roman Catholic Church. To be fair to Vatican I, the fall of Rome brought the Council to an abrupt conclusion. It could be argued that its teaching was not completed until Vatican* II (1962–65), whose perspective was that papal authority was to be monitored by all bishops for the well-being of the Church.

Nonetheless, in the meantime, papal authority had expanded greatly, aided not least by the increasing speed of travel and communication since the mid-19th c., by the expansion of Roman Catholic missionary activity, and by the Vatican’s almost total control over the appointment to bishoprics around the world.

MICHAEL J. WALSH

POPULAR CHRISTIAN PRACTICES CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Popular Christian Practices Popular Christian Practices in Eastern Orthodoxy

2) *A Sampling of Contextual Views
and Practices*

Popular Christian Practices in Africa
Popular Christian Practices in Asia
Popular Christian Practices in Asia: China
Popular Christian Practices in Australian Aboriginal Contexts
Popular Christian Practices in Latin America: Brazil

Popular Christian Practices in Latin American: Mexico

Popular Christian Practices in Latin America: Native Traditions in Mexico

Popular Christian Practices in North America

Popular Christian Practices in Western Europe

See also INCULTURATION CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Popular Christian Practices. Expressions of popular Christianity are present in abundance in virtually every context. Some are visible as dimensions of popular media, while others function among devotees, within families, or as personal manifestations of faith. What makes such expressions “popular” is less the demographics than the initiative and energy; they come from “ordinary people” who are not employed by or working on behalf of ecclesiastical institutions or bodies. Studies of popular religion often highlight polarities: clergy–laity*, official–unofficial, ecclesiastical–extraecclesiastical, elite–marginalized*, and formal–informal, the second term in each case indentifying what is “popular.” But if the initiative for a particular religious perspective or practice comes from outside ecclesiastical structures and significantly influences the members, it is clear that popular religion can arise inside faith communities as well as outside. Popular Christianity was often what survived in countries where official expressions of Christianity were forbidden or persecuted. Historical investigation shows the richness, complexity, and multiplicity of religious expressions, as well as the ways in which religious perspectives are shaped by competition among forms of Christianity. Popular Christianity is often related to a specific locale (e.g. a rural or urban area; house* churches; base* communities), is resistant to change (anti-modern) or embraces change (countercultural), is experiential rather than doctrinal, is syncretistic* or involves self-help strategies, is attentive to the role of the supernatural in one’s personal life (e.g. miracles* or apparitions), is focused more on activity than on theology (ritual practices, festivals, pilgrimages*), is anticlerical regarding religious authority*, and thus readily embraces dissent. See also ANCESTOR VENERATION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; BLACK MADONNA; FÁTIMA; LOURDES; MARY, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER; SYNCRETISM. DALE A. JOHNSON

Popular Christian Practices in Eastern Orthodoxy. Orthodoxy is an incarnate faith. The doctrinal and ethical teachings, the canonical discipline, and the liturgy of the Orthodox Church have penetrated the practical, everyday things of life, its activities, enterprises, and relationships. Daily prayer and an ordered system of fasting are essential expressions of Orthodox life, as are quiet acts of charity, since nothing and no one must escape the concern of the Church and its members.

The Euchologion, the Church’s official service book, contains, in addition to the sacramental rites and other sacred services, prayers for every need and circumstance, including blessings for women in childbirth and for newborn infants; for the sick, the frail, and the dying; for sowing and harvesting; and for the protection of persons and communities from the devastation of fires, floods, earthquakes, civil strife, foreign invasion, epidemics, and all manner of calamities. The Church embraces everything and everyone, in order to bring all things within the realm of salvation. Blessed water (see Holy Water) is sprinkled over persons, animals, and things as a sign of God’s transforming power and the ultimate transfiguration of the world. Special services are used for blessing new homes, the start of a new school year, and the establishment of new enterprises. Blessings are bestowed on new cars, tractors, plows, fishing boats, airplanes, ships, spacecraft, and every other kind of vehicle or instrument that serves the needs and occupations of people. Making the sign* of the cross over things and over one’s own body is an act of silent prayer and a confession of faith.

Homes have a designated prayer space where Scriptures* are read, cherished icons* are kept, a vigil lamp burns, and incense* is offered to accompany personal and family prayers. Wedding bands are worn on the right hand, and marriage crowns are kept in an honored place in the home. Newborn infants and their mothers are “churched” (see Churching of Women) on the 40th day after birth. Name days are faithfully observed and families regularly submit to their priest the names of family members, living and deceased, for prayers on their behalf, accompanied usually by an offering of bread, wine, oil, or flowers for use in the divine services. Although attending divine services in casual dress is unthinkable, an air of intimacy characterizes the assembly. The church calendar with its cycle of feasts and fasts, and especially the Sunday liturgy, the solemnities of Holy Week, and the splendor of the paschal feast, permeates the social and cultural fabric of personal and communal life.

ALKIVIADIS CALIVAS

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Popular Christian Practices in Africa. See AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES CLUSTER; AFRICAN RELIGION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

Popular Christian Practices in Asia. The Roman Catholic and Protestant churches in Asia inherited Western Christian practices, and Eastern and Oriental Orthodoxy in Asia was guided by the practices of Eastern and Oriental churches. However, as the Christian faith took root in Asian cultural contexts, these received practices were altered and/or replaced by local cultural practices, although Protestants have been more cautious and slow to adopt local cultural practices. Folk practices in Asian Christianity offer, as elsewhere, a dynamic of difference in the definition of Christian identity. Certain practices are rejected to highlight the difference between Christians and other religionists, while others are adopted to signal the difference between Asian Christians and other Christians in the global context. A few examples from India illustrate these points.

Folk Practices Linked to Rites of Passage. In certain parts of India, girls go through a series of traditional rites of passage, which are observed and blessed by the churches. Thus the celebration of puberty with local rituals is combined for Christians with a visit by the pastor and a prayer service at home. Weddings incorporate several rituals related to local cultures, e.g. the wearing of the thaali (wedding chain) by the bride, and the wearing and exchanging of garlands. The arranging of marriages also has a local cultural flavor. Endogamy (marrying within one’s subcaste) is observed by many Christians in India. Some follow rules concerning auspicious times during which weddings are to be held. Christian funerals carry many local cultural customs and practices, e.g. a festive meal with the local community at the end of 16 days of mourning, thus giving a central role to community relationships.

Liturgical Practices that come from the former religious traditions of the converts are incorporated into church liturgy. The Church of South India includes, in its wedding liturgy, the ritual of the couple’s taking seven steps toward the altar during the singing of Ps 128, reflecting a local practice among Hindu couples to symbolize their seven vows.

Various Festivals of the surrounding culture are observed by Asian Christians, even as new Christian festivals are created to prevent converts from reverting to their former religion; e.g. church anniversary celebrations in South India resemble similar festivals in local Hindu* shrines.

The appropriation of folk practices both raises serious theological issues regarding the relation between Christianity and local culture* and provides a fresh understanding of the catholicity of the church.

M. THOMAS THANGARAJ

Popular Christian Practices in Asia: China. When missionaries approached the Chinese people, they encountered a culture with rich and varied religious traditions, beliefs, practices, and organizations. Charismatic* Christians in China (commonly called “Pentecostals”), in particular, have many practices and beliefs that are surprisingly similar to those of Chinese folk religions.

The influence of Chinese folk religions on Chinese Christianity was limited until 1949, when the Chinese Church was isolated from world Christianity, and Chinese Christianity survived totally on its own. In this unfavorable atmosphere, the Christian theological education of preachers was totally disrupted, most preachers receiving no theological training at all; thus Christians understood Christianity with the resources they had, namely from the perspective of Chinese folk religions. When Christianity experienced enormous development following reform and an open door policy, the theological education of clergy fell far behind. As a result, while Christianity filled the spiritual gaps left by ancient folk religions, it was itself deeply influenced by folk religion traditions. "Folk Christianity" arose. Its followers include primarily poorly educated farmers who believe in God but regard God as one who has the direct power of karma, exorcises* evil spirits, and intervenes in answer to prayers* in proportion to a believer's offering. The concept of reciprocity is strongly held. A phrase commonly used to praise a Chinese god is youqiu biying, "infallibly granting requests for favors." Almost identical terms are used in the Christian environment of the church. Healing*, or more accurately the widespread belief in it, is one of the most important factors in the spread of Christianity in the 1980s. Calling on spiritual beings for healing and exorcism* has long been a core feature of Chinese religious life. Its Christian version requires a new orientation of believers, but is not a radical innovation. Folk Christians believe particularly in miracles* and treat the Bible as the sacred book on which their faith relies, although most of them cannot read it (see Scripture). They further indigenize Christian ethics* by worshipping God in church while often venerating their ancestors* at home and closely associating their belief in Christianity with their holistic hope* for the family's happiness, health, and longevity. Their religious ritual includes joyfully singing spirit songs, performing spirit dancing, and praying aloud.

Folk Christianity can be viewed as marked by superstition*, yet it accounts for the large number of inculturated* Christians in rural areas of China. TAO FEIYA Popular Christian Practices in Australian Aboriginal Contexts. See ANTHROPOLOGY CLUSTER: AUSTRALIAN ABORIGINAL THEOLOGICAL ISSUES.

Popular Christian Practices in Latin America: Brazil. Popular Christian practices originated in the medieval Catholicism brought from Portugal* in the midst of the colonial enterprise. Because of this origin, Brazilian Catholicism came to have a primarily lay* and social character. Owing to the scarcity of priests, lay brothers and friars predominated, and still do. Because of the need for social ties among widely dispersed residents, popular devotions have a social function; as collective devotions, they encourage the development of social ties (which are otherwise missing), both during festivals (Christmas, patron saint festivals, June folk festivals) and during the "path of penitence" (Holy Week) (see Roman Catholicism Cluster: In Brazil: Colonial Period).

The Centrality of the Cults of Saints. The central element of each of these popular devotions is the cult of a saint*, which is not limited to saints canonized by the Roman Catholic Church. The saint is always a protector, worshipped through his or her icon*, which for the devotee is not a mere representation, but an embodiment of the very presence of the saint. It is to the icon that the faithful bring presents and decorations, ask for blessings, and make vows. Sometimes devotees inflict punishment on themselves when they fail to fulfill their vows. The saint is kept in the oratory of a chapel, which devotees visit.

The Leading Shrines in Brazil. These include the shrines of Our Lady of Aparecida of the north, with her majestic basilica in homage of the patron saint of Brazil, of Good Jesus of Lapa in Bahia, and of the Divine Eternal Father in Goiás and in Ceará, the pilgrimage* center in Juazeiro devoted to Fr. Cicero (Cicero Romão Batista, 1844–1934), the most popular saint in the country (about 2 million pilgrims visit the center each year).

In these centers, worship is characterized by a devotional relationship with the saint in the form of petitions and the fulfilling of vows, such as the vow to ascend the steps of the sanctuary on one's knees. Each shrine has a "miracle room," where devotees leave ex-votos* (objects, photos, or sculptures of feet, hands, arms, heads, representing the parts of the body that have been cured) as a testimony to the grace granted by the saint.

The administration of these shrines is in the hands of the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church, even though in most instances these saints are not officially canonized. Consequently, at times conflicts erupt between the Church and common devotees, when the clergy seeks to discourage what it considers to be manifestations of fanaticism and superstition* in popular devotions.

The People's Saints. The people choose saints among persons in whom they perceive virtues associated with Christ himself, such as sacrifice, intense suffering, and dedication to the next life. A saint is in heaven with God and therefore has supernatural powers. The people's saints may be priests or nuns, or humble people, thieves, prostitutes, slaves, pious women, children, and at times imaginary people. Many are worshipped at their tombs, and are therefore known as "cemetery saints," but also through statues and cards in people's homes and copies of prayers that are kept in wallets and purses.

Notable among these popular saints are Fr. Cicero, Br. Damian, Sr. Dulce, the slaves Antoninho and Anastácia, the simple woman Nhá Chica, the girl Odetinha, the prostitute Jandira, the bandit Jararaca, and the legendary Negrinho of Pastoreio. See also BRAZIL.

MARCELO AYRES CAMURÇA

Popular Christian Practices in Latin America: Mexico. Popular Christian practices vary with the contexts in which they take place. Depending on the kind of devotional group, popular Christianity involves person-to-person relations and social and religious ties (friendship*) or person(s)-to-community commitments to communal service related to religious icons and shrines (stewardship). Examples of such devotional organizations include groups devoted to St. Jude Thaddeus, to various local icons, statues, or shrines of the Holy Child, Christ, or the Virgin.

The locations of shrines, church buildings, or cathedrals are frequently associated with pre-Columbian sacred places. For instance, the Virgin of Guadalupe* Tepeyac (whose shrine is in the hills near Mexico City), the Virgin of San Juan de los Lagos, the Virgin of Zapopan, the Virgin of Juquila, the Christ of Chalma (near Cuernavaca), the Christ of Cubilete, the Holy Child of Atocha in Fresnillo, Zacatecas, and the Santo Niño Doctor in Tepeaca, Puebla, are all located at or near pre-Columbian sacred places. Yet other patterns exist, especially in the Xochimilco region, where there are no definite shrines. The several statues or icons of the Holy Child (Niñopan, Niño de Belem, Niño Dormidito, Niño de San Juan) and of the Pietà* (Virgen de Dolores) are moved from home to home, each household assuming in turn responsibilities for the devotion.

Fixed or mobile feasts are peak moments of popular religiosity, whether they are national or local, related to the liturgical calendar or not. The feasts of Wise Men's Day (January 6), la Candelaria (Candlemas, the presentation of Jesus at the Temple; February 2), Ash Wednesday and Holy Week (variable dates), Children's Day (April 30), the Holy Cross (May 3), Corpus Christi (variable), Santiago Apóstol (July 25), St. Jude Thaddeus (October 28), All Saints and the Day of the Dead (November 1 and 2), Virgin of Guadalupe (December 12), las Posadas (celebrating Mary and Joseph's quest for lodging; December 16–24), and Christmas (December 25). What is celebrated on these feast days varies. The Day of the Dead (el Día de los Muertos) deserves special mention; it preserves magical-religious traditions of pre-Columbian origin, including giving food, beverages, and flowers to the souls* of the deceased, who come back to enjoy these gifts. The first day of this two-day celebration is for deceased children and lonely souls (who have no descendants to give them gifts); the second day is for deceased adults.

Rituals are performed to establish or fulfill commitments made before religious icons, including "petitions" to express what one needs, oaths as formal commitments to set aside time for devotion, and offering to do certain things commensurate with the favor asked in the petition. Expressions of gratitude for receiving the favor requested in the petition might include offering a milagrito (a small brass figure) or making a votive offering (a painting or figurine) that reflects the favor received (see Ex-voto), decorating the shrine, or welcoming the icon into one's home and offering food, toys, or flowers to it and its visitors.

AURORA ZLOTNIK

Popular Christian Practices in Latin America: Native Traditions in Mexico. How should the interactions of popular Christian practices and native traditions be understood? As a form of superstitious* syncretism* or as a form of inculturation* of Christianity called for by the Incarnation* (see Mission Cluster; the current cluster: In Eastern Orthodoxy). These questions call for a closer look at the specific native traditions involved.

Regarding Central American religions in Mexico, the first step is to recognize how rich and complex they were when Christianity arrived in the area. They had matured through a 1,000-year-old process in response to geographic demands and to the high civilizations and cultures in which they developed. Unfortunately, these religious traditions were seen through the lenses of a Christian ideology that prompted the "conquerors" to justify their invasion and oppression* of the peoples of the Latin American continent.

Central American cultures* and religions have the same basic orientation and sense of the transcendent, and thus constitute a macroculture. The language and the representations used to express these traditions are symbolic* and mythical*. At first these traditions emphasized respect for and devotion to natural forces. Later they unified the natural forces in a theological conception of life that kept in balance and harmony the earthly and the cosmic. Subsequently they perceived that the Divine is best understood in its relation to humans and history. They finally reached an extremely abstract conception of God. Various Nahuatl and Maya documents show the monotheistic perspective of these traditions. Nezahualcōyōtl (1402–72) writes that the Nahuatl people "have only one God, and they worship only One God, whose name is Quetzalcōatl." The Maya had various names for this one God, including Hun-oh-pú, a name that literally means "One-God-Is."

One might be surprised to find that, having become monotheists, the Nahuatl and Maya peoples abandoned neither the polytheistic language and religious representations of nature as a pantheon (a temple of all the gods) nor the references to divine manifestations in human affairs. One explanation is that any society comprises a diversity of people with different beliefs. Furthermore, one can say that all the diverse religious practices are held together in the broader, monotheistic conception. Thus according to the Myth* of the Fifth Sun (Quinto Sol), "Quetzalcōatl transformed the other gods into springs, others into fertile soil." The one and only God is present and acts in everything that exists, and God's presence, not God's representations, is worshipped.

The gospel and Christianity were proclaimed by means of categories, symbols, and a cultural worldview completely foreign to Central American peoples. Through the missionaries' first evangelization efforts, native peoples perceived the fundamental message of the gospel; but because the gospel was presented in a foreign religious and cultural code, they could not fully assimilate it. In order to adopt the gospel, they had to bring it into contact with the heart and the root of their own religious and cultural experiences, developing popular Christian practices, as well as popular Native religious practices. Thus current religious celebrations on sacred mountains, in sacred caves, and at other sacred places incorporate Christian practices – and thus can be viewed as popular Christian practices – even though they preserve ancient Central American religious practices and theology.

CLODOMIRO SILLER and
FERNANDO MATAMOROS PONCE

Popular Christian Practices in North America.

The diffusion of religion in the late 20th c. greatly increased the number and range of expressions of popular Christianity in North America. In media* such as music, television, and film, in popular religious magazines such as Guideposts, and in the large greeting card business, these might more appropriately be called religious dimensions of popular culture (e.g. generalized appeals to the supernatural) than popular Christianity itself, yet they often influence Christian expressions within the culture as well. On the other hand, ethnic identities formed partly in response to persecution or violence (especially Native* American and African* American) have strongly shaped expressions of Christianity within these communities. On one end of a spectrum of religious perspectives are persons for whom individuality is of particular importance: seekers, New Agers, and devotees of meditation or nature, whose Christianity may be mixed with other influences or religious strands. At the other end are those who emphasize mission and whose religious activity is connected with one or more of the hundreds of Evangelical* parachurch* organizations that exist outside of denominational structures (e.g. Youth for Christ, Promise Keepers, Women's Aglow, the Gideons*). Roman Catholic and Orthodox expressions of popular Christianity often incline toward visual images (statues or icons of the Virgin Mary* and the saints*, crucifixes, home altars, sacred sites). Warner Sallman's Head of Christ (1940) was reproduced more than 500 million times and significantly influenced Protestant popular religion. Protestant expressions often incline toward inspirational or apocalyptic* religious literature (e.g. in the past century, In His Steps; The Man Nobody Knows;

The Power of Positive Thinking; The Late, Great Planet Earth; and the Left Behind series). These books have been attractive not just because they are accessible to a wide audience, but also because they communicate the message that reliance on God's power can solve human problems. Various forms of music began as expressions of popular Christianity (evangelical hymnody, the Sacred Harp singing tradition, African American gospel, and Christian rock) and continue to attract followers. Advances in communications technology in the late 20th c., notably cable television and the Internet, have made connections to popular Christianity far beyond the local into a global phenomenon in a postmodern world. Its many forms include continuities with the past as well as newer variants dependent on contemporary cultural expressions.

DALE A. JOHNSON

Popular Christian Practices in Western Europe.

See BLACK MADONNA; FÁTIMA; LOURDES; MARY, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER.

Porete, Marguerite, a wandering Beguine*, most likely from Hainault (Belgium); a speculative mystic*, author of The Mirror of Simple Annihilated Souls and Those Who Only Remain in Will and Desire of Love (in Old French, c1290), an allegory* dependent on chivalric motifs. She was declared a relapsed heretic* on the basis of 15 propositions extracted from her writings and executed (1310); this was the first auto da fé* for mystical* heresy* in Western Europe.

Porete's work is an example of medieval women's vernacular* theology, which both challenged and complemented traditional scholastic* and monastic* theology. She provoked church authorities by making antinomian ideas accessible to other lay Christians and by claiming authority* from God rather than an earthly power.

Her anticlerical, antidevotional, and speculative treatise anticipates some issues prominent in 16th-c. reforms, yet the text is generally considered an anomaly in medieval mysticism. Porete's mystical speculation never became mainstream church doctrine, but her work directly influenced Jan van Ruusbroec* and Meister Eckhart*.

Porete employed ideas from Neoplatonic* cosmology* and the negative* theology of Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite to posit two paths of return to God. Souls*, as descended from Adam* (created) and from the Trinity* (eternal), can pass through the church-mediated cycle of fall*, redemption*, and return to God after a virtuous life. Yet certain noble souls can embrace their wretchedness and abandon virtue, returning to their true nature: the state of not-willing, not-knowing, and not-having, which Porete calls annihilation. For her, certain human beings can become “what God is” during bodily life, without the mediation of the church, through a seven-stage path of increasing detachment.

JOANNE MAGUIRE ROBINSON

Porphyry (c232–c303), Neoplatonist* philosopher. Of pagan background, he was acquainted with Origen*, gained a detailed knowledge of the Bible and Christian thought, but disliked Christianity’s exclusive claims and thought that Origen misused both Platonism* and the Greek method of allegory*. He studied in Athens, then sought out Plotinus* in Rome (c262–70). While greatly influenced by Plotinus, arranging his treatises into Enneads (six groups of nine) and writing a life of Plotinus, he was an independent thinker, taking, e.g. a nontraditional view of the three divine hypostases*. In Against the Christians (c270–c295), he was one of the first biblical critics, noting the inconsistencies among the Gospels* and showing that Daniel* must have been written at the time of the Maccabees*. Late in his life, he was probably one of the philosophers who persuaded Diocletian* to resume persecution* of the Christians. In his Philosophy from Oracles, he held Jesus to be a sincere teacher, though not divine, attacked the apostles for superstition and magic, and condemned Christians’ resistance to civil* religion. His work on Aristotle’s Categories was later translated by Boethius* and was widely used during the Middle Ages.

Portiuncula, small chapel in the plain below Assisi; the center of the activities of Francis* of Assisi, where he received his vocation (1208), commissioned Clare (1212), and died (1226). In the 16th c., it was enclosed by a church.

Port-Royal, Cistercian* convent of nuns, southwest of Paris, that became a center of Jansenism*. It was moved to Paris (1625–26) while Jacqueline Marie Angélique Arnauld* was abbess.

Portugal is and always has been a predominantly Roman Catholic country since its emergence as a nation (12th c.). Christianity came to the area under Roman rule (2nd c.) and, despite outbreaks of Arianism* and Priscillianism*, maintained its Roman Catholic orthodoxy under Suevic rulers (converted in the 5th c.). The territory was overrun from 713 by Muslim invaders, who were driven out in 1249.

Under Christian rule, Jews and the few remaining Muslims had very limited autonomy. In 1496–97, most of them preferred expulsion to conversion. Those remaining, known as New Christians, suffered popular hostility. From the 1540s, the Inquisition* enforced orthodoxy, and the Jesuits* dominated and expanded education. The Protestant Reformation left Portugal unaffected. In the 18th c., the crown asserted its power when the despotic royal minister, the marquess of Pombal (1699–1782), expelled the Jesuits (1759) and converted the Inquisition into a royal court (1774). Enlightenment ideas began to circulate among the elite around the time of the French invasions (1807–11), to which the clergy led the resistance. In the politically turbulent 19th c., the liberal elite distanced itself from militant Roman Catholicism. The Inquisition was abolished (1821), and when the clergy supported the anti-liberal cause in the civil war of 1832–34, the victors abolished the religious orders, nationalized their property, dethroned bishops, and broke with the Vatican. Normal relations were restored by the Concordat of 1848, after which the clergy became dependent on the state for its income. Religious orders began to reestablish themselves in the late 19th c. By 1900 religion was again a political issue: battle was joined between a more militant Roman Catholicism, including Jesuits, and the militant anticlericalism of the republican movement. In 1910 the monarchy was overthrown and the Republic dissolved all religious orders. Church and state were separated by decree (1911), ecclesiastical property was confiscated, divorce was permitted, and freedom of religion was proclaimed while an attempt was made to subordinate Catholic clergy to the secular power. Relations with the Vatican were severed (1913–18) and bishops exiled from their dioceses. It was in this state of tension that the Virgin appeared to three children near Fátima*, in central Portugal, in 1917. After the military coup of 1926, the religious situation changed, and in 1933 the new state was installed with the Catholic militant António de Oliveira Salazar (1889–1970) as head of government (1932–68). His student friend, Manuel Gonçalves Cerejeira (1888–1977), was cardinal-patriarch of Lisbon (1929–71), but the Concordat* of 1940 maintained the regime of separation, and church property was not returned. The Concordat was modified in 1971 when the Law of Religious Freedom, in accordance with Vatican* II, officially recognized non-Catholic denominations and in 1975, after the fall of the authoritarian regime, when divorce was again permitted. In 2001 a new law of religious freedom gave equality of treatment to non-Catholic denominations and enabled taxpayers to donate 0.5% of their tax payments to their religion. The Concordat of 2004 generally reflected this law, with the Roman Catholic Church able to appoint bishops freely.

In 1826 foreign non-Catholics were permitted to worship in private. From 1867 religious denominations were allowed to form associations, one of the first being the Lusitanian Church, set up by Old* Catholics in 1880, which joined the Anglican Communion in 1980. Other Protestant denominations followed, with Pentecostals flourishing from the 1970s. See also BRAZIL; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: BRAZIL and IN EUROPE: PORTUGAL.

Statistics: Population (2007): 10.6 (million) M. Christians, 10.1 M, 95% (Roman Catholics, 9.5 M, 89%; Protestants, including Pentecostals/Charismatics, 0.4 M, 4.2%; Eastern Orthodox immigrants, 0.2 M, 2.2%; Jehovah's Witnesses, 48,000; Mormons, 35,000); Muslims, 37,000; Hindus, 7,000; Jews, fewer than 1,000. (Source: Instituto Nacional de Estatística, 2007; % of Christians in each group, 2003, and Mormons, 1999; many Christians are secularized*.)

RICHARD A. H. ROBINSON

Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions. The Portuguese seaborne empire was constituted by an expansive system of strategically located, fortified coastal trading posts linking three continents: Africa, Asia, and the easternmost region of Latin America (contemporary Brazil*). The Treaty of Tordesillas (1494) ensured Portugal's exclusive right to these territories. Portugal's early activity in the islands off the West African coast (early 15th c.) represented the earliest European colonial experiment, including slavery*, settlement, and single-crop agriculture (sugarcane). With King João II's mandate to chart a trade route to India via the southern coast of Africa, Bartholomeu Dias rounded the Cape of Good Hope (1487). Vasco de Gama arrived in Calicut, India, via the East African coast (1498). Pedro Alvares Cabral inadvertently "discovered" Brazil (1500), when winds blew his India-bound ship off course.

At first the purpose of Portuguese colonialism* was not settlement but rather the establishment of a commercial trading empire. Even into the 17th c., settlement was primarily a means to fortify small trading colonies. Nonetheless, Padroado* Real granted the Portuguese rights to the missionary church in all of Asia, Africa, and Brazil. The first preachers and missionaries arrived on commercial ships.

The Jesuits* were the primary agents of mission and evangelization in the Portuguese Empire. Their arrival in Goa (1542) was the turning point for Roman Catholic mission to Asia; the Diocese of Goa became the administrative center for mission to India*, China*, and Japan*.

The Jesuit mission to Brazil was launched (1549) under the leadership of Manoel da Nóbrega (1517–70), who founded a string of coastal missions (mid-16th c.). The Portuguese crown employed Jesuits as administrators of "Indian" labor, which often set them at odds with settlers. When the order's attentions turned to evangelization of the indigenous and African populations in Brazil, their role as administrators of sugar plantations and as owners of African slaves (17th c. especially) compromised their efforts. The Portuguese Jesuit and missionary to the Amazon, António Vieira (1608–97), preached against slavery and argued for a unified model of mission that transcended the divide between colony and empire. The Jesuit mission in indigenous Brazil was organized in aldeias (reductions*), which sought to bring European regimentation and ordering to indigenous communities. The Jesuits saw a decline in their influence in Brazil beginning with the crisis in the sugar industry (1680s). This decline culminated in their expulsion from Brazil (1758). See also COLONIALISM AND IMPERIALISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; MISSION CLUSTER.

JENNIFER S. HUGHES

Portuguese Literature and Christianity. The emergence of Portuguese literature is commonly dated from the late 12th c. Some of the best-known Portuguese poetry, the Cantigas de Santa Maria, comprising 430 short songs in praise of the Virgin Mary*, was composed and set to music (mid-13th c.) by King Afonso X ("the Wise"). Portuguese medieval prose includes the anonymous doctrinal/devotional Christian essays Orto do espôso, Boosco deleitoso, and Livro da côrte imperial, promoting solitary life and defending Christian doctrines against Judaic and Muslim attack.

Bilingual playwright Gil Vicente (c1465–c1537) offers among his copious dramatic productions numerous autos (mystery* plays), including the most frequently staged Auto da Índia, the trilogy of the Barcas (“Inferno,” “Purgatory,” “Glory”), Auto da alma (on the “pilgrim*” theme), and Auto da feira (critique of a commercialized Roman Church).

King João III’s Renaissance court (1521–57) brought simultaneously Erasmian* Christian humanism, the Dominican-administered Inquisition*, and the Jesuits* as members of the intellectual vanguard and most favored mission arm of Portugal* and its far-flung empire. Portuguese Christian humanists included essayist João de Barros, who produced historiographic and travel works and several dialogues on moral education (e.g. Rhopica pñefma); and Damião de Góis, who chronicled the Portuguese monarchy, militated for Christian ecumenism, and was temporary imprisoned by the Inquisition on charges of “Lutheranism.” Renaissance poets included Luiz de Camões, whose 10-canto epic poem, Os Lusíadas, peppered by biblical references, sings the glories of Christian Portuguese colonial expansion and mourns the gradual loss of the national epic spirit to crass materialism and greed. Camões gives full voice to his Christian devotion in his numerous love sonnets (e.g. “Seven years the shepherd Jacob labored”) and the stately elegiac poem Super flumina (based on Ps 137).

The baroque period (17th c.), a time of general Portuguese malaise, is typified by solemn clerical writing. Preacher-essayists such as Fr. António Vieira, SJ, and Oratorian Fr. Manuel Bernardes address in sermons and letters issues related to the dissolution of public and personal morality, ethical errors of secular governance, and Portugal’s faltering position vis-à-vis newer Protestant colonial powers (notably Holland). In an age when intellectual and poetic female voices sought freedom in convents, Sr. Violante do Céu’s sonnets progressively evolve from themes of physical love to a spiritualized passion for Christ, while Sr. Mariana Alcoforado’s love letters (Cartas portuguesas) pour forth the frustration of a novice’s unrequited attraction to a secular love.

The romantic period (beginning c1825) brought a vigorous new wave of Christian devotion and emotion to Portuguese letters. Strongly nationalistic in tone, the historical novels and stories of Almeida Garrett (O Arco de Santana) and Alexandre Herculano (Eurico, o Presbítero) interpret medieval and Renaissance figures – both clerical and secular – as exemplifying devotion, loyalty, and other Christian virtues. Garrett’s play, Frei Luís de Sousa, re-creates the tense, lugubrious atmosphere of early-17th-c. Portugal and the internal drama of men and women facing uncontrollable circumstances. The prolific novelist Camilo Castelo Branco shows in his best-known novels the agonized religious polarization of his own life: Onde está a felicidade?, O Romance de um homem rico, Amor de Perdição, Amor de Salvação, A Queda dum anjo. His series of 10 novelettes, Novelas do Minho, reflects Roman Catholic devotional piety and folk superstition* in Portugal’s mountainous northernmost province.

The advent of literary realism (1860s) replaced religious emotion with a more analytical view of religion. The official and popular practices of the Roman Catholic Church were scrutinized by the academic “Generation of ’65,” especially Eça de Queiroz, whose novels and hagiographic stories convey an implicit or explicit critique of church and monarchy, while defending the Christian Socialism of the primitive church. His O crime do Padre Amaro depicts traditional seminary education that deprives young men of natural contact with women, predisposing them toward (sometimes tragic) future excesses with female parishioners, and A relíquia re-creates in a humorous vein the lucrative 19th-c. traffic in counterfeit relics from the Holy Land. In another spiritual mode, Antero de Quental reflects his tragic personal struggles with faith* in deistic and transcendentalist sonnets.

Except for Antônio Nobre’s symbolist poetry and Fernando Pessoa’s ontological modernist verses, 20th-c. Portuguese letters – especially fictional works (e.g. the short stories of Miguel Torga) – tend toward neorealistic depictions of rural life, with its traditional popular* Catholicism, although with occasional forays into more existential novels such as Aparição (Vergílio Ferreira) and A paixão (Almeida Faria). Nobel laureate José Saramago returns in his 1991 novel, O evangelho segundo Jesus Cristo, to a critique of Christianity reminiscent of Eça de Queiroz.

MARY L. DANIEL

Porvoo Declaration is a part of the “Porvoo Common Statement” (1994–95), the theological foundation of church unity between (1) British and Irish Anglican* churches and (2) Nordic and Baltic Lutheran* churches of Norway, Sweden, Finland, Estonia, and Lithuania. The churches acknowledged each other's doctrinal basis and ordained ministries and created a fellowship, an Anglican–Lutheran communion. Similar agreements in the USA (Called to Common Mission, 1999) and Canada (Waterloo, 1999) and new Anglican positions concerning episcopacy and the ordination of women* offer possibilities for enlarging the Anglican–Lutheran communion. However, the status of women bishops and the compatibility of the Porvoo agreement with other ecumenical agreements remain unclear.

RISTO SAARINEN

Positive Theology, Positive Law, Positivism.

Something is called positive because it is factual, given, or “posited,” in contrast to that which is rationally self-evident or deduced. It may be “posited” in several different ways, and saying that something is “posited” may be viewed favorably or not.

Positing may occur in the context of legislation. “Positive law” is that which is posited by lawgivers, as contrasted with claims about natural* law or rational theories of justice* and the good. Ever since the Stoics*, there has been a tendency to regard positive law as less worthy than natural law. Legal positivism is the position taken by many interpreters of the development of US law; it was also the position of Carl Schmitt, one of the theorists who reinforced the Nazi Movement in Germany.

Positing may occur in the context of tradition. “Positive theology” deals with the doctrines that have come from Scripture*, tradition, and the councils and “doctors of the church,” without first asking critical questions about historical or rational justifications. Several “positive theologians” were appointed to the faculty of the University of Berlin in the late 19th c. to counteract the liberalism* of Adolf Harnack*.

Positing may occur in the context of experience. “Positivism” is the designation for several types of philosophy that deal only with observable facts and processes. Comte’s Positivism tried to overcome the illusions of both theology and philosophy with a scientific approach, which, he thought, supported an optimistic theory of progress.

Historical positivism places emphasis on the data derived from the historical record and on the historical development of all ideas and theories, and thus is skeptical about general theories of history* and of hermeneutics*.

The “logical positivism” of the Vienna circle asserted that meaning must be based on either sense experience or logical coherence. Coherent concepts, while meaningful, are merely formal or tautologous until they are combined with sense experience. Assertions about the world are meaningful only if they are “verifiable” or, at a minimum, “falsifiable” through experience.

EUGENE TESSELLE

Post-Christian Thought. In the secular* world of Western Europe, there are many (perhaps mostly women) who retain a marked spirituality*. During the 1980s and 1990s, a period during which women’s groups on the periphery of the church and the Feminist Movement flourished, the term “post-Christian” was widely employed, in Britain and beyond, to designate those who, having moved beyond and outside Christianity, adhered to a spirituality that bore the marks of the tradition from which they had come.

With the Enlightenment*, central assertions made by Christianity became unthinkable: there could be no resurrection or miracles, since by definition they are supposed to be singular events, contrary to the interrelatedness that characterizes nature and history in which any event necessarily belongs to a larger class (“resurrections”); there could be no person whose relation to God was qualitatively different from that of all others. Furthermore, Christian belief in a transcendent God* implies a heteronomy* that, in modernity, came to be viewed as morally unacceptable. A long tradition, extending through Kant*, Hegel*, Feuerbach*, and Marx* to Freud*, concluded that Christianity was a mythical* projection, the product of human immaturity. In the face of such a critique, some thinkers struggled to reformulate that which could still be considered both ethically enlightening and believable from the Christian past.

More recently feminists have added a twist to the analysis, contending that Christian dogma is by no means benign, but rather is an ideology* that has both reflected and in turn served to legitimize patriarchy*. As such it is a form of fascism, if that term connotes an ideology that makes it appear only natural that one part of humanity (in this case, men) is normative, these people having the power to designate what is the essence and “place” of others (women). Given the 20th-c. recognition, arising in particular out of French thought, that we are embedded in language and culture, the attempt to escape such a mindset must be particularly challenging, if also a prerequisite for human equality. In this respect, many intellectual women have read the work of Luce Irigaray.

Mary Daly employed the term "postchristian," but soon abandoned it, commenting on the inappropriateness of naming oneself by that which one has divorced. In Britain the term is in particular associated with those who are convinced that there is a dimension to reality that has hitherto been hypostasized, anthropomorphized, and projected as an "other" called God (Hampson). Such a critique suggests how one might conceptualize what is the case in terms that are both epistemologically viable and ethically acceptable. But there has never been a post-Christian movement; those who designate themselves as post-Christians have held a variety of views. What is of significance is that many continue to count themselves spiritual, not simply ethical, persons. They may meditate, attend Quaker meetings, join some alternative group, or simply share a post-Christian outlook with their friends.

In the widest sense of the term, "post-Christian" could surely indicate a whole trajectory of thought, extending from Schleiermacher's* "second" speech on the nature of religion, through Otto's* phenomenological depiction of the sense of the holy*, to Iris Murdoch's philosophical writing. In Britain Don Cupitt's books gave rise to the Sea of Faith Movement, also strong in Australia and New Zealand, which provides a home and forum for debate for many of unorthodox belief. Research carried out by the "Religious Experience Research Unit" (based originally in Oxford) has shown how prevalent in Britain is the conviction of persons that they have had a religious experience, whether they call it of "God" or not (30–40%). Compare this with the results of one poll showing that less than 3% of the population attend any form of Christian worship at Christmas.

The question that presents itself is how, in the midst of what may be the first great experiment in secularity in modern Europe (this being also true of formerly Roman Catholic countries), we may retain a spirituality and sense of God; for it may be (to employ Kantian vocabulary) that the positive, historical religions that we have known have indeed been "vehicles," which we may think to have carried, if also distorted, human awareness of a certain dimension of reality. Those who think this (but have rejected Christian dogma) may rightly be named post-

Christian. The fact that modern science* tells us that there is no "outside" or "before" suggests that the paradigms that theology has formerly employed must be discarded. In this situation, it is vital that we recast what we would say, for human beings need some kind of concrete articulation, in words or imagery, of that which they believe to be the case. Lacking this we should be left with a wholly amorphous spirituality, or indeed a purely material transcendental against which the human spirit rebels.

DAPHNE HAMPSON

Postcolonialism and Christian Theology.

Christian theology has engaged postcolonialism both as a historical phenomenon and as a theory. In both cases, "postcolonial" usually refers to the 20th-c. period following the rule by European powers over colonies in Africa and Asia, beginning with India's independence (1947) and extending through the decolonization of the 1970s and 1980s in Asia and Africa. Yet this time frame can be misleading, for two reasons. First, European (and US) imperial and neocolonial policies still constrain Asian and African polities. Thus the "post" in "postcolonial" is often used also to mean a "continual pushing against and beyond" still powerful colonial legacies. Second, the time frame overlooks the longer period of decolonization during the 19th c. in Latin America and its ongoing "postcolonial" struggle with subsequent imperial policies of Europe and the USA.

As a historical phenomenon, postcolonialism has been engaged in various ways by Christian theology. Theology, when not complicit in reinforcing colonial structures (as it usually was throughout Asia, African, and Latin America), could articulate anticolonial discontent, sometimes fusing into inculturated* (or syncretistic*) revivalist* movements in the colonies or emerging, at other times, as politicized missionary* support for decolonizing struggle.

It is as a theory, though, that postcolonialism has been engaged by Christian theologians most intentionally, producing "postcolonial theology" in the 21st c. Most influential have been the theorists Edward Said, Homi Bhabha, and Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, whose works parse postcolonial themes with poststructuralist theory. These three focus mainly on concerns of Asia, but they have been joined by African theorists, such as Achille Mbembe, and Latin America ones (often highly critical of postcolonial theory), such as Walter Mignolo.

Theology's turn to postcolonial theory began mainly in biblical studies of the 1990s, when some scholars found the terms of imperialism*, colonialism*, and neocolonialism, to be valuable for analysis of the Bible and of biblical hermeneutics. More recently, constructive or systematic theologians have begun to engage postcolonial theories of difference, hybridity, mimicry, diaspora, border thinking, empire, and neocolonialism. These notions are revising the context and content of theological method, especially in Feminist, Liberation, and political theologies throughout the world. The central problematic that emerges amid these revisions focuses on how complex affirmations of difference modulate colonized peoples' liberating resistance and well-being. Even though this problematic is also shaping reconstructive reflection on traditional doctrines of Western theology (God*, Christ*, Spirit*, church*), there are at this writing very few doctrinal works emerging from conversations with postcolonial theory. See also COLONIALISM AND IMPERIALISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; DECOLONIZING THEOLOGY. MARK LEWIS TAYLOR

Postdenominationalism. See INDEPENDENT OR FREE CHURCHES.

Postmillennialism, the belief that Christ will return after the millennium* (Rev 20), a period of righteousness and peace that fulfills the church's proclamation and action. It became widespread in Protestantism, e.g. in the writings of John Foxe* and Jonathan Edwards*. It inspired reform-minded North American Christians to work for justice* and peace* to prepare for Christ's millennial reign. See also DISPENSATIONALISM; MILLENNIALISM CLUSTER.

Postmodernism and Liberation Theologies are tied to overarching transformations in society. Liberation* theologies emerged in the context of liberation movements – the US civil rights struggles and Latin American movements of the poor who personally experienced the failure of economic policies. Independently of each other, Frederick Herzog, a white theologian in North Carolina, James Cone, an African American theologian in New York, and Gustavo Gutiérrez, a Peruvian priest, published the first “theologies of liberation” (1970–71), at the same time that the first strands of Feminist* theology, by Rosemary Radford Ruether and others, were being developed. These different “academic” Liberation theologies interacted with particular liberation struggles and encountered each other only later on, not without tensions and disagreements. They share a new encounter with marginalized* people (along the lines of race, class, and gender) who gradually became the subjects (rather than objects) of theological reflection. This theological practice initiated significant and lasting shifts that challenge the academy.

Postmodernism is a new way of thinking (since the 1970s and 1980s) that is also closely tied to a context involving broad socioeconomic and cultural changes. Developments in communications and media* blurred the line between reality and virtual reality. Even the production of wealth* is located more in virtual reality (e.g. finance capital, stock market, label) than in “hard” reality (e.g. industrial production). Postmodernist ways of thought, including poststructuralism and deconstruction, challenge modern ways of thought (which presuppose hard notions of reality), such as scientific positivism*, philosophical foundationalism, and structuralism. Postmodernism is mirrored in cultural phenomena like multiculturalism and increased acceptance of cultural differences; affirmations of identity (based on a fixed referent in reality) are replaced by affirmations of difference.

Postmodern thought appears to challenge key concerns of Liberation theologies. If difference is broadly acknowledged and accepted and if hard facts are challenged, can we still speak of oppression along the lines of race, class, and gender? Are differences no longer oppressive*? Is the preferential* option for the poor and marginalized that is promoted by Liberation theologies the special interest of limited groups? Nevertheless, in postmodern times, pressure on the margins has become worse as the gap between rich and poor continues to grow and as tensions along the lines of race and gender continue, although they may be less visible, having been pushed underground. Contemporary Liberation theologians, taking into account the changes brought by postmodernity, carry on their work in light of these ongoing tensions. Yet postmodernism opens the possibility of new related projects, such as postcolonial* theology and subaltern studies, by providing insights on the oppressive impact of colonialism on all areas of life, including the realm of ideas. See also FEMINIST THEOLOGY CLUSTER; LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER. JOERG RIEGER

Postmodernism and Theology. It is widely assumed that an epochal shift occurred in the last decades of the 20th c. that took the Western industrialized world, at least, beyond the modernity ushered in by the Enlightenment*. The precise nature of the shift is not described consistently in the same terms, perhaps demonstrating the slipperiness of epochal designations, especially when made in close temporal proximity to events. Within theological circles, however, a certain version of "postmodernism" seems to hold sway, one to which François Lyotard's The Postmodern Condition: A Report on Knowledge provides a helpful index. Lyotard identifies the "post" with "an incredulity toward meta-narratives" (xxiv), particularly those inherited from the Enlightenment*. These include meta-narratives of progress, whether epistemological (scientific* or philosophical*), political* (democratic or socialist), or economic* (Marxist or capitalist), and of representation (linguistic or artistic). The decline of confidence in these meta-narratives calls into question their underlying standards of truth* and justice*. In the wake of the unanimity of perspective comes social and epistemological fragmentation.

Though Lyotard was published in France in 1979, well before the advent of the World Wide Web, the Web helpfully illustrates the postmodern condition as he describes it. Both in infrastructure and in content, the Web embodies a radically decentralized version of authority* and authorization. As a conduit for commerce and information, the Web enables the circulation of various forms of capital – virtual and real, economic and social – through a global network that both requires and transcends material structures (e.g. computer hardware, bricks-and-mortar stores). It makes possible new forms of social alliance (virtual and real) that can either buttress or transgress the topographies of nation-states and taxonomies of race, class, sex, and religion. Thus like the World Wide Web, "postmodernity" both draws on and transcends features of the "modern."

Postmodernism's consequences for religion are ambivalent. On the one hand, as meta-narratives, religions are vulnerable to fragmentation and dispersal. The decline of mainline Protestantism* (a modern phenomenon) and the rise of nondenominational independent* churches and parachurch* movements evince such vulnerability. On the other hand, others argue that, just as modernity's pursuit of the purely rational displaced religious authorities, so rationality's displacement allows for a return of the religious (see Rationalism and Christian Theology). Doubtless, this putative return (where did religion go, exactly?) takes many benign, even banal forms, but those that grab headlines seek to reassert traditional (and authoritarian) religiosities. Among the parachurch movements that have emerged in recent decades in the USA are the Moral* Majority and Focus on the Family. And the events of September 11, 2001, acquainted the world with forms of Islam that, while structurally decentralized and fragmentary, are able to marshal lethal force in service of their political agenda. Clearly, then, religion, like every other aspect of culture, finds itself caught in the crosscurrents of the postmodern condition.

Theological assessments of postmodernism follow the lines of ambivalence just described. While some argue that postmodernity confronts theology with new and distinctive challenges (Lakeland and Davaney), certain theologies with modern roots continue to assert their relevance. Heirs of the radical theology (or Death* of God) movement of the 1980s see postmodernity as carrying forward the triumph of the secular* over the religious, though not without residue (Crockett). Process* theology has found new life by staking a claim to postmodern terrain (Griffin, Keller, and Daniell). Advocates of various Liberation* theologies argue that modernity's dissolution, while posing challenges to liberative projects, need not block and can even bolster the pursuit of social justice* (Min and Rieger). Some read modernity's demise as an opportunity for a reprise of more traditional forms of Christianity. Post-liberal theology is sometimes put forward as an antidote to postmodernity's vertigo or malaise (Webster and Schnier). From England comes "radical orthodoxy." While its claims to radicality and to orthodoxy of interpretation have not gone unchallenged (Ruether and Grau), its affiliates advocate premodern Christian theologies as newly resonant and politically progressive responses to postmodern challenges (Milbank). Finally, the return of religion is illustrated by its newly found cachet as a scholarly topic among philosophers and cultural critics (e.g. Agamben, Badiou, Bloechl, Caputo, Zizek, and Keller and Daniell).

One finds echoes of these various responses in a new form of Evangelicalism*, the Emerging Church Movement (see Independent or Free Churches). Theologians writing for this movement (and thus in a more popular vein; see Smith) embrace postmodernism as a breath of fresh air for Christianity. Its advocates argue for abandoning the emphasis on right belief characteristic of Evangelicalism* (itself a product of modernity) in favor of an emphasis on communal practices that cultivate spiritual development and/or social justice. That engagements with postmodernism can produce such widely differing theological projects is an interesting feature of this current in contemporary Christianity. See also RATIONALISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; REASON.

ELLEN T. ARMOUR

POVERTY CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Poverty and the Eastern Orthodox Church

Poverty and Protestant Churches

Poverty and the Roman Catholic Church

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics:
African Views

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics:
African American Views

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics:
Asian Views

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics:
Caribbean Views

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics:
Latin American Views

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics:
North American Feminist Views

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics:
North American Latino/a Views

1) Introductory Entries

Poverty and the Eastern Orthodox Church. Theological and ethical considerations of the Eastern Orthodox* Church concerning poverty have been determined by the teachings of the hiera (Holy Scriptures*) and the thyrathen (natural* theology, Greek philosophy) sources. Even though an appreciation for and use of Greek ideas and principles are found as early as the NT (John 1:1; Acts 16:28, 26:24; Rom 2:14, 7:15; 1 Cor 3:22; see also Hellenistic Religious Traditions and Christianity’s Self-Definition; Inculturation Cluster: Of Christianity in the Greco-Roman World), it was after the 4th c. that church fathers emphasized the importance of Greek thought for theology and practice in teachings used for effective missionary work among the Greek-speaking world.

From antiquity, some attributed the existence of poverty to God, others to human nature: “The Lord makes the poor and makes the rich” (1 Sam 2:7); “Poverty and wealth come from the Lord” (Sirach 11:14; cf. Eccl. 4:1; 6:8). In the NT, poverty is a given: “You always have the poor with you,” Jesus said to his disciples (Matt 26:11; cf. Deut 15:11); helping the poor would be rewarded by God (Matt 25:31–46).

By contrast, Greek philosophy did not consider poverty a fixed, divinely ordained condition. For Plato* “there must be no place for poverty in any section of the population.” Aristotle* added that poverty was an impediment to peace and a civilized life, and “the only way to prevent social conflicts and civil wars is to banish poverty.” Helping the poor has its own inner satisfaction. Givers help fellow human beings like themselves. The teachings of Plato and Aristotle, Zeno and the Stoics*, who emphasized the practical application of ethics*, were familiar to Christian theologians of the Greek-speaking world. The church fathers viewed the philosophers’ teachings as “preparation for the gospel.”

Early Christianity was greatly influenced by the Greek language and culture, in which it grew and prospered. Thus “there are neither rich nor poor, because for all God has created nothing unnecessarily and has omitted nothing that is necessary,” said Basil* of Caesarea (329–79), one of the most influential writers on Orthodox theology, ethics, and monasticism. He advocated balance and harmony in social relationships, encouraging monks to be active in social and cultural issues. Basil* of Caesarea advised students to study not only philosophers, but also the Greek poets. He wrote, “Read Homer because what he writes is about virtue*.”

The belief that the human being is “an image* of God” (Bible) or “a spark of divinity” (Greek philosophy) played a major role in the formation and application of theology and ethics in the Orthodox Church. “Receive a poor person as an unknown God" (Greek) and "Receive a poor person as a brother or sister in Christ" (Christian) are mottoes that have never been forgotten. Christian Orthodoxy follows a traditional and consistent theology, including an ethics of poverty and the poor. Historically, the reaction to poverty was the practice of philanthropy, individually as well as through ptochēia or ptochotropheia, institutions established and usually maintained by the Orthodox Church to care for the needs of the poor (those unable to work).

Poverty was considered a virtue for monks (along with celibacy* and obedience); before joining a monastery, they would distribute their possessions to the poor or to philanthropic institutions. But monks who were poor as individuals might be collectively wealthy in a monastery, because of donations by the faithful (cf. the Poverty* Movement in Western churches).

Eastern Orthodoxy today does not condone poverty, which it sees as the result of human sinfulness, greed, exploitation, and selfishness. The restoration of human being to its pristine goodness, the practice of love*, and the establishment of institutionalized philanthropy are means by which poverty will be mitigated if not eliminated.

DEMETRIOS J. CONSTANTELOS

Poverty and Protestant Churches. The Reformation held to the traditional ascetic* notion of "spiritual poverty" as a virtue, but Protestantism increasingly spiritualized and internalized it. Of the NT's two quotations from Deuteronomy 15:4–11 – "There will be no poor [needy] among you" (Acts 4:34) and "There will always be poor among you" (Mark 14:7 = Matt 26:11; John 12:8) – Protestant churches have tended more readily to accept the latter, thereby settling for a narrow, spiritual view of salvation*. For Luther* and Calvin*, being justified by God should lead to good works on behalf of the poor neighbor. But the mark of salvation as participation in a transformed beloved community with the poor, as in earlier strands of the history of the church, has appeared only occasionally in Protestantism.

The tendency has been to identify poverty with material poverty, thus downplaying the political, cultural, natural, and spiritual dimensions of poverty. At worst Protestants have contributed to systematic poverty by succumbing to Aristotle's view that the poor are destined to be poor (and ignoring other teachings of Aristotle about poverty; see the present cluster: And the Eastern Orthodox Church). The poor have only themselves to blame owing to laziness, lack of faith, or ignorance, or because they are suffering God's punishment for wrongdoing.

But where Protestant churches have viewed poverty as unjust or unacceptable because it is involuntary or because it diminishes human community or because in Jesus Christ God identifies with the poor and works for the salvation of all through the salvation of the poor, they have sought ways to struggle against poverty. Generally these Protestant Church movements have sprung from the left wing of the Reformation, Lutheran Pietism*, Arminian* Calvinism, Evangelical* revivals*, the Holiness* Movement, Christian Socialism, the Social* Gospel emphasis of mainline Protestant churches, and Protestant forms of Liberation* and postcolonial* theology. One pervasive theme is reordering the church to minister to the poor.

The most effective Protestant measures have come from the conviction that life with and ministry to the poor is constitutive of the experience of salvation. The great experiment of the Lutheran Pietist Francke* in Halle provided a model for diakonia to the poor that is effective even today. John Wesley's revival was focused on the poor. By offering universally available salvation, these movements seek to change the hearts, habits, and conditions of the destitute and working poor.

The low point of Protestantism's relation to poverty came in the 18th to early 19th c. when the "enclosure" of farmland and common land caused rural depopulation and unemployment, creating a labor market for the burgeoning industrial revolution, and the old Poor Laws and parish* protection of the poor succumbed to new legislation in 1834. The resulting horrendous suffering of the poor led in the mid-19th c. to a new social and structural view of poverty in Marx*, nascent sociology*, and literature (e.g. Dickens). A new form of Protestant theology of poverty ensued that related the identity and justice* of God to the unjust social and political systems in which poverty thrives.

Various forms of 19th-c. Christian Socialism (F. D. Maurice in England; the Blumhardts* and Leonhard Ragaz on the Continent) had a lasting effect on William Temple, Tillich*, and Barth*, all socialists. In the USA (early 20th c.), the Social* Gospel, led by Washington Gladden and Rauschenbusch*, directed Protestants to the structurally complex life of the working poor. The Social Gospel was Post-millennialist* but not limited to simple prophetic denunciations of poverty; it sought to address poverty by radically changing systems of education*, health* care, hygiene, slums, infrastructure, housing codes, labor protection, voting rights, rights of women, racial tensions, and militarization. The Methodist "Social Principles" (1908), adopted the same year by the Federal* Council of Churches, represents a good example of the ecumenical effort. In the New Deal, this Protestant heritage joined with Roman Catholic social teachings, the Jewish tradition, and secular movements to bring about a "welfare state."

The legal and political gains on behalf of the poor were soon jeopardized by a resurgence of an unregulated market and the second modern globalization beginning in the 1960s. A plethora of new Protestant theologies dealing with poverty arose following the "political* theology" of Jürgen Moltmann and J. B. Metz in Germany and "Liberation* theology" in Latin America (led by Gustavo Gutiérrez) and later Africa and Asia. Frederick Herzog broke new theological ground in relating God and the poor in North America. Gradually Black* theology, initiated by James Cone, Feminist* and Womanist* theology, peace* theology, and ecological* theology began to see that racism*, sexism*, the degradation of nature, and permanent warfare are all inexorably related to poverty. More recent theologians (e.g. Milbank, Tanner, Meeks, Long) – address poverty by means of an even deeper theological criticism of the assumptions behind the global market economy.

M. DOUGLAS MEEKS

Poverty and the Roman Catholic Church.

The centrality of the Roman Catholic Church's concern for the poor flows directly from Jesus' mission of salvation* and his preference for the poor. Solidarity with the poor, as John Paul II stated, is "a proof of [the Church's] fidelity to Christ, so that she can truly be the 'church of the poor'" (Laborem Exercens, 8). The Church's view of "poverty" is twofold. It encourages poverty of spirit, which heightens one's openness to the needy, and it adopts the alleviation and prevention of poverty as a central part of its earthly mission. Voluntary poverty, as Thomas Aquinas* tells us, "is praiseworthy according as it frees [one] from the vices in which some are involved through riches [see Poverty Movement].... However, insofar as poverty takes away the food which results from riches, ... it is purely an evil" (Summa contra Gentiles, Chap. 133).

Poverty, often defined as a state of material insufficiency, contrasts with God's promise of abundance (Isa 60–65) and is the result of our propensity to sin*. From a Christian perspective, individual poverty is caused by social exclusion. Many of the church fathers saw the greed of the rich as the primary mode of exclusion, emphasizing, as had the OT prophets, that wealth* is often created at the expense of the poor (Clark). They also cited the obligation to use one's surplus for the benefit of the poor. As John* Chrysostom stated, the only safe place to store wealth is in "the stomachs of the poor."

Poverty is more than an economic phenomenon, and the Church is equally concerned with social and spiritual poverty, which are also caused by exclusion – from participation in one's community in the case of social poverty; and from communion with God and God's people in the case of spiritual poverty. Exclusion is usually caused by both individual actions and social structures. Thus the Roman Catholic Church promotes inclusion, both in the choices individuals make and in the social order. The Church emphasizes that all wealth* comes from God, and it is a sin* to exclude without cause some from God's gift to all.

This principle of the universal destination of goods, a key principle in the Roman Catholic social thought tradition, highlights the importance of "participation" for the authentic development of the human person. Poverty caused by exclusion both denies and prevents human development and is thus contrary to the dignity of the human person, made in the image* and likeness of God (imago Dei). Charity* (care for the poor) is tied to both love* of God and love of neighbor (Benedict XVI, Deus Caritas Est). The Church's approach to care for the poor, then, is grounded in efforts to achieve authentic human development (Paul VI, Populorum Progressio) and not continued dependency or exclusion.

The Roman Catholic Church's institutional commitment to serving the poor started with the first Christians. The apostles (Acts 6) appointed seven men (probably the first deacons*) to minister to the material needs of the poor. Fund-raising for the poor ("the saints") was part of Paul's* mission. By the time of Pope Gregory* I (540–604), the Church had institutionalized the practice of devoting one-quarter of Church revenues to care for the poor. By the Middle Ages, assistance for the poor was institutionalized in canon* law as a duty. It was carried out in thousands of institutions administered by bishops, parishes, monasteries, religious orders, and lay groups. Each era of Church history witnessed new efforts to "include" the poor. The work of Vincent* de Paul (c1580–1660) is especially noteworthy, as it continues to inspire successive generations, religious and lay, to work with the poor, for the poor. The 19th- to 20th-c. rise of industrialism and urbanism brought forth a series of new forms of economic, social, and spiritual exclusion. The numerous papal social* encyclicals of the past 120 years, under the influence of social sciences in the modern era, have focused particularly on social, political, and economic structures that create exclusion and thus create poverty. Many of these injustices stem from the "worship of wealth," which creates material poverty for the poor and spiritual poverty for the affluent.

These "structures of sin*" (as they are referred to in Sollicitudo Rei Socialis) cannot be adequately addressed by change in individual behavior alone, although that is necessary. Through its teaching mission, the Church seeks first to bring about a "change in heart," a turning toward God. But it recognizes the need to promote social justice* in public policy, the economy*, social structures, and international institutions if material poverty is to be lessened. Being the "Church of the poor" requires a "preferential* option for the poor," which will effect the elimination of exclusionary structures, the promotion of participation by the poor, and sharing by all in the world's goods, God's wealth. See also PREFERENTIAL OPTION FOR THE POOR.

CHARLES M. A. CLARK.

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics: African Views. Although the continent of Africa is endowed with abundant natural resources, its people continue to suffer from abject poverty, because human resources and economic infrastructures are underdeveloped and controlled by people from other continents.

To understand this situation, it is enough to remember that poverty can be defined as an ensemble of conditions that prevent human beings from flourishing and attaining fulfillment. The conditions of poverty – unemployment, illiteracy, ethnocentrism, civil war, famine, disease, and marginalization – make realization of human dignity and human* rights impossible and form an interlocking web that is difficult to unlock all at once. It is perpetuated largely by ill-founded development theories, erroneous assumptions, and misguided development programs designed to eradicate poverty.

Poverty also is a deprivation of capabilities, empowerment, and basic freedoms. Thus, as can be observed in Africa, prolonged poverty produces in the oppressed a pattern of internalized oppression* that manifests itself as fatalism, dependence, and hopelessness, which perpetuate the cycle of poverty. The lack of abundant wealth production and control of it and the lack of self-confidence and visionary leadership have ultimately resulted in the loss of survival mechanisms among the present generation of Africans.

Because poverty is conditioned by the dynamics of political organizations, socioeconomic infrastructures, and trade systems, by value systems and patterns of social organizations and relationships, and by religiocultural traditions, eradicating poverty cannot be achieved immediately. The notion that poverty could be instantly overcome with the help of international financial institutions and foreign aid alone is erroneous and misleading, because it ignores the dynamics of value systems and contextual social realities. A change at the level of value systems occurs slowly because each group of people has its own understanding of the good life and conceptualizes its setting differently.

Thus development programs that propose to eradicate poverty seem artificial, ineffective, and problematic. International financial institutions, donor agencies, and governments have offered an array of solutions, ranging from the control of population growth to structural adjustment programs, from debt relief to direct aid, but none of these has succeeded in bringing significant relief. Instead of reducing poverty, these "solutions" have helped perpetuate it. To eradicate poverty, there must be a localized initiative, linking all dimensions of human experience with the spirit of survival, that advocates transformation of the patterns of social relationships by a process of conscientization* and of mobilization of the poor. See also THE PRESENT CLUSTER: POVERTY, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS: AFRICAN AMERICAN VIEWS. AQUILINE TARIMO, SJ

Poverty, Theology and Ethics: African American Views. African Americans and African Canadians cannot envision poverty apart from their inheritance of an African worldview according to which the unity of body* and soul* implies a similar unity between the material and spiritual realms of life commonly expressed in human practice and thought. Since the unity of body and soul and of material and spiritual realms is grounded in God*, the source of all reality, any rupture in that unity constitutes a theological problem, because God is part of the relationship.

The resulting disharmony from the rupture penetrates the entire social order. Poverty is one of the major forms of that imbalance. Its vivid signs are seen in the deficit of the necessary conditions for life, e.g. the loss of food, land*, water*, and/or shelter; disease; physical pain and suffering*; captivity; and death*. Most important, the loss of communal relationships – in both life and death – constitutes the greatest of all evils. It alone evidences the full-blown state of poverty. Thus African Americans may not view themselves as poor simply because they lack material resources. If their family* and communal relationships are intact they are not in a state of poverty regardless of their needs. For this reason, African* American churches have always striven to be surrogate families and support systems for their members. In fact, mutual aid societies constituted one of the earliest forms of such communal helpfulness (see Prosperity Gospel Cluster: And Economic Empowerment Gospel and African American Churches).

Whenever the spirit of African peoples was broken by the conditions of the slave* trade, colonialism*, racial segregation, and discrimination (see Racism and Christianity Cluster: In Africa), their fundamental ontological unity was disrupted and, consequently, all dimensions of their common life were threatened. The resulting discord affected the psyches of individual persons, families, and neighborhoods everywhere. A residue of their African communal spirit enabled them to hold on to the ancestral germ of sympathy, empathy, and support for one another. Broken but not destroyed, they were able to endure as a people. While praying for deliverance, they kept alive the faith and hope that their suffering would be overcome one day.

Thus the African American view of poverty has always been correlated with the injustice inflicted on them by the external forces of racism* and oppression*. Yet because they viewed their societal condition as a theological problem primarily, they always knew that deliverance necessitated the habitual performance of prescribed religious rituals in order to restore the ontological balance that had been disrupted by the power of evil forces. Invariably, such a ritual performance implied subtle forms of resistance to their social condition as well as acts of compensation for God's displeasure. Most important, it implied a willing partnership with the God of creation in effecting the desired political, ethical, and theological resolution. (Contrast this perspective with the theoretical and limited view of the unity of body and soul held by Christians in cultures influenced by Greek thought; see Soul.)

PETER PARIS

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics: Asian Views. Poverty, perhaps the most daunting problem in many countries in Asia, is a central topic of most consultations and conferences on mission*, service, or development held by the church in Asia.

Economically understood, poverty is the deprivation of basic necessities of life – chiefly food, shelter, and clothing – and the lack of a minimum level of economic security, i.e. the lack of a reasonable assurance that the basic necessities of life will continue to be met.

Beyond purely economic factors, poverty is linked with unjust structures and faulty economic systems that favor the rich. Most disturbing is the persistence of mass poverty and the increasing gap between the rich and the poor despite planned development.

Thus poverty is clearly is an ethical problem, concerning development and justice*. Development is not simply about economic growth; it is also a participation in the process toward a more just society by the powerless, who need to acquire power in order to participate with dignity in decisions affecting their lives. Christian ethical responsibility involves “advocating a strategy of developing people’s power as the only safeguard of justice in any political system” (Thomas).

For the Asian Conference on Church and Society (1999), economic witness demands that specific attention be given to “the challenge of globalization and its consequence on peoples and societies in Asia.” “An uncritical attitude and unquestioned acceptance of globalization is morally unethical, economically unwise and socially undesirable.”

Theology can perform a critical role here. Like the prophets* of old, theologians of today can challenge those who wield power (by covertly using ideologies* to further their own interests) to take more seriously their responsibilities toward the defenseless. Beyond this important critical role, theology has a more positive role to play. In creative dialogue with each specific situation, theology can articulate and clarify the vision and aspirations that sustain the people in their struggle by confronting them with the ever widening horizon of God's liberative acts. “A theology that does not stimulate Christians to commit themselves to the liberation of the exploited and oppressed* has nothing to say to them. Theologizing would be futile toil if it does not contribute to the radical social change of peoples and institutions in our semi-feudal and semi-colonial society” (1975 Statement on Theological Reflection in the Philippines).

See also GLOBALIZATION: CHRISTIAN RESPONSES.

K. C. ABRAHAM

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics: Caribbean Views. The scarcity of resources in the Caribbean Islands has made it difficult for Caribbean people to press for structural changes in the areas of economics*, health* care, and politics*. One alternative has been to respond to symptoms without addressing root causes, particularly in relationship to poverty, racism*, and the cycle of dependency – an approach that makes poverty seem intractable.

The culture of resistance of the Caribbean Christian Church has provided over the centuries a key that unlocked the doors of freedom in many island states. Thus in some ways, Caribbean people have begun to break the back of oppression* and to fashion a language opening up a new future for them. This language of a culture of resistance provides a way of dealing with issues of identity and of discrimination on the basis of gender, class, race, and sexual orientation. Could it help take on poverty as well, even though poverty seems intractable?

Thus, out of this culture of resistance, Caribbean theologians begin to ask self-critical and systemic questions such as: Why is power concentrated in the hands of a few, while the majority are "poor," i.e. are powerless to determine their own destinies? How can the church take responsibility for issues of stewardship while it is the largest landowner in the Caribbean? How can the church stand with the poor so as to speak to issues of homelessness and scarcity of resources? How can the church become the site of resistance against all forms of poverty that afflict Caribbean people? How can the church speak from the cross, from the hurt and despair of Caribbean people, identifying itself with the least of these and thus letting itself be broken for the sake of the marginalized* and abused*?

Quite often in the Caribbean, the real misery and pain of the people are hidden behind forms of partial liberation, including behind preaching that advocates the salvation* of the soul* without making a connection with the real life situations that confront people's bodies*. For too long, the church's fear of losing faith* has made it protective and defensive, while it ignores structures of oppression and fails to be proactive in its commitment to transform life in the Caribbean as it affirms its faith.

NOEL LEO ERSKINE

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics: Latin American Views. See PREFERENTIAL OPTION FOR THE POOR.

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics: North American Feminist Views. Feminist views on poverty, Christian theology, and ethics are varied but share a methodological principle to take seriously women's experience in all its complexity (the interstructuring of gender, race/ethnicity, class, sexual orientation, and nationality) and an ethical commitment to the well-being of women, their families, and communities.

The majority of the world's poor are women. Feminists understand poverty to mean not just a lack of material possessions but also social powerlessness. Women's economic vulnerability is shaped by their female physicality and socially constructed gender identities and relations. It is exacerbated by neoliberal economic globalization, which exploits women's paid and unpaid labor and commodifies women's bodies.

Feminists' views on poverty range from liberal to radical. Liberal feminists advocate changes within capitalism, such as equal employment opportunity, to overcome poverty and sexual inequality. Radical feminists doubt that these can be overcome within capitalism, with its gendered and racialized systems of domination and exploitation. They advocate participatory forms of economic democracy in which women have equal social and economic power (see Democracy and Christianity). Ecofeminists* link the oppression of women and the earth. They prioritize sustainability and care for the earth and all its inhabitants.

Feminists charge that both economics and ethics are androcentric. Women's reproductive and domestic labor is not perceived as an economic contribution or domain involving moral agency and decision making. Androcentrism is manifested in economics in the privileging of market exchange as the basis of all value. In liberal and Protestant thought, it is manifested in the public-private split. The public sphere is the realm of justice*, the private the realm of love*. This results in a romanticization of the family* and expectations that women sacrifice their own well-being for their families. This is also a problem in Roman Catholic thought. Some feminists advocate that caring and care work be made visible, valued, and shared equitably by women and men.

Roman Catholic social* teaching and various Liberation* theologies are strands of Christian tradition many feminists find relevant to understanding poverty.

However, the usefulness of these traditions is limited by their justification of gender hierarchies (patriarchy*) and the inequality of women on grounds of natural* law or orders of creation*. Feminist theologies* offer more useful theological anthropologies* for understanding gender identities and relations.

Feminists envision just, sustainable, caring economies that uphold life. Human rights are upheld, and meeting the basic needs of all is a priority. This vision resonates with biblical notions of shalom and the kin-dom of God (see Feminist Theology Cluster: In North America: Mujerista; Kingdom of God, the Concept of, Cluster: In the New Testament).

PAMELA K. BRUBAKER

Poverty, Theology, and Ethics: North American Latino/a Views. Contemporary Latino/a theological reflection has focused on the poverty that results from an unjust social system. Latino/a theologians denounce capitalism because, while it is efficient in increasing material production and trade, it remains incapable of including all people. It creates wealth* for the few and misery for the many. Latino/a theologians suspect that the process of globalization*, based on capitalist forms of production, will result in more extreme forms of social exclusion, environmental degradation, social strife, and civil wars, all of which contribute to the phenomenon of socioeconomic marginalization*, political repression, massive migration, refugees*, and massive human poverty on a global scale.

As they read Scripture*, Latino/a theologians note that few issues receive as much attention as poverty does. Scripture speaks positively of the poor in spirit (Matt 5:3), as those who have God's purposes at the center of their lives. They acknowledge their dependence on God and are even willing to sacrifice their life plans and goals to be faithful servants of God, as the prophets and Jesus have been. Rather than "being" for the sake of "having," the poor in spirit are those who "have" in order "to be" (committed to the love and justice* at the heart of God's purpose).

Latino/a theologians also note that Scripture denounces the poverty that results from exploitation and domination and dehumanizes. Wealth* gained at the expense of the poor is tantamount to idolatry* in that it gives the illusion that we are self-sufficient or independent from God and/or from poor brothers and sisters whose needs cry for social justice.

Latino/a theologians claim the centrality of the biblical image of God's preferential* option for the poor. The community of faith, in obedience to God, is to love the poor in a preferential way through acts of social justice. Christians are to advocate for the poor, responsibly sharing their resources, but most importantly struggling with them so they, too, become moral and political agents who can forge a new and more inclusive and caring society.

ISMAEL GARCÍA

Poverty Movement. In the 11th and 12th c., with the rise of a money economy, there was increasing anxiety about money and wealth; wandering reformers advocated poverty in its various forms. Pope Urban II encouraged the laity* to adopt the "religious life" (1091). The notion of three orders for clerics, professed women, and laypersons was formalized (1201) when Innocent* III approved the Humiliati and other lay reform groups. The Poverty Movement culminated in the founding of the mendicant*, or begging, orders (especially the Franciscans* and Dominicans*, early 13th c.). See also PROP-ERTY; VOWS; WEALTH.

Practical Syllogism, type of reasoning developed in the Reformed* tradition as a way of gaining assurance* of salvation*. Faith* itself was regarded as sufficient assurance, but Calvin* also sought confirmation in sanctification* and good works*, not as cause but as evidence of salvation. The following "practical syllogism" was formulated by the Puritan* theologian William Perkins* at Cambridge and promoted by Tee-link in the Netherlands: "Whoever experiences the gift of sanctification is justified; I feel this by the grace of God; therefore I am justified." In popular Protestantism, hard work, thrift, and the accumulation of wealth* came to be viewed as the signs of election (see Protestant Ethic).

Praedestinatus, a work produced in Rome (c430–40) that sought a middle position in the Pelagian* controversy, denouncing Caelestius's* views (condemned in 418 and 431) but opposing the heresy of "predestinarianism*" as a corruption of the teaching of Augustine*.

Pragmatism and Christian Theologies. A central tenet of pragmatic theologies is that Christian theologies reflect particular situations of distinct times and places and are to be ethically assessed in terms of their practical consequences. North American philosophical pragmatism is generally identified with three main figures: Charles Sanders Peirce, William James, and John Dewey*. It is sometimes called classical pragmatism to differentiate it from the contemporary neopragmatism of W. V. Quine, Nelson Goodman, Wilfrid Sellars, Donald Davidson, Hilary Putnam, Thomas Kuhn, and most notably Richard Rorty. Eclipsed by Anglo-American analytic philosophy, classical pragmatism's influence on Christian thought was relatively short (1898–1940). Many North American students of Christian thought turned from pragmatist accounts of religious experience to either Alfred North Whitehead's* metaphysical philosophy or the history* of religion and comparative religion schools. During its height, pragmatism was most influential on North American philosophy* of religion.

Four themes mark the pragmatist movement: (1) naturalism: there is no knowledge outside of human experience; (2) instrumentalism: all forms of inquiry are tools that satisfy basic human purposes; (3) fallibilism: all knowledge claims are fragments and hence fallible; and (4) ameliorism: knowledge contributes to social equilibrium or betterment.

The greatest impact of pragmatism on Christian thought was the Chicago School of Theology's Guide to the Study of the Christian Religion (1916), D. C. Macintosh's Religious Realism (1931), and humanistic naturalism at Columbia University in the Humanist Manifesto (1933). The central tenets of these projects are (1) contextual: Christian theologies are historical responses to the particular situations of distinct times and places; (2) ethical: the meaning of Christian doctrine is ethical, expressing and clarifying Christian moral values; (3) process*: God is interpreted as natural processes, patterns, and powers operating in human experience; and (4) humanism: pragmatic theologies seek human and planetary flourishing as their ultimate goal. By the 1940s and 1950s, these pragmatic theologies were eclipsed by neo-orthodox theology, Christian Realism, and post-Holocaust theologies. Renewed interest in pragmatism and Christian thought surfaced in the 1980s and 1990s as such thinkers as William Dean, Nancy Frankenberry, Shelia Davaney, and Robert Corrington confronted neopragmatism. What emerged were pragmatic naturalism (nothing outside of natural processes for theological interpretation) and pragmatic historicism (no appeal outside of history for interpreting theology). Both pragmatic theologies are supported by the Highlands Institute for the Study of American Religious Thought, through which pragmatism in Christian thought has become international, interreligious, and a means of critically assessing Christian thought.

VICTOR ANDERSON

Praise, in worship, expression of admiration for and thanks to God through prayer, song, or gesture.

Praise and Worship denotes a style of contemporary hymnody, a style of Charismatic* worship, and a commercial product within the contemporary Christian/gospel music industry. Growing out of two and a half centuries of revival* culture in England and North America, the Praise and Worship Movement began in house* churches and independent* Evangelical congregations as the convergence of a popular* culture-oriented renaissance in worship arts and the experience and theology of Spirit*-filled Evangelicalism*.

Music is the primary medium through which the Praise and Worship Movement renews* Christian worship through fresh and intensified expressions of praise*. Praise and worship is embodied, participatory worship in which music and religion become coextensive. For worshippers participation in musical worship is often the activity wherein they realize God's reality and presence most profoundly. Praise and worship liturgy is more fluid than the liturgies in mainline churches, both because of its Spirit-led performance of worship and because of its ties to trend-driven consumer culture*. The role of the worship leader is one of spiritual authority* and leadership. Women often function as worship leaders. Praise and worship songs are spiritualized popular songs. Like the mainstream pop music whose sounds it emulates, praise and worship is a stylistically diverse genre that includes soft pop, folk rock, soul, classic rock, alternative rock, hardcore punk, rap, bluegrass, jazz, and electronica. While most of these styles are not the typical fare of Sunday morning worship services, they have a place at youth group meetings, music festivals, and other extraecclesial gatherings.

Praise and worship music is one product of a burgeoning worship industry. The commodification of Evangelical worship music began as early as John and Charles Wesley's* production of hymnbooks. However, the music of worship is no longer a niche product marketed to churchgoers, but one promoted, via cable TV and other media, in the general marketplace. Worship music now functions beyond the church as a mode of alternative entertainment.

Critics allege that praise and worship music is theologically shallow and that its popularity and trendiness pose a threat to traditional liturgies and hymnody. Advocates say that praise and worship music revitalizes worship by facilitating intimacy with God and that it can be blended into and renew traditional liturgies (see Liturgies, History of). Others argue that the malleable theology of praise and worship music is the characteristic that allows it to be used in a variety of liturgical locations, where it takes on a meaning relative to each local ethos. With its affinity to pop music forms and its use of technology* in the context of worship, praise and worship music bridges worship and popular culture. See also CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER; EVANGELICALS/EVANGELICAL CLUSTER; GOSPEL MUSIC; MEDIA AND CHRISTIANITY; MEGACHURCHES REMAKING RELIGIOUS TRADITION IN NORTH AMERICA; PENTECOSTAL WORSHIP. DAVID HORACE PERKINS

Praxis (Gk "doing"), application of faith* in action, as contrasted with mere thought, although it implies reflective action. See also ORTHOPRAXY.

Prayer, for Christians, as for practitioners of other religions, is as essential for the health of the human spirit as breathing is for the body. Prayer is a universal language; some form of prayer is found in every religion and in every century of recorded history. Basically, in Christianity and many other religions, prayer is communication between human beings and a deity.

Prayer can be both an individual activity and a group activity. Individuals may pray silently, voice their prayers, chant or sing their prayers, or write their prayers on paper or cloth and put them in sacred places (such as the Western Wall in Jerusalem) or a prayer wheel (as in Tibet), or they may simply remain in contemplation ("abiding").

Group prayers are voiced by families and groups of friends; in churches, synagogues, temples, and mosques; in the natural world; and in gatherings of persons dedicated to working for peace and social justice and the meeting of urgent human needs.

Forms of prayer include praise of God (by whatever name the deity is called); *confession, expressions of sorrow for wrongdoings, by individuals or groups – even by a whole nation – by both omission and commission; *intercession, requests for help, for healing, for guidance and blessings, for individuals, groups, or nations; *thanksgiving for blessings received; and contemplation (see Contemplation, Contemplative Prayer and Life; Prayer of the Heart).

Prayer is a major practice of monks and nuns in monasteries of various faiths, including Buddhism* and Christianity (see Monasticism Cluster). So as to devote themselves totally to prayer, some orders, such as the Trappists (Cistercians*), maintain silence except to communicate something essential and to participate in several worship services each day.

In the early centuries of the Christian era, a number of monks – among whom were the desert fathers – lived in solitude in the wilderness and spent the major part of their time in prayer and meditation or contemplation (see Monasticism Cluster).

The sacred scriptures* of various religions contain teachings about prayer and collections of prayers, often used in worship services. The Bible contains both the Psalms* (widely read and sung in both Jewish and Christian worship services; see Worship Cluster: In Ancient Israel) and teachings about prayer and prayers themselves (such as the Lord's Prayer, taught by Jesus Christ to his disciples; Matt 6:9–13).

A longtime effort to strengthen a sense of spiritual oneness in the human family is the World Day of Prayer, observed by many Christian denominations. See also LITURGY; WORSHIP CLUSTER.

FRED CLOUD

Prayer Breakfast, in the USA, a meeting for businesspeople or legislators, featuring prayer and usually a short address by a religious or political leader. The custom was originated by Abraham Vereide, a Norwegian immigrant and Methodist pastor, who began the breakfasts to counter the influence of socialism in Seattle (1935). The National Prayer Breakfast, addressed by the US president, has been held since 1953. It is criticized for seeking out powerful leaders, including some dictators, for taking a “top-down” approach to politics, and for compromising the separation between church* and state.

Prayer of the Heart, a nondiscursive, affective intuition of the presence of God that touches the will*, resulting in the perfecting of love* and other virtues*, in joy and repose. The prayer of the heart is also known as active contemplation or centering prayer. In Roman Catholic teaching, this form of prayer is considered to be “acquired” through an active contemplation preceded by the mental disciplines of spiritual meditation. It is therefore not “infused” (mystic or passive) and is thus distinct from mystic* contemplation and union with the Divine.

Prayer of the heart was called “active recollection” or the “prayer of simplicity” in Carmelite* spirituality as taught and practiced by Teresa* of Ávila and John* of the Cross. Prayer of the heart was also part of the spirituality of Francis* de Sales (17th c.) and was popularized in Western Europe, especially by Quietists* such as François Malaval (1627–1718; An Easy Practice to Elevate the Soul to Contemplation) and Jeanne Guyon* (1648–1717; Short and Easy Method of Prayer), who viewed this form of prayer as open to all. Their treatises were condemned in part for diminishing the role of meditation as a preparation for contemplation and for blurring the distinction between acquired and mystic contemplation. Yet the active prayer of the heart remained a constant emphasis within Western spirituality*, even among German Pietists* (e.g. A Short, Easy, and Comprehensive Method of Prayer, attributed to Johann Kelpius, 1673–1708), who were influenced by Quietist spirituality. In the late 20th c., Thomas Keating of the Cistercian* Trappist tradition popularized “centering prayer” in North American ecumenical contexts. See also CONTEMPLATION, CONTEMPLATIVE PRAYER AND LIFE.

PATRICIA A. WARD

Preaching, talking of God, is as ancient as human speech. Before there were preachers, there were Hebrew storytellers, prophets, and sages. Storytellers gave us the great myths of creation* in Gen 1–11, as well as stories of God’s covenant* promises to patriarchs. But prophets*, called by God, were more obvious precursors of preachers, for they spoke a public “Word of God” to people. Later, there were sages who instructed people (as in Proverbs*) to lead prudent lives for God.

Israel also contributed a “theology of the Word.” According to Genesis, God spoke and the world was created. Again God spoke, “Let my people go,” and Israel passed through the sea, free of enslavement. God’s words are never idle; they accomplish what God intends (see Performative Language).

Scattered Jewish communities, separated during the Exile from the Jerusalem Temple, founded local places for prayer and learning. The word “synagogue*” means “place of assembly.” After the destruction of the Second Temple, synagogues became central to Jewish life. Synagogue worship featured a sermon usually based on readings from the Torah, but also referring to the Prophets and wisdom writings, and thus continued to shape Israel’s identity.

Jesus was a Jewish preacher. He spoke of a coming realm (kingdom*) of God, urging people to live in God’s new social order in preparation for God’s new social order. In God’s realm, the poor would be raised up, the hungry fed, the powerless empowered, and the oppressed set free. Jesus gathered disciples to share the task of preaching his message of liberation. Evidently he welcomed followers to meals, perhaps celebrating the eschatological banquet on Mount Zion, anticipating the actual end of time. After staging a prophetic protest in the Temple during Passover week, Jesus was arrested and publicly crucified* by Roman authority. Cruel death seemed to discredit his message, and the Jesus movement scattered. But disciples came together again to testify to his resurrection*, a divine endorsement of Jesus’ gospel message. Christianity began with a message.

As a Jewish sectarian movement, Christianity inherited in-house patterns of worship from the Jewish synagogue, including the biblical sermon. But as ties with Judaism became strained, Christianity began to expand in a Gentile world with evangelical preaching. Although the sample sermons in Acts* are probably products of Luke’s rhetoric, early missionary preaching may well have been a kind of storied recital. From the start and through the centuries, there were both preaching to spread the message and in-house preaching from scriptural texts.

Gradually, preaching practices were learned. Origen* (d254) urged interpreters to discern different senses of Scripture: literal, moral, and mystical. The Cappadocians* and John* Chrysostom (347–407) in the East, and Augustine* (354–430) in the West, set preaching styles that prevailed for centuries. Augustine wrote De doctrina christiana, the first Christian homiletic guide.

Although preaching languished during the Middle Ages, Charlemagne* in the 8th c. encouraged the education of clergy and required sermons to be preached in the language of the people every Sunday and holy day. Much preaching was catechetical. As for the training of preachers, there were 12th-c. guides, including Alan of Lille's (1128–1202) significant The Art of Preaching. Preaching revived in the 13th and 14th c. when Franciscan* and Dominican* friars produced collections of sermons as well as homiletic guidebooks.

With the Renaissance and Reformation, there was a huge renewal of preaching. In the Roman Catholic tradition, Erasmus* wrote his formidable rhetoric. And Protestant Reformers, Luther*, Zwingli*, and Calvin*, inaugurated influential patterns of preaching. Reformers often preached sermons in which they interpreted books of the Bible from beginning to end, lectio continua, day after day. To Reformers, preaching was the Word of God and thus bound to be effective. Luther and Calvin preached thousands of sermons but did not write homiletic guides. Instead, Melancthon*, Luther's colleague, wrote the first Protestant rhetoric for preachers.

The Catholic* Renewal, begun by Erasmus, was carried on with the founding of the Jesuit* order. In 1545 the Council of Trent* mandated preaching every Sunday and feast day, and provided for the homiletic training of priests.

In 1607 the Puritan* William Perkins* wrote his Arte of Prophesying urging a plain, but reasoned style of preaching. His work was influential. By contrast Continental Pietism* favored preaching to the heart, the style of which was both affective and personal. Pietists influenced John Wesley* in England and Jonathan Edwards* in the USA. With Evangelical preachers, such as George Whitefield*, a pattern of revival* preaching developed that was centered on "the conviction of sin" (a feeling of the dreadfulness of sin* that dishonors God and condemns the sinner), the acknowledgment of helplessness, and the announcement of the free unmerited mercy of God.

In the centuries that followed, one can trace alternating currents of rational plain-style preaching and the fervor of Evangelical sermons. In the 20th c., four movements have been significant:

1. The rise of the Social Gospel. Early in the century, Walter Rauschenbusch* wrote A Theology for the Social Gospel (1917) urging preachers to address social issues and thereby effect social change.

2. The Biblical Theology Movement. P. T. Forsyth led the way with his 1908 Beecher Lectures and Karl Barth* followed with The Word of God and the Word of Man (1928). They championed biblical preaching, rejecting addresses on topics or themes.
3. A turn toward pastoral preaching. In 1928 Harry Emerson Fosdick proposed "life situation" preaching, measuring the success of sermons by how many people requested pastoral counseling. Fosdick's methodology led to widespread therapeutic preaching.
4. The Liturgical Movement*. This movement prompted Vatican* II's insistence that a priest's first duty is the proclamation of the gospel. Thereafter Roman Catholic theology schools began employing full-time homiletic faculty members.

Other social factors influenced preaching: the rise of the Black churches in North America and the ordination of women* led to the publication of significant works on homiletics. Henry Mitchell's Black Preaching (1970) established an African American homiletic. Although women have preached for centuries, Christine Smith's Weaving the Sermon (1989) inaugurated a growing literature on women's homiletic. Since the 1970s, homiletic literature has multiplied, as have academic societies for the promotion of homiletic thought. See also RECEPTION STUDIES OF PREACHING. DAVID BUTTRICK

Predestination. Discussions of predestination are concerned with the extent to which God intentionally determines in advance what will occur. "General predestination" refers to God's predetermination of all that occurs. "Salvific predestination" refers to God's predetermination of who will spend eternity with God.

The differing perspectives on "general predestination" reflect diverging understandings of the extent to which God controls all of creation. For theological determinists (e.g. Luther*, Leibniz), since God controls even "free" human choice, while not every state of affairs is of inherent value, God's comprehensive decree predetermined on balance the "best of all possible creative options."

For most free will theists (e.g. Wesley*, Hicks*), God could be, but is not, all controlling. God has voluntarily granted us a type of freedom* (libertarian freedom) over which God does not exercise control; consequently, much of what occurs as the result of human choice was not predetermined. Some free will theists (following Origen*, Augustine*, Molina*, Bellarmine*, and Suarez*), however, believe that God possesses “middle* knowledge.” God has always known what every person would freely do in every possible circumstance. Thus by planning and actualizing a world containing only those circumstances in which God knows we will freely do what God would have us do, a predetermined creative plan of God’s choice was brought about. Thus we are predestined “for” some task; predestination is related to vocation*, ministry*, and mission*, to which people are called by God, as is the case when predestination is related to the doctrine of the church*, as for Calvin*.

The differing perspectives on “salvific predestination” (a concern of Western Christianity with an “honor and juridical satisfaction” perspective; see Atonement #2) center on the extent to which individuals are saved or damned apart from personal choice or action.

For “double predestinarians” (e.g. Gottschalk*, Calvin*), because all humans since the Fall have been “born in sin,” all can justly be allowed by God to spend eternity in hell* (apart from God). However, God has predetermined that some will be “saved” by God’s irresistible, unconditional grace*, while others will not be offered such grace. This predetermination is based neither on any decision or action by those individuals nor on God’s foreknowledge of their actions.

For “conditional predestinarians” (e.g. Arminius*), God has offered saving grace to everyone; whether someone is saved is conditional on whether he or she accepts God’s gift. God, with middle knowledge, saw from the beginning who would freely choose to accept his grace and predetermined to offer such grace to them.

For “conditional non-predestinarians” (e.g. “open theists” such as Clark Pinnock), God’s grace is offered to everyone, but God does not foreknow who will accept this conditional offer.

See also GRACE OF GOD CLUSTER: IN THE WESTERN TRADITION.

DAVID BASINGER

Preexistence, the belief that Jesus Christ existed before his incarnation*. Paul calls Christ the power and wisdom of God (1 Cor 1:24), who was in the form of God yet took that of a human (Phil 2:6–8). Identifying Jesus with preexisting divinity is much stronger in Hebrews (Heb 1:1–4) and in John (especially 1:1–14).

Preferential Option for the Poor. Since its inception, Latin American Liberation* theology emphasized the preferential option for the poor as a positive affirmation of the faith commitment to live in solidarity with the poor, i.e. the vast majority of the population in Latin* America and the Caribbean* Islands. Actually, the preferential option for the poor is not “optional.” It is at the core of the Christian faith and the major challenge of the gospel.

From the perspective of the Christian faith, the poverty* of the majority of Latin American people has a historical basis; it is the result of unjust conditions and thus is contrary to the will of the God of the Bible, who wants love*, life, and justice*. It is this historical condition of poverty that the Latin American Episcopal Conferences of Medellín* (1968) and of Puebla (1979) called “inhuman,” “anti-evangelical,” and a demonstration of “institutionalized violence.”

As the Peruvian theologian Gustavo Gutiérrez has repeatedly said since 1971, the preferential option for the poor is a theocentric option: it is based on God. There is another valid reason for adopting this option: the injustice of poverty, as is demonstrated by economic and social analysis. Nonetheless, ultimately the preferential option for the poor is anchored in faith* in God. To adopt it in our own historical circumstances is to take the same option that God unconditionally took when siding with the impoverished and the oppressed*, saying, “I have witnessed the affliction of my people in Egypt and have heard their cry” (Exod 3:7; NAB). This is the God of the Psalms, who “cares for the lowly and knows the proud from afar” (Ps 138:6; cf. Ps 72:12–14); the God of the prophets, who denounces oppression as an offense against God; the God whom Jesus proclaimed in parables; the God of Lazarus; the God of the lepers. This is the God who, when the powerful and rich are indifferent and refuse the invitation in the parable of the Great Supper, gives the order, “Go out quickly into the streets and alleys of the town and bring in here the poor and the crippled, the blind and the lame” (Luke 14:21); this is the God of the song of Mary, who “has thrown down the rulers from their thrones but lifted up the lowly. The hungry he has filled with good things; the rich he has sent away empty” (Luke 1:52–53).

The preferential option for the poor is also clearly a Christocentric option: Jesus made the preferential option for the poor the key to his messianic praxis and his message. In deeds and words, Jesus proclaimed “the Kingdom* of God and God’s justice” (Matt 6:33), which, for the benefit of the poor and of those who suffer, transform the unjust order that prevails in the world. In this way, Jesus proclaimed justice*, liberty, fulfillment, health, restoration, reconciliation, community life, and welfare – all granted by God.

Jesus was born in the world of the poor and lived in solidarity with the “little ones” and with the socially and religiously marginalized* – living a preferential option for the poor. In the synagogue of Nazareth, by reading the prophet Isaiah (Luke 4:16–20) Jesus defined his mission as bringing the good news of liberation to the poor, as the Jubilee* and an affirmation of the right to life.

The preferential option for the poor has two aspects: evangelical solidarity with the poor and the denunciation of poverty* as unjust and anti-life. Social analysis shows that poverty is caused by unjust socioeconomic structures and marginalization. Poverty is not just an economic phenomenon; it is also cultural and ethnic, and takes many forms. The preferential option for the poor demands a detailed knowledge and understanding of the multidimensionality of poverty.

Consequently, Latin American Liberation theology placed the preferential option for the poor at its very core. Liberation theology sees the poor and marginalized as in urgent need of liberation in a globalized world ruled by a market economy and a lack of solidarity, both of which ignore the pain and injustice suffered by humiliated and impoverished people. Liberation theology chose to speak of the “preferential option” because of the universality of God’s love* that reaches every person without exception, but first the “little ones” and the vulnerable, those who live under unjust conditions characterized by exclusion and death, because they cannot meet their basic needs for work, food, dwelling, health care, and education.

For Latin American Liberation theology, believers are called to take on themselves with deep faith* and hope* the theocentric and Christocentric preferential option for the poor and to express it in gestures of love and solidarity with the poor and the excluded, the truly crucified ones, who struggle for the fundamental right to life.

VICTORIO GUILLÉN ARAYA

Pregnancy. Scripture, medical knowledge, and cultural attitudes have influenced Christian views of pregnancy.

In Scripture pregnancy is portrayed as intrinsic to human nature, related to the Fall*, and a sign of God’s favor. With the words “Be fruitful and multiply,” Gen 1:28 links pregnancy to the fecundity and goodness of creation*; procreation is an intrinsic aspect of the order of the universe. In Gen 2, Eve’s* defiance of God’s command is tied to pain in childbearing. Pregnancy is also viewed as a sign of God’s favor. For example, Noah*, Abraham*, Sarah*, and Hagar* are promised that they will be blessed with children and that their descendants will cover the earth; the angel Gabriel* views Mary’s* status as the mother of Jesus as an indication that she has “found favor with God.”

Medieval attitudes about the physiological process of pregnancy were influenced by Aristotle’s medical view that the male “seed,” or sperm, contained a homunculus, a tiny but completely formed human being that was deposited inside the female, who simply nourished the growing being. For Aristotle male children were the product of “good” seed, and the anima (soul*) entered the body 40 days after conception, while female children were the product of “weak” seed, and the soul did not enter the body until 90 days after conception. These attitudes reinforced a hierarchical understanding of gender relations that viewed women as inferior to men.

Pregnancy has historically been the domain of women. Western cultural convention through the 19th c. dictated that pregnancy be acknowledged when a woman announced she was pregnant or when her physical appearance showed it. Given the numerous causes of a lack of or irregular menstrual periods, many women could not confirm pregnancy until they detected fetal movement (between the 4th and 6th months). Furthermore, women’s pregnancies and deliveries were managed largely by other women, often midwives, “wise women,” or other female healers. Evidence suggests that many of these same women were persecuted as “witches*” and killed during the Inquisition*. In the mid-19th c., male physicians sought to increase their professionalization through guild membership, advanced degrees, and licensure. By 1850 women were sent to doctors to have their pregnancy confirmed by physical examination.

Ambiguous scriptural and cultural attitudes about procreation, sexual activity, pregnancy, infertility/barrenness, and motherhood have had and will continue to have a significant impact on attitudes toward women, their roles in society, and their capacity for leadership in the church. See also BIRTH CONTROL AND CONTRACEPTION, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF.

REBECCA TODD PETERS

Prelate, a person holding a high ecclesiastical office, usually a bishop*, an archbishop*, a metropolitan*, a patriarch*, or an official in the Roman curia*.

Premillennialism. See DISPENSATIONALISM; MILLENNIALISM CLUSTER.

Preparatory Service, Reformed* service of confession* and repentance* before the Lord's* Supper; admittance traditionally required a Communion* token (see Fencing the Table). Camp* meetings on the US frontier may have originated in the Scotch and Irish preparatory service.

Presanctified Liturgy, or "Liturgy of the Presanctified Gifts," is a Lent* service of the Orthodox* Church, which typically takes place on Wednesdays and Fridays and during Holy Week. It is a great vespers* fused with rites for the distribution of Holy Communion (from gifts consecrated on the preceding Sunday).

B. MARK SIETSEMA

Presbyter (from Gk for "elder"), title for a leader in the early church, at first identical with "bishop"* (Acts 20:18; Titus 1:5–7) but later applied to the clergy* under the bishop. This title is equivalent to the French prêtre and the English "priest," terms derived from "presbyter" (and not derived from the Greek and Latin words now translated "priest*"). See also PRIESTHOOD.

Presbyterian Churches. Presbyterianism is named for its basic principle of governance: rule by elected elders (presbyters). Presbyterian churches and their theology emerged from the 16th-c. Protestant Reformation*, with a Reformed* theology inspired by John Calvin*. John Knox* studied with Calvin and brought Reformed theology to his native Scotland*. A systematic exposition of this theology, and its application in polity and worship, was developed in the Westminster* Confession of Faith, produced by 17th-c. English Puritans* with Scottish advisers. In 1706, seven ministers formed the first colonial American presbytery in Philadelphia.

Presbyterians hold in common with all Christians the mystery* of the Triune God (see Trinity in Eastern Orthodoxy; Trinity in the Western Tradition) and the belief that Jesus Christ is human and divine. Like all Protestants, Presbyterians believe in the authority of the Bible (see Scripture) and salvation* by God's grace*, accepted through faith*. In addition, Reformed and Presbyterian churches have characteristic theological emphases: the sovereignty and providence* of God*, the election* of people to salvation and service (vocation*), the covenant* life of the church, stewardship of God's creation*, the sin* of idolatry, and a commitment to transform the world in obedience to the Word of God.

Presbyterian history in the USA reflects the effort to balance unity in essentials with diversity in nonessentials. For Presbyterians, doctrinal discussion has often been combined with theological debate about issues in the larger society. For 320 years, the Westminster Standards – the Westminster Confession of Faith, the Larger Catechism*, and the Shorter Catechism – were the sole confessional documents of British and North American Presbyterianism. Nonetheless, differences over what were essentials led to divisions. There was a division from 1741 to 1758 between the New Side, which favored revivalism*, and the Old Side, which advocated formal creedal agreement. Later, in 1837, the New School, which supported cooperation with Congregationalists*, was ejected by the Old School, which insisted on remaining separate. The underlying cause was slavery*; the New School favored abolitionism*, whereas the Old School held that slavery was biblically justified. New and Old School factions consolidated in the North in 1869. In the South, both sides also reunited after the Civil War. From 1893 to 1927, the modernists, who embraced contemporary science*, quarreled with the fundamentalists*, who promoted five essential and necessary doctrines based on an inerrant* Bible. In this case, the underlying issue was evolution*, which the modernists accepted and the fundamentalists rejected. This conflict was resolved in 1927 when the right to interpret the confessional standards was returned to the presbytery.

Changes in the Presbyterian confessional stance took place in the 20th c. The Westminster Confession was revised in 1903 to balance the doctrine of God's decrees with an affirmation of God's love. In 1958, with the union of the United Presbyterian Church of North America and the Presbyterian Church in the USA, a committee was created to draft a contemporary statement of faith. The theme of the resulting Confession of 1967 was "reconciliation*," focused on conflicts over race*, war*, poverty*, and "anarchy in sexual* relations."

Early in its process, the committee received permission to publish the Book of Confessions to broaden Presbyterian understanding of its Reformed roots. Adopted in 1967 by the United Presbyterian Church in the USA, the book included the Nicene* Creed, Apostles'* Creed, Scots Confession* (1560), Heidelberg* Catechism (1563), Second Helvetic Confession (1566), Westminster Confession of Faith and Shorter Catechism, Theological Declaration of Barmen* (1934), and Confession of 1967.

When, for some, the balance between essentials and nonessentials was upset, other, smaller Presbyterian bodies came into being: the Orthodox Presbyterian Church in 1939, the Presbyterian Church in America in 1973, and the Evangelical Presbyterian Church in 1981. These new denominations, objecting to changes in social mores and what they perceived to be changes in church doctrine, returned to the Westminster Confession as their theological standard.

In 1983 the United Presbyterian Church in the USA reunited with the (Southern) Presbyterian Church in the United States to form the Presbyterian Church (USA). The first moderator of the reunited church was charged to appoint a committee to compose a brief statement of the Reformed faith for possible inclusion in the Book of Confessions. Adopted in 1991, "A Brief Statement of Faith: Presbyterian Church (USA)," summarized the Christian, Protestant, and Reformed faith in contemporary language. It also enlarged the Reformed tradition by including an account of Jesus' life and ministry; proclaiming the equality of all people, both men and women; and asserting that the Spirit calls women and men to all the ministries of the church.

JACK B. ROGERS

Presence, Divine. See MYSTICISM.

Presence of Christ. Several NT passages state that, after his resurrection and exaltation, Jesus in his humanity "is not here but has risen" (Matt 28:6; cf. Acts 1:9–11). This is often interpreted to mean that his resurrected body is located in heaven, beyond human experience. The problem for Christian piety is, How can Jesus become/remain present? Four kinds of answer are given.

1. Christ is present in his divinity; his human presence is no longer needed (based on verses like "Do not touch me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father" [John 20:17] and Paul's statement that he no longer knows Christ in a human way [2 Cor 5:16]).
2. Popular piety often assumes a human presence of Jesus, as in the hymn "And he walks with me and he talks with me," theologically grounded in the Miaphysite* emphasis on the inseparable unity of the divine and human in Christ and in the Lutheran doctrine that Christ's humanity acquires the attributes of his divinity, including omnipresence.

3. Jesus' humanity is present in the Eucharist*. For the Roman Catholic Church and (in a slightly different way) the Eastern Orthodox Church, the bread and cup are transformed into the Body and Blood of Christ; this doctrine is usually termed "real presence." Thomas Aquinas argued, however, that the body and blood are present substantially but not locally. Sacramental presence is not the same as local presence.

Calvin* abandoned any notion of substantial presence; according to his eucharistic doctrine, believers' hearts are lifted up to the ascended Jesus by faith, he is truly exhibited by the bread and wine, and he is made present by the power of the Holy Spirit. This is a "virtual presence" or a "spiritual real presence" (J. W. Nevin*).

Others in the Reformed tradition emphasized the sign character of the Eucharist, making Christ present not substantially but in the event of proclaiming the Word and "showing forth" his death in the Eucharist.

4. Christ is present in others, either in a Christian gathering, "where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (Matt 18:20), or among the disciples in mission (Matt 28:20); or in "the least of these" (when the parable of the sheep and goats in Matt 25 is interpreted as gospel).

See also PREFERENTIAL OPTION FOR THE POOR.

EUGENE TESELLE

Presentation, Feast of (also Candlemas*), liturgical celebration of Jesus' presentation in the Temple and the purification of his mother, 40 days after his birth (Luke 2:22–39; cf. Lev 12:1–4), February 2 in the West.

Prester John ("Presbyter" John), legendary Christian ruler variously thought to have been in Asia, India, or Ethiopia. The first vague mention of Prester John was made by a traveler from India in Rome (1122). In the crusader* kingdoms of Palestine, the story was told (1145) about this Christian ruler and priest in his empire beyond the territory ruled by Islam.

The legend could be based on garbled traditions concerning an Assyrian Christian ruler (belonging to the Church* of the East, often unduly called Nestorian) among the Mongols or the Christian emperor of Ethiopia*. It stimulated the hope that he would appear to rescue the crusaders in their fight against the Muslims.

Priesthood. From a cross-cultural perspective, priesthood refers to the office of a priest; one empowered or authorized to perform sacred rituals*, especially sacrifices*. In some traditions, priesthood is largely hereditary (as in ancient Mesopotamia); in other cases, priesthood is received through ordination* (as among Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and Anglican Christians).

The Hebrew biblical term for priest, kohen, was translated into Greek as hierews and Latin as sacerdos. The English word “priest” comes from the French prêtre, derived from the Greek presbyteros (elder), the comparative of presbys (old man). In Roman Catholic ecclesiastical Latin, presbyter and sacerdos are equivalent terms for “priest.”

In ancient Israel, the construction of the Temple in Jerusalem led to the centralization of the priesthood, linked variously to the family of Aaron (Exod 28:1; Lev 8:1–9:22) and the tribe of Levi (Num 3:6–9). The high (or anointed) priest was responsible for the sin offering (Lev 4) and the sacrifice for the Day of the Atonement (Lev 16).

The NT presents Jesus as the “great high priest” (Heb 4:14) linked to “the order of Mechizedek,” the king of Salem, who brought out bread and wine and blessed Abraham (Gen 14:18–20; Heb 5:6, 10; 7:1). By offering himself as the sacrifice “once for all” (Heb 10:10), Jesus superseded the need for the Jewish priesthood (Heb 5:7–10) and established his followers as a “holy priesthood” (1 Pet 2:5) (see Priesthood of All Believers).

The Greek NT does not use “priest” (hierews) in reference to Christian ministers. In the First Epistle of Clement* (c96), presbyters and bishops are described as merely analogous to the priests of ancient Israel (1 Clem 41), but gradually the term itself was adopted, just as the Communion table became an altar* and the Eucharist* a sacrifice. By the time of Tertullian* (c160–221), Hippolytus* of Rome (c170–235), and Cyprian* of Carthage (c200–58), the term “priest” (sacerdos/hierews) can be found in reference to bishops and presbyters, but not deacons (cf. Tertullian, Exhort. 7; Hippolytus, Trad. Ap. 3; Cyprian, Ep. 61.3.1).

Roman Catholics, Orthodox, and many Anglicans believe Jesus instituted the Christian priesthood at the Last Supper when he authorized his disciples to offer the eucharistic* memorial of his sacrifice (Luke 22:14–20). Reformed and Protestant Christians, however, reserve the title “priest” for Christ and the priesthood shared by all believers. “Presbyters” are elders, pastors, or ministers, not members of a separate “priesthood.”

ROBERT FASTIGGI

Priesthood of All Believers, doctrine that all Christians are truly “priests,” based on several NT passages, especially 1 Pet 2:5–9 and Rev 1:6, 5:10, 20:6. The early church called its leaders presbyters* (elders*) and bishops* (overseers), and “priests” only after the 3rd–4th c., by analogy with the priests of Israel. The term “priest” acquired a quite different meaning when the term “presbyter” was contracted into “priest.” The Protestant Reformation* reasserted the priesthood of all believers; the Roman Catholic Church acknowledges that all believers are priests through baptism*, continuing to think of presbyters as priests in this distinctive sense.

Primate, bishop who holds first place in a province* or, more recently, in a region or state.

Prior, Prioress, person with second place after the abbot or abbess in a monastery, or the superior of a priory subordinate to an abbey.

Prisca (Priscilla). Prisca is mentioned by Paul, along with her husband, Aquila, as one of his very active “co-workers” (Rom 16:3; see also 1 Cor 16:19; 2 Tim 4:19; Acts 18, using the diminutive Priscilla) and hosting a house church (first in Rome, then in Corinth, Ephesus, and again in Rome). There is no evidence that she was the martyr whose grave was venerated in the Roman catacomb* of Priscilla.

Priscillianism, movement in the 4th c. that originated with Priscillian (d386), a Spanish layman of high rank who promoted an ascetic* mode of life. This aroused suspicion about private meetings and confusion of gender roles (cf. Eustathius* of Sebaste), which were condemned by a synod of 10 bishops in Saragossa (380). Accused of Manichaeism*, Priscillian defended his orthodoxy in several writings and sought approval from Ambrose* in Milan and Damasus* in Rome, without success. On his return to Spain, he became bishop of Ávila (381). When a synod of bishops in Bordeaux condemned his views, he appealed to the new emperor in the West, the “usurper” Maximus, under whom he was beheaded (386). This first execution of an accused Christian by a Christian ruler – though on grounds of sorcery, not heresy – was opposed by Martin* of Tours, Ambrose of Milan, and Siricius of Rome as secular interference in church matters. The stereotyping of “Priscillianism” as a movement came at the council of Toledo (400) after Priscillian’s death, and in the writings of several heresiologists, including Jerome* and Orosius. He was widely regarded as a martyr in Spain, and the shrine at Compostela* may be located at his burial place.

EUGENE TESELLE

Private Judgment, in Protestant churches, the responsibility of each person to base judgments on Scripture*, not on human (including ecclesial) authority*.

Praoño, Leonidas (1910–88), “the Bishop of the Indians.” Born in San Antonio of Ibarra, Ecuador; founded the first popular radiophonic schools of Ecuador. As bishop of Riobamba (1954), he dedicated 33 years to defending the rights and dignity of native people throughout Ecuador*. He was the subject of misunderstanding, slander, and unfair persecution by dictatorships, economic groups, and the Roman Catholic Church hierarchy. He was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize (1986).

LUIS MARÍA GAVILANES DEL CASTILLO

Procession, orderly movement of a body of persons on a solemn liturgical occasion, either festal* or penitential* in function.

Process Theology affirms that biblical thinking is supported by the philosophical idea that the world is composed of events each of which is a synthesis of relations to other events. This applies to electrons and human experiences, and even to God, who, far from being immutable, is constantly enriched by new occurrences. People, instead of being self-contained, are constituted by their relations in community.

Process theology arose at the Chicago Divinity School in the 1930s. Its antecedent was the sociohistorical school, whose leaders wanted to end the controversy between science and theology by integrating them. They found hope in new developments in science* that broke with its reductionism.

They were impressed by Alfred North Whitehead, the English mathematical physicist whose cosmology of events was both more responsive to new scientific knowledge and more hospitable to religion. Every event is a subject as it occurs. Hence, the incorporation of human beings by evolutionary theory did not deny the role of emotion, reason, or purpose. God also is a subject interacting with creature.

Whitehead’s thought was taught in Chicago by a radical empiricist, Henry Nelson Wieman, and a rationalistic metaphysician, Charles Hartshorne*. Wieman thought that faith* requires full confidence in God, whom he described in a fully empirical way. Those who came to be called Process theologians followed Hartshorne and Whitehead in affirming God as a subject. They rejected creation* out of nothing and God’s total control. While God contributes to the becoming of each event, these create themselves by integrating their past with new, God-given possibilities. An interactive God who influences everything but fully controls nothing seems more compatible both with the Bible and with the reality of evil*.

This philosophical approach separated Chicago from mainstream theology. This changed when Schubert Ogden integrated Hartshorne’s theism with Rudolf Bultmann’s* existentialism*. Daniel Day Williams wrote a Whiteheadian systematic theology. Since then much similar work has been done. Diverse doctrines and emphases have been formulated in process terms. For example, different process Christologies* have focused on incarnation*, revelation*, and salvation*. Some emphasize Jesus’ similarity to us; others, his difference.

Process theology’s nondualism* and nonanthropocentrism prepared it for the ecological challenge and close alliance with ecofeminists*. Its nonsupernaturalism opened it to the wisdom not only of Christian faith but also of other communities. It works supportively with Liberation theologies. It continues to seek the integration of science and theology by reformulating both in processive terms.

JOHN B. COBB, JR.

Proclus (c390–446), patriarch of Constantinople. A celebrated preacher, he delivered (429/30) a renowned homily on Mary* as Theotokos* (Mother of God), triggering a controversy with Nestorius*, who asserted that Mary could be the mother only of Jesus’ humanity. Proclus’s homily was given special honor at the Council of Ephesus* (431), which condemned Nestorius. His “Tome to the Armenians” (433) persuaded many of them to abandon the Nestorian* position. Proclus differentiated between hypostasis* and nature*, mediating between the Cyrillian insistence on one hypostasis and the Nestorian on two natures. His formulation became an important source of the doctrine of the Council of Chalcedon* (451).

Profession, declaration, promise, or vow on entering the religious* life, usually to follow the three counsels* of perfection (poverty, chastity, obedience). In Reformed traditions, a (weekly) profession of faith, a declaration of faith (usually by the recitation of a creed*).

Programme for Theology and Cultures in Asia (PTCA; since 1983; C. S. Song, first dean) is not an institution but a theological movement committed to implementing living theologies with Asian resources, seriously engaging local, regional, and global issues (see Contextual Theologies). Gathering existing theological associations from all over Asia at its national, regional, and theological seminar-workshops and consultations, PTCA has, as attested to by its list of publications, promoted cross-generational Christian theologizing in Asian ways that engages issues concerning Asian people's movements; Asian religions*, cultures*, symbols*, and images; Asian festivals and customs; Asian Spirit movements (see Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster: In Asia); women*; religious fundamentalism*; globalization*; mission* in Asia; and naming God* in Asia.

SIMON SHUI-MAN KWAN

Prohibited Degrees of Marriage, relationships of blood or family that make it unlawful (on the basis of biblical, Roman, or Germanic criteria) for two persons to marry. See also MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF, CLUSTER.

Pro Juárez, Miguel Agustín (1891–1927), Mexican Jesuit* priest who, despite the anticlerical restrictions of the 1917 Constitution and the resistance that culminated in the 1926 armed uprising of the “Cristeros”, devoted his ministry to workers and the poor*. Detained as a suspect in an assassination attempt against the president-elect Álvaro Obregón, without judicial process, he and his brother Humberto were executed (1927). He was beatified by John* Paul II (1988). See also MEXICO.

MARÍA ALICIA PUENTE LUTTEROTH and ELIZABETH JUDD

Prologues (to Biblical Books)

Marcionite Prologues are brief introductions to the letters of Paul, contained in most Latin manuscripts of the Bible, including the Vulgate*. The oldest are the prologues to Galatians, 1 Corinthians, Romans, 1 Thessalonians, Ephesians, Colossians (with Philemon), and Philipians. Originally written in the form of a connected introduction to the Pauline corpus, these prologues set the letters in “chronological” order before the inclusion of the Pastorals*. Since Marcion* assumed this sequence, the prologues have been attributed to him; but the same order is found elsewhere, the content is not Marcionite, and the prologues were widely used in the Western Church.

Monarchian Prologues are short introductions to each of the four Gospels in many manuscripts of the Vulgate*. Today they are generally attributed to Priscillian* or his followers, since the Monarchian* teachings are similar to his.

Anti-Marcionite Prologues are short introductions to the Gospels of Mark, Luke, and John in many manuscripts of the Vulgate*. They were originally composed in Greek, but only the prologue to Luke (probably the earliest, perhaps from the late 2nd c.) survives in that language. The others are from the late 4th c.. Their anti-Marcionite character is generally doubted.

Promised Land. The Bible displays a strong “land mystique,” from the patriarchal sagas with their central promise of the land, through the postexilic restoration. The conquest of Canaan* (13th c. BCE) is a watershed. The pre-conquest is a time of the promise, followed by a time of covenantal* relationship of Israel as a nation with God as its king. Subsequently, the land is almost completely lost but is reclaimed in some fashion until 135 CE.

The land is the concrete embodiment of Israel's faith*, hope*, and love* and of the covenant* with God, preventing the revelation* from being a disincarnate set of ideas. The covenant is way of life in time and space (land).

God's own property, the land is “inherited” by Israel through conquest (see Canaan). Any nation that invades the land is dispossessing God and will be punished, said the prophets. When the land's dispossession was completed by the Romans (70–135 CE), the land was “spiritualized” both by Jews (e.g. Rabban Yohanan ben Zakkai, 1st c. CE) and by early Christians. While some insist that the land has become obsolete for the church, others see a displacement of the biblical land to Rome, Constantinople, or Moscow. Certain fundamentalists* hail the modern Jews' emigration to the ancestral land as a process leading eventually to their conversion* to Christianity.

Throughout, the land remains, paradoxically, a promised land. The promise at the beginning of salvation* history stands valid until the end. The land can never be claimed by anyone but God. The land of “Palestine” is a microcosm for the creation, God’s “garden.” The inhabitants of the “land” anywhere in the creation are only guests or “renters” (Lev 25:23; 1 Chr 29:15; Heb 11:9; 1 Pet 2:11). See also LAND, THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES AND PRAXIS, CLUSTER.

ANDRÉ LACOCQUE

Propaganda Fide, Congregatio de, office of the papal administration (curia) concerned with mission activities and the administration of areas without an indigenous hierarchy. It was formally established (1622) in order to consolidate Roman Catholic gains in Germany during the Thirty* Years’ War; its responsibilities soon became global. It was renamed the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples (1967). See also CATHOLIC RENEWAL.

Proper, any portion of the liturgy* (e.g. prayers, readings, hymns) that is specific to a particular day in the church year.

Property (from Lat for “one’s own”), that which is gained, possessed, owned, and controlled to the exclusion of others. Hunter-gatherer and pastoral societies generally assumed that all members had access to resources: ownership, and thus “property,” was communal. In agrarian and urban societies, under feudalism*, and in colonialist* and neocolonialist situations, sole access to and control of property confer both advantages that lead to class differentiation and obligations to superiors and inferiors that readily authorize economic exploitation or slavery*. Under capitalism, property is held “in fee simple” and can be “alienated,” or sold. Ownership is never absolute; it may be restricted by contracts, deeds, or wills* and/or regulated by public authority for the common good or to protect human* rights.

Major changes from shared access to private property, with disruptive social consequences, include the “enclosures” of common woods and pastures in Germany at the time of the Reformation* (one of the causes of the Peasants* War) and in England and Scotland during the 18th c.; seizure of lands in colonial settings for the benefit of European owners; and changes in the Mexican Constitution (1992), commodifying all land.

In Christian history, ethical concern for the use of property may be compatible with, and critical of, any of these ways of understanding of property. Thomas* Aquinas’s general theory of property finds a place for each understanding: (1) the earth as a whole is given to the whole human race, (2) private property is not absolute, although it is advisable on pragmatic grounds, but (3) private property is still held as a trust conferring obligations toward others. In extreme cases, the poor are allowed to “take” what they need, and this is not theft.

In the NT, Jesus had harsh words about wealth* and urged giving without expecting a return. The early church in Jerusalem held all things in common and distributed to those in need (Acts 2:44–45, 4:32–35). Paul (Gal 2:10) calls the Jerusalem Church “the poor” (Heb ebionim), possibly its self-designation (Ebionites*). In the Gentile mission, Paul and Luke replaced community of goods with almsgiving*, thus viewing property as a trust held on behalf of the poor. Similarly, in the patristic period, many early bishops, especially John* Chrysostom, reproached persons of great wealth for stealing from the poor and urged almsgiving as a means of salvation for the wealthy (cf. Matt 19:16–26; Luke 12:33, 18:18–27, 16:19–31).

“Community of use” has come to be a widespread approach to issues of property. The Council of Antioch* (341) stated that church properties belong first to the poor, then to the bishop, the clergy, and their dependents. Rome and the West acknowledged four equal claims: the bishop and his household, the clergy, the poor, and repair of church buildings. In the East, it was expected that a third of one’s property would be given to the church; in the West, bequests took the place of an additional child (see Will).

Each monastery owned its property in common, on the model of the Jerusalem Church (see Monasticism Cluster). But the Franciscans* championed poverty*, following Jesus’ instructions (Matt 10:9–10). While using “property” (houses, furnishings, books), they owned nothing, either personally or as an order; ownership was placed in the hands of the cardinal protector. This practice, called “poor use,” was mandated by Francis* and Bonaventura*, and was later called “dominion” (Gen 1:26, 2:15), i.e. stewardship* without ownership. There was controversy, however, over this Franciscan tradition. Nicholas III in *Exiit (1279) acknowledged the difference between ownership and use, but affirmed “right of use,” calling it a kind of ownership, which John XXII reaffirmed, declaring it heretical to claim that Christ owned nothing (1323).

Other religious* orders followed Paul's practice of "working with one's own hands" (1 Thess 2:9, 4:11–12); this ideal of the 4th-c. monastic movement was lost in the West, until the Beguines*.

During the Renaissance, new attitudes toward property developed when Erasmus* and his Catholic and Protestant followers criticized almsgiving* as a means of encouraging dependency, and instead championed poor* relief. The Reformation* revived and reinterpreted the NT notion of vocation*, making daily work a "calling" in which one could exercise discipleship to the glory of God. Property was needed for most callings, and its use was to be guided by a sense of stewardship*. The Protestant* ethic enhanced the importance of private property as one basis for assurance* of salvation. See also ECONOMY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: ECONOMIC ETHICS AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; POVERTY CLUSTER; PROSPERITY GOSPEL CLUSTER; WEALTH AND CHRISTIANITY. EUGENE TESELLE

Prophecy and Prophets. The earliest recorded human mediation of the divine will to others comes from Mari (early 2nd millennium BCE). A similar phenomenon existed in Nineveh (early 1st millennium), when a third prophetic movement, biblical prophecy, was flourishing. Affinities among these three movements – particularly those entailing the language employed to designate prophets as divine messengers and seers and formulaic expressions (e.g. "Fear not"; "The god has sent me;" "Thus shall you say") – suggest some kind of relationship.

Just as prophets in Mari and Nineveh included ecstatic messengers to kings and diviners who responded to inquiries by ordinary citizens, so biblical prophets filled a wide spectrum of roles, from peripheral critics of royalty to central officials in the royal cult. The usual title for a biblical prophet (nabi) is etymologically tied to the Akkadian word for one who is either summoned by a deity or who proclaims a divine word. Other designations indicate a capacity to divine things hidden from normal individuals, often by technical means; an ability to see into the immediate future; and special intimacy with the deity and the spirit. Ecstatic conduct and clairvoyance are found in only a single example of prophecy (from Syria, transmitted through an Egyptian narrative). Above all, prophets directed their words to kings, often assuring them of a god's protection but also demanding specific actions on their part. Because their message occasionally fomented social revolt, administrators devised methods for punishing dangerous prophets. Biblical prophecy presented a vexing problem, for no adequate criteria for determining authenticity were devised. The failure was not for lack of effort; prophets who advocated contrasting messages in the name of the same deity made the quest an urgent one. In Israel, the iconic David complicated matters, for prophets held opposite views about the claim that the biblical God had established the Davidic kingdom for perpetuity. Those who accepted this disputed theological affirmation developed messianic* hopes* pertaining to the future.

As in the Bible, prophets in Mari normally delivered their words orally, and letters summarizing the oracles were transmitted to distant rulers. Standing before a statue of a god, a prophet functioned as spokesperson for that deity. The ranks of prophets included both men and women; they delivered messages for deities of both sexes. The most prominent goddess was Ishtar of Arbela. The only named prophetess in the Bible was Huldah, but frequent references to female prophets indicate that divine intermediation was open to all, and Joel* envisioned a day when prophecy would break all social barriers. The designation of Abraham*, Moses*, and Deborah* as prophets is probably anachronistic.

Israelite prophecy can be defined by three stages: preclassical, classical, and postclassical. The temporal marker for the transition to the ethical monotheism* of classical prophecy was the 8th c. BCE, the time of Amos*, Isaiah*, Hosea*, and Micah*. Seventh-century prophecy took on priestly elements with Ezekiel* and to some extent Jeremiah*. The shift to postclassical prophecy occurred in the late 6th c. when prophets began either to reflect on earlier prophetic oracles or to incorporate elements of apocalyptic* thinking into their words.

Zechariah 13:2–6 represents the low point of biblical prophecy, but the promise in Deut 18:15 kept the hope* alive into NT times that in every generation, or at some future time, a prophet like Moses would arise and command obedience by the people.

Biblical prophecy gave voice to the people by boldly criticizing kings, nobles, and priests for oppressing* the poor*. This championing of widows, orphans, and the needy in the name of their maker was often costly, for those in authority were reluctant to surrender power. Prophets spoke on behalf of the deity, but they did not surrender their individuality. Jeremiah even struggled with his commissioner, personally resisting the message entrusted to him.

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

Prophets, the, biblical books that constitute the concluding part of the OT: Isaiah*, Jeremiah*, Lamentations*, Ezekiel*, Daniel*, Hosea*, Joel*, Amos*, Obadiah*, Jonah*, Micah*, Nahum*, Habakkuk*, Zephaniah*, Haggai*, Zechariah*, and Malachi*. For Jews, the list of books that constitute the second part of Tanakh*, the Prophets, is similar but not identical; it adds Joshua*, Judges*, 1 and 2 Samuel*; 1 and 2 Kings* but excludes Lamentations and Daniel (which are included in the Writings*).

Propitiation, action performed to render another person propitious or favorable, specifically to appease the anger* of God after a sin* has been committed. It is often contrasted with expiation*, where the emphasis is on making up for, or erasing, a sin. See also ATONEMENT #2.

Proselytism (Gk “newcomer”). In Judaism and the NT, a proselyte was one who had been circumcised and “come into” the Jewish community. In modern times, the term “proselyte” is applied to a convert to any group. “Proselytism” has acquired negative connotations. Since the 17th c., it has been applied to overzealous, coercive, or manipulative attempts to convert other Christians to one’s own Christian church or movement. One aspect of colonialism* (or imperialism*) was its sponsorship of proselytizing among many peoples; e.g. the Berlin* Conference gave missionaries rights of access throughout Africa. With the growth of religious freedom in Eastern Europe, the hegemony of Western culture, and the financial resources (as well as zeal) of missionary organizations, proselytism has become an issue in many countries. Proselytizing of other Christians has been outlawed in Greece since 1911, and it has been opposed in contemporary Russia*. Proselytizing of non-Christians is outlawed in several states in India* and in many Islamic* countries. See also MISSION CLUSTER.

Prosper of Aquitaine (c390–c463), advocate of Augustinian theology. Probably a monk in Marseilles, he was disturbed by the opposition to Augustine’s views among John Cassian’s* followers. While not denying grace*, they wanted to ensure a role for free* will, specifically at the “beginning of faith” (see Semi-Pelagianism). Prompted by correspondence from Prosper (c428), Augustine* wrote his last two treatises, On the Predestination of Saints and On the Gift of Perseverance. In 431 Prosper went to Rome to defend Augustine’s position, published several works against his critics, and was a close adviser to Pope Leo* (440–61). The canons of the Council of Orange* (529) are based partly on Prosper’s excerpts from Augustine.

PROSPERITY GOSPEL CLUSTER

Prosperity Gospel in Africa

Prosperity Gospel and Economic Empowerment Gospel in African American
Churches

Prosperity Gospel and Liberation Theology

Prosperity Gospel and the Word-Faith Movement

Prosperity Gospel in Africa. Prosperity theology came to Africa from the USA through the Pentecostal* churches, and especially through the Charismatic* Movement that radiated through a multiplicity of African-led Christian communities – the “revivalist*” churches of an “African Great* Awakening.”

This theology is grounded in a particular vision of God* as the lord of all wealth*, following the prophet Haggai 2:8: “The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, says the LORD of hosts.” This God is proclaimed to be the one who blesses his children by showering on them material treasures and success in all that they undertake. Visible prosperity and success are unmistakable signs of divine blessing and of believers’ faithfulness. Jesus said, “I came that they may have life, and have it abundantly” (John 10:10). A Christian community demonstrates that it truly is a church that God loves and supports by its ostensible financial abundance. Yet such churches are shown to be truly blessed only insofar as their pastors are themselves rich, indeed very rich, thanks to believers’ bountiful gifts. This wealth must be imposing: luxury cars, huge, lavish houses, and magnificent church buildings.

The pastors have to be successful in recruiting new members through acts of wonder and miracles* (including spiritual healings*), which demonstrate that the pastors' power comes from God and the Holy* Spirit. Spiritual power is the second pillar of Prosperity theology (after wealth); it provides a lens through which pastors' material wealth is justified and validates their preaching, which makes it a duty for all God's servants to be most generous, and even extravagantly so, in giving to others.

From the perspective of other churches in Africa and the concern for ethical responsibility in preaching, this teaching is misleading and highly dangerous. The entire message of the theology of prosperity is colored by the atmosphere and language of "a delirious mysticism." It appears to be designed primarily to manipulate Christian believers to give a lot of money to the leaders of their communities. In the present situation in Africa, what is needed instead is a message that will open believers' eyes to the political, economic, cultural, and social problems that crucify Africa on the cross of underdevelopment and despair. From this perspective, in Africa the Prosperity Gospel seems to be a big but shallow enterprise of psychological manipulation of believers by a few skillful preachers, rather than a deep and powerful movement of transformation of the African continent into a fertile space of shared happiness.

KÄ MANA

Prosperity Gospel and Economic Empowerment Gospel in African American Churches. The Prosperity Gospel, an increasingly popular though theologically problematic ecclesial orientation, has had a profound impact on African American Christian practices in the post-civil rights era. Its popularity can be attributed, in part, to the late-20th-c. Evangelical* and Charismatic* revivals* and the Word*-Faith Movement. A renewed emphasis on personal encounters with the divine made evident via Spirit baptism (baptism* in the Holy* Spirit), physical healing*, and the promise of material wealth* helped to shift the terrain of North American Protestantism from traditional mainline to more Pentecostal-informed, Charismatic* religious expressions. Such an orientation may be related to the Black Church's long-standing emphasis on God as an "ever present help in the time of trouble" (see African American Cluster).

Mutual aid societies (since the late 18th c.) were part and parcel of independent black congregations. When Richard Allen* adopted the slogan "To Seek for Ourselves" for the newly organized Free African Society and subsequent African* Methodist Episcopal Church, members pooled economic resources to provide health* care coverage, unemployment compensation, and death benefits for members. This overt economic agenda found a new mode of expression amid the Great Migration Era (1900–50). As more than 3 million blacks moved from the southern region of the USA, they looked to the Black Church as their social service provider. African American megachurches in cities like New York, Chicago, and Detroit acted as welfare agencies, retail centers, employment bureaus, and real estate investors in order to mitigate the callous conditions of urban life that befell Southern migrants. Congregations such as the Abyssinian Baptist Church in Harlem and the Concord Missionary Baptist Church in Brooklyn continue this legacy by establishing community development corporations and job training centers, and by investing in and providing affordable housing.

This historical emphasis on economic empowerment explains why many interpret Word*-Faith teachings as an extension of this tradition. On the surface, such a connection appears plausible. Financial stability and upward mobility, central tenets of Word-Faith practices, are staples of the progressive Black Church's mission. But theologians and progressive-oriented clergy have criticized the Prosperity Gospel as little more than the sanctification of North American capitalism used to justify individual economic gain rather than promoting the social good and economic empowerment of the community. Therefore, many African American clergy seek to distinguish the Prosperity teachings of Rev. Ike (1970s) and Word-Faith teachers (since then) from the Black Church tradition of economic empowerment embodied in the progressive wing of civil* rights activism.

See also POVERTY CLUSTER: POVERTY, THEOLOGY AND ETHICS: AFRICAN AMERICAN VIEWS. JONATHAN L. WALTON

Prosperity Gospel and Liberation Theology. Efforts to incorporate concepts of prosperity, retribution, self-improvement, and individualism into North American Protestantism began as early as the first settlements in North America, at Jamestown and Massachusetts Bay, and continued through the Enlightenment* and the industrial revolution. These are the roots of what is known as Prosperity theology or Prosperity Gospel.

Many of the diatribes against Prosperity theology focus solely on the more extreme manifestations of this perspective. These extreme manifestations do exist (see the present cluster: In Africa). However, like Liberation theology, which is more properly referred to as Liberation* theologies, Prosperity theology is a complex phenomenon with many incarnations. The basic tenets that Prosperity theologies hold in common are (1) the idea that God desires prosperity for all of God's children, (2) a biblical grounding of prosperity ideals as an extension of the Abrahamic covenant* to include Christians after the death and resurrection of Christ, (3) the practice of "positive confession" or "name it and claim it" as the means of obtaining the material blessings associated with health* and wealth*, and (4) the concept of "seed faith" as giving in faith* more than one can reasonably afford in order to reap better returns. These various aspects are emphasized to greater or lesser degrees in different Prosperity teachings.

The concept of prosperity encompasses spiritual, mental, and physical, as well as financial, benefits. Furthermore, from the more moderate perspectives, financial prosperity is not given to believers to make it possible for them to live in luxury, but rather to enable them to address the issue of global poverty*. Thus financial security, in contexts of deprivation, can be a form of liberation. According to Kenneth Copeland, the good news for the poor is that God does not want the poor to be poor anymore.

It is this message in particular that has popularized Prosperity theologies as a significant theological export, evidenced by the exponential growth of Prosperity churches recorded in Latin America, Africa, and Asia in the later part of the 20th c. Prosperity theologies are often deemed inimical to Liberation theologies. Upon further exploration, however, some surprising convergences emerge.

Both Liberation and Prosperity theologies recognize poverty as an evil (see Poverty Cluster). Both can agree that God does not want the poor to be poor and that God wishes to rectify their suffering in this life, not the next. Both argue for a holistic view of salvation* as a matter of spiritual, physical, social, and psychological well-being. The spiritual aspects of salvation are not denied, but in both cases the physical aspects are emphasized in reaction to a perceived deemphasis of these very aspects in many Christian traditions.

Both Liberation and Prosperity theologies make selective use of biblical texts. Liberation and prosperity are both key biblical themes, and interpretation of the biblical text does not definitively support either perspective. Furthermore, both theologies assume a certain level of direct correspondence and relevance between biblical and contemporary issues, whether these are liberation struggles or questions of health and wealth.

Both Liberation and Prosperity theologies are interested in resistance to domination and oppression*. Prosperity theology views domination primarily as a spiritual issue, one that can be addressed through faith* and positive affirmations; Liberation theology views domination as a systemic social issue, which can be resolved through active religious and political resistance. Both perspectives evince and could be united around a spirit of resistance. Both offer resources of empowerment that can be utilized politically. The challenge, particularly in communities that preach prosperity, is activating those resources.

The similarities between these two perspectives extend far beyond these points. The differences between the two theologies should not be minimized. Nevertheless, Prosperity and Liberation theologies may have more to learn from each other than proponents of either perspective have been willing to consider. See also MEGACHURCHES IN EL SALVADOR; THE PRESENT CLUSTER: IN AFRICA.

ALISSA JONES NELSON

Prosperity Gospel and the Word-Faith Movement. See WORD-FAITH MOVEMENT AND ITS WORSHIP.

Protestant Ethic, so named by Weber*, a pattern of habitual, disciplined work and self-control that shuns luxury and pleasure and values thrift and accumulation. It developed in late medieval and early modern times (in monasteries), and was often associated with the Lay* Piety Movement (c11th–13th c.). The link with Calvinism* and Protestantism*, and their view of labor as an expression of thanks to God for one’s election, was not made until the 17th c. See also LABOR, THEOLOGIES OF.

PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Protestantism

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Protestantism in Africa: Southern Africa

Protestantism in Africa: Western Africa

Protestantism in Asia: China

Protestantism in Europe: France

Protestantism in Europe: Germany

Protestantism in Europe: The Nordic Countries

Protestantism in Europe: Russia

Protestantism in Latin America

Protestantism in Latin America: Argentina

Protestantism in Latin America: Brazil: Churches of Immigrants

Protestantism in Latin America: Brazil: Churches of Resident Aliens

Protestantism in Latin America: Brazil: Colonial Period

Protestantism in Latin America: Brazil: Mission Protestantism

Protestantism in Latin America: Brazil: Parachurch Associations

Protestantism in Latin America: Central America

Protestantism in Latin America: Colombia

Protestantism in Latin America: Mexico

Protestantism in North America: Canada

Protestantism in North America: United States

Protestantism in the South Pacific and Australia

1) Introductory Entry

Protestantism. The term “Protestantism” denotes a family of Christian religious trends that originated in the 16th c. as a consequence of the European Reformation*. The variegated historical, cultural, and intellectual origins of Protestantism meant that, from the outset, it was a complex phenomenon. The term “Protestant” dates from the late 1520s and came to be applied to the movement at a relatively late stage. In its earlier stages, the Protestant Movement tended to define itself in terms of its “Evangelical*” identity. In actuality, “Evangelicals” is the general term used to designate Protestants in Latin America and other parts of the world (in contrast to North America, where the term “Evangelicals” designates exclusively conservative Protestants, as distinguished from mainline Protestants; see Evangelicals/Evangelicalism Cluster: And Evangelical Theologies).

Four significant constituencies can be identified in the first era of Protestantism. First, a group crystallized around Martin Luther* (1483–1546), whose reforming activity centered on the university town of Wittenberg in Northeastern Germany. Although Luther was reluctant to use the term “Lutheranism*,” this epithet rapidly came into general usage to designate this movement.

Second, an essentially independent reform movement developed in Switzerland. Initially, this movement was particularly linked to the city of Zurich and its Reformer, Huldrych Zwingli* (1484–1531). During the 1540s, the center of intellectual and political power in the movement gradually shifted toward the free city of Geneva, and its leading Reformer, John Calvin* (1509–64). Although often referred to as “Calvinism*,” this term is probably best reserved for Calvin’s own views or those of his close followers; the epithet “Reformed*” is preferred.

Third, a more radical wing of the Reformation emerged in both Germany and Switzerland, which held that Luther’s and Zwingli’s reforms had not been sweeping enough. The term “Anabaptist” (literally, “rebaptizers”) was initially used to refer to this movement because of its tendency to insist on adult baptism. In recent years, the term “Radical Reformation” has come to be preferred (see Radical Reformation).

Fourth, a distinctive style of Protestantism emerged in England during the period 1535–70, when the themes of the Reformation on the Continent were adapted to the English situation.

Early Protestantism derived its distinct identity from its emphasis on returning to the Bible as the supreme authority* of Christian life and thought. This principle is often expressed in the Latin phrase sola scriptura (by Scripture* alone). It paralleled, though was not identical with, a characteristic theme of Renaissance humanism: the importance of returning ad fontes, to the fountainhead of cultural norms in antiquity. This emphasis has remained characteristic of Protestantism, although it is interpreted in different ways. For example, for most Lutheran and Reformed Protestants, this emphasis on the Bible does not rule out the relevance of patristic or certain medieval writers. In marked contrast, more radical Protestant writers tend to regard patristic* and medieval theology and spirituality as corrupt or inauthentic.

This emphasis on the authority of the Bible had a further consequence for Protestantism: the rejection of papal* authority. Although Protestantism went on to develop a wide variety of church polities and ministries, the movement maintained its original criticism of the concentration of theological and institutional authority in the person of the pope. There is no equivalent of the papacy in Protestantism. The absence of a central authority is often seen as a cause of the movement’s subsequent fragmentation.

Many Protestants regarded the doctrine of justification* by faith alone (Lat sola fide) as being of critical importance. According to this distinctive doctrine, associated primarily with Martin Luther, humanity is unable to enter into a relationship with God under terms of its own choosing. A right relationship with God is a matter of grace*, not of works*; it is to be seen as the result of divine graciousness, not human achievement. This aspect of the Reformation was generally seen (e.g. by Philipp Melancthon*) as an extension of Augustine’s* anti-Pelagian* agenda to the late medieval church. Although it was widely regarded as an integral aspect of early Protestant identity, radical Protestant writers tended to regard this teaching with suspicion, believing that it undermined Christian morality and discipleship.

These emphases have remained a part of Protestant identity since the 16th c. As the movement has expanded and developed, the interaction of these elements has shifted. The first two distinctive features remain substantially intact: most Protestant thinkers and denominations remain committed to the primacy of Scripture (though differences of interpretation must be noted; see Scripture) and a rejection of any formal institutional, theological, or spiritual authority of the pope (though many recognize the personal gifts and authority of individual popes, particularly the late John Paul II). Although most Protestants continue to consider the doctrine of justification by faith important to Protestant self-identity, there are indications that some no longer see it as definitive. In part, this reflects continuing concerns among some Protestants over the biblical foundations of the doctrine or its moral and spiritual implications; it also reflects the rise of ecumenism*, which has led many Protestants to reexamine the history of early Protestantism and offer revisionist accounts of the role of this doctrine. SEE ALSO JUSTIFICATION, THEOLOGICAL VIEWS AND PRACTICES,

CLUSTER: A CENTRAL DOCTRINE FOR WESTERN CHRISTIANITY.

ALISTER E. MCGRATH

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Protestantism in Africa: Southern Africa. Protestantism arrived in Southern African (South* Africa, Lesotho*, Swaziland*, Mozambique*, Zimbabwe*, Botswana*, Namibia*) with colonizers from Portugal (Mozambique), Holland (South Africa), Britain (South Africa, Lesotho, Swaziland, Zimbabwe, Botswana), and Germany (Namibia). The earliest Protestant Church was probably established in 1652 by Dutch settlers: the Dutch Reformed Church (Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk).

The second half of the 20thc. was a period of rapid change. Countries in Southern Africa attained independence. Protestantism played a major role in the transitions from colonialism to self-rule. Change continues as the region seeks to define itself amid threats of globalization*, poverty*, HIV/AIDS, and political instability (e.g. in Zimbabwe*).

Protestants constitute a relatively large percentage of the population in South Africa (30.7%) and Namibia (47%); they constitute a smaller percentage (between 8 and 14%) in the other countries. As elsewhere Protestants are distinctive for their emphasis on the supreme authority of the Bible, liberty* of conscience, the individual's right to interpret Scripture*, and commitment to a just social order. As elsewhere there is a struggle between conservative and liberal theologies.

Although Protestants were seldom allied with colonial governments, they did not mount an effective opposition to colonial regimes. Nevertheless, they trained some who became leaders in liberation movements. In Mozambique*, FRELIMO (Front for Liberation of Mozambique) had leaders trained in Protestant schools. Many of these, including 31 African Presbyterian leaders, were arrested in 1972, among them Zedequias Manganhela and Jose Sidumo (who died in Machava prison).

Apartheid* in South Africa crumbled under the pressure of critics that included Anglican Bishop Desmond Tutu, Presbyterian Alan Boesak, and the Christian Institute of South Africa, with its influential Journal of Theology in Southern Africa. In Namibia the United Evangelical Church of South West Africa (uniting two Lutheran churches; 37% of the population in 1995) played an important role in the struggle for independence in 1971 when its African leaders published a pastoral letter condemning the politics of apartheid.

Protestants help set trajectories of stability, development, and hope* in the face of challenges posed by post-9/11 anxieties, a shrinking globe, phenomenal advances in science and technology, and the concentration of wealth* among elites. In South Africa, the Truth* and Reconciliation Commission headed by Bishop Tutu helped former bitter enemies to envision a future together. In the face of HIV/AIDS and a life expectancy that has plummeted to less than 40 years, Protestant campaigns have emphasized abstinence, faithfulness to one's partner(s), and the use of condoms.

HENRY MUGABE and
ISAAC M. T. MWASE

Protestantism in Africa: Western Africa.

Formal planting of Protestantism in Western Africa dates to 1618. Until then all Christian activities in the region were undertaken by Roman Catholics. Various European merchants established themselves along the coast by building forts for commercial purposes; these merchants were accompanied by chaplains who played the dual role of providing spiritual welfare for the Europeans and preparing the ground for later organized missions in Western Africa.

Following the 18th-c. Evangelical revival* in Europe, Protestant missionary societies, such as the Church Missionary Society, Wesleyan Missionary Society, Basel Missionary Society, and North German Missionary Society, successfully planted various Protestant churches, including Presbyterian, Methodist, and Anglican churches in Western Africa during the 19th c.

Protestant missionary activities had both positive and negative results. They contributed immensely to the development of the region in terms of social infrastructure, formal classroom education*, and the stimulation of African mother tongues (see Bible Translations Cluster: Present-Day Translations in Africa). However, the missionary endeavor failed to sympathize with and constructively relate to the indigenous spiritual beliefs that underpin the traditional worldview in West African cultures (see African Religion and Christianity Cluster). The resultant Protestant churches directly inherited both the gains and the deficiencies of the missionary efforts.

The responses to Protestant Christianity in Western Africa have been so varied that they could be placed on a spectrum ranging from total rejection through partial acceptance to total acceptance. The churches have been contending with pressing issues, such as church* and state relations, the quest for a new form of spirituality, liturgical renewal, indigenization, selfhood and aid, relationships between Western African churches and European churches, and church unity. The Protestant churches spearhead social action, particularly through schools and hospitals.

A major response to the gospel in Western Africa has been the emergence of African* Instituted Churches, which marked a new era in the contextualization* of Christianity on African soil. Making good use of the Bible translated into West African languages, the African Instituted Churches, as well as Pentecostal* and other Charismatic* churches, have arguably made headway in appropriating biblical resources in the West African context, helping Protestant churches to discover ways of being the church in Africa by ceasing to be a Western church. Contemporary African Protestantism seeks to engage the interior of the indigenous worldview and to reclaim it for Christ. As such it is a manifestation of the existence of an identifiable contemporary African Christianity. See also AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES CLUSTER: IN WEST AFRICA; CHARISMATIC AND PEN-

TECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: WESTERN AFRICA.

CEPHAS N. OMENYO

Protestantism in Asia: China. Protestant Christianity, introduced in China (1807) by British missionary Robert Morrison (1782–1843), remained alien to a majority of the Chinese people for more than 150 years. Early missionaries were too closely involved, politically and militarily, with Western foreign powers to understand the need for and significance of indigenization and inculturation*. After the Opium Wars (1840, 1860), a long series of incidents involving missionaries, culminating in the Boxer Uprising (1900), set the scene for the Centennial Missionary Conference (Shanghai, 1907). The ensuing rethinking and readjustments of mission policy led to more successful developments in the early 20th c., when churches rapidly developed educational, medical, literary, and philanthropic services. In the meantime, important developments – political and social unrest following the downfall of the Manchurian imperial regime (1911), and the introduction of democratic thinking, Western scientific knowledge, and Marxist revolutionary theory among students and intellectuals – gave rise to the May Fourth New Culture Movement (1915) and to the Anti-Religion and Anti-Christianity movements (1919–26). In response to these, two important reformist movements marked a new era of change (1920s–1930s): the Independent Church Movement (pioneered in 1906 by Rev. Yu Guozhen) extended and demanded the separation of the churches from foreign missionary societies in financial, personnel, and organizational matters; similarly, the Indigenization Movement stressed sinicization (assimilation into Chinese culture) in theology and liturgy (heralded by Dr. T. C. Chao and others). These movements culminated in the Declaration of Churches by the General Conference of Chinese Protestant Churches in Shanghai (1922), which affirmed the “three-self” principle of self-government, self-support, and self-propagation that would later become a formal movement.

The war against the Japanese (1937–45) and the liberation civil war (1946–49) plunged the country into disorder, which was conducive to the spread of fundamentalism*, Millennialism*, and spiritual revivalism*. By midcentury there were about 700,000 Protestant Christians organized into denominational churches affiliated with foreign missionary associations and independent indigenous churches (e.g. the Little Flock, the True Jesus Church, and the Jesus Family). In a country of more than 600 million people, these constituted only a tiny minority of less than 1% of the population, culturally marginalized and dissociated from the broad masses of people.

With the founding of the People's Republic (1949), the church entered a new phase in which all relationships with foreign missions were severed. Under the leadership of Wu Yaozong (Y. T. Wu), the Three-Self Patriotic Movement was formally launched, purporting to build the Christian Church anew as a truly Chinese church. After the Cultural Revolution (1966–76), the church emerged as "postdenominational," organized around the Three-Self Patriotic Committees and Christian Councils on the national, provincial, and local levels, respectively. Since then, Protestant Christianity has witnessed unprecedented growth and development. It is estimated that at present there are more than 16 million Protestants worshipping in more than 60,000 Three-Self churches and "assembly points," with 25,000 "clergy" or "church workers." In 2004 a Bible printing press in Nanjing celebrated the printing of 40 million copies of the Bible in Chinese and ethnic minority languages. A network of some 20 theological seminaries and hundreds of short-term theological schools are preparing thousands of young preachers and ministers to serve the ever growing and developing churches. The theology of the local churches, generally speaking, is rather conservative, following the Evangelical* tradition. But currently under the leadership of Ding Guangxun (Bishop K. H. Ting), a campaign of "reconstruction of theological thought" is being launched among urban church leaders and theological seminaries, with more open, humanistic, and socialist leanings, stressing contextualization and accommodation within the contemporary social and cultural milieu.

In the meantime, there have arisen outside the established Three-Self churches an increasing number of "house* churches," the numerical strength of which has been variously estimated as comparable to or higher than that of the Three-Self churches. Although Protestant, they try to remain at a distance from the Three-Self churches, but not necessarily because of hostility. They are nondenominational and independent of each other, without centralized regional or national organization; they are not registered with the Bureau of Religious Affairs and usually stand aloof from social or political involvement. Their theology is either fundamentalist or Evangelical (see Chinese Contemporary Independent and House Churches).

Another phenomenon since the late 1990s worth noting is the emergence of "cultural Christians" and an increasing interest in Christianity among intellectuals, in stark contrast to the antireligious and anti-Christian attitude of previous decades. Many university departments and institutions specializing in Christian studies have been set up, and theological books, either translated or written by Chinese scholars, have been published, attracting many sympathetic readers. Most scholars involved may not be confessed Christians, but the general tone of discussion is appreciative and positive about the gospel. This seems to point to a bright future for the development of Christianity in China, but the Protestant churches, whether established or house churches, do not appear to be prepared to meet the challenge of academia. See also CHINA; NORTH INDIA, CHURCH OF; SOUTH INDIA, CHURCH OF; THREE-SELF PRINCIPLE AND PATRIOTIC MOVEMENT IN CHINA; UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST IN THE PHILIPPINES.

CHEN ZEMIN

Protestantism in Europe: France.

French Protestantism (which developed on the basis of its Huguenot* heritage) broadly supported the process of laicization* that eventually led to the 1905 law establishing a strict separation of church* and state (1905). This support reflected the complex interactions and tensions (since the mid-19th c.) between Protestant churches and the revival* movement, and among the Protestant movements of mission, evangelization, social action, and education. This dynamics also strongly contributed to the creation of the French Protestant Federation (1907), composed of Protestant churches and charitable institutions. The Federation was needed to assuage the tensions resulting from heated debates on secularism* and from the division between Evangelical and liberal groups. Under the strong leadership of Marc Boegner during the difficult period from 1930 to 1964, it fostered union among Protestants and the safeguard of freedom of public worship. By 2000 most Protestant churches in France (Reformed, Lutheran, Baptist, Evangelical, several Pentecostal-Charismatic* church unions), social work institutions (including CIMADE*), and mission societies were participating in the French Protestant Federation (900,000 members) and were in constant contact with the Evangelical Federation of France and the National Union of Assemblies of God. Each member church maintains its own identity and distinctive qualities. Though the churches disagree about many issues (e.g. baptism, social ethics), they remain committed both to a cordial yet demanding dialogue* on local and national levels and to a common witness and social service. Representing Protestantism in conversation with the French government and the media, the Protestant Federation emphasizes Protestant unity beyond its diversity. In this way, with the help of remarkable leaders such as Suzanne de Dietrich and Madeleine Barrot*, as well as scholars such as Roger Mehl, Georges Casalis, André Dumas, Jacques Ellul, and Paul Ricoeur*, French Protestantism makes a distinctive contribution to the practice of secularism* in a nation with strict separation of church and state.

JACQUES STEWART

Protestantism in Europe: Germany. The Reformed* tradition in Germany was influenced by several factors. The Reformed churches in Switzerland* established relationships with Reformers in Strasbourg and other south German cities before the death of Zwingli* (1530), and Calvin's* years in Strasbourg (1538–41) strengthened the relationship. The elector of the Palatinate invited Reformed theologians to draw up the Heidelberg* Catechism (1563); other German princes, especially in Anhalt and on the lower Rhine, also inclined toward Reformed rather than Lutheran doctrines and practices. While this tradition was not acknowledged by the Peace of Augsburg* (1555), the Reformed were often tolerated as moderate Lutherans in the tradition of Melancthon*, and they gained further legitimacy at the Reichstag of 1566.

The fortunes of the Reformed tradition in Germany were closely linked with the house of Hohenzollern. The elector John Sigismund of Brandenburg converted to the Reformed faith (1613), guaranteeing freedom of conscience for his Lutheran subjects. He became duke of Jülich-Cleves-Mark-Berg on the lower Rhine, which was already Reformed (1614), and duke of Prussia (1618), where most people were Lutherans.

Reformed pastors served in either the court or the army. The Prussian rulers supported religious tolerance and encouraged both the Enlightenment* and Pietism* in their realms, giving special support to Zinzendorf* and the Moravians*.

Maintaining this inclusive spirit, and inspired by the model of the Church of England (see Anglicanism Cluster: Anglican Communion and Its Theology), Friedrich Wilhelm III promoted the Prussian* Union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches in his territories (announced in 1817 in connection with the 300th anniversary of the Reformation). While the Union was opposed by most Lutherans, and Schleiermacher*, its most important defender, objected to many details, the Prussian Union persisted and was gradually adopted in other territories. Following classic Protestant principles, a representative "synodal" government was adopted, especially after the revolution of 1848. The major liberal theologians of the 19th c. (Schleiermacher*, Rothe, Ritschl*, Harnack*) were either Reformed or Unionist. Many Lutherans continued to take positions that were more “conservative” or “confessional,” even as they became affiliated with the comprehensive Evangelical Church in Germany. See also GERMANY; LUTHERANISM CLUSTER: IN GERMANY; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: GERMANY AND LUTHERANISM; REFORMED CHURCHES.

EUGENE TESELLE

Protestantism in Europe: The Nordic Countries. See LUTHERANISM CLUSTER: IN NORDIC COUNTRIES.

Protestantism in Europe: Russia. Protestants appeared in Moscow in the first half of the 16th c. Unlike Roman Catholics, Protestants were treated with tolerance in Russia, because they neither interfered with politics nor made any attempts to spread their doctrines among the Orthodox Russians. Peter the Great granted freedom of faith to foreigners in 1702. Catherine II invited German colonists (Lutherans, Reformed, Mennonites) to settle along the Volga River and in the south of Russia. In 1763 she issued a manifesto granting them religious freedom. However, Protestantism in Russia had very little influence on the Slavic population until the mid-19th c. In the 1860s, the first Slavic Protestant groups emerged in the south of Russia. So-called Evangelical Christians established themselves in St. Petersburg. Seventh-day Adventists began to attract Russians in the 1880s; the Pentecostal Movement had reached Russia by 1911–13. It was only in 1905 that Russian Protestants were recognized by the state through the imperial edict “On Strengthening the Beginnings of the Religious Tolerance.”

Having declared freedom* of conscience, the Bolsheviks were comparatively tolerant of Russian Protestants in the first decade after the 1917 revolution. Yet in 1929 they banned all religious and missionary activities other than worship services. Protestant theological schools and periodicals were shut down, many prayer houses were confiscated, and ministers were arrested.

The postwar years (1945–1950s) witnessed the revival of Protestant churches, although the restricted registration and suspicion toward authorities kept many communities underground for many decades. The revival of religious life in the 1990s, fervent missionary activity, and international contacts produced a rapid growth of Protestants confessions, including new denominations such as Charismatics* and Quakers. Gradually, Protestants have been able to integrate themselves into modern society by overcoming their social circumspection and isolation. They often cooperate with evangelism across denominational lines and emphasize individual conversion*, personal piety, Bible reading, a role for the laity* in worship, evangelism, and teaching.

In many contemporary Protestant congregations (especially Baptist), worship includes hymns* and spirited “choruses,” the use of various musical instruments, but with only some traditional Christian symbolism. Although Protestantism’s impact in Russia is growing, Protestants constituted only a little more than 1% of the population in 2000.

ALEXANDER NEGROV and TATYANA NIKOLSKAYA

Protestantism in Latin America. Since the early 1900s, all Protestants in Latin America have been called evangélicos, “evangelicals” (accentuating “evangel,” good news, gospel, as in Germany), but in a different sense than in England and the USA.

The Protestant (Evangelical) Movement was banned by the Spanish rulers during colonial times (except in small areas controlled by Protestant nations, e.g. Jamaica and the Guianas). After independence (early 19th c.), small beachheads were established in the Roman Catholic nations through immigration, Bible societies, and mission efforts. By the early 20th c., more than 40 missionary societies were collaborating in a changing social and political scene. With the secularizing spirit of liberalism, Protestants/Evangelicals joined with liberal Catholics in gradually achieving religious liberty*, in limiting ecclesiastical control of civic functions (civil registers of births, weddings, and deaths), and the development of municipal cemeteries, public education, and state-run health services.

By 1950 Protestant churches had slowly gained adherents, then began to mushroom, owing mainly to cooperative evangelism* and the growing Pentecostal*/Charismatic* movements. Mainline churches, which tended to maintain their imported languages and liturgies (e.g. see the present cluster: In Latin America: Brazil), continued to experience slow growth, mostly through immigration. The more conservative churches underwent moderate growth, despite a spectacular increase in missionaries (a 680% growth between 1930 and 1960). However, without significant missionary and foreign financial support, in the tumultuous 1950–90 period the independent Charismatic Movement experienced phenomenal spontaneous growth, coming to comprise 70–75% of Protestants in Latin America.

Many reasons are given for this rapid Evangelical growth: deteriorating social conditions, the rise of dictatorships and internal wars, forced migrations, the spread of indigenous and Catholic folk religions, the blending of native and gospel mysticism*, and resistance to Western secularism*. Religious workers tend to accentuate spiritual factors: persistent evangelism*, the use of religious media* (there are more than 1,000 Evangelical radio stations and 100 television channels), mass revivals*, and more participatory worship than in the liturgical Roman Catholic tradition. However, in the 1990s, growth began to level off, as many second- and third-generation youth started to become disaffected with the churches.

Some estimate that, by 2000, 12% of Latin Americans were Protestants, although the percentages varied widely among nations: Guatemala*, 25%; Brazil*, 15%; Chile*, 15%; Uruguay*, 4%; and Mexico*, 6%. More progressive Protestants engage in an active dialogue with some Roman Catholics, whereas conservative Protestants maintain a defensive and critical attitude. This tension is reflected in the existence of two continental church councils, neither of which, however, has much influence because the majority of Protestants do not participate in them. Diversity with some anti-North American overtones characterizes Latin American Protestantism/Evangelicalism.

SIDNEY ROOY

Protestantism in Latin America: Argentina. The first Protestant churches manifested the relationship between religion and nationality of origin. English, German, Swiss, and Danish immigrants established ethnic communities around their churches as they sought to avoid assimilation into Argentine society. Thus the Evangelical Church of Río de la Plata originated as the German Evangelical Synod of Río de la Plata; it was initially related to the protection of German culture and linked to Nazism*. The word “German” was removed from its name during its reorganization in the 1970s.

But Protestantism does not remain insular; Methodist, Baptist, Seventh*-Day Adventist, and Lutheran churches, the Hermanos Libres Church, the Salvation* Army, and the Mennonite* Mission proselytize* or evangelize* (depending on one’s perspective). For instance, William Morris (1864–1932), associated with the North American Methodist Episcopal Church and later with the (Anglican) South American Missionary Society, led a mission aimed at bringing education* and Christian teaching to working-class children, especially street children, and created many schools.

In the 1980s, the Pentecostal* and neo-Pentecostal (Charismatic*) churches expanded. The ministries of pastors Cabrera (Visión de Futuro), Giménez (Ondas de Amor y Paz), and Anacondia (Mensaje de Salvación) appealed to a great number of believers. See also ARGENTINA.

DAMIÁN SETTON

Protestantism in Latin America: Brazil: Churches of Immigrants. As an independent nation (1824), Brazil began to receive immigrants from Central Europe. Around 300,000 Germans, 60% of them Lutherans, settled in Southern Brazil between 1824 and 1942. Their first pastors were hired either by the Brazilian Empire or by private settlement companies. The religious life of these immigrants was centered on the Bible, their hymnbook, and catechism; they organized schools, "temples*," and cemeteries. Lacking pastors, they entrusted the laity* with pastoral duties. After 1860 Prussia helped Lutherans to found the German Evangelical Synod of the Province of Rio Grande do Sul (1868) to defend their interests against the Empire and Roman Catholicism (the official religion until 1889). A messianic movement, the "Mucker Movement," emerged in reaction to both the clericalization represented by the Synod and the influence of the Enlightenment* among German intellectuals; it was crushed by the Brazilian army.

After the failure of the first synod, new ones were founded: the Synod of Rio Grande do Sul (1886), the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Santa Catarina, Paraná, and Other States (1905), the Synod of the Evangelical Congregations of Santa Catarina and Paraná (1911), and the Evangelical Synod of Central Brazil (1912). Pastors from the USA founded the Brazilian District of the German Lutheran Missouri Synod (1900). The two Lutheran churches in Brazil today, the Evangelical Church of the Lutheran Confession in Brazil and the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Brazil, grew out of these five synods.

German influences left deep marks on the immigrants' churches. The Lutherans' integration into Brazilian life was painful. Since they were immigrants and not Roman Catholics, they did not have the right to vote or to be elected. Their marriages* were viewed as concubinage until 1869; mixed marriages were prohibited (even after 1869); their dead could not be buried in public cemeteries; their "temples" could not resemble churches. Their legal isolation was exacerbated by geographic, ethnic, and linguistic isolation. In this situation, the pan-Germanic policy of the German Third Reich found fertile soil, especially when nationalizing measures implemented by the Brazilian government (1930–45) harshly affected Lutherans. Many Lutherans were attracted to Nazi/Fascist ideology. But Brazil's participation in World War II progressively led Lutheran churches to abandon the German language, to have pastors raised and educated in Brazil, and to become involved in issues concerning Brazilian national life.

MARTIN N. DREHER

Protestantism in Latin America: Brazil: Churches of Resident Aliens.

Little is known about the many Protestant foreigners who stayed for short times in Brazil: sailors, merchants, soldiers, adventurers, and scientists. In colonial times, their presence was viewed with suspicion; Protestants were considered undesirable.

With the arrival of the Portuguese royal family (1808) escorted by a British (Protestant) fleet headed by Sir Sidney Smith, and the subsequent support of the British ambassador Lord Strangford, the 1810 Trade and Shipping Treaty included a clause giving British Protestants freedom to worship in Brazil using their language.

The main Brazilian harbors soon had Protestant (Evangelical) communities, the first church being built by the Anglicans in Rio de Janeiro (1819). Chaplains and priests settled down and, in their absence, consuls performed religious duties. For instance, in 1821 Maria Graham attended a worship service in the Salvador Chapel in Bahia and noted that the preacher gave thanks to God for King João VI of Portugal, who permitted them to worship according to their faith.

Brazilians welcomed such Protestants, but the boundaries between the two groups remained clear. Nevertheless, the presence of these churches of resident aliens opened the doors for the establishment of Protestant churches with Brazilians' participation.

EDUARDO GUZMÃO QUADROS

Protestantism in Latin America: Brazil: Colonial Period.

During the colonial period, religious dissidents were exiled from the country. The few Flemish, German, French, and English Protestant colonizers soon became Roman Catholic through marriage or for economic reasons (only Roman Catholics could own land).

At São Vicente (1532), one of the first colonizers was the Flemish Erasmus Schetz. Several of his employees were Protestants, and his son Gaspar had contact with Melancthon* and Helius Eobanus Hessus, the first rector of the University of Marburg, whose grandson, Heliodorus, settled in São Vicente. The English Protestant John Whithall also settled there (1578), but became Catholic when he married the daughter of an Italian and adopted the name João Leitão. The cannoneer Hans Staden, a shipwrecked Lutheran, left an important report about 16th-c. Brazil.

As Jean de Lery reported, in 1555 a French expedition under the command of Admiral Villegaignon established France Antarctique at the Guanabara Bay as a settlement for 300 Huguenots*. On March 30, 1557, the first Calvinist congregation in Latin America (Peter Richer and Guillaume Chartier, pastors) was constituted. But these Calvinists were expelled in 1567 by the Portuguese Inquisition* (in Brazil since 1557).

The Dutch conquered a considerable portion of Northeastern Brazil. In the Dutch colony (1637–44), 15 Calvinist temples, a synagogue, and the first Talmudic school of the Americas were built. But when the Dutch were expelled, the Calvinist preachers left Brazil and the remaining Protestants were progressively assimilated.

In subsequent years, only the subjects of the Portuguese crown could enter Brazil. Nonetheless, soldiers from the German Lutheran territory of Hesse and German Protestant officials at the service of the Portuguese crown came to the colony, particularly after 1761. The Protestants who wanted to occupy public positions converted to Roman Catholicism; among them were Daniel Pedro Müller (1779–1842), the son of the Lutheran pastor of Lisbon, and Carlos Augusto de Oeynhausen (1778), a cousin of the Count of Lippe, who reorganized the Portuguese army.

The coming of the Portuguese royal family to Brazil (1808) and the 1810 Trade and Shipping Treaty (giving British Protestants freedom of worship), as well as the arrival of Leopoldina of Hapsburg, put an end to the prohibition of entry by Protestants. Some Lutherans also came to Brazil at that time: Baron Wilhelm von Eschwege (1777–1855), the father of Brazilian mineralogy, the botanist Karl Friedrich Phillip von Martius, and the mineral engineer Friedrich Ludwig Wilhelm Varnhagen (1783–1842).

MARTIN N. DREHER

Protestantism in Latin America: Brazil: Mission Protestantism.

The term “Mission Protestantism” refers to the establishment of Protestant (Evangelical) churches in Brazil by North American missionaries. This designation is helpful to distinguish this branch of Protestantism – including Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Congregationalist*, and Adventist* churches – from independent Charismatics*/Pentecostals* (see Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster: In Latin America: Brazil) and from churches of immigrants (see the present cluster: In Brazil: Churches of Immigrants). This type of Protestantism established itself in Brazil through the distribution of the Bible and religious edification literature, its emphasis on family devotionals, its schools for secular education* and theological* formation, and its permanent polemic against Roman Catholicism. Its followers were poor peasants, who encountered these new religious beliefs through family networks. With the intense migration from rural areas to the cities in the late 20th c., this Protestantism became increasingly identified with the urban middle class.

Mission Protestantism was founded on the central theological affirmations of the Protestant Reformation*: the exclusive authority of the Bible in questions of faith (Scripture* principle); salvation* as the exclusive work of God’s grace*; the priesthood* of all believers; and the rational explanation of faith, ethical rigor as public witness. Mission Protestantism was dominated by pastoral practices inspired by the Wesleyan Methodist* tradition, with emphasis on conversion*, charity, and sanctification*. Local congregations were relatively autonomous, although they were organized by regional federative systems (e.g. as regions, districts, according to the denominations) and under the jurisdiction of a supreme council. Although not always a harmonious meeting ground for different theological perspectives and religious experiences, Mission Protestantism provided a vanguard articulation of ecumenical* relations and actions focused on the social responsibility of churches, especially after the 1916 Panama* Conference.

Compared with Roman Catholicism, Mission Protestantism can be viewed either as a foreign body, not well adapted to the cultural context of Brazil (especially because it functions as an ideological legitimization of the US economic and political penetration), or as an integral part of the modernization of the continent, confronting its colonial* traditionalism and conservative authority. Yet neither view takes into account the classical typology of Brazilian Protestantism that focuses on differences in dogma, rite, and religious experience.

LAURI EMÍLIO WIRTH

Protestantism in Latin America: Brazil: Parachurch Associations. Parachurch* associations are formed by peoples or institutions outside particular ecclesiastical structures. They are interconfessional and financially independent. There are four main types: Bible societies, youth organizations, ecumenical organizations, and educational associations.

The history of parachurch associations in Brazil begins in Europe, when the British* and Foreign Bible Society published the NT in the Portuguese language (1809). Copies of this NT and, later, Bibles from the American* Bible Society were sold at Brazilian harbors. After independence (1822), foreign and national colporteurs* traveling throughout the countryside distributed these "Protestant Bibles", along with religious literature, and explained their doctrine. The Sociedade Bíblica do Brasil (1948) conformed to the same interdenominational patterns.

A parachurch organization aimed at youth was the YMCA*, founded between 1891 and 1893 in Rio de Janeiro by the missionary Myron J. Clark, who promoted sports and recreational activities to attract youth; it had a book-lending library. That model spread to other cities. In 1940 the Brazilian Student Christian Federation (a branch of the World* Student Christian Federation) and in 1957 the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students were founded with the intention of promoting alternatives to the fundamentalist* theology dominating the main Protestant churches.

Other parachurch organizations aimed at promoting ecumenism among the churches. The Confederação Evangélica Brasileira (Brazilian Evangelical Confederation, from 1934 to 1964, when it disbanded after the military coup) became the main link between global ecumenical activities and the national churches after the foundation of the World* Council of Churches (1948). In 1982 a less representative and less effective Conselho Nacional de Igrejas Cristãs (National Council of Christian Churches) emerged.

Some educational parachurch organizations, such as the Aliança Pró-Evangelização de Crianças (Pro-children Evangelization Alliance, since 1940), support children's education; others, such as the Associação dos Seminários Teológicos Evangélicos (Evangelical Theology Seminaries Association, since 1961), support higher education. The Igreja e Sociedade na América Latina (Latin American Church and Society, since 1961) and the Fraternidade Teológica Latino-americana (Latin American Theology Fraternity, since 1970) also play an important role in theological education; relying on active Brazilian participation, they influenced theological thought during the troubled dictatorial period.

EDUARDO GUZMÃO QUADROS

Protestantism in Latin America: Central America. After Columbus's arrival on the coast of Central America (1502) and during the Spanish colonial period, the Roman Catholic Inquisition closed the doors to Protestantism. John Martin, an Irish Anglican, was the first protestant martyr: he was taken prisoner in Guatemala* (1574), hanged, and publicly burned by the Inquisition in Mexico*. In 1655 English pirates took the island of Jamaica*, from which they banned Roman Catholicism, establishing the Anglican Church. English settlements along the coast and British Honduras* (Belize) became Protestant enclaves.

In 1821 the independence of Central America from Spain was declared. Commercial treaties facilitated the immigration of European Protestant colonists and merchants, including William Le Lacheur, an Englishman who transported coffee to England and sold Bibles in Costa* Rica (1843). Yet the persecution of Protestants still existed; Juana Mendia, a young Guatemalan native, became the first native Protestant martyr of Central America; she died following a ferocious beating (1843). The late 19th c. saw confrontations between political conservatives and liberals and the alliance of liberals with Freemasons and Protestants. In 1871 in Guatemala*, the general Rufino Barrios promulgated anticlerical laws, expelled the Jesuits, and introduced the Presbyterian Church.

The construction and appropriation of the Panama* Canal by the USA (1904–14) established US economic control over Central America, while the Panama* Conference (1916) prompted the establishment of North American Protestant missions on the continent, through organizations such as the Latin American Mission (launched in 1921 by Harry Strachan and Susan Beamish).

The organization of unions of native people, rural workers, women, and factory workers and of student movements, as well as the guerrilla warfare unleashed in El* Salvador, Guatemala*, and Nicaragua* against military states supported by the USA (from the 1960s), culminated in the triumph of the Sandinista revolution (Nicaragua, 1979). An example of a Protestant committed to this struggle is the Baptist Luz Marina Torres, who abandoned his studies to join the insurrection against Somoza's dictatorship in Nicaragua. Both Roman Catholic and Protestant theologians, poets, martyrs, prophets, and prophetesses disseminated Liberation theology.

In 1960 Protestants were merely 3.9% of the mostly Catholic population. In 1995 Protestants constituted 18.3% of the population (5.9 million out of a total of 32.4 million). The growth of Protestantism is due both to the appeal of the Protestant ethic, which theologically legitimizes the work of the middle class and the development of business, and to the expansion (from the 1970s) in rural and urban areas of the Pentecostalist*/Charismatic* movements, which are considered to be expressions of individual liberty and of rebellion against centralized authority. The theology of the Holy Spirit – with its healing, glossolalia*, new* creation, and diverse ecstatic experiences – provides a way for the poor* and mestizos* to combine popular* Christian traditions and Charismatic experiences with the myths of ancient religions of the Maya, Emberá, Wounan, and Guaymies, as well as with the spirituality of the descendants of African slaves, such as the Garífunas, and of the Miskitos and Antilleans, who immigrated to Central America. See also COSTA RICA; EL SALVADOR; GUATEMALA; HONDURAS; NICARAGUA.

JAIME ADRIÁN PRIETO VALLADARES

Protestantism in Latin America: Colombia.

Protestantism arrived in Colombia in the 1820s, although it had been in San Andres Island since colonial times. Although the Colombian Biblical Society was founded in 1825, the first missions targeted the foreign populations in Colombia. Yet the Liberal government, seeking to break the Roman Catholic Church's monopoly (second half of the 19th c.), called the Presbyterian US mission to establish an indigenous Protestant church. Following the failure of Liberal governments to remain in power, politicians reestablished the Roman Catholic Church as the official church (the 1886 Constitution). The Protestants' situation worsened during the civil war in the 1940s; Protestant public worship was prohibited, as was private Protestant worship in "Catholic missionary territories" (75% of Colombia); 116 Protestants were killed. In 1949 Protestants founded the Colombian Evangelical Confederation, which promoted the freedom of religion (established in 1991).

Protestants have several education centers in Colombia, but their membership remains low. Mennonite* organizations work for economic and social development and for peace, especially in regions of conflict. But Protestants involved in humanitarian activities have been victimized.

Since the 1960s, the Pentecostal* and Charismatic* movements (c7% of the population) have diversified the Colombian religious landscape. They lack a unified theology, but share some practices e.g. glossolalia*, spiritual healings*, and demonology*, as well as involvement in sociopolitical affairs. Since 1991 they have joined to form their own political parties.

SANDRA RIOS

Protestantism in Latin America: Mexico. Since its origins in the 16th c., Protestantism has been a diversified series of movements of “dissenters” from the Roman Catholic Church, arising in a great diversity of theological, cultural, political, and geographical contexts, and thus taking a great variety of expressions and ecclesial forms. Consequently in Mexico there are (1) diverse historic Protestant churches with European origins; (2) Evangelical and Holiness* movements, which originated in the USA; and (3) Pentecostal and Charismatic* movements (see Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster: In Latin America: Mexico) rooted in the Charismatic renewals in both historical and Evangelical churches; these renewals resulted in part from the activities of North American missions but are now growing mainly out of movements originating in Mexico.

1. Historic Protestantism. The first Protestant incursion into Mexico took the form of the distribution of Bibles (e.g. sent by the British Bible Society, 1828–42) with the support of José María Luis Mora (1795–1856; priest, writer, lawyer, reformist Mexican statesman). Santiago Hickey arrived in Matamoros (1860) with a shipment of Bibles, as a colporteur of the American Bible Society.

Organized Protestantism arrived in 1859, when apparently the first public Protestant worship service in Mexico was celebrated in Zacatecas by Julio Provost and José Llaguno. The first Baptist Church and the first Presbyterian Church (organized by Melinda Rankin) were established in Monterrey (1864). Methodist work began in 1872 with missions from two Methodist* Episcopal churches in the USA, together with the Religious Society of Friends* (Quakers, 1871), Congregationalists* (1872), Reformed* (1878), Disciples* of Christ (1890), Seventh-day Adventists* (1893), Nazarenes* (1908), Lutherans* (1950), Mennonites* and Anabaptists* (1955), among others.

Another form of Protestant work in Mexico was that of education* and health* care. Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, and Quaker schools had a certain amount of success, especially between 1880 and 1920, because they provided a liberal “laic” (i.e. non-Roman Catholic) education. Protestant health care work included the implementation of local health care programs and the establishment of health care centers, clinics, and hospitals in the main cities and rural areas.

The main doctrines and principles of these Protestant churches include the Bible as the supreme standard for faith and life; the Trinity as the hermeneutical criterion in theology; commitment to mission*; freedom* of conscience and religion; the priesthood* of all believers; and the separation of church* and state. Three forms of church government – episcopal, presbyterian and congregational – are represented (see Church, Concepts and Life, Cluster: Types of Ecclesiastical Structure). Each denomination has publications, including El faro (1885, Presbyterian), Abogado cristiano ilustrado (1876–1930, Methodist), La luz bautista (1903, Baptist), Luminar (1937–51), La Biblia en América Latina (1967–87), and three journals related to theological education: Cristianismo y sociedad (1963; published in Mexico, 1983–91), Taller de teología (1976–84), which became Oikodomein (1994), and El apóstol (1977, Baptist).

2. Evangelical Movements. Although the name “Evangelical” designates all Protestant churches in Mexico, it more specifically refers to the Evangelical Protestantism that arose from the work of North American missionaries (since 1840) as a continuation in Mexico c1916 of the North American "Second Great* Awakening" (revivalism*). The latter was characterized by individual religious experience, soteriological Christology (see Atonement #2), and emphasis on sanctification*.

After World War II, missionaries of a different kind arrived. They were part of the Holiness* Movement, with Millennialist* and fundamentalist* interpretations, and preached a faith that appeared to be a reaction to the threats posed by the progression of secularism*, science*, and communism*. (The "mother churches" – Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist – were themselves strongly influenced by this movement.) It involved a dualistic perspective, emphasizing the Holy* Spirit and teaching an ethics of separation from the world, accompanied by a legalistic inflexibility. It held on to the Protestant tradition that considers the Bible to be the only source of faith and conduct, yet their reading of the Bible was now very literal*, and they emphasized individual conversion*, being born again, and missionary zeal.

From this radicalization of the Evangelical ethos*, and in the context of the cold war, Evangelical communities themselves (especially in institutions of theological* education) developed an alternative ecumenical position associated with Christians' social and political commitments. The Conference of Oaxtepec (1979) and the magazine Cristianismo y sociedad marked a shift in the conception of Evangelical mission in Latin America, which is now committed to the overall transformation of society. The Fraternidad Teológica Latinoamericana (Latin American Theological Fraternity, 1970) similarly retrieved the Evangelical tradition of the 16th- to 17th-c. Anabaptist Movement, rereading the Bible with a commitment to a well-balanced and complete mission of the church. See also CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: MEXICO; MEXICO.

JAVIER ULLOA and
REBECA MONTEMAYOR

Protestantism in North America: Canada. See CANADA.

Protestantism in North America: United States. See UNITED STATES.

Protestantism in the South Pacific and Australia. Mission activities were predominantly British, with French and German influences in their respective colonies. As elsewhere Protestants stress the supreme authority of the Bible, liberty of conscience, the right of private judgment, and commitment to the rule of law. Yet there were marked divisions among established churches in Australia.

Protestant churches of the South Pacific, notably in Tonga, were comfortable with a Polynesian version of partnership, and therefore with communal churches that included different Protestant denominations. Everywhere in the region, commitment to missionary outreach, philanthropy, community service, and vocational integrity transcended separatism and modified divisive individualism. Many Protestants were attracted by liberal theological and political views, although confessional convictions remained strong among small Protestant churches.

In Australia some three-quarters of the population was Protestant during the 19th c. State aid was given to all the major denominations (including Roman Catholics) until the 1870s; by the end of the 20th c., new forms of aid had emerged. The Commonwealth Constitution prohibited the establishment of any religion as the state religion. Protestant political parties were unsuccessful, although the Orange and Masonic Lodges had an informal political influence.

Protestants constituted a majority on most Pacific Islands, with the exception of New Caledonia. By the mid-20th c., many Protestant denominations were engaged in ecumenical dialogue*. The United Church of Papua* New Guinea and the Solomon* Islands and the Uniting Church were the only major reunions of churches. Other forms of cooperation grew steadily, especially among Evangelicals and Pentecostals. The Second Vatican* Council forced many Protestants to reconsider their identity, as did the major cultural changes of the later 20th c., such as feminism, sexual liberation, postmodernism, changes in family life, and migration. The erosion of traditional Protestantism was slower in villages of the South Pacific than in the cities. Political problems, including civil wars in Fiji, Papua New Guinea, and the Solomon Islands, have shown how difficult it has been for churches to transcend ethnic rivalries.

In Australia, Protestantism's impact on those under 50 has steadily diminished. Some 25% of the population no longer claims any religious allegiance. The future of historic Protestantism looks problematic except among the smaller confessional churches, the Anglican Diocese of Sydney, and Pentecostals, who have established Family First (2004), the only Protestant group so far to obtain representation in the federal Parliament. IAN BREWARD

Protestant Principle, for Tillich*, the insistence that God is not to be identified with any manifestation (without denying God's presence in these manifestations); thus it is "the prophetic judgment against religious pride, ecclesiastical arrogance and secular self-sufficiency and their destructive consequences." It can be viewed as analogous to the "negative Scripture* principle." See also ICONOCLASM AS A THEOLOGICAL CONCEPT.

Proverbs, Book of, one of the Kethubim* (Writings), this anthology comprises nine collections, seven with superscriptions (1:1-9, 10:1-22:16, 22:17-24:22, 24:23-34, 25-29, 30:1-14, 31:1-9). A prologue (1-9) and an epilogue (31:10-31) provide a theological perspective for the entire book, which emphasizes the fear of the Lord as the first principle/beginning of knowledge and lauds a feminine embodiment of wisdom.

The sayings were composed over several centuries, starting during the monarchy and extending to the Hellenistic period. At first located within the family in small villages and subsequently the domain of a scribal elite, probably in Jerusalem, the proverbial sayings lack any reference to Israel's sacred traditions and represent insights available to everyone. Indeed, even a few sayings from the Egyptian Instruction of Amen-emopet are preserved in the biblical context, along with one saying from the Aramaic Ahikar. Two of the nine collections just listed are said to come from foreign instructors, Agur and the mother of Prince Lemuel.

The primary goal of sages was to teach youth how to cope with daily existence by acquiring the virtues of timing, eloquence, restraint, and integrity. Those who did so were promised the blessings of society: long life, progeny, wealth, and honor. Initially, the instruction came from parents, but the artistic structure of the sayings and the theological agenda in the introductory collection indicate professional expertise and interests. The poetic structure of the sayings utilizes parallel lines, usually two or three, in relationships that are synonymous, antithetic, or ascending. The poetry highlights two themes above all: the tree of life and the path (or way) of wisdom.

The sayings acknowledge a threat to boys posed by a foreign woman and imagine that they can receive assistance from her rival, personified wisdom*. Historians of religion have accented the similarities between this female figure and the goddesses Ma'at and Isis, especially the fact that the Egyptian Ma'at is depicted with the ankh, the symbol of life, in one hand and justice in the other, and Isis praises herself in the same manner that Wisdom does in Prov 1-9. Christians and Jews have gleaned insights from this book on various aspects of daily life, particularly the formation of character. Some early church fathers drew christological implications from personified wisdom, who is described as present at creation and bringing delight to the creator and life to humans (Chaps. 1 and 8), language applied to Jesus in the NT.

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

Providence. See GOD, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER.

Province, group of dioceses*, originally equivalent to a province of the Roman Empire. The metropolitan* or archbishop* is the chief city's bishop.

Prussian Union, union of the Lutheran and Reformed churches in Prussia. Friedrich Wilhelm III suggested the formation of the United Evangelical Church (1817). Schleiermacher* presided over the first united synod in Berlin, and on Reformation Day in 1817 he, representing the Reformed, and Philip Marheineke, representing the Lutherans, led a celebration of the Eucharist, with 93 ministers in attendance. But many Lutherans opposed the Union. Two crises soon surfaced. (1) While Schleiermacher wanted to leave room for both traditions, the king promoted a new prayer book, which both groups found objectionable; (2) while Schleiermacher championed government of the church by synod, the king wanted to function as "lay bishop." Synodal government ultimately prevailed; it was enshrined in law after the 1848 revolutions, decreed by Bismarck after 1871, and reinforced by the Weimar Republic.

Psalms, Book of, is Israel's normative collection of songs of praise* and prayer*. It contains materials borrowed from the ancient Near Eastern religious milieu as well as poems and songs that are "homegrown," or based on Israel's faith traditions. The Book of Psalms is constituted by a collage of smaller collections, some of which have been assembled by groups of temple singers such as the Levites* and the groups named after Asaph and Korah.

The two dominant themes of the collection, announced respectively in Ps 1 and 2, are the Torah* as the path to life and Davidic kingship as an expression of the rule of YHWH. The accent on Torah articulates an ordered life of obedience and promises of well-being for Torah keepers, and becomes a basis for prayers of complaint when the guarantees for Torah keepers do not materialize in life. The accent on kingship in the Psalms celebrates the centrality of the monarch to the right ordering of life and presents human kingship as a way in which Israel can survive in a dangerous world.

The Psalms have two primary functions. Some are essentially instructional, inculcating in the community a way of life as understood in Israelite faith. By contrast Psalms of cultic celebration are performative* and generate the liturgical reality of which they speak, especially the assertion of YHWH's kingship.

The primary genres of the Psalms are hymns* and laments. The hymns exuberantly affirm and "magnify" YHWH in acts of praise that are acts of self-abandon by Israel to the wonder of YHWH. Conversely, laments and complaints are prayers that voice Israel's legitimate entitlement to good treatment from YHWH. The interaction of hymn and lament gives the Psalter an existential tension that has been definitional for Jewish and Christian pastoral* care.

The several collections have been ordered into a final canonical form of five books. These are intended to be an imitation of the "Five Books of Moses" and provide a normative attestation to YHWH as the God of Israel and creator of the world. The imaginative poetry of the Psalter has continued to fuel the imagination of Jews and Christians who are preoccupied with the defining reality of YHWH.

WALTER BRUEGGEMANN

Psalter, a biblical book of Psalms*, or a book containing them, which in the Reformed* churches may take the form of metrical* Psalms.

Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament. The phrase "Old Testament Pseudepigrapha" designates a varied body of Jewish and Christian literature. These writings contain stories about, and speeches ascribed to, figures known from the OT. They are not included in the Jewish or Christian canons* of Scripture*, but depend on biblical literature and on oral tradition. These writings vary immensely in their provenance (geographical and chronological), manner of transmission and preservation, size, form, style, subject matter, message, and purpose. Their authors are unknown, either because the writings were anonymous or because they were pseudonymous, i.e. bearing the name of the biblical figure with which they were mainly concerned (hence "Pseudepigrapha"). They have been transmitted almost exclusively by Christian groups, although a number are of Jewish origin. The best-known Pseudepigrapha include the Testament of Abraham*, the Assumption* of Moses, the Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch*, the Ethiopic Book of Enoch*, Fourth Ezra*, the Ascension of Isaiah, the Book of Jubilees*, the Life of Adam and Eve, Pseudo-Philo's Book of Biblical Antiquities, the Sibylline* Oracles, the Odes* of Solomon, the Psalms* of Solomon, and the Testaments* of the Twelve Patriarchs.

The collection of OT Pseudepigrapha is first and foremost a scholarly construct. NT scholars have been especially interested in these writings; they have regarded them as reflecting the cultural and religious background of the historical Jesus* and the Jesus movement. From these scholars' perspective, "Pseudepigrapha" stands for a specific corpus of literature: those anonymous, arguably Jewish writings not found in the Septuagint* that can be dated to no later than the 1st or 2nd c. CE. Taken together, they are regarded as a more or less coherent reservoir of parallels to the early Christian texts that are their principal object of study. This impression may have been strengthened by the collections of translations of Pseudepigrapha into modern languages (English: Charles, 1913; Charlesworth, 1983–1985; Sparks, 1984). These collections are helpful because the Pseudepigrapha were transmitted in such a wide variety of languages that no scholar could be expected to master them all. However, even a quick comparison of the various collections immediately reveals that in NT times the Pseudepigrapha were not compiled into a corpus as biblical books were. Modern editors and publishers decided which writings to include or not to include in collections of Pseudepigrapha. Nonetheless, many scholars include "the" Pseudepigrapha in their discussions of certain subjects as if they comprised a corpus distinct from, e.g., the Qumran* literature and later Jewish haggadic and Christian hagiographic traditions.

Modern collections of OT Pseudepigrapha are also potentially misleading because of their tidy arrangement in printed volumes. This easily gives a false impression of textual stability, whereas in reality many of these writings exist in a bewildering variety of versions and recensions without clear interrelations. Furthermore, the continuous change in form and content that occurred during their transmission has rendered the context and meaning of many passages obscure. If the reconstruction of the archetype of a particular writing proves possible, its text can usually be dated to no earlier than the 8th–9th c. in the Byzantine period. Occasionally, patristic references or quotations, or, very exceptionally, the finding of fragments among the Dead* Sea Scrolls, make it possible to date the writing of some pseudepigraphal texts to a much earlier period; one cannot presuppose that the medieval text is consistent with the original, since evidence shows that copyists took many liberties with such texts (in contrast, see Bible, Texts and Manuscripts).

These observations suggest that the interest of Christians in these writings was not merely antiquarian. Copyists tended to act as redactors, creatively adapting the writing they were dealing with to their own and their audiences' specific needs with an eye to admonishing or comforting their audiences through the lives and teachings of OT figures. This activity reflects a Christian interest in the OT and its main figures that contradicts the notion that the church was solely preoccupied with the figure of Christ. For these copyists/redactors, the lessons to be learned from the patriarchs and prophets were not subordinate and inferior to specifically Christian teachings. Thus much of the subject matter of the OT Pseudepigrapha concerns questions of an existential, cosmological, or ethical nature, e.g. the origin of death*, the number of heavens*, the orders of the angels*, the location of hell*, and how to be a good human being. These issues are commonly assumed to be relevant, although they are not specifically Christian.

Thus the aim of outlining the religious and cultural background of Jesus and the Jesus movement by establishing a corpus of Pseudepigrapha has failed. This scholarly project has uncovered a jumble of medieval Christian texts, instead of the clear and transparent picture of 1st-c. Judaism that was expected. In a more positive vein, the Pseudepigrapha of the OT are evidence of a continuing interest in the lives and teachings of OT figures, both in the Christian Church and in earlier and contemporary Jewish milieus. Paradoxically, the dynamic nature of the traditions concerning OT figures (as opposed to the fixed textual transmission of the Bible itself) demonstrates both that the writings which recorded them (adding, omitting, altering) did not claim authority for the letter of their texts, and that the issues addressed were central to their transmitters' worldview. Whereas the static text of the sacred writings may have enjoyed high respect and veneration, the dynamic texts of the Pseudepigrapha reflect the ways in which the people of old actually functioned in the context of everyday Jewish and Christian religion. JOHANNES TROMP

Pseudo-Clementine Literature. See CLEMENTINE LITERATURE.

Pseudo-Isidorean Decretals. See DECRETALS, FALSE (PSEUDO-ISIDOREAN).

Pseudonymity. A pseudonymous document is not written by the person whose name it bears, but is either written after the supposed author's death or during the supposed author's lifetime by someone not commissioned to do so. However, a work written with the help of an amanuensis (secretary) or one penned by a co-worker for a writer's later approval is not pseudonymous. A text written after the supposed author's death but incorporating his material (or the supposed author's views, as conceived of by the writer, a common school practice in the Hellenistic world) would be pseudonymous, unless the writer were fulfilling a request to prepare existing material for later circulation.

TERRY L. WILDER

Pseudo-Philo's Book of Biblical Antiquities, summary of biblical history from creation to Saul, enriched with apocryphal material, much of which it shares with Jewish haggadic tradition. Although it is often dated to the 1st c. CE, a much later date cannot be ruled out. Preserved only in the Western Christian Church, it is a prime example of the medieval continuity of Jewish and Christian narrative tradition. The ascription to Philo is secondary. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA. JOHANNES TROMP

Psychology and Theology. The relationship between theology and psychology depends on their respective definitions. An antireligious psychological paradigm (e.g. Sigmund Freud's or Albert Ellis's) necessarily conflicts with a neo-orthodox* theology (e.g. Barth's* or Reinhold Niebuhr's*). But a proto-theological psychological system (e.g. Carl Jung's or William James's) can readily engage in dialogue with a theology of mediation (e.g. Tillich's* or Schleiermacher's*). Or conflict can be muted and synthesis prevented if one follows the linguistic turn of analytic philosophy (Wittgenstein*) whereby theology and psychology are viewed as incommensurate and self-referential "language games" that share no terms or concepts.

Psychology and theology intersect through certain themes and issues.

1. Diagnoses of the Human Condition. For both psychology and theology, there is something not right about ordinary human life: it falls short, misses the mark, is estranged from its full nature. For most theologies, such estrangement is a part of the human condition. For most psychologies, it is contingent (on social conditioning, bad parenting, genetic malfunctioning), a disease to be treated. Freudians insist that human life is intrinsically conflicted: internally by incompatible wishes and fears, externally by the tension between desire and social constraint. Thus despite the fact that they have entirely different bases, Freud's view of human nature is close to an Augustinian* doctrine of original* sin*. By contrast humanistic psychologies (e.g. Carl Rogers's and Abraham Maslow's) affirmed the essential perfectibility of human nature; even their arch-antagonist, B. F. Skinner, concurred that human nature could be conditioned into perfection by rewards and punishments. Christian theologies could be organized along a similar continuum.

2. Norms. As a discipline closely associated with modernity, psychology proposes norms of health and sickness, maturity and immaturity that originally shared modernity's valuation of autonomy* and self-realization, and eschewed or minimized dependency. Thus those schools most indebted to modernity (both Freudian psychoanalysis and its humanistic antagonists) are strongly suspicious of dependency. Most theologies insist that we are dependent on a divine source or reality outside of ourselves (see Heteronomy), a vertical dimension foreign to psychology.

3. The Nature of Religious Language. A literalistic* interpretation of Christian speech tends to preclude a constructive engagement with psychology, whereas symbolic* and analogical* models of theological language, for which language works on many different levels, facilitate such engagement.

Historically, when the discipline of psychology began at the height of modern rationalism* and scientism* (late 19th–early 20th c.), psychologists tended to regard theological beliefs as pathological and emotionally immature – a reductionist attitude that treated theological beliefs exclusively as psychological processes.

After World War II, a more open dialogue between theologians and psychologists (including Rollo May, Paul Tillich, and Erich Fromm) developed, using existentialism* as a common language. The psychology involved in discussions with theology was clinically oriented, primarily post-Freudian psychoanalytic psychology and secondarily Jungian depth psychology, but not experimental psychology.

This postwar, very academic dialogue eventually petered out. Psychologists and theologians treated theological claims primarily as cognitive constructs to be debated and affirmed or denied, and psychology as a system of propositions about human nature. This proved to be a dead end. Terms were clarified and issues seen differently, but eventually people agreed, disagreed, or agreed to disagree.

Three new trends have emerged. (1) A dialogue has developed among those who see both psychology and Christianity (and other religions) as sets of practices rather than as propositional systems. (2) Clinical psychoanalysis has moved from the exclusive individualism of the Freudian, Jungian, and humanistic paradigms to embrace a more relational model with obvious resonances with the relational theological models of Schleiermacher, Buber*, Tillich, and Process* and Feminist* theologies*. Here dependency, even on a divine source, is not necessarily problematic. (3) New subdisciplines of psychology, rooted in the experimental traditions (e.g. cognitive neuroscience and evolutionary psychology) have tended once again to approach theological material with reductionist attitudes.

A dialogue with psychology requires a theology which insists that religious truth is mediated through human psychological, neurological, social, cultural, and historical processes. Theologies, like neo-orthodoxy, that eschew such mediation and insist on transcendental truths inevitably find little in common with psychology. For psychology, discussions with theology require the epistemic* humility to recognize that a psychological account of religious phenomena, however complete on its own terms, is not a complete account.

Psychoanalytic psychology suggests that theological beliefs are not purely cognitive but rather involve potent affects, strongly held sensibilities about self and world, deeply felt wishes and fears. Beliefs are carriers of profound, early experiences and developmental processes. To fully understand them involves comprehending more than their cognitive content. Attempts to inculcate or transform a person's beliefs by purely conscious means (preaching, theological lecturing, reading, or debating) seem slightly naive.

Psychology is not simply relevant to the praxis of pastoral* care. It shares common concerns with theology and illuminates connections between theological positions and theologians' individual histories and personalities.

JAMES WILLIAM JONES

Puerto Rico. Christianity arrived in Boriquén (one of the three Great Antilles in the Caribbean*, east of Cuba* and the Dominican* Republic) when Christopher Columbus claimed it with his sword for the Roman Catholic sovereigns of Spain during his second voyage (1493). During the Spanish colonial period, the Roman Catholic Church, as the state church, was led by poorly trained priests. Consequently, Catholicism took form as a popular* religion among peasants, slaves*, and free slaves working on sugar plantations – most of the population – even as the Church framed the formal Hispanic culture of the island, especially among the upper classes. An intellectual and political elite was influenced by the Enlightenment* and liberalism during the 19th c., and antagonism between the Catholic Church and liberals developed. The Holy See* condemned the liberal principles and institutions; liberals were alienated from the Church.

Three hundred years after Columbus's arrival, the USA, a Protestant nation, invaded the island during the Cuban–Spanish–American War (1898). After the war, the Catholic Church was reorganized according to Roman Catholic models in the USA: many Spanish priests returned to Spain; the Catholic bishops and the religious orders (in charge of the Catholic parochial schools) came from the USA. Meanwhile, the pope granted independence to the dioceses so that they might join the Latin American synods. After the US invasion, the Protestant missions (Adventist*, Baptist, Christian* Church, Congregationalist*, Episcopalian*, Methodist, Lutheran) soon established churches in every town, and were followed by Pentecostals* (1916) and many other groups (including Charismatics*). By 2008 the overall Protestant membership (including that of all independent churches, among which are the Charismatic churches) is said to have reached 35% of the population (with only 50% remaining Roman Catholics), taking into account both the Puerto Ricans living on the island (c4 million) and those living in the USA (about the same number; frequently commuting, as US citizens, although the island is not a state of the USA).

For the first 30 years (1899–1930), the US Catholic bishops and Protestant missionaries participated in the North Americanization of Puerto Rico. But with the economic crisis of the 1930s, nationalist groups often seeking independence emerged and strongly challenged Americanization. In this vein, Catholic and Protestant theologians sought to demythologize* the “providentialist” understanding of the US political presence as they developed theologies affirming the Puerto Rican national identity and taking into account the interests of Puerto Ricans. Following a decade of US political repression against the nationalists, a new class of moderate but populist professionals and intellectuals organized a coalition of rural and urban workers that were in control of political power from 1940 to 1968. The resulting modernization of the island encouraged the development of a large network of Roman Catholic private schools and fostered the social mobility of Protestants from the rural and lower classes into the new middle classes.

During the 1960s, problems associated with the growing urbanization and young people's political resentment against the USA and the US military presence in Puerto Rico (as they were drafted to fight during the Vietnam War) led Roman Catholic and Protestant youth to join the political manifestations against all forms of imperialism. Catholics were motivated by Vatican* II and by the Medellín* conference of

Latin American bishops (CELAM*), and Protestants were influenced by the theology of social responsibility of the World* Student Christian Federation, the Latin American approach of the Unión Latinoamericana de Juventudes Evangélicas, and the ecumenical theology of the World* Council of Churches. The radicalization of Christian students, seminarians, priests, and young pastors led to serious conflicts with the older generations and church authorities in both Catholic and Protestant churches. While the proposals and actions of the radical young generation were strongly repressed, their contribution to the life of the churches had and continues to have a lasting influence. After 1970 the Pentecostal* and Charismatic* churches multiplied and influenced the mainline Protestant churches. In the early 21st c., these last two movements constituted the main focus of theological reflection and pastoral attention, led especially by Liberation* theologians and biblical scholars, such as Luis Rivera-Pagán. SAMUEL SILVA-GOTAY Pulcheria (399–453), Eastern empress (450–53). Older sister of Theodosius II and a powerful figure in Constantinople, she supported the condemnation of Nestorius* (428) and the restoration of John* Chrysostom's bones (438), and opposed Eutyches* (449). When Theodosius died (450), she chose his successor, Marcian, whom she married. She encouraged the convening of the Council of Chalcedon* (451), which reversed the actions of the Second Council of Ephesus* (449).

Punishment. See ATONEMENT; DAMNATION; HELL; JUDGMENT; PURGATORY.

Purgatory, in Roman Catholicism, the place where, in the interim between an individual's death* and the general resurrection*, the soul* of a person to be saved expiates venial* sins* or mortal* sins* after contrition* and confession* (but not satisfaction). Purgatory was considered to be a place only from c1170 and was dogmatically defined only in 1254. References to "purgatorial fire" in "the punishments" or the "places of punishment" appear in vision literature, where frightening landscapes present some eternal and some temporary punishments. Believers perform actions called suffrages (prayers, masses, alms), entreating saints to intercede for suffering* souls* and so accelerate expiation. The granting of indulgences* and papal declarations occasioned a quantification and even a monetization of progress through purgatory.

The bull Unigenitus (1343) posited an infinite "treasury of merits" that Christ* had "invested" and that popes could "expend" for the dead. The most venal excesses provoked widespread protest, culminating in Luther's* "95 Theses Against Indulgences" (1517). The sale of indulgences helped shape Protestant opposition to "works theology." Defenders of purgatory claim to find legitimation in Matt 12:31–32 (forgiveness in the world to come), 1 Cor 3:11–15 ("purified as if by fire"), and 2 Macc 12:41–46 (prayers to absolve dead soldiers of sin*). See also DAMNATION; HELL; JUDGMENT.

ALAN E. BERNSTEIN

Purification of Mary, feast on February 2 that is also known as the Presentation* of Christ and Candlemas*.

Puritans, Puritanism, militant movement to further reform the Protestant Church of England (see Anglicanism Cluster: Anglican Communion and Its Theology) and to shape a model church and society in New England. Named "Puritans" by opponents because of their extreme efforts to "purify" the church, by the later 1600s they took pride in the name. Dubbed by modern historians "the hotter sort of Protestants" and by themselves "the godly," Puritans sought to promote an ardent Christian piety and a Calvinist* or Reformed* theology.

In England Puritanism began as nonconformity in matters of ritual and ceremony during the reign of Elizabeth* I (1558–1603), focused on preaching and pastoral work during the reign of James* I (1603–25), became more oppositional after 1625 when Charles I and Archbishop William Laud* promoted anti-Calvinism and sacramental ceremony, and came to power during Oliver Cromwell's* rule (1649–58). After the restoration of the monarchy in 1660, many Puritan clergy were ejected from the Church of England. Thereafter, they were also called "Dissenters*," and their presbyterian and congregationalist* (independent) meetings were illegal until the Toleration* Act (1689). Many Puritans, led by William Bradford, John Winthrop, Thomas Hooker, and John Cotton, went to New England (1620s and 1630s) to found churches consonant with their ideals. But tensions over Anne Hutchinson's* supposed antinomianism*, baptism* (the "half-way covenant"), and toleration were disruptive. Later Cotton Mather bemoaned the declension from their original ideals.

Believing that the Bible should be the authority for church practice (see Scripture) and attuned to the pattern of the Reformed* churches on the Continent (e.g. Geneva*, where some later Puritan leaders were exiles during the reign of Roman Catholic Queen Mary), Puritans wanted to simplify worship by purging the church of surviving aspects of medieval Catholic ritual and ceremony such as eucharistic vestments*. Many, following Thomas Cartwright, rejected the government of the church by bishops, preferring a presbyterian system with authority vested in the parochial clergy or a congregational system stressing the fellowship and self-determination of local congregations. Congregationalism* prevailed briefly during Cromwell's rule in England and throughout the history of colonial New England (where it was codified in the Cambridge Platform of 1648). A few congregationalist Puritans known as Separatists thought the Church of England so unreformed that they formed illegal congregations outside of it, some migrating to the Netherlands, such as the congregation led by Robert Browne, author of Reformation without Tarrying for Any (1582). The settlers of Plymouth in New England were Separatist in inspiration; Roger Williams* was a thoroughgoing Separatist who denounced the union of church and state.

The heart of Puritanism was a piety and theology of God's grace* and of holiness of life. Puritans emphasized preaching, spiritual counsel, restriction of the Sabbath* (for them, Sunday) to religious exercises, a scrupulous morality, and an introspective piety concerned with assurance of salvation*, producing notable devotional writing from such authors and preachers as Richard Greenham, Richard Sibbes, Richard Baxter*, and Joseph Alleine. Puritan theologians such as William Perkins*, William Ames*, and John Owen developed a theology of grace* that stressed predestination*, outlined the steps of salvation* and the Christian life, and expressed these teachings in the biblical framework of covenant*. Puritan piety also entailed a concern for the Christianization of society.

Puritanism's impact has extended to the present. It helped shape such British Protestant denominations as Baptist*, Congregationalist*, and Presbyterian*; influenced thinking about the spiritual life in Protestantism in Europe; bequeathed its understanding of the conversion* experience to later Evangelicalism*; produced classics of Christian literature, including John Milton's* Paradise Lost and John Bunyan's* Pilgrim's Progress; legitimated the right to resist tyrannical government; and left a reformist and revolutionary spirit to posterity. See also UNITED KINGDOM; UNITED STATES.

DEWEY D. WALLACE, JR.

Pusey, Edward Boverie (1800–82), educated at Christ Church, Oxford, elected a fellow of Oriel (1823), appointed Regius Professor of Hebrew at Christ Church (1828) just as he published his defense of the new German theology and historical critical studies. Pusey, the acknowledged leader of the Oxford* Movement even before Newman's* reception as a Roman Catholic (1845), played an important role in the Library of the Fathers series (translations of major patristic authors, from 1838), made significant contributions to Tracts for the Times on fasting* (1831) and baptism* (1836), and supported the foundation of Anglican sisterhoods. His sermon on the Holy Eucharist*, defending the doctrine of the real presence* (1843), was condemned by the university. He preached in support of private confession and priestly absolution (1846), and helped to rally opposition to the Gorham decision by the Privy Council (by which a priest, condemned by his bishop for holding a heretical view on baptismal regeneration, won on appeal; 1850) and to the liberal historical and theological positions enunciated by Anglican liberal priests in Essays and Reviews (1860). His Eirenicon (1864) initiated a published conversation with Newman and others on various contended aspects of Roman Catholic doctrine and the possibility of the Anglican Church union with Rome.

PETER C. ERB

Q

Q, a Collection of Sayings Ascribed to Jesus, identified in 1838 as the second “source” (German, Quelle; hence the nickname “Q”) that Matthew and Luke used in addition to Mark in their redaction* of their respective gospels (see Synoptic Gospels). This source consisted of sayings of Jesus (with some narratives). Yet no copy of this source has ever been found. Scholars reconstructed it on the basis of the sayings that are found in both Matthew and Luke but not in Mark. Q has come to be a widely accepted explanation by modern scholarship for the parallel sayings in Matthew and Luke that are not found in Mark; alternative hypotheses have not gained widespread acceptance.

The sayings in Q – e.g. those found both in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5–7) and in parallel passages in Luke – could not have been derived from Mark (since they are not in Mark), but are found in Matthew and Luke in much the same order and wording. This observation leads to the conclusion that Q was written in Greek. What were the actual sayings of Jesus in Q? This needs to be established since the wordings in Matthew and Luke often differ. This is done in two steps. First, the distinctive grammar, vocabulary, style, and theology of Matthew and Luke can be established from their way of editing materials taken from the Gospel of Mark. Second, it then becomes possible to reconstruct the original wording of Q by choosing the formulation that does not include the distinctive “fingerprints” of one or the other gospel writer – the original formulation being found at times in Matthew and at other times in Luke. There might have been sayings in Q cited in only one of these Gospels, because either Matthew or Luke omitted them; yet it is difficult to discern whether or not sayings found in only one of the Gospels were actual parts of Q. Thus proposals for including such sayings in the reconstructed Q have not gained wide support. The discovery in 1945 of the Gospel of Thomas*, a collection of 114 sayings ascribed to Jesus, has led to the recognition that Q was a “saying Gospel,” like Thomas, in contrast to the “narrative Gospels,” such as Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

The primary importance of Q is that it contains the most reliable collection of sayings that go back to Jesus himself (see Jesus, Quest for the Historical). There are later accretions in Q, as there are in the Gospels, such as woes pronounced on the Jewish leadership, reflecting the lack of success of the Jewish Christian mission with which Q was associated, in contrast to the Gentile Christian mission of Paul. A reference to the fall of Jerusalem in Q (Luke 13:34–35) puts the date of the final redaction around 70 CE.

JAMES M. ROBINSON

Quadragesimo Anno. See SOCIAL ENCYCLICALS; SUBSIDIARITY, PRINCIPLE OF.

Quadrilateral. See LAMBETH QUADRILATERAL; WESLEYAN QUADRILATERAL.

Quakers. See FRIENDS, RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF.

Quaker Worship. From its origins in mid-17th-c. revolutionary England, Quaker worship consisted of a respectful silent waiting for the leadings of the Holy* Spirit, without ritual, sacrament, program, or human leadership. This “unprogrammed” approach remained dominant until the last half of the 19th c.

Rooted in the assumption that “Christ has come to teach his people himself,” Quakers believed that during silent worship God’s Spirit would descend on his people and lead them to minister in a meeting where all, children, men, and women, were equal. Gradually, through a collective agreement of the meeting, some men and women were recorded as ministers*, but they required no special training or education; the only expectation was that those so designated were favored and would often preach or pray. There was no pulpit or rostrum, only a raised area, or “gallery,” where the ministers sat. Others, designated “elders*,” were responsible for general oversight of the ministry and had regular joint meetings with the ministers. Sometimes, meetings might go for years in total silence, while at other times, the Spirit might lead others to minister often. The women sat on one side of the plain, unadorned meeting room, the men on the other. There were no sacraments or formal religious education.

By the late 1860s, in the Midwestern USA, traditional Quaker worship was being influenced by the spread of revivalism*, and a pattern of evangelical preaching emerged, with mourner's benches, altar calls, and gospel songs. By the 1890s, pastors were employed by these meetings, with a few allowing or encouraging baptism or the "Supper." Some meetings included the use of hymnals and musical instruments, as well as choirs, in their formally organized services. Sometimes, there were periods of "waiting" during these services, which offered worshippers a chance to testify. Distinctive Quaker practices, such as wearing plain clothing, virtually disappeared. Sunday schools became a part of the meetings, making them all but indistinguishable from Methodist or Baptist churches. Pastors often co-pastored with their wives; less frequently women held pastorates, and by the end of the 20th c., some theological training was expected, if not required; two or three Quaker seminaries were built in the USA.

Thanks to missionary activities, the pastoral approach predominates in the world today; yet unprogrammed meetings also exist, primarily in Europe and parts of the USA and Canada.

H. LARRY INGLE

Quartodecimans, early Christians who observed Easter* as the Christian Passover* on the 14th day of the moon, in the month of Nisan. While the Church of Rome celebrated Easter on the following Sunday, this older tradition continued in Asia Minor, and it was defended by Polycarp*, who claimed that it had been handed down from John* the Apostle, and by Irenaeus*. While most churches eventually adopted the Roman practice, a separate church that maintained the older tradition continued into the 5th c.

Quebec. The brand of Roman Catholicism that took root along the banks of the St. Lawrence River, the birthplace of French settlement in North America (the first priest arrived in 1608) was similar to that found in contemporary France: a religion operating under state regulation but animated by the ideals of the Council of Trent* (1545–63). The first bishop of Quebec, François de Laval; the mystic and teacher Marie de l'Incarnation (Marie Guyard*); the nursing sister Catherine de Saint Augustin; the Jesuit* fathers, both missionaries and explorers; the founders of Montreal (Maisonnette, Jeanne Mance, Marguerite Bourgeois): all these prominent figures of the colony were deeply committed to the 17th-c. Catholic* Renewal. All were looking for a new world where they could live in harmony with their convictions. Well ensconced by the time of the British Conquest (1759), this Catholicism was Ultramontane*, even though the secular elites were both royalist and Gallican. Somewhat paradoxically, this characteristic expedited the transition to English rule. Pragmatic despite their staunchly anti-papist stance, the new masters of the French colony feared not so much the faraway pope as the French and American Revolutions and thus granted the Roman Catholic Church liberties that would have been impossible in England.

Early in the 19th c., the Church became impoverished as the French aristocrats and merchants returned to France. It was now serving a dispersed population with a small and poorly educated Canadian clergy. By the mid-19th c., however, a Catholic revival once again took hold, with an exploding demand for European religious*, nuns, and brothers. Catholic organizations developed a network of educational and health institutions. Given the sustained growth of the Church, which still sought direction from Rome rather than from any other center of power, the Province of Quebec earned a strong reputation for being a Catholic civilization, if not the "priest-ridden province" mocked by Anglo-Protestant satirists of the day. For almost a century, the Catholic Church challenged the English bourgeoisie and, later, the Canadian elite who held the reins of industry and commerce. It was the only organization capable of providing a framework for the identity of the French-speaking people under English domination. Thus the Church became a real political actor, controlling community life and addressing the population's quests for meaning.

The years following World War II greatly changed the situation. A relatively new urban middle class, produced by Roman Catholic institutions, was now in a position to demand its autonomy, both from English Canada and from the Church. It adopted the ideals and the myths of modernity that characterize the North American way of life. In the 1960s, the "quiet revolution" successfully challenged the traditional place occupied by Catholicism and transformed the question of identity into a political one that no longer needed to be justified on the basis of religion. In fewer than 40 years, Quebec French culture became one of the most secularized* in the Western world; rates of church attendance fell to less than 10% in the cities, and the new generations became less and less familiar with the tradition.

One may now properly speak of a post-Catholic society in Quebec. In fact, participation in Church activities, knowledge of the creeds, and commitment to moral issues seem to be less prevalent among the French-speaking Catholic population of Quebec than among other groups in Canadian society, including Catholics who speak other languages and French-speaking citizens of other parts of Canada, where confessional identification is still tied up with the memory of a cultural history or ethnic origin.

Traditionally, Roman Catholics and Protestants were as estranged from one another as were the dominant cultural groups, separated by language, way of life, and contrasting visions of the world. Now, ecumenism*, at the level of church leadership at least, has developed new and original opportunities for dialogue. Despite a decline in power, the Christian churches have demonstrated new modes of vitality since the last decades of the 20th c. Pastoral* and social* projects have been created, sometimes in cooperation with other vital forces within society, that challenge dominant social policies. The Catholic Church and other Christian denominations no longer hold sway in contemporary culture and have become deeply concerned with the question of modes of admissibility and creativity of Christianity in the secular world. Perhaps more radically than anywhere else, Christianity in Quebec is now confronting one of the most fundamental challenges of the modern contemporary world: how can Christianity become meaningful in a society that claims to have no need of its traditional ideals, morals, and comprehensive system of meaning? See also POST-CHRISTIAN THOUGHT; SCIENCE AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; SECULARISM AND SECULARIZATION; SECULARIZATION AND DESECULARIZATION IN EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA.

RAYMOND LEMIEUX

Queer, a word sometimes used pejoratively for persons known to engage, or suspected of engaging, in homosexual practice. Now the word functions primarily as a rallying point for those who affirm and defend such practice or contest the assumed normativity of heterosexuality. Queer interpretation challenges the assumption that biblical texts must be read in ways that conform to certain normative views about sex, gender, and sexuality*. See also BIBLE INTERPRETATION CLUSTER: IN NORTH AMERICA AND WESTERN EUROPE: QUEER.

Quietism, a form of religious devotion emphasizing passive contemplation and withdrawal from thought, will, and the senses. It advocates contemplative* prayer, abnegation of the self, union with the divine will, inner repose, acceptance of suffering and persecution, and disinterested or pure love*. In its orthodox form, Quietism was part of the mystic* tradition (e.g. that of John* of the Cross). In the context of the Catholic* Renewal (Counter Reformation) and Jesuit–Jansenist* controversies, Quietism in its popular form was accused of neglecting external disciplines of devotion and acts of charity.

See also FÉNELON, FRANÇOIS DE SALIGNAC DE LA MOTHE; GUYON, JEANNE BOUVIER DE LA MOTHE; MOLINOS, MIGUEL DE.

PATRICIA A. WARD

Quinisext Council (or Trullan Synod) of Eastern bishops (692) met in the domed trullus of the imperial palace (thus “Trullan”) to complete the disciplinary canons of the fifth (553) and sixth (680–81) ecumenical* councils (thus “Quinisext” [fifth–sixth]). Its decisions about clerical marriage, matrimony, ecclesiastical dress and ordination, and other issues are authoritative in the Eastern Church but were recognized only indirectly by Pope Hadrian I (772–95).

Quiroga, Vasco de (Tata Vasco) (1470?–1565), Dominican priest born in Spain, visitor (inspector) of New Spain (Mexico*), pacificator of the Chichimecs of Michoacán, one of the five judges (oidores) in the “Audencia” that governed New Spain (1531–35), the first bishop of Michoacán (1538–65). Inspired by Thomas More’s* Utopia and its idealistic vision of a tolerant society, he founded the self-governing San Nicolas School in Pátzcuaro and created towns where Chichimecs, Purépecha, and other native peoples lived in security, were taught religion, developed arts and crafts industries, and practiced self-government.

MARÍA ALICIA PUENTE LUTTEROTH and
ELIZABETH JUDD

Qumran, site near the northwest shore of the Dead Sea, noteworthy for its substantial archaeological remains and the hundreds of fragmentary manuscripts, the Dead* Sea Scrolls, found in caves in nearby cliffs. Although the Qumran ruins were first described as the remains of a fortress or a villa, the contents of major scrolls and the dating of the pottery in the caves, which parallels that of pottery in the ruins, indicate that Qumran housed a community of Essenes* between c100 BCE and 68 CE, when the army of Titus destroyed it during the First Jewish Revolt.

GEORGE W. E. NICKELSBURG

Qur'an and Christianity. The Qur'an has many Jewish elements, as well as numerous outspoken references to the Christian tradition. The latter can be divided into the critical appropriation of stories about Jesus, his mother, Mary (the only woman to be mentioned by name in the Qur'an), and his disciples, and statements about the condition of contemporary Christians.

Of the nearly 6,500 verses in the Qur'an, some 100 deal with the story of Jesus. Two longer and partly overlapping episodes tell the story of the Annunciation, the virgin birth, and the early years of Jesus. Jesus is characterized as a prophet* who reinforced the Torah but also relaxed some regulations. His preaching evoked protest and unbelief among the Jews, who tried to kill him on the cross. That was their plan, but God had another plan: Jesus was not crucified (another man who looked like him was), but was raised by God to heaven to be with God (Qur'an 4:157-58). The followers of Jesus are called "Nasara," a term used by Jews in the Talmud* but also in Mesopotamia/Iraq* (East Syrian) by outsiders. The term "people of the Book" refers in the Qur'an to Jews and Christians.

Some passages in the Qur'an show a preference for Christians over Jews. The best known is Qur'an 5:82: "Of all men you will find the Jews and those who associate others with Allah in His divinity to be the most hostile to those who believe; and you will surely find that of all people they who say: We are Christians, are closest to feel affection for those who believe. This is because there are worshipful priests and monks among them, and because they are not arrogant." Qur'an 9:31-4, however, blames rabbis and monks equally because they are taken as "Lords beside Allah" and "they wrongfully devour men's possessions and hinder people from the way of Allah." Qur'an 57:27 refers to the monastic* life characteristic of Christians in a mildly critical way: "And monasticism they invented – We did not prescribe it for them – only seeking the good pleasure of God; but they observed it not as it should be observed." Christians are blamed for saying that Jesus is the Son* of God and for referring to God as "Three" (see Trinity*) instead of one (4:171) – the "Three" being interpreted as Allah, Jesus, and Mary (5:116). Christians are often blamed for conflicts and differences of opinion. They are seen as proselytizers: "Neither the Jews nor the Christians will be pleased with you unless you follow their religion" (2:120). Believing Muslims are commanded not to take Jews or Christians as their associates or friends (5:51).

According to Qur'an 61:6, Jesus predicted the coming of a successor: "Jesus son of Mary said: Children of Israel, I am indeed the messenger of God to you, confirming the Torah that is before me, and giving good tidings of a messenger who shall come after me, whose name shall be Ahmad. Then, when he brought them the clear signs, they said: This is a manifest sorcery."

The oldest evidence of the text of the Qur'an can be found in the mosaic inscriptions of the Dome of the Rock (constructed 692, 60 years after Muhammad's death). Some of these inscriptions are taken from Qur'an 19:33-36. They praise Jesus, son of Mary. But they also warn believers that "[i]t is not for God to take a son unto him." It is this mixture of admiration for and warning about Jesus and Christians that is consistently found in the Qur'an.

KAREL STEENBRINK

R

Rabanus Maurus (c780–856), German scholar and theologian, “preceptor of Germany.” A child oblate* in Fulda*, he studied under Alcuin* and then became a teacher (818–24) and abbot (824–42) of Fulda, writing treatises on the arts, canon* law, and the clergy, and commentaries on Scripture. When his activities were disrupted by dynastic struggles after the death of Louis* the Pious, he retired to write an encyclopedic work on the world, human life, and Christian faith. As archbishop of Mainz (847–56), he was closely involved in the condemnation of Gottschalk*, ironically a child oblate like himself.

Rabbi, Rabboni (Heb “my teacher,” “my highest teacher,” respectively), forms of direct address to Jewish teachers, especially in the Pharisaic* tradition; later these became third-person titles. Jesus is addressed as “rabbi” (Mark 9:5, 11:21, 14:45, par.) and “rabboni” (Mark 10:51; John. 20:16).

Rabbula (c350–35), bishop of Edessa (412–35), metropolitan of Osroene. After the Council of Ephesus* (431), he became a leading opponent of Nestorianism* and Theodore* of Mopsuestia, allying himself with Cyril* of Alexandria, whose works he translated into Syriac. He opposed the Antiochene christological* position. His opponent, Ibas*, succeeded him.

Rachel, younger daughter of Laban, with whom Jacob fell in love at the well near Haran. Through deception Jacob was married first to the older daughter Leah* and was able to marry Rachel only after seven years. Rachel was the mother of Joseph* and Benjamin*; she died while giving birth to the latter (Gen 35:16–20). Allegorically*, Rachel is considered the higher wisdom, Leah the lower.

RACISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Racism and Christianity: Ethnocentrism

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Responses

Racism and Christianity in Africa

Racism and Christianity in Asia

Racism and Christianity in the Caribbean

Racism and Christianity in North America:

Feminist Theology and Systemic Racism

Racism and Christianity in North America:

White Racism as a Theological Issue for White Churches

Racism and Christianity in the South Pacific and Australia

Racism and Christianity in Western Europe

1) Introductory Entry

Racism and Christianity: Ethnocentrism. Generally understood, the term “racism” designates prejudice, bias, discrimination, violence*, and terror directed at persons or groups solely on the basis of what are perceived to be inferior traits, characteristics, manners, customs, or other cultural markers such as language, dress, or skin color.

Ethnocentrism mobilizes the “racial superiority” of a dominant hegemonic group and turns it against a distinct ethnic group perceived as inferior, even within the same geographic region, as in, e.g., the European conquerors’ treatment of Native Americans, Nazi Germany’s “final solution” (see Holocaust, Jewish [or Shoah]), and the Rwandan* and Kosovo genocides.

In Western culture, racism takes the form of white supremacy over people of color, of bifurcating race relations between “white” and “black.” Racism as the ideology* of white supremacy has historically defined relationships between Europeans and Africans and their descendants since the time of their initial contact and the conquest of Africans, and it has been supported by the mobilization of Christian missionary activities against African people in European colonization and imperialism (see Colonialism and Imperialism and Christian Theology). Perhaps in no greater geographic area has this type of racism been more insidiously sedimented and mobilized in race relationships than in the USA through the transatlantic slave trade, chattel slavery*, Jim Crow legislation, lynching, the Ku Klux Klan organizations, and the use of juridical and penal systems to regulate and subjugate black bodies. The effects of these acts of white supremacy continue to structurally influence forms of prejudice, bias, discrimination, and physical, institutional, and psychological violence and terror among people of African descent in the USA.

Racism, whether that of white supremacy or ethnocentrism, not only manifests itself in the personal attitudes and personalities of individuals. It is also systematic and institutional, permeating the structures of groups, communities, nations, and societies throughout the world. Moreover, racism does not always manifest itself in overt patterns and practices of violence and terror by judicial, penal, governmental, military, educational, and Christian churches. It may also manifest itself as a banality of evil* in the form of demeaning and denigrating epithets, slurs, wit, and jokes directed at or referring to African Americans. It is so deeply entrenched, preserved, cultivated, and enacted in the everyday practices of people and groups that no social institutions, not even the Christian churches in the USA, are free of its power to distort interhuman encounters.

Whether as ethnocentrism or white supremacy, racism is idolatry*. In the USA, it raises white power and privilege to the status of the divine, which determines the worth, value, and dignity of all who fall under its power. Many believed that racism could be eliminated through progressive liberal reforms, propagation of the Social* Gospel, and the marshaling of religious forces in the fight for civil* rights and the efforts of the Civil Rights Movement to overhaul social systems that by law protected the lynching of blacks and racial discrimination against blacks in work, housing, and all other social spheres – as if racism were only an ideology. Many believed that racism could be eliminated by people of goodwill, black and white – as if racism were only a matter of personal attitudes and individual personalities. Yet racism as idolatry exhibits a permanency that makes it the cultural logic of race relations in the USA.

The Christian churches must accept their share of responsibility for the endurance of racism. Christians are called everywhere to make their greatest efforts to expose the violence and terror spawned by racism and its demonic* power to distort interhuman relations. Where racism is masked as white supremacy or ethnocentrism, people of goodwill are called to discipline themselves personally and as communities in order to be ever on the alert for the manifestations and operations of power of this idolatry in their own lives.

VICTOR ANDERSON

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Responses

Racism and Christianity in Africa. The ideology* of racism that shaped the policy of apartheid (“separate development”) was formulated and justified theologically by the Dutch Reformed Church of South Africa. It was the official doctrine on race relations in South Africa until apartheid was legally abolished (1994). At this time, the democratic Republic of South* Africa was established after a long struggle for liberation supported by campaigners both within and outside the country. According to the doctrine of apartheid, the people of African descent were cursed and condemned to be “hewers of wood and drawers of water” in the service of the people of European descent. This doctrine was biblically defended by reference to the “curse” of Ham (Noah’s third son) by his father in Gen 9:24–27.

The World* Alliance of Reformed Churches in the declaration by its General Council (Ottawa, Canada, 1982) proclaimed that this abuse of the Bible to justify racial oppression was a heresy*. This declaration reads in part, “The gospel confronts racism, which is in its very essence a form of idolatry*. Racism fosters a false sense of supremacy, it denies the common humanity of believers, and it denies Christ's reconciling, humanizing work. It systematizes oppression, domination and injustice. As such the struggle against racism, wherever it is found, in overt and covert forms, is a responsibility laid upon the church by the gospel of Jesus Christ in every country and society."

The World* Council of Churches, following a mandate of the Fourth Assembly (1968, Uppsala, Sweden), established the Programme to Combat Racism (1970), which organized a consultation (1975) entitled "Racism in Theology and Theology Against Racism." This report outlines the contexts in which racism thrives, indicating that racism is present whenever:

- Persons, even before they are born, because of their race, are assigned to a group severely limited in their freedom of movement, their choice of work, their places of residence and so on.
- Groups of people, because of their race, are denied effective participation in the political process, and so are compelled (often by force) to obey the edicts of governments which they were allowed to have no part in choosing.
- Racial groups within a nation are excluded from the normal channels for gaining economic power, through denial of educational opportunities and entry into occupational groups.
- The policies of a nation-state ensure benefits for that nation from the labor of racial groups (migrant or otherwise), while at the same time denying to such groups commensurate participation in the affairs of the nation-state.
- The identity of persons is denigrated through stereotyping of racial and ethnic groups in textbooks, cinema, mass media, interpersonal relations, and other ways.
- People are denied equal protection of the law, because of race, and when constituted authorities of the state use their powers to protect the interests of the dominant group at the expense of the powerless.

- Groups or nations continue to profit from regional and global structures that are historically related to racist presuppositions and actions.

Racism in Africa has been justified through the selective and literalist reading of specific Bible texts to suit the interests of the perpetrators. In particular, Christian descendants of the people who invaded Africa and the Americas from Europe used selected Bible texts to justify their conquest and oppression of the peoples they had conquered. The doctrine of "chosen* people" as narrated in the OT was interpreted to refer to the invading conquerors. Racism ignores and negates the doctrine that all human beings are created in the image* of God. Furthermore, racism portrays Jesus* as a Caucasian (see Christologies Cluster), particularly in the indoctrination of the oppressed, and in the art, drama, and music used for the purposes of subjugation. Racism has been further entrenched by means of individualistic expressions of Christianity (see Autonomy), which inhibit social mobilization and resistance by racially oppressed Christians. Martin Luther King*, Jr., and Archbishop Desmond Tutu are two of the most renowned church leaders who rose to prominence because of their campaigns against racism in the USA and South Africa, respectively.

It is worthwhile heeding the challenge articulated by the WCC report cited earlier: "Discovering the sin* of racism with all its implications and choosing the risky road of repentance-action, these are two aspects of one and the same process. It is a process which involves individuals and groups in the whole of their life and challenges their entire pattern of behavior. But it is also a process which involves and challenges the Church of Christ in a pre-eminent way since there the message of forgiveness is spelt out and articulated as explicitly as possible. In this process we are driven to rethink our ideas as to the nature of the Church* and to recover the meaning and implications of its original mission."

JESSE NDWIGA KANYUA MUGAMBI

Racism and Christianity in Asia. Asia is a continent in which multitudes of racial, ethnic, and cultural groups exist, frequently in tension. Pride in their racial heritage is characteristic of Asian people. Often this pride breeds contempt and hatred toward people outside their own group. These negative feelings are reflected in the social and political spheres and affect the economic process as well.

A definition of racism proposed by the Uppsala Assembly of World Council of Churches (1968) is helpful for understanding the role of racism in Asia: "By racism we mean ethnocentric pride in one's own racial group and preference for the distinctive characteristics of that group; belief that these characteristics are fundamentally biological in nature and are thus transmitted to succeeding generations; strong negative feelings towards other groups who do not share these characteristics, coupled with the thrust to discriminate against and exclude the out-groups from full participation in the life of the community." From this perspective, many conflicts in Asia can be characterized as racial.

Many countries in Asia experienced white supremacy during periods of subjugation under colonial* rule: Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, the first prime minister of independent India*, articulated this forcefully: "We in India have known racialism in all its forms even since the commencement of British Rule. The idea of a master race is inherent in imperialism – India is a nation and Indians as individuals were subjected to insult, humiliation, and contemptuous treatment. The English were an imperial race, we were told, with a God given right to govern us and keep us in subjection; if we protested we were reminded of the tiger qualities of an imperial race."

However, a variety of ethnic conflicts can be found in different countries in Asia. Often parallels are drawn between the heinous caste* system in India and racism. Some scholars even argue that casteism is nothing but a subtle form of racism. The atrocities committed against the Dalits* (untouchables) have a parallel only in the racial genocide of Native Americans and the racial slavery* of blacks in the USA and other countries. But most scholars agree that notwithstanding the similarity between casteism and racism, they are not the same; casteism involves social, economic, and religious features that cannot be reduced to racial issues.

The discrimination and misery experienced by ethnic minorities in Japan*, particularly Buraku*, Korean, and Okinawan people, are widely known. Japan itself is a country where some racial groups gained prominence over others socially and culturally.

In almost all Asian countries, indigenous "tribes" (see Tribalism and Christianity) are subjected to discrimination, humiliation, and exclusion. Racial tension prevails in Hong* Kong, Singapore*, and Malaysia*, which influences the economic and political processes in these areas. In other countries in Asia, especially Vietnam*, Cambodia, and Pakistan*, ethnic conflicts, which sometimes exist below the surface, negatively affect the life of the people. In short, the pernicious evil of racism is rampant in Asia.

K. C. ABRAHAM

Racism and Christianity in the Caribbean. Racism in the Caribbean (as in many other places in Latin America) constitutes the systemic and systematic exclusion, exploitation, and marginalization of anyone who is not of European descent. A combination of European power and prejudice, racial attitudes were historically used to justify violent oppression* and colonization in the name of Christianity. The expansion of the Spanish Empire in the Caribbean starting in the 15th c., then of the British, French, and Dutch Empires (17th and 18th c.), was synonymous with the massacre of indigenous peoples, the evangelization of African slaves*, and the exploitation of Asian laborers in the 19th c. Christianity and the law worked together to subjugate and exploit African slaves and indentured laborers.

During the period of slavery, colonizers created laws that banned miscegenation ("race mixing"; marriage between spouses of different racially defined groups); these laws prohibited African religious, cultural, and social practices and limited the movement of slaves. They established hierarchies according to skin color that maintained white power and justified the inferiority of slaves and of later indentured laborers. Miscegenation between white planters and African slaves occurred nonetheless, and their offspring, "mulattos" or "colored," were seen as inferior to their white counterparts and had little if any economic, social, or political power. Simultaneously, colonizers used their religion, Christianity, to "save" African slaves, whom they deemed to be "heathens" and to reacculturate them in ways that reinforced their assumed inferiority to Europeans. For example, the Anglican Church maintained social and ethnic differences within worship services by prohibiting slaves from taking Communion from the same cups as their European counterparts. Moreover, all African religious practices were illegal and punishable by law.

Although racism was officially dismantled with the emancipation of slaves and the termination of colonization, people of African descent continued to experience economic, political, and social restrictions in their own countries. The emancipation process actually consisted of monetary "compensation" to the planters (slave owners) for the loss of their labor force, but there was no real economic redress for the African slaves who had suffered centuries of violent exploitation. Indeed, emancipation did not dismantle the political and social hierarchies of colonialism. African workers were further exploited through the establishment of "apprenticeship" (akin to indenture) in most of the British Caribbean. Once African Caribbean people obtained full freedom, white planters brought Chinese and Indians to the region by means of indenture schemes. The result was the creation of a cheap labor class and hence a decline in the price of wage labor in the Caribbean. Indenture pitted the African Caribbean population and Asian population against each other and worked as a buffer between whites and people of African descent (especially in Trinidad, Tobago, and Guyana).

In the 20th c., resistance and liberation movements emerged against the continued discrimination of both African and Asian Caribbean people. Perhaps the most popular are the African-based religious movements, such as Rastafarianism* and the Back to Africa Movement.

When many of the white planters left and "people of color" gained control of political and legal institutions, on some islands racism evolved into "colorism", i.e. the building of an economic, political, and social hierarchy according to skin color. Dark-skinned people continued to experience discrimination. Thus while racism no longer exists as a legal system, prejudice among people in the Caribbean remains.

Even after the emergence of a black middle class in Caribbean territories, a social hierarchy based on skin color persists. As an economic force, "benign" racism in the Caribbean merely preserves inherited advantages. Imaging in the media – whereby African people are portrayed as people of dubious character who are indifferent to social responsibility – reinforces self-contempt and self-doubt among African Caribbean persons. The saddest manifestation of this internalized racism is apparent in the desire of many African Caribbean youth (particularly in Jamaica*) to "de-pigmentize" themselves with bleaching cream. In sum, racism remains a serious problem for the churches in the Caribbean, especially because in many ways they have themselves internalized racism.

GARNETT ROPER

Racism and Christianity in North America: Feminist Theology and Systemic Racism. In the 1980s and 1990s, Womanist*, Mujerista*, and Asian American Feminist theologians (see Feminist Theology Cluster: In Asia) exposed as false the claim by Feminist theology (developed mostly by white women theologians) to speak for all women. Around the same time, historical studies of the emergence of whiteness as a racial identity and sociological studies of the effects of whiteness on white women's perceptions of race began to appear.

In response, white Feminist theologians began to acknowledge and address the effects of systemic racism on the field. The centrifugal force at work in systemic racism is white privilege. Whiteness is not perceived and identified as a "race," but occupies the ostensibly neutral center. It constitutes the normative gaze by which racialized minorities are recognized, evaluated, and assigned their "proper" places. The system is asymmetrical; non-whites who more closely conform to the standards that govern that gaze are more easily assimilated than others.

Systemic racism is one of many contextual forces that affect all of us regardless of our best intentions. White Feminist theologians have found a variety of theoretical resources helpful in exposing and combating systemic racism, even as they recognize that the battle is ongoing. In addition to those already mentioned, among the resources used to expose systemic racism are critical race theory in legal and literary studies, as well as poststructuralist* and postmodernist* thought and the analytical tools they provide. ELLEN T. ARMOUR

Racism and Christianity in North America: White Racism as a Theological Issue in White Churches. In European and USA-based societies, white racism refers less to prejudices of individuals than to routinized outcomes of beliefs and practices that sustain hierarchical social structures, based on privileging "white" essentialized physical features over "black" ones. This anti-black racism is also projected on most non-white communities, compounding white racist practices against other peoples of color: indigenous, African, Asian, Latino/a-Hispanic, Asian, and Arab. White racism has been reinforced by such practices as slavery*, massacre, housing and job discrimination, land theft, lynching, disenfranchisement, marginality, imprisonment, war, and poverty.

Theologians from communities of color often challenged white racism, but it remains an oft-neglected theme among white theologians. Five theological questions are key: (1) How have Christian beliefs helped create and sustain white racist systems? (2) How might theologians name the central event of Christian faith to facilitate antiracist work? As reconciliation*? Liberation*? Emancipation? Redemption*? (3) How are theologies of racism related to theologies that address other modes of oppression? (4) How have recent portrayals of Jesus* as "black," "yellow," or "brown" contributed to the antiracist struggle? (5) What is the meaning of Jesus' execution on the cross for the suffering and death of peoples of color by lynching, imprisonment, and capital punishment? MARK LEWIS TAYLOR

Racism and Christianity in the South Pacific and Australia. Christianity came to Oceania in colonial* wrappings, inevitably creating tensions over racial definitions – the basis for racism. In localized settlements characterized by diverse forms of interaction among ethnicity, colonial resource exploitation, and Christian presence, Christianity had three types of roles in racial definition:

1. Christianity fused with a dominant group, which monopolized Christian ideology* to legitimize its racist dominance over a minority. Thus in Fiji*, missionary success created a society that fused Methodist holiness* with Fijian tribal authority. The colonial imposition of a labor system on indigenous people (1879–1916) and a "chosen people*" theology fused with national identity to create an "other" (a "racial minority"). Because both Christian ideology and Fijian ethnicity dominate the national constitution (reinforced since the 1987 election by a series of military coups), Fijian racism is public, religious, and constitutional.
2. Christianity functioned as a bystander to the enforcement of homogeneity through migration control in secular societies in which questions about the relation of religion and culture were resolved and religious legitimization was unnecessary. In Australia, imported forms of Christianity were denominational rather than missionary, and plantation economies (with indentured labor) were restricted to the north. Consequently, the racism that emerged was largely detached from the increasingly urban Christian praxis. (The exception was on the “frontier,” where a minority Calvinist election* theology played a role in legitimizing the clash between dispossessed Scottish Gaels and dispossessed Aborigines.) Thus Australian racism has been largely secular, operating through the churches’ politics of neglect – the indentured labor “problem” being “solved” by the White Australia Policy and national unification (1901). However, when Australia’s first indigenous international Christian mission, the South Seas Evangelical Mission, emerged among the indentured population as an Australian Pentecostal*/Charismatic* movement, it was active in antiracist causes and worked against the oppression of Aborigines.

3. The churches actively contributed to the struggle against racism by helping contractual identities to emerge. The prime example of this role of Christianity was the Treaty of Waitangi, a national settlement in New Zealand establishing the rights of Maori people. It was won by Maori resistance but articulated and supported by Christian leaders, the indigenous Ratana Church Movement, and, from the 1980s, the Councils of Churches.

Only the emergence of pluralist, globally open economies after World War II challenged the tie between race and religion in Oceania. Yet the contemporary rise of religion as a reintegrating force in various national constituencies is an ironic result of the success of colonial secularism.

MARK HUTCHINSON

Racism and Christianity in Western Europe. The origin of racism lies in the construction of hegemonic conceptions of culture in European and Northern American societies that began in the early modern period. Modern racism emerged in the context of 19th- and 20th-c. colonialism* and imperialism, and was directly linked to the establishment of nation-states and nationalism*.

Starting in the second half of the 19th c., racist claims of superiority over other – mostly minority – ethnic groups and their oppression* were legitimized by (pseudo-) science, especially “social Darwinism*.” Racist ideologists had, however, pre-Darwinist forerunners who posited a genealogical racism in the 16th c. In the Christian context, this type of racism was found not least in discourses of racial superiority by missionaries involved in the Christianization of indigenous people and the legitimization of slave* trade (see Mission Cluster: And Race). Theological arguments, including “chosen people*” discourses, legitimized white ethnocentrism and oppression* of indigenous people (e.g. the theory that they were “Hamites,” descendants of the cursed Ham; Gen 9:20–27). In the late 18th c., often in connection with the missionary movement (see Mission Cluster: Thematic Issues: Anti-slavery), anti-slavery movements arose, which justified their positions by the perceived biblical mission to make all people their followers. In the early 20th c., Protestant World* Missionary Conferences directed their attention to the problem of racism. Although opposed to it, they still participated in the discourse of white paternalism that declared “races” to be part of the divine order.

The declarations by Protestant German delegates at the World Missionary Conferences in Jerusalem in 1928 and Oxford in 1937 were openly racist. Their theological discourses drew on modern racist and anti-Semitic* conceptions developed by Huston Stewart Chamberlain, Wilhelm Marr, Paul de Lagarde, and others.

The political use of racist theories culminated in the Weltanschauung (see Ideology) of diverse Fascist movements in Europe and particularly in German National Socialism. The latter based its ideology primarily on the myth of “Aryan” superiority, hence justifying the genocide of the Jews (see Holocaust, Jewish [or Shoah]). The most extreme representative of National Socialism in the Christian spectrum, the Protestant movement of the German* Christians (Deutsche Christen), intended to insert Christianity into Aryan racism in order to obliterate the Jewish roots of Christianity. (Similarly radical was the fundamentalist Protestant Ku Klux Klan in the USA.)

Racist ideas and anti-Semitic codes were propagated beyond right-wing movements into the wider Christian population. Discourses going back to stock anti-Semitic commonplaces – the so-called deicide topos (Matt 27:22–25: “The people as a whole answered, “His blood be on us and on our children!”) and that of the perennial Jewish collective guilt – had been the basis of anti-Judaism since early Christianity. In addition, 19th- and 20th-c. modern anti-Semitism consisted of two basic orientations: biologically based racial anti-Semitism and sociocultural anti-Semitism. Christians readily linked sociocultural anti-Semitism to traditional Christian anti-Judaism. Whereas Protestant anti-Semites tended to include racist ideas in their argumentation, the majority of Roman Catholics rejected the biological essentialism of racial anti-Semitism, emphasizing the primacy of religion over “race”; they nonetheless endorsed sociocultural anti-Semitism. In his encyclical Mit brennender Sorge (With burning concern; 1937), Pope Pius* XI spoke out against the absolutizing of “race” and “nation,” yet he did not broach the issue of anti-Semitism.

Although the end of World War II was an ideological turning point, anti-Semitism and racism persisted, even among Christian circles, during the second half of the 20th c. Outside of Europe, during this period racism was particularly apparent in racial discrimination in the USA and apartheid in South* Africa. In Europe, especially in Germany, debates on racism strove to deal with Germany’s racist and anti-Semitic past. In the Christian churches, the debates over racism that began in the 1950s and 1960s culminated in the 1980s and 1990s. The Second Vatican* Council lamented the hatred of Jews by Christians in the declaration Nostra Aetate (1965). The Vatican published the document “We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah” (1998), expressing its deep regret over the “errors and failures of those sons and daughters of the Church,” yet denouncing only individual Christians for their responsibility for the Shoah, and not the responsibility of the Church itself.

At the same time that these European debates over the Holocaust were taking place, the ecumenical movement focused on the thematization of and reaction against racism on a global scale. In 1954 the World* Council of Churches declared segregation based on race to be incompatible with a Christian worldview, and then addressed apartheid in South Africa (e.g. through the Program to Combat Racism, 1970). During the same period, the US Civil Rights Movement was led by churches with roots in Protestant revivalism*, and Roman Catholic Liberation* theology was directed in large part against racist oppression*. After World War II, the Christian churches initially condemned racism as a sin* and heresy*, e.g. in proclamations by the Lutheran World Federation (1977), the World* Alliance of Reformed Churches (1981), and the papal commission Justitia et Pax (1989). In the 1990s, a shift toward an interpretation of racism as a societal phenomenon could be detected (e.g. WCC’s reports of 1991 and 1995).

URS ALTERMATT and
FRANZISKA METZGER

Racovian Catechism (1605), the confession of faith for the Minor Reformed Church (anti-trinitarian “Polish Brethren”) in Poland*, considered to be the most influential document in Unitarian* history. It was named for Rakow, Poland, where many persecuted Polish Brethren migrated (1569) in order to create a New Jerusalem. For 60 years Polish Brethren published c500 tractates and books, which were sent to Transylvania, Germany, and England.

The Racovian Catechism, largely the work of Faustus Socinus*, was published, after his death, by four ministers, with Peter Statorius as the principal editor. It summarized church beliefs in question-and-answer format, strongly emphasizing Jesus’ ethical teachings and the Ten* Commandments, as well as social relations within the state, including a stance against the death* penalty and in favor of pacifism*. According to the Catechism, there is no knowledge of God and Christ without biblical revelation*; God's nature is one, not three; Jesus Christ, a real man with only a human nature, is God's son by his utter obedience, resurrection, and ascension; there is only one sacrament, the Eucharist*; and humans have free will*, so there is no original* sin.

After the Brethren fled Poland (1658), the Racovian Catechism, in many editions (including Latin, Polish, English, Dutch, and German), remained an influential statement of Unitarianism*.

MARK W. HARRIS

Radical Orthodoxy, theological movement originating in the 1990s in Anglican Catholic circles at Cambridge University. It urges the recovery of a premodern ontological vision associated with catholic liturgical* practice and the Christian doctrines of the trinity* and creatio ex nihilo*, in the service of a critique of the metaphysical assumptions, social relations, and cultural practices characteristic of modernity*. A quasi-Heideggerian* narrative traces the violence*, anomie, and exploitative technophilia of secular* societies back to impoverished philosophical notions of being as sheer givenness without inherent order, meaning, or beauty, unwittingly abetted by deficient theologies that solidify dualistic relationships between reason* and faith*, nature*, and grace*.

PAUL DEHART

Radical Reformation, a diversified movement that emerged in the wake of the 16th-c. Protestant Reformation. The leading Protestant Reformers, including Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin, breaking with centuries of Roman Catholic tradition, questioned many aspects of Christian faith, including the views of Scripture*, the Holy* Spirit, baptism* and other sacraments*, and the relationship between church* and state. In response to some of the doctrinal formulations of leading Reformers, alternative groups arose, including the Anabaptists*, Spiritual* Reformers, and Evangelical Rationalists. These Radical Reformers challenged the subjugation of religion to territorial princes and civic officials (still accepted by the leading Reformers). They found their most lasting institutional forms in the Society of Friends* (Quakers), Pietism*, the Moravian* tradition, and Methodism*.

DONALD KRAYBILL

Radio. See MEDIA AND CHRISTIANITY; MEDIA AND CHRISTIAN WORSHIP.

Rahner, Karl (1904–84). Born in Germany, Karl Rahner entered the Society of Jesus in 1922 and, after undertaking philosophical and theological studies, was ordained as a priest in 1932. His doctoral studies in philosophy at the University of Freiburg (1934–36) included several courses with Martin Heidegger* and a dissertation on the metaphysics of knowledge in Thomas Aquinas* under Martin Honecker. Rahner's thesis was rejected for being insufficiently Thomistic*. He obtained a doctorate in theology from the University of Innsbruck, Austria (his dissertation was on patristic interpretations of John 19:34). Appointed professor of theology, he taught at Innsbruck (1936–64), then at the Universities of Munich (1964–67) and Münster (1967–71).

A Sapiential Theology. One should not be deceived by Rahner's self-description as an "amateur theologian." Because of his enormous philosophical and theological output – some 4,000 items – Rahner is widely regarded as one of the most influential Roman Catholic theologians of the 20th c. What is true, however, about Rahner's self-deprecation is that his overriding concern was always "pastoral" and not academic. His goal was to help Christians of his time make sense of their faith in the face of contemporary questions and challenges and to grow spiritually. Rahner's theology is sapiential or even mystical, deeply rooted in faith and worship; it aims at fostering an experience of God by ordinary Christians in their everyday life. It is an initiation into a personal experience of God. While influenced by philosophers such as Kant*, Hegel*, Pierre Rousselot, Joseph Maréchal, and Heidegger, especially in his two philosophical works, Spirit in the World (1939) and Hearers of the Word (1941), Rahner was most indebted to the spiritual writings of the fathers (especially Origen*), Bonaventure*, Thomas* Aquinas, Teresa* of Ávila, and, above all, Ignatius* of Loyola (Spiritual Exercises). Indeed, the most fruitful way to approach Rahner's theology is through his popular writings on prayer and spirituality and his interviews. Yet one cannot ignore his more difficult works: his 23-volume Theological Investigations (translation of the 16-volume Schriften zur Theologie) and Foundations of the Christian Faith (1976).

God as Mystery. In his early philosophical works, Rahner attempts to show that in every act of knowing and loving, humans necessarily, though implicitly, “reach out in anticipation” (vorgreifen) toward the infinite horizon of being and goodness (God, the Mystery), without being able to grasp it. Using the Kantian* transcendental method, Rahner argues that such reaching-out-toward-without-ever-grasping the horizon of being and goodness (the “transcendental experience”) is the condition of possibility for every act of knowing and loving a particular object (the “categorical experience”). The goal of theology* is to help everyone come to an explicit awareness of this orientation toward God, which defines what being human means.

God as Self-Giving Holy Mystery. For Rahner the conviction that this distant Mystery has, freely and out of love, come near us is central to the Christian faith. God has given God’s own self to humans. This divine self-communication is trinitarian in structure. God the Father is self-communicated in two distinct and related modes: as origin, history, invitation, and knowledge (in the Son*); and as future, transcendence, acceptance, and love (in the Spirit*).

Humans as “Supernatural Existential.” Using Heidegger’s terminology, Rahner calls grace* an “existential.” However, he adds the adjective “supernatural” to highlight the gratuitous character of God’s self-communication. Thus the natural capacity (potentia obedientialis) by which humans open themselves to God and desire beatific* vision has been in fact fulfilled by God’s self-gift and transformed into the “supernatural existential,” which humans are enabled to live out concretely.

Jesus Christ as the “Absolute Savior.” Faithful to his pastoral and spiritual intention, Rahner develops a Christology that responds to the contemporary challenges of science* and religious pluralism. The Chalcedonian* dogma is not the end but the beginning of a search for a deeper understanding of who Christ is. In the evolutionary context, Rahner sees the Incarnation* as the meeting point between two movements, one by the Spirit (God) “coming down” to matter (“descending Christology”), the other by matter “moving up” or actively self-transcending toward the Spirit (“ascending Christology”). The person in whom this meeting occurs is the “Absolute Savior,” identified by Christian revelation as Jesus of Nazareth.

“Anonymous Christians.” With regard to religious pluralism, Rahner argues on the basis of God’s universal salvific will (1 Tim 2:4), the unity between love* of God and love of neighbor (Matt 25:40), and the role of Jesus as the Absolute Savior that anyone who lives out the supernatural existential concretely can be called an “anonymous Christian.” While one cannot affirm with certainty that all will be saved, one must hope and act as if it will be so. The church’s mission* remains; it still consists in being the sacrament* of God’s salvation*. See also MISSION CLUSTER: MISSION, THEOLOGIES OF, AND WESTERN AND ASIAN CHURCHES; PLURALISM, RELIGIOUS, AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.

PETER C. PHAN

Ramist Logic. An alternative to Aristotelian* logic, Ramist logic divides and subdivides any topic into a series of dichotomies. Developed by Petrus Ramus (1515–72), it was influential among Reformed* thinkers, particularly in Cambridge.

Ransom. Many in the early church interpreted Christ’s ministry, his death on the cross, and/or his resurrection (e.g. 1 Pet 1:18; Rev 5:9; Matt 20:28 // Mark 10:45; 1 Tim 2:5) as “ransoming” humanity from captivity to Satan or to the “powers” (1 Cor 2:8; Col 2:13–15). See also ATONEMENT #1; REDEMPTION.

Rapture (Lat raptus, “being carried away”), in mystical language, the ecstatic experience of being carried out of oneself through awareness of God, and thus losing self-awareness. For Dispensationalists* and other Millennialists*, “rapture” refers to Paul’s statement (1 Thess 4:17), in speaking of Christ’s return, that believers living on earth will be caught up to meet him in the air.

Rastafari Movement. This movement originated in Jamaica* (early 1930s) and is widespread throughout the Caribbean* region, where it interacts with Christianity. It became internationally known through the Jamaican-born Reggae singer Bob Marley. It takes its name from Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia* before his coronation, Ras being his title of nobility and Tafari his family name. For the Rastafaris, Haile Selassie is the black Messiah*. This movement proclaims that God* is black and that the black people are the true people* of God, marching toward the new Zion*, which is “Ethiopia,” where they will no longer be oppressed*. “Babylon” refers to the present situation of racism* and exploitation of the poor*.

The theological and philosophical foundations of Rastafari were laid by Marcus Mosiah Garvey* (born in Jamaica, 1887), the founder of the Back to Africa Movement: black people, like the people of Israel before them, are exiles in the land of the whites, and it is God's will that they should be set free. This reflects a cultural rather than a geographic problem. Thus Rastafaris have issued a call for the Africanization of the Caribbean.

ARMANDO LAMPE

Rationalism and Christian Theology. Christianity is rooted in faith*. For Augustine*, faith is not only an act of believing that there is a God, but also an act of believing what God says, because one believes in (i.e. trusts) God. Faith so defined is construed according to a model of personal relations, and it has never been thought to be intellectually blind. Like Judaism, Christianity claims that faith results in wisdom* and that through faith one receives other gifts of God's Spirit such as understanding, counsel, and knowledge. Reason*, therefore, ought to benefit from faith; Augustine claimed that "unless you believe you will not understand." Reason has also been used to articulate, teach, and clarify faith. Christianity has thus always engaged in theology*, a reasoned exposition of its teaching and narratives, and a critical reflection of its beliefs. Faith is thus exercised in a reasonable way; Augustine also claimed it is "thinking with assent." Still, the precise relation between faith and reason in theology has always been debated (in part because faith is understood in different ways; see Faith).

In the early church, philosophers such as Justin* and Athenagoras were attracted to Christianity because of the truth they saw there. Conversely, the teachings of the ancient philosophical schools found their way into Christian theology and made it a discipline. Platonism*, which acknowledged not only a creator but also a transcendent good and a mystery* that remained beyond all attempts to fully understand it, had a particularly strong influence on early Christian theology. Its insistence on a link between morals and thought was also amenable to Christian thinkers. Alexandrian theologians such as Clement* and Origen* owed much to Platonism and transmitted it to later theology. There were also limits. Thinkers such as Irenaeus*, Hippolytus*, Tertullian*, and the Cappadocians* blamed heresy* and speculative excess on an overreliance on reason and the use of pagan philosophy. Reason dwelled within the limits of a developing relation with a transcendent God.

Christian theology's use and understanding of reason stayed largely within Augustinian and Platonist horizons through the Middle Ages, yielding a spiritually oriented theology. When the writings of Aristotle* reappeared, there was a period of tension between his secular, scientific claims and the Augustinian-Platonist tradition. Ultimately Aristotle was subsumed within the larger framework, as thinkers such as Aquinas* argued that natural reason did not give direct access to the mind of God but could deal with God's effects in creation and, by analogy*, say something about God. This approach allowed theology to become an academic discipline, just when the university, and not the monastery, became the chief place where it was exercised.

The role of reason in theology changed significantly in the modern period, as reason came to be defined in terms that owed more to mathematics and physics than to interpersonal knowledge. For example, John Locke* insisted that strength of belief be in direct proportion to the degree of evidence for what is believed. This upset the balance between intellect and other elements of the Christian life; neutral, objective evidence became the fulcrum on which all aspects of faith were balanced. For many thinkers, evidence became the sole criterion for accepting or rejecting theological claims. No longer an active search for wisdom, theology came to resemble a natural science, based on publicly defensible first principles systematically worked out and tied to foundations in secular knowledge. In some cases, this led to a strictly "rational theology," such as Deism*, which said no more than could be built out of reason and public, empirical evidence. Other theologians attempted to make the best public case for central traditional doctrines, but also trimmed them accordingly. Others, such as Karl Barth*, rejected all such attempts, insisting that theology as the knowledge of God exists only within the space set out by the activity of God's own Word. Nonetheless, Barth assumes that reason is what modern philosophy says it is.

Much recent philosophy and theology has been extremely critical of the view of reason that reigned from the time of the Enlightenment* to the 20th c., recognizing that its strict insistence on objectivity, neutral reason, method, and certainty has been unrealistic and unworkable even in the natural sciences. Seeking out Christianity's own internal logic has therefore been an important quest for some theologians (see Conviction; Metaphor; Symbolism), as has been an attempt to recover ancient spiritual sources. Other theologians, however, have kept alive an appeal to the secular world, seeking to find a neutral, public reason and to strike a balance between its demands and those of maintaining the internal integrity of Christian faith. See also POSTMODERNISM AND LIBERATION THEOLOGIES; POSTMODERNISM AND THEOLOGY; REASON; REVELATION.

ERIC O. SPRINGSTED

Ratramnus (9th c.), Carolingian* theologian. A fellow monk of Paschasius* Radbertus in Corbie, he wrote a treatise (843) in opposition to the latter's realistic* view of the Eucharist*, emphasizing a more symbolic understanding. Through consecration the bread and wine of the Eucharist become mystic symbols commemorative of Christ's body and blood; in the bread and wine, which retain their outward appearance, resides a power perceived only by the faith* that makes them effective. There was little controversy at the time, but in the 11th c. Retramnus's position, along with that of Berengarius*, was condemned under Pope Leo IX at the Synod of Vercelli (1050). His treatise attracted serious attention during the eucharistic disputes of the Reformation* when his position appeared to be akin to Calvin's; i.e. the substance of the body of Christ is made present through the bread and wine received by faith.

Rauschenbusch, Walter (1861–1918), US clergyman, professor, author, who became a leader in the Social* Gospel Movement (early 1900s). Ordained in 1886, he became pastor of the Second German Baptist Church in New York City, a congregation of needy working-class immigrants. Awakened by their poverty and unjust treatment, he worked with area pastors to help meet their needs.

In 1902 Rauschenbusch was appointed professor of church history at Rochester Theological Seminary, where he had graduated. By then he was also working with Washington Gladden and other leaders of the emerging Social Gospel Movement and was active in the social ministries of the new Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. The Federal Council adopted the Social Creed of the Churches (1908), which member denominations also approved. These actions were the origin of Social Gospel ministry. Rauschenbusch was among its leaders throughout his life, writing several influential books. Three of them indicate his evolving thoughts and concerns for economic and social justice informed by Christianity: Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907), Christianizing the Social Order (1912), and A Theology for the Social Gospel (1918). See also SOCIAL GOSPEL MOVEMENT.

DONALD K. GORRELL

Realism. Today the term connotes either dependence on facts rather than myth* or speculation, or the philosophical position that knowledge is based on the world and not primarily on consciousness. Earlier it referred to the doctrine that universals* have a reality independent of consciousness. Sacramental realism is the view that Christ's body and blood are "really" present in the Eucharist. See also UNIVERSALS.

Reason. In classical usage, reason applied first to counting, computing, or calculating; then to other activities of reasoning; then to the principles that govern a process of reasoning; and finally to the human capacity for thinking, the "eye of the mind." In medieval thought, "reason" tends to mean the process of reasoning, while "understanding" is the insight at the beginning or end of such a process. Reason was said to be presupposed by, and preparatory to, revelation*. Reason was associated with knowledge of God through the natural world generally available to human beings (Rom 1:19–20; Acts 17:23–29), but it needed to be perfected through revelation, for only then would it lead to insights that were otherwise impossible to reach. This way of relating reason and revelation* is not uncontested, however. The Enlightenment* favored reason over revelation, because it was more generally accessible and did not make claims to special insight or authority; if revelation had a role, it was merely as the vehicle by which the truths of reason first came to be discovered. Others disputed the claims of natural theology and reason and relied exclusively on revelation (Kierkegaard*, Ritschl*, Barth*).

What is the relation between will* and reason, i.e. between willing and deliberation about good and evil, better and worse choices? The Greek philosophers tended to assume that willing follows the judgment of reason, while the biblical tradition emphasized divine willing and human obedience or disobedience (Deut 26:16–19; Josh 24:15). Ultimately the question is whether an act is good because a legislator – God, or society, or the state – wills it (see Positive Theology, Positive Law, Positivism; Voluntarism), or whether it is legislated because it is good or natural or reasonable (see Rationalism and Christian Theology). See also LOCKE, JOHN.

EUGENE TESELLE

Rebecca, Rebekah, daughter of Bethuel, sister of Laban, wife of Isaac*, mother of Esau* and Jacob*. She helped Jacob deceive Isaac and obtain his blessing (Gen 27:1–28:5).

Rebirth, Spiritual. See EVANGELICALS/EVANGELISM CLUSTER.

Rebmann, Johannes (1820–76), a German, went to the East African coast as a missionary sponsored by the Church Missionary Society (founded 1799). He joined Dr. Ludwig Krapf* in Rabai near Mombasa (1846) and lived there until his death (1876). Krapf and Rebmann were not interested in vocational training as a means of evangelization. Rather, they were preoccupied with anthropological, linguistic, and geographic documentation. For more than three decades, they made very few converts to Christianity, but their documentation paved the way for the European occupation of Eastern Africa. Rebmann was most well known for being the first European, guided by the local people, to see the snow-covered peak of Mount Kilimanjaro, the highest mountain in Africa. His reports to England and Germany about high, snow-capped mountains within the tropics were received with much skepticism, but they also aroused curiosity and encouraged more European (especially British and German) adventurers and explorers to come to East Africa.

Recapitulation (Gk anakephalaiosis, “summing up”), term used in the NT for love as the summation of the Ten* Commandments (Rom 13:9). For Irenaeus* (following Eph 1:10), Christ sums up all things; as a recapitulation of Adam*, reversing Adam’s disobedience with his own obedience, Christ recapitulates humanity, leading it back to the beginning, i.e. the divine Word*.

Reccared (d601). King of the Visigoths in Spain (586–601), he converted from Arianism* to Roman Catholicism (587), publicly announcing his conversion at the Council of Toledo (589). Despite resistance from some of the Goths*, he achieved a new unity between Christians of Roman and of Gothic descent.

Receptionism, the position that, in the Eucharist*, the Body and Blood of Christ are received not physically but through faith, and thus are not received by unbelievers.

Reception Studies of Preaching investigate the processes and practices involved in receiving and using sermons, and promote awareness of common reception patterns, as well as issues of social location and identity. What difference do race, ethnicity, and social location make in the reception of sermons? What are the key factors that affect sermon reception? What makes a sermon more effective? What do listeners do with sermons? What are the roles of psychology, perception, and memory in the reception of sermons? What are the purposes of sermons in the lives of listeners (see Preaching)?

Empirical studies of reception* have increased, especially in late-20th-c. North American and German contexts. For example, the “Listening to Listeners Project” (2000–3), led by Ronald Allen and funded by the Lilly Foundation, was based on in-depth interviews with individuals and focus groups, involving 263 laypersons and 32 preachers in 28 Midwestern congregations in the USA. The published analyses of these interviews elucidate listeners’ perceptions of content, feeling, the preacher, and embodiment. Intensified awareness of issues of reception brought about a “turn to the listener” in homiletic* theory starting in the late 1970s, first in inductive sermon methods (Craddock; Meyers) and in experientially grounded narrative and imaginative approaches to preaching (Lowry; Steimle, Niedenthal, Rice). These theories assumed a humanist* theory of subjectivity and made use of existentialist* philosophies and theologies grounded in ideas of “common human experience.” They somewhat mirrored the rhetoric of Kenneth Burke, who advocated “identification” with one’s interlocutor as the key to rhetoric effectiveness and encouraged a shift from “persuasion” to “constitutability” as the goal for rhetoric. It was assumed that preachers could and should identify with those listening to sermons, and speak from and for listeners when speaking from the pulpit.

Postmodern* and hermeneutical* philosophies, postcolonial* theories, cultural* studies, critical race* theories, and feminist* and womanist* theories provided strong critiques of ideas regarding sameness or interchangeability with respect to human subjectivity. With an awareness of these critiques and through reception studies, homiletic theories have incorporated the awareness of the differences and otherness of listeners in four homiletic models: (1) perspectival, “targeted-audience” models; (2) ethnographic homiletics, wedded to congregational study (Tisdale); (3) conversational and collaborative homiletics; and (4) testimonial homiletics.

JOHN S. MCCLURE

Reception Studies of Scripture (German, Wirkungsgeschichte) investigate the ways readers, including Christian believers, have been affected by particular biblical texts throughout history. With this knowledge, present readers of Scripture are able to acknowledge both “the otherness of the other” (Gadamer*) and the contextual character of their own interpretations, including “detached” scholarly exegeses*.

This critical approach emerged in the 1980s in biblical commentaries (Luz), and later in collective studies and compilations in the series Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture. Reception studies became feasible because of the methodological effervescence of the 1970s–1980s. Literary, structural, semiotic*, rhetorical, feminist*, liberationist*, ideological*, and sociocultural* critical approaches were introduced in biblical studies to complement historiographic* and philological* methods. These studies demonstrated the legitimacy of a diversity of interpretations of the same biblical texts. These practical exegetical results affirmed the polysemic nature of any discourse or text by specialists of hermeneutics*, semiotics*, and communication theories, according to whom interpreters necessarily read a text from the perspective of their “pre-understandings.”

While this hermeneutical circle may result in a problematic “reading into the text,” it also is a necessary interpretive process, especially when believers read biblical texts as Scripture* in their quest for a Word-to-live-by in a particular sociocultural and religious context. To make sense of a text, readers necessarily choose certain textual features as most significant. These textual choices – made by scholars using the aforementioned methods or by believers throughout history – reflect the readers’ contextual, cultural, and religious stances and concerns. One can no longer affirm that the textual features underscored by modern* Western methods are the only significant ones and that interpretations based on other textual features are illegitimate until proved otherwise. Rather one can view biblical interpretations developed in different sociocultural and historical contexts, including those by ordinary believers, as legitimate until proved otherwise and as sources of insight into the richness of biblical texts.

Interpretation of the Bible in African*, American*, Chinese*, English*, French*, German*, Indian*, Italian*, Japanese*, Portuguese*, Russia*, Scandinavian*, and Spanish* literature and the differences in biblical interpretation in various contemporary cultural contexts (see Bible Interpretation Cluster) are all reminders of “the otherness of the other” and of the contextual character of each biblical interpretation. See also SCRIPTURAL CRITICISM. DANIEL PATTE

Recluse, person enclosed in a cell, out of contact with the world, for purposes of spiritual meditation.

Reconciliation, process of restoring right relationships when harm or injury has come between two or more persons, through a process or ceremony to mark the resolution of difficulties.

The classic Christian concept of reconciliation begins with an understanding of sin* as a disruption of the relationship between God and humankind, viewed by Western* churches as the responsibility of believers who are guilty of sin, or viewed by Eastern Orthodox* churches as the result of sin understood as a disease from which humans need to be cured. In either case, by their sin, humans become alienated from God and are unable to mend the torn fabric through their own efforts. This broken relationship can be restored only by God’s initiative. “Be reconciled to God,” the Scriptures urge (2 Cor 5:20), and this appropriate attitude is understood as a response to God, “who reconciled us to himself through Christ” (2 Cor 5:18), i.e. who healed humans so that union with God would once again be possible (in Eastern traditions) or who made peace with alienated humanity (in Western traditions). Western traditions emphasize that in ancient Israel reconciliation was built on the concept of atoning* sacrifice*. The symbolic offering is a price paid for restoring relationships. Making things right after harm has been inflicted is accomplished by payment of damages or costs of restitution, symbolized by the sacrificial lamb.

Traditional Western understandings assumed the need for a rough parity between the extent of harm and the price of reconciliation. Justice* depends on restoring balance; the wrongs require some effort to put things right. Most difficult is the irreparable harm incurred when life itself is lost. How can life be restored? What is the price for its restitution? Even when such payment cannot possibly undo the harm, rather than resorting to retaliation, symbolic means are employed to represent the process of making things right. The classic example is Jesus on the cross saying, “Father, forgive them for they do not know what they are doing” (Luke 23:34).

In traditional Roman Catholicism, reconciliation is understood in the sacrament of penance, whereby a believer is restored to right relationship with God after committing sin. In confession to a priest (understood to be God's authorized representative), the person identifies the offense, bears witness to its gravity, and shows a spirit of contrition. The priest then pronounces forgiveness, releasing the individual from the burden of guilt (see Penance and Forgiveness).

In recent decades, Christians have taken Paul's mandate for "the ministry of reconciliation" to new levels of service in conflict resolution. Consistent with Eastern traditions of reconciliation as "healing" (rather than justice), the mediation of disputes and skills and techniques for peace building and healing of traumas are applied to major arenas of recovery from warfare and widespread social conflict, as is done in the Truth* and Reconciliation Commissions in South Africa. See also RECONCILIATION AS A CHRISTIAN PRAXIS.

N. GERALD SHENK

Reconciliation as a Christian Praxis. To work for reconciliation is to want to realize God's dream for humanity – when we will know that we are indeed members of one family, bound together in a delicate network of interdependence. True forgiveness deals with the past, all of the past, to make the future possible. That is what makes a community a community or a people a people.

Most of human history is a quest for that harmony, friendship*, and peace* for which we appear to have been created. The Bible depicts it all as a God-directed campaign to recover that primordial harmony when the lion will again lie with the lamb and they will learn war no more. Now and again, we catch a glimpse of the better thing for which we are meant, e.g. when we work together to counter the effects of a natural disaster, when for a little while we are bound together by bonds of a caring humanity, a universal sense of ubuntu. Then we experience fleetingly that we are made for togetherness, for friendship, for community, for family*, that we are created to live in a delicate network of interdependence.

It is crucial, when a relationship has been damaged, that the perpetrator acknowledge the truth and be ready and willing to apologize. It is never easy. In almost every language, the most difficult words are "I am sorry." Thus it is not at all surprising that those accused of horrendous deeds adopt the denial mode, asserting that such and such has not happened. The Germans claimed they had not known what the Nazis were up to. White South Africans have also tried to find refuge in claims of ignorance; they had not wanted to know (see Racism and Christianity Cluster).

In forgiving, people are not being asked to forget. It is important to remember, so that we do not let such atrocities happen again. Forgiveness does not mean condoning what has been done. It means taking what happened seriously and not minimizing it, drawing out the sting in the memory that threatens to poison our entire existence. Forgiving means abandoning your right to pay back the perpetrator in his own coin, but it is a loss that liberates the victim. In the act of forgiveness, we are declaring our faith in the future of a relationship and in the capacity of the wrongdoer to make a new beginning on a course that will be different from the one that caused us the wrong. We are saying that here is a chance to make a new beginning. It is an act of faith* that the wrongdoer can change. See also JUSTICE, THEOLOGICAL VIEWS AND PRACTICES, CLUSTER: IN AFRICA.

ARCHBISHOP DESMOND TUTU

Reconstruction, African Theologies of. Theologies of reconstruction arose in Africa from a critical reflection on the theologies of liberation* and inculturation*. The liberation paradigm had dominated progressive theological thinking in Africa since the 1960s. The theologies of liberation have been premised on the Exodus narratives, Isa 61:1–2 and Luke 4: 16–22, emphasizing that God liberates the oppressed* from all domination by their oppressors. All theologies of liberation are dialectical – the oppressed against the oppressor, and the oppressor against the oppressed. Furthermore, theologies of liberation provide justification for the oppressed to engage in struggles for their own liberation, with God as their ultimate source of power in their resistance. All theologies of liberation are preoccupied with the suffering, which the theologians reject, and with the oppressors, whom they oppose. Theologies of liberation are essential conceptual tools for resistance to oppression, domination, and exploitation.

New conceptual tools are necessary for facilitating reflection on the new society that must be rebuilt on the ruins of the old, oppressed, and divided society. Theologies of reconstruction provide such conceptual tools in anticipation of the new society that results from successful struggles for liberation. Since the struggle for liberation is a process, it necessarily overlaps with social reconstruction. The new society is anticipated at the same time as the old society is dismantled. Theologies of liberation and theologies of reconstruction are sequentially related, but spatially and temporally integrated. The main features of African theologies of reconstruction can be outlined as follows (summarizing the main points in Mugambi, From Liberation to Reconstruction, 33–51).

It was assumed by most African secular and religious leaders that the withdrawal of the colonial administrations would automatically lead to new social structures. Of course, this was not the case. Thus since the 1990s African Christian theologians have recognized the urgent need of theologies of reconstruction as systematic articulations of human response to revelation in their particular African situations and contexts. These theologies will be effective in 21st-c. Africa if, and only if, the social and physical reality of the continent and its peoples is accurately and comprehensively understood and reinterpreted. Developing African theologies of reconstruction involves discerning alternative social structures, symbols, rituals, myths, and interpretations of Africa's social reality by Africans themselves – as European theologies did in periods of reconstruction, e.g. after World War II in Germany (as Hans Dieter Betz noted in his response to Mugambi's 1999 presentation of African theologies of reconstruction).

African theologies of reconstruction strive to clarify the relationship between gospel and culture (see Culture Cluster: And Christianity). While Christian theologians commonly engage either the discontinuity or the continuity between gospel and culture, African theologians of reconstruction underscore that the gospel is a challenge to every culture. This means that no person has any reason to posit his or her culture as superior to others. Each culture has its strengths and weaknesses, but qualitative comparisons have no ethical justification. Thus the portrayal of African culture as a deficient vehicle for expressing the Christian faith – a long-standing practice by missionaries in Africa – must be set aside. Theologies of reconstruction advocate the amplification of the ongoing cultural stabilization of African Christianity through a characteristically African outlook in rituals, symbols, vestments, music, liturgy, architecture, metaphors, and theological emphases. No church can survive the challenges of history unless the gospel is effectively appropriated to the cultural and religious heritage of its members – as is the case with the Coptic* Church and the Ethiopian* Orthodox Church, which are distinctly African and trace their history to the patristic period. Theologies of reconstruction have the task of helping African Christians assert their own cultural heritage, just as Christians of other cultures have done. The Christian faith has many forms of inculturation, none of which is perfect. African Christians need their own (see Inculturation Cluster).

Regarding social life, the gospel has reached many people in Africa as very bad news. In colonial* Africa, the Christian community tended to be identified with the ruling elite, a social profile that defined in each country the relationship between church* and state in the postcolonial era. The challenge of reconstruction is for the churches to enhance the reconciliatory roles of secular organizations, a process that also calls for overcoming the squabbles among denominations and Christians in order to promote social harmony and cohesion.

Similarly, African theologies of reconstruction have to rethink the relationship between African* Religion and Christianity (see African Religion and Christianity Cluster). The missionary enterprise in Africa was conducted as if it intended to secularize the African outlook. If Africans are notoriously religious, why is it necessary to convert them from their religiosity? Thus another challenge for theologies of reconstruction is to discern the connection between secularization* and the process of evangelization*.

At the beginning of the 21st c., although Africa was in a pitiable condition, the possibility remained that it would emerge as an influential continent. But this would require the determination to utilize the available and potential resources for the welfare of the people. African theologians challenge the churches to assume the responsibility to prepare the people for this immense task and to proclaim with faith, hope, and love that God makes possible what to human beings appears an impossibility.

Theologies of reconstruction are needed beyond Africa. At the end of the 20th c. – the most violent and destructive in history, with two world wars that annihilated millions of people and subjugated millions more – a truce closed the “cold war,” and transnational interactions, “globalization,” emerged. Upon these ruins, following African theologies of reconstruction, theologians have to provide a critique that transcends globalization, affirming the particularities of peoples and cultures while appreciating the blessings of humanity and of the ecology* of the earth as a whole. Theologies of reconstruction have an essential role in this process of building new relationships and structures and rebuilding a new social consciousness.

JESSE NDWIGA KANYUA MUGAMBI

Recusants, Roman Catholics who refused to attend the services of the Church of England, especially after the excommunication of Elizabeth (1570), for which they were deprived of civil privileges by penal laws and subject to high taxes. See also ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: UNITED KINGDOM.

Redaction Criticism (German, Redaktionsgeschichte), a historical*-critical method in biblical studies that views biblical texts as edited ("redacted") versions of earlier sources and traditions and seeks to elucidate the theological stance of the author/redactor. It is particularly important in the study of the Synoptic* Gospels.

Redemption. Christians have always believed that, because of sin*, death*, and other forms of evil*, all human beings need to be redeemed. Paul maintained, "All have sinned and are deprived of the glory of God" (Rom 3: 23). Self-redemption is not a possibility; human beings cannot set themselves free. Without Christ the Redeemer, they will not be delivered from the dominion of evil.

From the beginning, Christians understood that the dying and rising of Jesus effected a new exodus from bondage (see Atonement #1). Christian liturgies incorporated the songs with which Moses* and Miriam* led the people in praising God for their victorious liberation from slavery (Exod 15:1–21). The divine rescue of the Israelites gave a specifically Jewish meaning to the language of redemption used by Paul. Christians also interpreted redemption in the light of the return from exile in Babylon (Isa 40–55). The manumission of slaves and/or the ransoming of prisoners of war also helped to shape the way some early Christian communities proclaimed Christ as redeeming or liberating* them.

Unlike the doctrine of incarnation*, redemption did not provoke debates and official teaching from general councils during the church's early centuries. It was taken for granted that it was only through Christ that human beings could be redeemed. The NT told of Christ "buying" us "at price" (e.g. 1 Cor 6: 20, 7: 23) or "giving his life as ransom for many" (Mark 10:45). The NT had in mind what redemption "cost" Christ (his life) and never spoke of a ransom being paid to someone or something. But in the patristic period and later, some Christians expanded the metaphor to describe a transaction and even a specific price paid to God, to the Law*, or even to the devil*. Frequently, redemption has been associated with Christ's work of expiating* sins, a work explained by Anselm* (d1109) as "satisfaction," with Christ setting right a moral order disturbed by sin (see Atonement #2). Later, in the Western Church, some took this to mean that Christ was burdened with human sin, punished in our place, and so propitiated* an angry God. Yet the Orthodox churches (see Orthodox Churches, Eastern, Cluster: Introductory Entries) – like many Charismatic* churches and Liberation* theologians – conceive of redemption as liberation from bondage to evil powers (e.g. demonic powers or systemic evil) or as healing from sin as a disease (see Atonement #1). Much contemporary theology stresses that Christ redeemed humanity not only by his death, but also by what came before (his incarnation* and ministry) and after (his resurrection*, gift of the Holy* Spirit, and second* coming), and that the redemption concerns the whole of creation (Rom 8:18–23). Not only humanity but also the whole universe needs redemption. See also ATONEMENT; CROSS AND CRUCIFIXION; LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER; RECONCILIATION; RECONCILIATION AS A CHRISTIAN PRACTICE; SACRIFICE; SALVATION.

GERALD O'COLLINS, SJ

Reductions (Spanish, reducciones; Portuguese, aldeias), settlements founded by Spanish or Portuguese colonizers for the purpose of assimilating South American native populations into European culture and religion. The reductions were related to the encomienda system. In "exchange" for the "privilege" of living as Christians in the reduction, natives provided forced labor for the colonizers, which was akin to slavery. By contrast the Jesuits developed an egalitarian form of reductions, "Jesuit reductions," where numerous natives lived with Jesuit clergy, all of them following similar strict rules of Christian life. For instance, after landing in South America in 1550 (in a region that encompassed the northwest areas of present-day Argentina*, Paraguay*, and Brazil*), the Jesuits promised the Spanish monarch generous rewards, in the form of tributes, in exchange for exempting the Tupi and Guarani in their reductions from hard labor. In certain countries, e.g. Mexico*, reductions were called "congregations" (Spanish, congregaciones).

In Western Africa (see Nigeria), 19th-c. missionaries established “Christian villages” (Roman Catholics) and “mission villages” (Protestants) where Christians lived together apart from the African culture (a practice later discontinued). See also ENCOMENDEROS, ENCOMIENDA; PORTUGUESE EXPLORATIONS, CONQUESTS, AND MISSIONS; SPANISH EXPLORATIONS, CONQUESTS, AND MISSIONS. DANIEL PATTE Reformation. The term refers to several types of “reformation,” but especially “magisterial reformation” led by academics (magistri) and supported by magistrates: the Anglican*, Lutheran*, and Calvinist* Reformations; the “Radical* Reformation” by dissidents and Anabaptists*; and the “Catholic Reformation” or “Catholic* Renewal.” There would not have been a Reformation without Reformers driven by Luther’s* question, “What makes a person a Christian?”

Answers were found through the recovery of biblical preaching* and pastoral* theology that addressed fundamental issues of religious life: personal anxiety, God’s acceptance, and ethical guidance. Humanists such as Lefèvre* d’Etaples (c1460–1536) and Erasmus* (c1469–1536) aided the Reformers. Lefèvre d’Etaples promoted biblical study by means of commentaries, sermons, and a French lectionary. Erasmus promoted biblical understanding with his edition of the Greek NT (1516). Preachers became translators and translators became preachers. Their conviction that theology serves proclamation is expressed in Erasmus’s rendering of the opening of the Gospel of John: “In the beginning was the speech, i.e., the sermon.”

The Reformation in Germany. Luther’s (1483–1546) biblical studies led him to believe that righteousness* before God is not a human achievement but a free gift from God. Convinced that salvation* is not the goal of life but the foundation of life, Luther reversed medieval piety: good works do not make the sinner acceptable to God; rather, God’s acceptance of the sinner prompts good works. Faith* active in love* energized innovative approaches to social welfare, public education*, and political* authority. Rejection of mandatory clerical celibacy* enabled clergy to become citizens with homes, families*, and civic responsibilities.

Dissension among Reformers began early and escalated as Thomas Müntzer* (c1490–1525) joined the Peasants’* War (1524–25), claiming “the godless have no right to live.” Medieval apocalypticism*, oppressive social and economic conditions, Reformation calls to “Christian freedom*,” and critiques of canon* law and papal authority fueled peasants’ social and religious expectations but misfired with their defeat.

Emperor Charles* V’s foreign preoccupations impeded the elimination of Reformation movements in his realm. Protestant princes presented an irenic confession of their faith to the emperor at the 1530 Diet of Augsburg. Composed by Luther’s colleague, Melancthon* (1497–1560), the Augsburg* Confession became foundational for Lutheran churches and remains so today. By 1555 Protestant movements had gained sufficient strength to gain official toleration in the Peace of Augsburg* (see Germany).

Other Reformation Movements. Reformation movements throughout Europe shared the watchwords “Scripture* alone,” “grace* alone,” and “faith* alone,” but their contexts varied. Zwingli* (1484–1531) and Calvin (1509–64) in Switzerland* lacked princely protection and had to implement their movements through town councils. Conflicts arose with Anabaptism*, initially led by Conrad Grebel (1498–1526). Anabaptists understood baptism* to depend on a confession of faith rather than to be a sacrament* administered to infants who neither understood nor evidenced Christian life. Their Schleitheim Confession (1527) also rejected what their contemporaries assumed were normal obligations of citizenship: oaths, tithes, and military service. Zwingli fought with Luther over whether the Lord’s* Supper is primarily an act of thanksgiving for the gospel (Zwingli’s memorial view) or a concrete offer of the gospel (Luther’s sacramental emphasis).

In Geneva, Calvin and French exiles directed evangelization toward France. The first national synod of the Reformed Church in France met in Paris (1559) and accepted Calvin’s draft of the Gallican Confession (modified at the Synod of La Rochelle, 1571; the Confession of La Rochelle continues to inform Protestantism* in France). However, the French tradition of “one king, one law, one faith” moved the Roman Catholic crown to try to root out Protestantism.

In England, Henry* VIII’s break with Rome over his divorce informs the traditional view of the English Reformation as an act of state. Royal imposition of ecclesiology continued with his heirs: Protestantism with Edward VI, Roman Catholicism with Mary* Tudor, and Protestantism with Elizabeth* I. The English Reformation benefited from residual anticlericalism and the spread of ideas by scholars, merchants, pamphlets, Bible translations, and Protestant refugees fleeing Continental persecution. During Elizabeth I's reign, Marian exiles (Calvinists who fled during Mary Tudor's reign) returning from Protestant centers in Frankfurt and Geneva radicalized reform in the direction of Puritanism*.

In Scandinavia and Eastern Europe, Lutheran influences were present in the 1520s. Christian III established the Lutheran Reformation in Denmark* (1537). Luther's theology arrived in Sweden*-Finland* via students from Wittenberg. The Swedish king Gustavus Vasa established the Reformation there (1527). In Eastern Europe, the Reformation was established in Prussia and Livonia but remained a minority movement in other areas.

The Catholic Renewal (reform) stemmed from medieval devotional movements and Conciliarism* (14th c.), which called for reform of the church "in head and members." Ignatius* Loyola (1491–1556), founder of the Society of Jesus (Jesuits*), continued medieval monastic reforms and promoted pastoral and mission work. However, papal antipathy toward reform impeded calls for a council. When a council finally met, a generation of strife had hardened positions. The Council of Trent* (1545–63) focused on Catholic* renewal and the refutation of Protestantism. See also CREEDS, SYMBOLS, AND CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

CARTER LINDBERG

Reformation, Catholic. See CATHOLIC RENEWAL.

Reformed Churches. The term "Reformed churches" usually refers to those Reformation* churches whose theological self-understanding, worship practices, and forms of church organization and discipline originated in the 16th-c. Swiss (rather than German Lutheran) Reformation.

While the German and Swiss Reformations agreed on the need to renew the Roman Catholic Church by the biblical message that God graciously* saves sinners in Jesus the Christ through faith* alone conferred by the Holy Spirit, the Swiss Reformation focused on God's glory and obedience to God and hence on the application of the biblical authoritative teaching to all aspects of ecclesial, individual, and public life, thus excluding any customs (e.g. vestments, hymns, church art) not warranted by Scripture.

Therefore, the Reformed churches understand themselves to be shaped by the concern to discern the Word of God, again and again, in order to witness to God's will within changing historical situations. They are hermeneutical* communities of obedience to Christ in each new context.

Led initially by Zwingli* in Zurich and animated especially by Calvin* in Geneva, the "Reformed" wing of the Reformation spread through the south of France and the Upper Rhineland (the western part of Germany*), reached Scotland*, England, the Netherlands*, Poland*, and Hungary*, Bohemia, and Transylvania. Earlier Reformation movements – those of the Hussites* and Waldensians* – later recognized themselves in the Reformed tradition.

From England and Scotland, the Reformed Movement reached North America. Following European emigration and colonial and missionary expansion – especially during the 19th c. – Reformed churches were established in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and the Caribbean. Today most members of the World* Alliance of Reformed Churches are religious minorities living and witnessing in the Southern Hemisphere.

The historical development of the Reformed churches took place under diverse and often adverse circumstances. As a result, the Reformed family of churches is marked by differences in theology and church government, which are visible in the different names by which these churches identify themselves.

One of these names is "Presbyterian*," used by Reformed churches with roots in the Swiss but also in the Scottish and Puritan* wings of the English Reformation. Presbyterian churches often recognize in the 1647 Westminster* Confession a major expression of their traditional theology. They have a form of church government by elders* elected by a local congregation that, in association with elders elected by other congregations in the same area, constitute – together with the ministers of Word and sacraments – the presbytery, whose governing powers distinguish this form of church polity*.

Another name is "Congregational*," used by churches that look to the 1658 Savoy* Declaration for their traditional theology. They hold in particular that Christ is the only head of the local gathering of the saints. As a result, they emphasize the autonomy of the local church – the congregation – and adopt a "congregational" form of church government. Other churches simply call themselves "Reformed" churches. These are in general located in Western Europe or are related to European emigration or mission in the Southern Hemisphere. Their traditional theology finds expression in such texts as the 1566 Second Helvetic* Confession, the 1563 Heidelberg* Catechism, and the 1561 Belgic* Confession.

Still other churches, with historical and theological ties with the revival* movement, bear the name “Evangelical*” in order to emphasize their core message and the evangelistic imperative, in opposition to what they see as “liberal” Protestantism. In the context of the 20th-c. ecumenical movement, several Reformed churches, often encouraged by the World* Alliance of Reformed Churches, have become “united” churches, “uniting” churches, or simply “Protestant” churches following intraconfessional or transconfessional unions or reunions.

This significant diversity raises the question of what the Reformed churches hold as theologically distinctive. Their answers once again differ. For some, their uniqueness lies in church government and structure. Others point to a constellation of theological themes that emerge from Reformed past and contemporary confessions, such as God’s sovereignty, God’s covenant* with humanity in Christ, and the way the authority of God’s Law in the OT is construed in church life. Others hold that there are “essential tenets” that constitute Reformed identity, but the ones most commonly quoted – the Trinity*, Incarnation*, the ancient christological* affirmations, the Protestant* principle, and election* – are also shared by “non-Reformed” denominations. During the first 50 years of its history, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches tried to establish harmony among the different Reformed confessions or to formulate a confession of faith that its member churches would recognize and receive, but abandoned this project c1925, following Karl Barth’s* advice.

As they feel called to relate what the Bible says to what needs to be said in today’s world, Reformed churches make evident that they understand themselves to be reformed in the sense that they are always being reformed by the Word* of God. As a result, they feel at times the need to restate their faith as part of their call to proclaim the gospel. The following are three examples:

1. Against the risk represented by the influence of National Socialist ideology on the so-called German* Christians, the 1934 Barmen* Theological Declaration states that Jesus Christ is the one Word of God, that this Word is at the same time God’s pledge of forgiveness* of sins and God’s claim on our whole life. Consequently, the church can have only one master, and the state cannot embody the total order of human life.

2. Against the sin of the racist* ideology of apartheid* and the “heresy*” of its theological legitimization, the 1982–86 Belhar Confession affirms that the church gathered by God’s Word cannot be divided by human prejudices and therefore holds together Christian unity, human reconciliation*, and the search for justice*.
3. Against the neoliberal economic* ideology and its idolatrous claim that outside the market there is no salvation, Reformed Christians from all over the world gathered in Ghana* in 2004 and adopted the Accra Confession, which seeks to correct the modern anthropocentric understanding of Christian stewardship* often associated with the domination of nature and the colonial domination of other peoples.

ODAIR PEDROSO MATEUS

Reformed Ecumenical Council, a council of 41 Reformed* churches in 25 countries, formed in 1946, with offices in Grand Rapids, Michigan. While it has been more conservative than the World* Alliance of Reformed Churches (WARC), a majority of its member churches have become members of the WARC as well. The two organizations agreed (2008) to merge in 2010.

Reformed Worship is an expression of Reformed theology: We worship God because of who God is and what God has done, believing humanity’s “chief end is to glorify God” (Westminster Catechism). Reformed worship is initiated by God, who calls us to worship, and not by our religious inclinations. The essential substance of Reformed worship is gratitude to God.

Reformed worship was shaped by Zwingli* in Zurich and by Calvin* in Geneva, who drew on practices of Bucer’s* Strasbourg congregation. The Reformers kept the basic Word and sacrament structure of Roman Catholic liturgy, but they worshipped in the vernacular, moved the center of worship from chancel to nave, replacing the altar with a table, and introduced the singing of psalms and hymns by the congregation. This was a shift from ritual to full congregational participation.

Practices were different in Zurich and Geneva. Zwingli merely modified the medieval “prone,” a simple service of Scripture, preaching, and bidding prayers that often preceded the Mass. He celebrated the Lord's* Supper only quarterly, the congregation receiving bread and wine as symbols for remembering Jesus' supper with his disciples. But in Calvin's Geneva, the order for worship was derived from the traditional ante-Communion and included a call to worship, followed by a confession of sin, a declaration of pardon, and a reading or singing of the Ten* Commandments interspersed with *kyries. Then Scripture was read and a sermon preached, after which there was an offering, prayers of intercession with the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, a psalm, and a final blessing. Metrical Psalms were sung throughout the service. When the Supper was celebrated, the words of institution were read from 1 Cor 11, followed by a theological exhortation. Then the Sursum Corda (the call to "lift up your hearts") preceded the distribution of bread and wine. The worship concluded with a brief prayer of thanksgiving, the Nunc Dimittis (the Song of Simeon, Luke 2:29–32, beginning with "now you are dismissing your servant in peace"), and the Aaronic blessing (Num 6:24). Calvin urged a weekly observance of the Supper, but his proposal was rejected. His congregation instead welcomed Zwingli's quarterly practice.

If there was "real presence," for Zwingli it was within the collective faith of the people. But Calvin set forth a higher doctrine: the congregation was a royal priesthood*, and although Calvin practiced no consecration of elements, he affirmed a real presence through the total enactment of the Eucharist.

DAVID BUTTRICK

Reformers, term commonly used to designate the leaders of the 16th-c. Protestant Reformation. See also BUCER, MARTIN; BULLINGER, HEINRICH; CALVIN, JEAN; CRANMER, THOMAS; FAREL, GUILLAUME; FLACIUS, MATTHIAS ILLYRICUS; KNOX, JOHN; LUTHER, MARTIN; MELANCHTHON, PHILIP; TYNDALE, WILLIAM; ZWINGLI, HULDRICH (ULRICH).

Refugees as a Theological Concept and an Ethical Issue. The OT term ger (stranger, alien) designates both foreign migrants and refugees who depend on the protection of the country, town, or sanctuary willing to welcome them. The Pentateuch* underlines the duty of offering hospitality and solidarity to such strangers: "When an alien resides with you in your land, you shall not oppress the alien. The alien who resides with you shall be to you as the citizen among you; you shall love the alien as yourself, for you were aliens in the land of Egypt: I am the LORD your God" (Lev 19:33, 34). The migrants remind Israel of its own history: captivity in Egypt; being welcomed in a land that belonged to God alone; later exile in Babylon, accompanied by the liberating faithfulness of God. Strangers should find empathy and solidarity in Israel, which can readily identify with those who have had to leave everything behind. Similarly, in the gospel, a stranger, a Samaritan, a neighbor that one should love as oneself, is in turn called to fulfill the commandment of love (Luke 10:25–37). For believers this is a reminder that it is always from an Other/other that one receives life and that it is with an Other/other that one builds the future.

Many forced population movements brought about by religious persecutions have marked world history. For instance, in 17th-c. France, the revocation of the Edict of Nantes*, which resulted in the banning of Protestant religious practices, forced 300,000 French Huguenots* from all social spheres to leave their country and go to Switzerland, the Netherlands, Germany, or Britain, and even to the Americas and South Africa. They were generally well received, as they brought with them knowledge and techniques that contributed to economic growth in their adopted countries. Yet established churches in these countries extended only a cautious welcome to the Huguenots, for they continued their religious service and teaching in French, making an effort to maintain their cultural practices (understood by some exiles to be a preparation for their return home). "Refuge" – whatever haven where their ancestors were welcomed and protected – still has an important place in the memory of European Protestants. This memory inspired the support given in the 20th c. by churches and Protestant institutions to programs designed to welcome and protect people fleeing from totalitarian regimes and anti-Semitism (e.g. the Cimade* in France). According to the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, in 2006 there were 9.5 million refugees in the world, immigrants who had crossed their national borders. In addition, at least 20 million uprooted people were displaced within their own countries due to insecurity and penury resulting from civil wars. This huge number of refugees is a real challenge to the international community and to ecumenical solidarity with churches and religious communities in such countries, often among the poorest in the world. The official status of "refugee," as defined by the Geneva Convention, has recently been subject to severe restrictions in certain countries that, after having been “host countries” for many years, now practice strict forms of selective immigration.

In Europe, church councils and numerous Christian associations and other organizations have jointly denounced the growing political tendency to close borders, to suspect systematically those who seek political asylum of being “false refugees,” and to force refugees to return to their countries of origin. These organizations also oppose policies of assimilation whereby refugees or immigrants are forced to adopt as rapidly and as completely as possible the culture of the host country, even though this usually means integration into a pluricultural society. See also CIMADE. JACQUES STEWART

Regula Fidei (Rule of Faith), term used since the 2nd c. to designate the basic tenets of faith; a phrase often used with reference to the Apostles’ Creed as a summary of the kerygmatic tradition, or to Scripture as the Word of God.

Regula Magistri early Western monastic rule with 95 chapters, written anonymously in Latin. Certain scholars (since the 1930s) have argued that it was written in the early 6th c. in Southern Italy and was a major source of the Rule of Benedict. Recent research suggests that the Regula Magistri was developed on the basis of Benedict’s Rule in Bobbio after Columbanus’s death and that it is related to the 7th-c. “mixed” monastic rules. Nearly four times as long as Benedict’s Rule, it is detailed and verbose and presents its teaching as the Word of God speaking through a “Master.” Deploing monastic instability, it gives the abbot extensive powers.

MARILYN DUNN

Regular. In the Roman Catholic Church, the term refers to members of religious orders, both women and men, bound by vows and living in community, following a rule (regula).

Regular Clergy, in the Roman Catholic Church, priests bound by vows and living in community, following a rule (regula), in contrast to secular clergy.

Reign of God. See KINGDOM OF GOD, THE CONCEPT OF, CLUSTER.

Relationality, as a mode of existence in relation with others, is either a primary or a secondary dimension of human existence, according to theologians’ understanding of God.

1. In Western churches, relationality is commonly viewed as secondary, because theologies tend to emphasize the autonomy* and sovereignty of God* as a person, known to humans as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, but the relationality of the Trinity* is fundamentally hidden from humans. Thus individuals are ideally autonomous, as God is.
2. The Cappadocian* theologians emphasized the relationality of God’s self as the Triune God (Trinity*). This tradition dominated the Eastern churches, which affirm the basic relational character of human existence.
3. By resisting the Enlightenment* and the modern one-sided affirmation of autonomy, relational views of God and humans have been brought to the fore in contemporary theology following Buber*. Bonhoeffer* emphasized the “sociality of humanity” from a christological-ecclesiological perspective. Barth* and Rahner* mark the return to trinitarian relational theology. The relational character of existence has been elaborated in feminist ethics* of care and extended to all existing things in Process* theology and ecotheology*.
4. Feminist* and postcolonial* critics pointed out the risks involved in affirming relationality at the expense of autonomy. Some, like Elizabeth A. Johnson, have affirmed a middle position of “relational autonomy.”

Relationality balances the two other modes of existence, autonomy* and heteronomy*. Giving undue preference to relationality might hide an oppressive* tendency, as individuals’ autonomy risks being abandoned and giving way to an oppressive form of heteronomy*.

CRISTINA GRENHOLM

Relics, remains of martyrs* and other saints* after their death, or objects that have been in contact with their bodies. The earliest evidence for the veneration of relics is the Martyrdom of Polycarp, which describes his body as being preserved and honored so that others can share in the power of his life and death. While there was some continuity with the Greek veneration of heroes, polytheists generally expressed repugnance toward this Christian practice, Julian the Apostate being perhaps the most vocal. Christians viewed the body as the temple of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 6:19); the martyr’s body, furthermore, was associated with a faithful life, an often gruesome death, and the future resurrection*. Shrines and then basilicas* were built over the tombs of saints; meals were eaten at these tombs, and people would sleep near them (see Incubation) to receive visions or healing. While Ambrose* opposed eating meals at these tombs, he himself may have initiated the practice of placing saints' remains under the altar (cf. Rev 6:9).

Roman tradition forbade moving or disturbing a body. Consequently in Roman culture, "relics" were usually a cloth that had been lowered into the saint's grave, or oil, or a flower from the altar (which contained the saint's remains). But in the East and in Germanic territory, saints' bodies were more freely transferred and divided into parts. The Second Council of Nicaea* required saints' relics to be placed in every consecrated church. The veneration of relics was debated along with the veneration of icons*, and definitive approval came in the 11th c. in both the East and the West (see Saints, Devotion to, in the Orthodox Tradition; Saints, Devotion to, in the Roman Catholic Tradition). After the Islamic conquests, relics, usually stolen, were transferred to the West (e.g. relics of St. Mark from Alexandria to Venice [828] and of St. Nicholas from Myra to Bari [1087]); many relics in Constantinople were looted during the Fourth Crusade (1204). There was an extensive trade in relics, often of doubtful authenticity. During the Middle Ages these were displayed in reliquaries*, and miracles* were attributed to them. The sites of famous relics became destinations of pilgrimage*.

The veneration of relics, criticized by Erasmus* and the Reformation*, was defended by the Council of Trent*, although it tried to eliminate superstition* and commercialization. The practice of distributing relics as gifts helps to legitimate the Roman Catholic Church as a worldwide community. Popular* Christianity, Protestant as well as Catholic and Orthodox, continues to treasure the remains or mementos of holy persons, because they make sanctity more tangible and more approachable, offering both patronage and protection.

EUGENE TESELLE

Religion as a Concept and Christianity.

What Kind of Category Is "Religion"? The concept of "religion" has functioned as a crucial category in defining the nature and identity of Christianity and its relationship to other cultural traditions, philosophies, and communities. Rarely, however, does one pause to consider the precise nature, complex history, and changing uses of this category. Recent scholarship within religious studies, building on the pioneering work of Wilfred Cantwell Smith (1962, The Meaning and End of Religion), has drawn attention to the changing pattern of usage of this term from classical antiquity to the post-Enlightenment* period.

The Chicago historian of religion Jonathan Z. Smith has argued, e.g. that religion is in fact an "imagined" category in the sense that it exists as an intellectual or scholarly tool for analyzing complex data, but does not exist "outside the academy." Neither "religion" nor reified entities known as "the religions" exist "out there" in the world; rather, complex traditions, belief systems, and patterns of ritual behavior are labeled "religions" (while others are not). Moreover, Smith argues, the modern usage of the term, developed in the context of the late-19th-c. emergence of a comparative "science of religion," modeled itself on the biological sciences in seeing "religion" as a genus with a number of identifiable members. Defining what counts as a religion and what does not, however, has proved a difficult task, not least because of a misunderstanding of the "imagined" nature of the category.

In sum, the term "religion" is a social construction with a specific history that one can plot. Since the work of W. Cantwell Smith and Jonathan Z. Smith, a number of scholars have argued that the modern concept of religion carries with it a strongly Eurocentric (and Christocentric) imprint that has played a significant role not only in the classification of "other cultures" according to a broadly Eurocentric rubric, but also in the furthering of the European colonial project (as Asad, Balagangadhara, Chidester, Dubuisson, Fitzgerald, and King have argued).

The History of the Category. In a pre-Christian context, Cicero explained that the Latin term religio derives from re-legere, "to retrace" or "reread." For him, religio involves the practice of retracing the "lore of the ritual" of one's ancestors (De natura Deorum II.72). Thus the Romans, the Thracians, and the Jews, among others, had their own religio. The Christian writer Lactantius* (c250–c325) offered a rival etymology, deriving religio from religare, "to bind together" or "link" (Institutiones divinae IV.28). This shifted the focus to one's relationship to the divine and also allowed the emerging Christian movements to circumvent an understanding of religio that emphasized ancestral tradition. This new etymological definition, therefore, became crucial in legitimating the separation of Christianity from the more ancient Hebrew ancestral traditions and also in allowing for the Christian message to be seen not as grounded in ancestral practices and laws, but as a message to be passed on to Jews and Gentiles alike.

One consequence of Lactantius’s rendition is the explicit polarization of religio vs. superstitio: religio as grounded in historical truth vs. superstitio as the myths and legends of the various “pagan” traditions. This characterization of religio in terms of “true vs. false religion” would become a powerful ideological* marker in later Christian centuries.

In the medieval period, the religiones generally referred to the various monastic* orders and those who undertook “the religious life,” a life governed by monastic vows. This usage has survived into the modern period in the adverb “religiously,” which denotes a particularly zealous or committed approach to a specific activity (as in “He reads the newspaper religiously every morning”).

After the Protestant Reformation, religion increasingly came to be understood in Northern Europe in terms of the notion of personal “faith” and “piety,” and the term began to appear in the vernacular languages of Europe. By the 17th c., the association of “religion” with an internal faith and piety within the individual believer was becoming firmly established.

However, much of our modern understanding of “religion” and “the religions” derives from the Enlightenment, where the terms came to denote historical systems of beliefs and practices followed by people of faith. Theologians such as Schleiermacher* also developed the Protestant emphasis on religion as an inner “creaturely feeling,” and “religion” increasingly came to be understood as a substantive noun with a specific essence shared by the various historical “religions” (as in Feuerbach’s* 1851 Lectures on the Essence of Religion). This was a necessary conceptual step in the birth of various secular philosophies during the Enlightenment period that sought to treat Christianity and the “other religions” as discrete cultural phenomena, to be located increasingly in the realm of private choice rather than in the realm of public politics. In this way, in the emerging nation-states of Northern Europe and the USA, “religion” came to be seen as a private phenomenon, a matter of personal choice, which was an extension of earlier Protestant notions of “private faith” but in a secularist* and, to an increasingly significant extent (through increased global migration patterns), a pluralistic* setting.

Although the term was coined much earlier, it was not until the late 19th and early 20th c. that the concept of “world religion” grew in prominence. This idea became popular as a means of classifying Christianity and the other major traditions of the world (Hinduism*, Buddhism*, Judaism*, Islam*) under a single pluralistic rubric (Masuzawa). Although this reflected a movement away from an older, more exclusivist attitude (according to which either Christianity was the “only” real religion as opposed to superstitions* and heresies*, or Christianity as the “true” religion was contrasted with the various false religions), the world-religions paradigm tends to locate all other traditions according to a broadly Christian prototypical model of what a “religion” is (Masuzawa). Nevertheless, one of the consequences of rendering “Christianity” as one of a number of “world religions” has been to throw into relief its historical and cultural embeddedness as one of a number of culturally embedded “cosmographic formations” (to use Daniel Dubuisson’s preferred alternative to the concept of “religion”). See also INCULTURATION CLUSTER; RELIGIONS AND CHRISTIANITY.

RICHARD KING

RELIGIONS AND CHRISTIANITY

See AFRICAN RELIGION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; ANCESTOR VENERATION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; AUSTRALIAN ABORIGINAL TRADITIONS AND CHRISTIANITY; BAHÁ’Í FAITH AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; BUDDHISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; CIVIL RELIGION; CONFUCIANISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; DAOISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; FREEMASONRY AND CHRISTIANITY; HELLENISTIC RELIGIOUS TRADITIONS AND CHRISTIANITY’S SELF-DEFINITION; HINDUISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; MITHRAISM AND CHRISTIANITY; MYSTERY RELIGIONS AND CHRISTIANITY; NATIVE AMERICAN TRADITIONS AND CHRISTIANITY; NEW AGE SPIRITUALITY AND CHRISTIANITY; SHAMANISM AND CHRISTIANITY; SHINTO AND CHRISTIANITY; SIKHISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; VODOU AND CHRISTIANITY

Religiosity, a term that has maintained its Latin connotations of scrupulousness, sometimes to excess or superstition*.

Religious Experience. See CHARISMATIC* AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER; EVANGELICALS/EVANGELICALISM CLUSTER; MYSTICISM, MYSTICS; ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER.

RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC,
CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Religious Orders, Roman Catholic

Religious Orders, Roman Catholic: Forms of Religious Life

2) *A Sampling of Contextual Views
and Practices*

Religious Orders, Roman Catholic,
in Africa

Religious Orders, Roman Catholic, in Latin America: Brazil

Religious Orders, Roman Catholic, in Latin America: Mexico

See also WOMEN'S RELIGIOUS ORDERS
CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Religious Orders, Roman Catholic.

There are many ways to live one's faith in God, ranging from educating children to leading a contemplative life. Believers make a choice according to their aptitudes and personality.

The origin of the monastic lifestyle is commonly linked with asceticism* based on the eschatological character of faith in the eternal God. Yet in a transitory creation, there are also divinely given norms for life that reflect God's twofold relations to the world: God for the world, and the world for God. Both must be respected. Religious life, therefore, reflects the "incarnational*" character of Christian faith. Each person cannot embrace all aspects of faith. One can serve God in many ways, although the goal remains the same: the Reign (Kingdom*) of God. One must choose between a certain detachment from the world and a strong connection with it. Unfortunately, the term "asceticism" often has negative connotations: rejection of the world, flight from reality, hostility toward the body* and enjoyment. Asceticism, however, is never an end in itself. Through it one applies oneself to a higher good. The ascetic elements concretized in vows* are the external form of a religious life driven by the inner aspiration to cultivate a personal relationship with God. Jesus' life is full of ascetic elements. Traveling around in the service of his prophetic-religious task entailed his refusing to amass possessions, abandoning his own family, and not having a home of his own. He gave no thought to a customary trade or profession and accepted the risk of being despised, persecuted, and rejected by the established order. His message reflects his lifestyle: he accepted being baptized by John, called the masses to repent, proclaimed the priority of the Reign of God, insisted that a believer cannot serve two lords, and invited his followers to abandon all.

Antony and Egyptian Monasticism. Religious life, an indirect outgrowth of the lifestyle of the peripatetic preachers, is first explicitly found in the life of Antony*, who (c275) left his village in Egypt and lived in the nearby desert as the disciple of an older hermit*. Antony was not the first monk, but the first to belong to the group called "hermitic anchorites," hermits who "withdraw from public life" (Gk anachorein). Their way of life did not entail complete isolation. Humans cannot exist without a minimum of contact. Antony the hermit lived in a cell alone, and the older monk was his spiritual father. Once a week they celebrated the Eucharist; they devoted themselves to manual labor.

About 320, cenobitism* with a highly organized common life appeared in the Egyptian desert. Pachomius* founded a community of brothers who wanted to reach salvation* together and convened much more frequently than the semi-anchorites. They ate together, dressed in the same way, and shared manual labor, prayer, the Eucharist, and acceptance of the authority of the leader. For such groups a rule* became indispensable. They considered communal living to be of value in itself. Their goal was to build a community after the model of the first Christians in Jerusalem (Acts 4:32–35). Pachomius also founded communities of women.

Egyptian monasticism started to decline in the 5th c., because the original inspiration faded away, a common occurrence in monastic communities. Nevertheless, monasticism survived in Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor (see Monasticism Cluster: In the Byzantine Empire; Monasticism Cluster: In the Syriac Tradition). The history of religious life is characterized by growth and decline, by ups and downs; it fades away and rises again. Crises arose because of external events, such as wars, plagues, and political repression, or because of internal factors, such as the slackening of discipline and of commitment to the ideal of monastic life. Numerous reform movements gave rise to new orders or communities, which were not actually completely new, but rather old forms coming to new life, as in the cases of the Carthusians* and Cistercians*.

Western Monasticism (c370–1050) was at first influenced by Egyptian monasticism. Augustine* speaks of monasteries in Treves, Milan, and Rome. The Augustinian* Rule, the oldest monastic rule of the West, is somewhat in the Pachomian tradition: the religious community seeks to signify a new society in this world. In Augustine's interpretation, "monk" no longer means someone who stays alone, but someone who forms a unit with others.

A difference between the Augustine and Benedict* Rules is that the Augustinian Rule was intended for a small group with common ideals, whereas the Rule of Benedict sought to exert a pronounced influence on the whole of social life. The great abbeys cared for schools, hospitals, courts, hospices, and services for the poor.

Reformation of the Church. From 1050 to 1300, the goal of monastic life became the reformation of the church. By 1050 the strict monastic orders had been founded and one could speak of "religious life" as a broader movement. Many mixed forms of religious life came into existence as a result of new social situations. The Roman Catholic Church began to participate actively in the expansion of society as a great political whole. In this context, there was a role for military* orders (Templars* and Hospitallers*, who intended to liberate the Holy Land). Still more influential was the movement of the canons* regular* at the time of the Gregorian reformation (see Gregory VII, Pope), where monastic elements and official priesthood were brought together. The clergy, unified in communal living around the bishop, started to live under a rule as canons, very much as monks did in a monastery. Norbert* (early 11th c.) wanted the canons regular to be open to (rather than separated from) the world through preaching and missionary work. The canon regular Dominic* initiated groups of itinerant Friar-Preachers, the Dominicans*.

During this period, the life of the mendicant* orders became the most typical form of religious life, following Francis*. At first Francis lived as a hermit but eventually became a homeless worker and preacher. Francis's and the mendicant orders' radical material poverty* was a protest against the wealth of the emerging European cities, where capitalism originated, and their mentality of "power through wealth." Those committed to a life of poverty believed that one should not be ashamed to live as a beggar. Furthermore, a mendicant monk was not bound to one house. The role of group father or mother was replaced by more democratic forms of government.

The success of the mendicant orders can be explained in part by the decline of the pastoral and spiritual life of the Roman Catholic Church at a time when new institutions, the universities, surpassed the teaching of the old monastic schools. The needs of the Church were so great that hermits from Palestine (Carmelites*) and Italy (Augustinians) could no longer live in isolation. In the late Middle Ages, the Devotio* Moderna called for greater interiority and personalization of the act of faith; and the observant movements (to which Luther* belonged) called for renewal and reformation.

Religious Life as Apostolic Service to the Church. This was initiated by Ignatius* (1539), who wanted to free himself from the old and decaying structures of the Church. A religious community ceased to be an entity in its own right. Ignatius continued to call for the individual's experience of God (Devotio Moderna) and affirmed centralized authority in the religious community, but he required neither habit nor choral prayer, a reflection of the development of personalism in Western culture. The community became the matrix of apostolic work, a support for the pastoral commitment of individual members. In the same period, congregations for women devoted themselves to social work, especially among girls (*Angela Merici). Belonging to the Church involved working together; thus obedience became essential, and religious life contributed to the edification of the church.

In the late Middle Ages, objections arose to religious life: it was asserted that neither Holy Scripture nor Jesus Christ supported life in religious orders and that it was a form of "Pharisaism" because members of religious communities considered themselves better than other Christians.

Expansion of Religious Orders. The 16th and 17th c. were times of expansion of religious orders. In the great abbeys, certain monks specialized in and published scientific works. Thus, e.g., the Maurists* preserved much of the ancient cultures (both Christian and non-Christian cultures); seminaries and vocational schools flourished. Many religious communities sought their identity in secondary elements of Christian faith, e.g. the adoration of the Eucharist.

General Secularization. In the 18th and early 19th c., secularization* went further than a separation between state and religion. The saying was: only what is useful is valid; and in modern society, religious orders and their life were not considered useful. Hence many orders and congregations were abolished. Even prominent theologians thought that religious orders and their life were dead. But in the 19th c., there was an astonishing growth of religious establishments and religious groups of all sizes. Nearly all modern congregations devoted themselves to an active goal: caring for the sick, teaching, providing schools for everyone, creating presses, caring for the poor, housing the homeless, caring for unwed mothers, helping juvenile delinquents, and carrying out missionary work in foreign countries. The Redemptorists*, the Montfortans, and the Fathers of the Holy Spirit were founded to address the need for pastoral services among the lowest classes. This disinterested commitment to the needy is characteristic of modern congregations and reflects the devotional and individual spirituality of that age. While Ignatius's spirituality placed Jesus at the center, many modern congregations adopted particular saints, such as Mary, Joseph, and Barbara.

Cultural Crisis. Between 1960 and 1970, especially in Europe, there was a sharp decline in the number of religious, there were no new vocations, and young people did not seem interested in the way of life of a religious order. Secularization took on a new significance; the autonomous human person became the judge and the end of all things. Only what can be observed in human experience is true; thus the existence of a transcendental reality is denied. Yet even in this situation, there are signs of a new beginning. For members of religious orders and other Christians, the goal of religious life remains the same: contributing to the realization of the Reign* of God. New forms of communal life with more specialized activities are emerging, emphasizing interpersonal relationships in smaller groups. In countless groups, abandoning the world takes the form of being socially critical in the name of the Christian faith. Is this a sign of revival of religious life?

T. J. VAN BAVEL, OSA

Religious Orders, Roman Catholic: Forms of Religious Life. Religious life has taken many forms. It arose within 60 years of the Crucifixion in response to Jesus' resurrection. Some Christians, predominantly women, convinced of the active presence of the risen Jesus in their lives, and liberated by faith in the resurrection from the fear of personal or social extinction through death, felt personally called to express the totality and exclusiveness of their relationship to Christ by lifelong consecrated virginity*, characteristically interpreted as espousal to him. The first virgins usually lived in their own homes, participated as specially honored members in the life of the local church, and devoted themselves especially to a life of prayer. Virgins were a prime target of Roman persecution*, both because as Christians they refused to participate in the cult of the emperor and because virginity itself constituted a withholding of their reproductive capacities from the service of the Empire. Some, e.g. Agnes, appear in the calendar of Christian saints as “virgins and martyrs,” highlighting virginity as a chosen way of life.

A parallel phenomenon was the institution of consecrated widowhood*, to which 1 Tim 5:3–16 testifies. These widows, who chose not to remarry, were recognized as a special order in the church that carried out caritative ministries, catechized* new converts, and prayed unceasingly for the church.

When the church, freed from persecution, became increasingly involved in the life of the Roman Empire (3rd c.), some Christians fled to the deserts of Egypt and Arabia, seeking refuge from the secularization of the institutional church. Desert monasticism* retained the original features of religious life, namely virginity or celibacy as a form of total consecration to Christ, ecclesial recognition, dedication to prayer, and service to the neighbor. In addition, there was an emphasis on rejection of the “world,” which was understood to be the sinful secular order, and rigorous asceticism* of mind and body in quest of an ideal of contemplation*. Antony* (c250–350) remained the prototype of the desert hermit, while Pachomius* (d346) founded the first monastery in Egypt. Cenobitic* monastic life (in community) was codified in the Rule of Basil* (c330–379) in the East and the Rule of Benedict* (c480–c534) in the West.

As the church spread into diverse geographic and cultural contexts in Europe and eventually the New World, religious life diversified. During the medieval period, monasticism remained the dominant form among both men and women. But from the 12th c. to the Reformation (which suppressed religious orders among Protestants), the mendicant* religious life, typified by the Franciscans* and Dominicans*, modified classical monasticism. The apostolic energy of this new form of religious life eventually fueled the emergence of nonmonastic male clerical orders like the Jesuits* and lay male orders like the Christian Brothers, which were devoted to the work of evangelization at home and abroad. Efforts to found apostolic women’s congregations such as the Ursulines (see Angela of Foligno; Merici, Angela; Religious Women’s Orders Cluster: In Europe and North America) were repeatedly suppressed by ecclesiastical authorities in their attempts to enforce cloister. Finally, in 1900 Pope Leo XIII recognized what the people who had been served for centuries by committed religious women providing health, educational, and social service had long known, namely that these members of the “congregations of simple vows,” like members of traditional cloistered orders, were indeed religious. During the 1800s and early 1900s, the number of women religious increased to the hundreds of thousands, and women religious outnumbered their male counterparts three to one.

The Second Vatican* Council called religious to renew their life according to the gospel and their founding charisms* and to modernize their lives and ministries. This renewal effort precipitated 30 years of turbulence from which religious life is slowly emerging. Contemporary religious life is no longer seen, by its members or others, as an elite or superior form of Christian life but as a distinct life form in the church characterized by the total commitment of its members to Christ in prayer and ministry expressed in the perpetual profession of vows of consecrated celibacy, voluntary poverty*, and obedience, lived in community.

SANDRA M. SCHNEIDERS, IHM

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Religious Orders, Roman Catholic, in Africa. Religious life has its origins with the desert fathers and hermits* in North Africa, where they lived solitary, ascetic*, and prayerful lives. Religious life in communities began with monasticism*, often said to have originated with Antony* of Egypt* (250–356). Later developments in Western monasticism introduced religious as “contemplatives in action” (not cloistered and with a missionary thrust). On the African continent, cloistered contemplatives* exist in a few communities of Carmelites*, Poor* Clares, and Benedictines*; however, there are more “contemplatives in action.” Men and women religious are more numerous in Tanzania*, the Democratic Republic of Congo*, Nigeria*, Kenya*, and Madagascar*.

Consecrated life in Africa came with colonization and evangelization. Missionary bishops initially founded “local orders” in their dioceses for pastoral needs. Much later, missionaries from main orders like the Jesuits*, Dominicans*, Franciscans*, Carmelites*, Comboni, and Missionary Oblates (OMI) recruited locals into international orders. Religious were compartmentalized into teaching and nursing orders according to the founding charism* of each. Their schools and hospitals offer high-quality education* and health* care. Men and women religious promote the Roman Catholic ethos and values of the founder/foundress (e.g. Jesuit, Dominican, Mary Ward* values in education).

Vatican II urged religious groups to go back to their founding charism* and to adapt to the “signs of the times.” The response in Africa was a diversification of apostolates, as well as local and national collaboration in ministry among different religious orders, a sharing of resources and expertise (including, at different stages of formation, candidacy, noviceship, juniorate, and tertianship). Decrees by general congregations of the different orders have affirmed the preferential* option for the poor and marginalized of society (women, children, and people affected and infected by the HIV/AIDS pandemic). Today new ministries locate religious in pastoral care and in working for social justice and peace. Women religious are gradually engaging in theology, spiritual direction, and lecturing at seminaries and theological faculties.

Evangelical vows*, key to the religious life, are not totally strange to African cultures*. African cultures place a high value on simple and social communal living (poverty*), virginity* (chastity), and obedience to authority. However, celibacy* seems to be a contradiction of Africans’ love for family* life and children. Poverty is also problematic in the African context of material poverty. By virtue of their education and skills, religious cannot be considered materially poor. But they live out poverty by sharing their goods (through charitable work) and living a simple life style.

FRANCISCA H. CHIMHANDA

Religious Orders, Roman Catholic, in Latin America: Brazil.

The concept of religious order (status religionis) in the Roman Catholic Church is essentially based on vows* of obedience, chastity*, and poverty* of a member of a religious community, which bind him- or herself to the rules of a certain order canonically admitted. Religious orders are basically divided into two clerical groups: regular* and secular*. The regular orders comprise clergy/priests and nuns who live according to a rule (regula), whereas the secular clergy (who serve “in time” or in the world) comprise clergy/priests and members of the Roman Catholic Church who respond to the needs of ordinary people. Both kinds of clergy had a decisive role in Brazilian history.

There are roughly five phases in the history of religious orders in Brazil. The first (1500–1759) was characterized by missionary and catechizing activities in the new land, mainly with regard to indigenous groups. Their conversion led to the spread of the Roman Catholic Church throughout the overseas territories of the Portuguese Empire. The process of evangelization was not divorced from the colonization process, in which the state used the spiritual work of the Church for its own ends through the system of royal patronage (Padroado Régio*), a juridical institution by which the crown could interfere with ecclesiastical matters and subject the colonial Church to its authority. This period saw the establishment of convents and monasteries, as well as colleges and missionary schools. Six religious orders had a conspicuous role during this phase: the Jesuits* (1549), the Carmelites* (1580/84), the Benedictines* (1581), the Franciscans* (1585), the Capuchins (1612), and the Mercedarians (1639).

The second phase (1759–1822) was marked by two kinds of conflicts initially provoked by the expulsion of the Jesuit order from Brazil (1767). First, there were conflicts between religious orders and secular clergy regarding the strategy for conducting missions*; religious orders established “reductions*” (Spanish, reducciones; Portuguese, aldeias), Christian settlements where people lived with the regular clergy, primarily Jesuits, following strict rules, whereas the secular clergy preferred to establish parishes. The expulsion of the Jesuits signaled the Portuguese crown’s fear of the autonomy of the religious orders. Second, there was the beginning of the struggle between crown and church. This struggle was exacerbated not only by the very controlled enlargement and multiplication of dioceses and prelates and their submission to the colonial state, but also by the reinforcement of the Padroado (see Church and State Relations Cluster: In Latin America).

The third phase (1830–1930) witnessed the reorganization of the religious orders under the authority of the Roman Catholic Church and, simultaneously, an alleviation of the influence of the Iberian metropolis, Portugal*, on its colony; the movement of independence coincided with, and was stimulated by, these changes. This was also a period of intensified political crisis, which culminated in the so-called Religious Question (1872–75), when two clergy (D. Macedo Costa and Friar Vital Maria) were punished by the emperor of Brazil, Pedro

II (1825–1891), for their opposition to Freemasonry*, with which the emperor himself was affiliated.

The fourth phase (1930–60) saw the rise of a growing number of other religious orders (e.g. Theatines, Marists, Laterans, Ursulines, Salesians), which established new hospitals and educational institutions.

The last phase (since 1960) has witnessed a split among the religious orders. The dictatorial governments that simultaneously sprang up throughout Latin America sharpened the division between, on the one side, contemplative orders, like the Augustinians* (since 1889) and Benedictines*, and, on the other side, socially engaged orders, such as the Dominicans* (after 1882) and Franciscans*. Yet on both sides, in the early 21st c. there were conservative and progressive trends, making it difficult to say which trend will prevail in the future. See also BRAZIL; WOMEN’S RELIGIOUS ORDERS CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: BRAZIL.

MARCOS CALDAS

Religious Orders, Roman Catholic, in Latin America: Mexico. Although Friar Bartolomé de Olmedo, a Mercedarian friar, arrived with Hernán Cortés in 1519, religious orders began to appear in Mexico with the first Franciscan* mission (1524). The orders (including several small orders founded in Spain) arrived successively: Dominicans* (1526), Augustinians* (1533), Jesuits* (1572), Discalced (barefoot) Carmelites* (1585), Mercedarios (“Knights of Mercy,” 1589), Conceptionist sisters (1530), Dominican sisters (1567), Poor* Clares (1570), and Jerónimites (1585), followed by Juaninos (1604) and Oratorians (1659). During the colonial period, the life of the Roman Catholic Church was marked by rivalry between Spanish and native members, by the different areas of competence and charisms* of the orders, and by constant conflict with the diocesan hierarchy, given the special status of the regulars*. The religious orders in New Spain were extremely active, as demonstrated by the large number of vocations they gave rise to and by their contribution to the economic, cultural, and social life of Mexico. But after the expulsion of the Jesuits (1767), the number of regulars dwindled; the decline was intensified during the time of national independence and continued in the 19th c. The Laws of Reform (1856–60) were especially difficult for regulars: in 1863 the only legally admitted order was that of the Sisters of Charity. When the conflict with the government subsided (c1873), church members asked that the regulars and their ministries be reinstated; the first male Mexican congregation, the Missionaries of San José of Mexico, and its female branch, the Sisters Josefinas, were established (1873). Gradually new religious orders arrived in Mexico: Claretians (1872), Salesians (1892), Marists Brothers (1899), Lasallians (1903), Benedictines (1903), Capuchins* (1907), Redemptorists (1908), Escolapians (1913), and the Sisters of the Sacred Heart, the Sisters of San José, and the Sisters of Good Shepherd (c1914–16). The second Mexican congregation, the Missionaries of the Holy Spirit, was created in 1914. Owing to legal intolerance and subsequent governmental religious persecutions, the period from 1917 to 1938 was difficult for the regulars. After a modus vivendi was worked out (see Mexico), several additional congregations were founded, including the Legion of Christ (1941). The number of male orders, including new native orders, increased from 25 in 1914 to 67 in 1990 (along with an additional 7 lay, apostolic, or contemplative orders), and the number of female orders, including 89 new national orders, increased from 97 in 1914 to 231 in 1990 (along with an additional 27 apostolic or contemplative orders). By 2000 there were 313 orders performing their respective ministries, coordinated by the Conferencia de Superiores Mayores de México (CIRM). See also WOMEN'S RELIGIOUS ORDERS CLUSTER.

MONICA URIBE

Reliquary, small container for relics*, usually decorated with precious materials. Initially portable, sometimes in the shape of the cross, the gabled shrine originated in the Middle Ages.

Remnant, the portion that remains after the removal of all else; a concept (expressed by various biblical terms) applied to those who remained after many in Israel were destroyed or exiled (Ezra 9:8; Zech 14:2) or to those who would return from exile among the nations to constitute a new Israel. In the Prophets, the reference to “remnant” is often threatening; only a few, a faithful remnant, will remain (Amos 5). Whether and how Paul* used this concept in Rom 9–11 is debated. In the Synoptic Gospels, passages about the Last Judgment* often allude to a remnant that alone will be saved (e.g. Matt 3:7–10, 7:13–14, 13:10–17, par.).

Remonstrance, statement composed by Jan Uytenbogaert (1610) that outlined the views of the followers of the Dutch theologian Jacobus Arminius, known as the Remonstrants or Arminians*. The Remonstrants challenged the Calvinist doctrine of divine grace* and argued for the convocation of a synod to reconsider the Belgic* Confession and the Heidelberg* Catechism. The Remonstrance included five articles: grace is universally prevenient (anticipatory); election* is conditional on faith*; the atonement* provided by Jesus' death was intended to be unlimited and universal; God's grace can be resisted; and perseverance in faith is not certain and thus it is possible for believers to fall from grace. Condemned by the Counter-Remonstrance, the theological dispute that followed soon took on political overtones and led to the division of the states of Holland. The Remonstrance was condemned by the Synod of Dort* (Dordt, Dordrecht) (1618), which prohibited Remonstrant church services and exiled church leaders unwilling to renounce their beliefs. Remonstrant exiles reunited in Antwerp (1619) and returned to Holland (1631) to form the Remonstrant Reformed Church (finally formally recognized in 1795). Many congregations joined the Netherland* Reformed Church and continue to exist.

RENÉE JEFFERY

Renaissance (French, “rebirth”). Jacob Burckhardt's influential Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy (1860) made famous the notion that the Renaissance represented the birth of the self-conscious, “modern” individual. But during the 20th c., we learned that Renaissance men and women belonged more to their own time than they did to a future one. There was a rebirth during the Renaissance, in two senses: (1) a recovery of the artifacts (objects and texts) of classical Greek and Roman civilizations and (2) the rise of innovative practices, texts, works of art and architecture, and politics that grew out of this recovery.

Humanists rediscovered Latin texts in monasteries and other archives that had been forgotten for centuries, expanding knowledge of classical literature to its present limits. Only one major text has been discovered (19th c.) since: Cicero's De republica (see Erasmus, Desiderius; Humanism and Renaissance). The rediscovery extended to artifacts – the remains of buildings, sculpture, and a few paintings. These led to transformations in painting (linear perspective, use of color; during the 1400s), sculpture (freestanding statues, Donatello; early 1400s), and architecture (culminating in Palladian style; 1500s); music (polyphony, wedding of words and notes; 1500s); cosmology (sun-centered, Copernicus*; 1543); and medicine (empirical attitude toward the body, which led to knowledge of the circulation of blood; 1600s). These innovations were powered by a mercantile capitalist economy that generated great wealth for a few and thriving urban centers.

Most people who lived during the Renaissance, however, were unaware of it and did not share in it. Social historical studies of this much larger population, especially since the early 1970s, has led many to see greater continuity than fundamental change during the Renaissance, and these studies have led to an academic quarrel over terminology – “Renaissance” describing a higher culture, “early modern” the continuity of social history before, during, and after the Renaissance.

Religion represents a special case in this debate, inasmuch as the Reformation* was at once a high culture (scholarly) movement and a mass movement, mobilizing large populations and leading to fundamental shifts in ways of thinking about a host of issues close to most people: the relation of men and women (see Marriage, Theology and Practice of, Cluster; Women's Christian Practice and Theologies Cluster), the purposes and extent of education*, and the sources of authority and its justification. By 1648, when the wars of religion finally ended, Europe had been transformed; the Renaissance and the Reformation were the engines that powered the transformation.

ALBERT RABIL, JR.

Renunciation of the Devil, formal renunciation of Satan and all his company; part of baptism* at least since the 3rd c. and still found in several traditions. It was linked not only with the rejection of idolatry* but with the view of the Crucifixion as a ransom* from captivity to the devil*. See also ATONEMENT.

Reordination. Should ordination* be repeated? In light of the controversies related to Cyprian*, the Donatists*, and simony* (11th c.), the Western Church concluded that ordinations need not be repeated if performed in the right form and with the right intention.

Repentance (verb roots: Heb shuv; Gk metanoeo), sorrow over and confession of one's sins, “turning away from” evil, along with a turning toward God. True contrition* is motivated by love for God, whereas attrition* is motivated by fear of punishment. In contrast, conversion* emphasizes the “turning toward” God. See also PENANCE AND FORGIVENESS.

Reprobation. See ATONEMENT; DAMNATION; HELL; JUDGMENT; PURGATORY.

Requiem Mass, normally celebrated as a Funeral Mass, includes the rite of final commendation of the deceased, followed by the rite of Christian burial when there is no cremation. In broader terms, a Requiem Mass can refer to other Masses celebrated for the deceased such as on All Souls' Day (November 2) and on anniversaries of death. See also MASS, ROMAN CATHOLIC. KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ

Rerum Novarum. See SOCIAL ENCYCLICALS.

Responsorial Psalms, Psalms sung by a solo cantor or choir, with the congregation responding by singing a repeated verse. The practice originated with Joseph Gelineau, SJ, was further developed in the Taizé* community, and was adapted from the Roman Catholic liturgical reading of the Psalms that used certain verses as a refrain during the recitation of an entire Psalm (a practice found before and after the Council of Trent*).

Restoration Movement, the 1830s union in the USA of followers of Barton Stone* and Alexander Campbell* (also known as the Stone–Campbell Movement). It sought Christian unity through the restoration of what were believed to be NT practices, including the confession of Christ (not creeds*), weekly Lord's Supper*, and believer's baptism*. The movement spread to Great Britain and has become worldwide. Changing social contexts led to several branches: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), Churches of Christ, and Christian Churches and Churches of Christ. Each witnesses in distinctive ways to Christian unity through faithfulness to Jesus Christ. See also CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST). D. NEWELL WILLIAMS

Resurrection of the Body in Western Christianity refers to two related resurrections: the resurrection* of Jesus on the third day after his death and the general resurrection of all humans in the last days. While bodily resurrection is at the heart of NT teachings, it was not self-evident that a decayed body could become whole again: “How are the dead raised? With what kind of body do they come?” (1 Cor 15:35). These questions became a subject of theological inquiry and debate, leading to a plurality of understandings about the resurrection of the body.

Authors used a number of metaphors* grounded in the Bible, each with its own assumptions and consequences.

1. Body as seed. This metaphor was used by Paul (1 Cor 15:36–54) to explain the resurrection of the body after burial. “Seed” connotes both continuity and transformation: the seed and the sprout are the same entity, but the sprout differs from the seed, suggesting that the post-resurrection individual differs from his or her former self.
2. Body as reassembled pieces. In the patristic period, authors such as Tertullian* of Carthage and Augustine* of Hippo preferred the metaphor of a mended pot or statue, which emphasized the material continuity of the individual body (i.e. the continuity of its particles and members). Reassemblage metaphors remained popular through the 17th c., as did ideas about the survival in the afterlife of physical markers such as sex or personal appearance.
3. Love between body and soul. In the late Middle Ages, art, hagiography, poetry, and theology emphasized the theme of desire*, making parallels between the body*–soul* connection and romantic love*. Many other metaphors existed (e.g. the reassemblage of ships, the donning of new clothes, the smelting of ore, the hatching of an egg).

No matter which metaphor was preferred, resurrection theology led to a host of concerns: Would aborted* fetuses be resurrected? Would physical deformities persist in heaven? At what age would bodies be resurrected? Theologians addressed these in various ways.

Western Christianity consistently identified the physical body as an inherent part of the self. This position made necessary the doctrine of bodily resurrection, since the soul could not ultimately be rewarded or punished without the body. The paradox* of resurrection is that the body is understood to be both subject to decay and incorruptible. Premodern theologians were for the most part willing to accept this paradox to preserve the material and structural continuity of the self in the afterlife. LEAH DEVUN

Resurrection of the Dead in Eastern Orthodoxy. Orthodox Christians derive their beliefs about the bodily resurrection of the dead from the Nicene Creed, in which the faithful profess, “I expect the resurrection of the dead and the life of ages to come.” The resurrection and transfiguration*, heralded by the life of Jesus Christ, mark the beginning of a “new* creation,” after which the final Judgment* will occur. The transformation is understood to be a natural, biological event rather than a magical or mechanical one.

Eastern Orthodoxy maintains that many details concerning death* and the resurrection of the dead have not been revealed by God; therefore, theologians offer nondoctrinal teachings based in Holy Tradition, called theologoumena. For example, for theologian Metropolitan Maximos*, partial judgment follows physical death and ushers the righteous into an intermediate stage of partial blessedness during which the fate of the deceased may be influenced by intercessory prayer.

Orthodox liturgical practices reflect these beliefs through hymns of gratitude to God and traditional Byzantine chants designed to convey the range of human emotions experienced at death. The burning of incense signifies prayers carried upward to Christ, and candles symbolize liberation from darkness as the departed embark on a path to Light. See also DYING, CARE OF THE, AN EASTERN ORTHODOX PERSPECTIVE.

JOHN T. CHIRBAN

Resurrection of Jesus, proclaimed in Matt 28:1–15, Mark 16:1–8, Luke 24:1–49, John 20:1–29, and 1 Cor 15:1–58, has been debated by Western theologians and historians since the Enlightenment*.

Historiography* effectively precluded any affirmative judgment concerning the historicity of Jesus’ resurrection (Troeltsch*, 1865–1923). Hermann Reimarus (1694–1768), influenced by Deism*, insisted that Jesus’ disciples stole his body. Strauss* (1808–74), influenced by Hegel*, pioneered an understanding of the Gospels and Jesus' resurrection as myth*. William Wrede (1859–1906) saw both the Resurrection and the messianic secret in Mark* as creations of Jesus' disciples. For Wilhelm Bousset (1865–1920; history* of religion school), the early church grafted Greek and Hellenistic ideas onto Christianity and thus deified Jesus. For Martin Kähler (1835–1912), historical research is always limited and provisional; one should thus not assess the claims of Scripture historically.

Theologians struggled with these issues. Barth's* (1886–1968) dialectical* theology rejected both liberal* and natural* theologies, emphasized revelation*, and thus downplayed historical affirmations of Jesus' resurrection because they placed human assertions above God's Word*. Bultmann* (1884–1976) shifted the focus from Jesus to the early church with form criticism; he demythologized* NT miracle* and resurrection stories; influenced by Heidegger*, he emphasized the existential significance of these stories for believers. Wolfhart Pannenberg (1928–) rejects Barth's view as indistinguishable from "self-delusion" and Bultmann's as "pure myth" in order to come back to a historical affirmation (Jesus actually rose from the dead) as the most plausible explanation of the Christology of Jesus' followers. In their natural theologies, the analytic philosophers Stephen Davis, Richard Swinburne, and Gary Habermas reach similar conclusions.

N. T. Wright, John Dominic Crossan, and Gerd Lüdemann seek to explain the rise of resurrection belief. For Crossan, influenced by literary criticism and cross-cultural anthropology, resurrection language is about ecclesiastical authority* (rather than life after death), arising from a sense of Jesus' presence* in the church. From Lüdemann's psychological perspective, the resurrection stories reflect the experience of Jesus' loving presence by the deeply grieving Peter and the guilt-driven Paul. According to Wright's worldview analysis, the natural meaning of resurrection in 1st-c. Judaism was bodily and corporate. As a mutation of Jewish belief (Jesus is raised prior to the general resurrection), early Christian belief in Jesus' resurrection and empty tomb and the reports of his appearance are most easily understood if Jesus was in fact raised bodily from the dead. For Wright (like Crossan), resurrection is also about God establishing justice* in the world.

Presuppositions concerning miracles*, historical* method, Scripture*, hermeneutics*, and faith* are involved in any understanding of Jesus' resurrection. ROBERT B. STEWART

Retreat, withdrawal or seclusion for religious meditation and devotion, first institutionalized by the Jesuits*, Francis* de Sales, and Vincent* de Paul.

Revelation (Gk apokalypsis, Lat. revelatio, translating Heb glh, "unveiling" or "disclosure" of what was hidden). Expanding on the visual metaphor of unveiling, the term was applied sometimes to a dramatic act of God, sometimes to a theophany*, and sometimes to the genre known as apocalyptic* (Book of Revelation*). An alternative to the visual metaphor was the auditory mode of disclosure – "the Word* of God" and Scripture* as inspired*.

In Christianity, revelation means primarily God's encounter with those to whom God wishes to communicate God's own being, promise, and will. This God, "the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob," the "God not of the dead but of the living" (Matt 22:32), "who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead" (Rom 4:24), reveals God's self – not something or someone else, not even something about God, but God's own self.

This divine communication may happen in diverse ways, through, e.g., stories, the created world, and events. Revelation is differentiated from knowledge of God given through the natural world (Rom 1:19–20; Acts 17:23–29). Revelation happens. It is not a form of knowledge that would result from such encounters with the divine and that would need to be conserved and held. Yet revelation is to be retold in the form of stories of these encounters and thus communicated to others (see, e.g., Julian of Norwich).

The story of the prophet Elijah's encounter with God presents the revelation of God's self in "sheer silence," in contrast to the "shaking elements" of nature such as earthquakes, thunderstorms, and fire (1 Kgs 19:11–12). This silence causes Elijah to cover himself. Within this haunting silence, God shows him the path he is to follow in the midst of a world full of confusion and directs him to the inconspicuous community of believers. God's revelation tells people what they cannot tell themselves. The Bible bears witness to this revelation, made known in Christ's proclamation. What is disclosed in this way illuminates human history and makes possible the reading and understanding of other testimonies to this history in its light (see Testimony).

Revelation is the event in and through which God discloses who God is, how God is acting, and what God's intentions are. Since this divine self-revelation also reveals the situation and condition of those to whom God communicates, it is often painful to be exposed to this revealing process. It causes fear and trembling. At the same time, God's communication gives believers a clarity about themselves that liberates them from self-centeredness, opening them to God's communication, which transforms them into beings capable of being drawn into participation in God's work. God's revelation unveils what humans want to conceal and suppress, yet this unveiling is only the obverse of the nearness of a God who is closer to humans than they are to themselves. Such revealed nearness transforms the whole context of believers' life (see Heteronomy; Mysticism, Mystics).

One can glimpse the mystery* of both God's gracious nearness and the hiddenness of God's presence (see Apophaticism), perceive the utter otherness of the ground of faith (see Faith #5), and also be overwhelmed by joy at the abundance of God's love*. Each revelatory event makes one surprisingly aware that one's perception of God's acting is always provisional and partial, not only because of the limitations of human knowledge (see Reason), but also, and even more so, because God reserves further action for the future so that one perceives God's faithfulness only through hope* and confidence in the divine promises.

A very different understanding of revelation is suggested by the last book of the Bible, "Revelation*," which belongs to the apocalyptic genre. Its title has often caused misunderstanding, because the book describes visions of future dramatic events, seemingly known only in advance through God's revealing their secret developments to elected persons. In this case, revelation would be defined as the uncovering of secrets rather than the encountering of a mystery. Furthermore, at times the Book of Revelation has been understood to be a blueprint of God's acting in history, or even as a divine timetable by which we may plot our present position and distance from the end of all things.

A more appropriate reading of this apocalyptic book underscores that Rev 1:1 speaks of "the revelation of Jesus Christ." He is the crucified victor who destroys the powers of hell*. In Christ's ongoing story, his people's future is decided and contained. Christ is the coming one who personifies God's truthfulness in the midst of all the pain and passion of a tortured world. His revelation is given to encourage hope, endurance, and confidence. The whole scope of the story of Christ is revealed and will be consummated in the coming of God, who will dwell with his people and will make all things new (Rev 21: 3–5).

A third conception identifies revelation with "the word of God" and Jesus Christ as the incarnate Word of God. This view was developed by thinking of the Logos* (the Word; John 1:1–18), the second person of the Trinity*, not only as the revealer of God's decisions and purposes for the world, but also as the gestalt of God's gracious will, the manifestation of God to human beings. Whatever awareness humans have of God and God's purposes has its origin in God's own self-disclosure, the Logos.

Finally, revelation is associated with the Holy* Spirit, which reminds one of, testifies to, and extends Jesus' proclamation and mission (John 16:7–15) and inspires Scripture* (2 Tim 3:16). To affirm the revealed origin of Scripture is not to say that revelation is contained in the Bible. It is rather to claim that these texts have a revelatory role; through the Scriptures, revelation takes place (see Scripture).

Revelation has been contrasted through history with reason* and the knowledge (of God) gained through reason and through observation of the natural world (see Science and Christian Theology). While in medieval times and beyond, revelation was viewed as nurturing reason and going beyond its reach (see Locke, John), the Enlightenment* favored reason over revelation, because it did not make claims to special insight or authority (see Rationalism and Christian Theology). In turn, certain theologians, including Kierkegaard* and Barth*, disputed the claims of natural* theology and relied exclusively on revelation.

GERHARD SAUTER

Revelation, Book of. The vision John records in Revelation (1:1) includes Christ and heaven (1:9–20; 4, 5), Christ's messages to seven local churches (2, 3), partial destruction of the earth (e.g. 6:1–16; 8:6–9:21; 16:1–21), mythical creatures (13; 17:1–18:19; 19:11–20:15), and God's establishment of the New Jerusalem (21:1–22:5). The authorship of the book has been disputed since the 2nd c. For some the author was John*, son of Zebedee, a disciple of Jesus. Most modern scholars, denying this identification, argue that this "John" is the author of neither the Gospel of John nor the Epistles of John*.

Through symbolic language, Revelation points to the dominance of the Roman Empire, both economically (e.g. 13:16–17; 17:4; 18:11–19) and politically (13:1–2; 17:18). It addresses problems experienced by early Christians, including persecution* (2:10, 13; 13:7, 15; 17:6), whether to participate in Roman religious customs (2:14, 20; 13:6, 12), and a lack of fervor by adherents (2:4; 3:16).

The author understands his work to be “prophecy” (1:3; 22:18–19). His imagery draws heavily on Jewish Scripture, especially prophetic literature (e.g. Rev 4:1–11; cf. Isa 6:1–9; Ezek 1:4–28). The use of familiar OT imagery lends authority to the author’s vision: what John sees is similar to what prophets before him have seen. Imagery from the OT also lends meaning to the vision, as when God’s domination of Egypt during the plagues (Exod 7–12) recurs in a new context (Rev 16) (see Typology). As prophecy, Revelation speaks words of exhortation and comfort to the author’s situation.

Revelation also uses conventions of apocalyptic literature – such as a heavenly journey (Rev 4:1) interpreted by an angel (21:9–10) and visions of beasts (Rev 13; cf. Dan 7:1–8) – to communicate a divine perspective rather than a worldly one.

In a context in which the Roman Empire appeared to be all powerful, Revelation emphasizes the dominion of God. Christians experiencing persecution are comforted by the promise of God’s triumph over evil (Rev 19–22); Christians tempted to participate in Roman religious or economic practices are reminded that the power of these is illusory and that their own inheritance of God’s promises requires faithfulness to God in the present (2–3; 21–22).

Christians have disputed the authority of Revelation since the 2nd c. In many traditions, it is infrequently read during worship. Other traditions rely heavily on Revelation to support expectations of Christ’s immediate return. A wide variety of artistic renderings of scenes from Revelation have shaped readers’ imaginations throughout Christian history. See also APOCALYPTICISM CLUSTER; MILLENNIALISM CLUSTER.

SUSAN E. HYLEN

Revival, Revivalism, terms that refer to a phenomenon among Protestant Evangelicals* in which, through extraordinary community experiences, a large number of people find themselves experiencing a greater desire for fervent devotion to Christianity.

Early manifestations of revivalism took place in Europe, notably the 17th- to 18th-c. Pietist* Movement led by Phillip Spener* and August Francke*, and the Moravian* revival (1727) led by Count Ludwig Zinzendorf*. Moravians inspired the Methodist John Wesley* and his friend George Whitefield* in their leadership of the transatlantic Great* Awakening, the first and archetypal revival movement of the English-speaking world. The work of a movement of theologically sympathetic Evangelicals, the Great Awakening revivals began in the 1730s, rapidly spreading fervor for conversion and personal experience of God throughout England, Europe, and the American colonies. The Great Awakening can be interpreted as the formative event of modern Evangelicalism*.

In the early 19th c., the Second Great* Awakening spread across the USA on a platform of personal piety, social reform and, most significantly, a major international mission movement, which exported US revivalist Evangelicalism worldwide.

The first major global revival movement began with the rise of Pentecostalism* via the Azusa Street revival (Los Angeles, 1906). Today, Pentecostalism and the Charismatic* Movement together comprise the second-largest Christian movement in the world.

While revivalists are not theologically unified, some features are generally common to all forms of revivalism. (1) Revivalism involves a desire for individuals to experience conversion* to Christianity through a direct, immediate connection to God the Holy* Spirit, an experience typically accompanied by a strong conviction of personal sin* and distance from God. In the conversion experience, God is seen to be demonstrably overcoming that estrangement. (2) Revivalism is usually accompanied by dramatic, exhortatory preaching in which preachers call listeners to repentance and conversion. (3) Much revivalism strongly emphasizes an ongoing experience of the mysterious* reality of God. Thus revivals are also for converted Christians who often pursue revival to experience more of God’s supernatural presence and work in their lives. Thus phenomena like visions, prophecy*, healing*, and other physical manifestations often accompany revivals. (4) For the participants, revivals are exciting, life-defining events in which heaven seems to come to earth, concretizing and validating the intellectual and theological components of faith. Such experiences often provoke widespread evangelism* and missionary activity. Revival spreads.

Revivalism strongly influenced Evangelicals*, shaping innumerable popular expressions of Christianity around the globe, and continues to do so, e.g. in the African revival (see Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster). In addition, the term “revival,” combining religious and secular connotations, refers to a key characteristic of the nationalism of certain Christian nations (see Nationalism and Christianity).

CALEB J. D. MASKELL

Ricci, Matteo (1552–1610), Italian missionary in China, known for his missionary method of “accommodation.” He changed an initial policy of accommodation to the Buddhist* way of life into an adaptation to the lifestyle and etiquette of the Confucian* elite. He opted for openness and tolerance toward Chinese values; he believed that the Confucian social doctrine should be complemented by the metaphysical ideas of Christianity. He also adopted a tolerant attitude toward certain Confucian rites, such as ancestral* worship and the veneration* of Confucius, which he declared to be “civil rites.” This policy determined the Jesuits* basic attitudes during the 17th and 18th c. but was denounced by the Dominicans*. The “Chinese* rites controversy” had a great influence on missionary methods (see Mission Cluster).

Ricci’s most significant Chinese writing, Tianzhu shiyi (The solid meaning of the Lord of Heaven, 1603), is a typical example of the use of Christian natural* theology to approach Chinese literati. As part of his argumentation, Ricci quotes the Chinese classics to show that in ancient times the Chinese had a natural knowledge of God. His journal, originally written in Italian, became known in the 1615 Latin translation by Nicolas Trigault, De Christiana Expeditione apud Sinas. See also CHINA.

NICOLAS STANDAERT

Richard of St. Victor (d1173), Victorine* theologian. Born in Scotland, he spent his life in the Abbey of St. Victor and became the successor of Hugo* of St. Victor as an interpreter of Scripture, combining themes from Dionysius* and Augustine*. His Benjamin Minor and Benjamin Major delineated, respectively, the preparation for and the grace* of mystical* contemplation*. He also wrote a speculative work on the Trinity*, arguing from the nature of love*.

Ricoeur, Paul (1913–2004), one of the most influential European philosophers of the 20th c. His work ranged from existentialism* and phenomenology* to political* theory and hermeneutics*. His first two books, written after World War II, dealt with the religious existentialism of Gabriel Marcel* and Karl Jaspers*. But he is most celebrated for his radical contribution to philosophical hermeneutics, following Schleiermacher*, Dilthey, Heidegger*, and Gadamer*, through his innovative applications of contemporary hermeneutics to questions of religion, theology, and biblical study.

Ricoeur’s first major contribution to the hermeneutics of religion, The Symbolism of Evil (1960; English 1967), was followed by anthologies of essays on religious and theological subjects, including The Conflict of Interpretations (1969; English 1974), Essays in Biblical Interpretation (1980), Figuring the Sacred (1995), and Thinking Biblically (co-written with André LaCocque, 1998). In these Ricoeur seeks to relate key concepts of semantic innovation, ontological surplus, and critical interpretation to notions of divinity and eschatology*. Though a liberal French Protestant, Ricoeur was always open to dialogue with Jewish, Catholic, and other faith traditions. From Symbolism of Evil, Ricoeur extended his range of reference to include nonmonotheistic as well as monotheistic traditions. This amplified ecumenical and exegetical scope was influenced by his collegial friendship with Mircea Eliade (the phenomenologist of comparative religion in Chicago), which modified the earlier influence of thinkers like Bultmann* and Barth*.

Despite his major contributions to a hermeneutics of religion, Ricoeur went to considerable lengths to maintain a formal division between his philosophical and theological writings; thus he withheld the explicitly “religious” Gifford Lectures when it came to the publication of the philosophical Oneself as Another (1992). In his later years, however, Ricoeur had some reservations about this dual-track separation of philosophy and theology, his “methodological asceticism,” in part because of the deep influence of the French Enlightenment and Republican culture of education.

Ricoeur’s contribution to the philosophy of religion might best be summed up in terms of his distinction between a “hermeneutics* of suspicion” and “hermeneutics of affirmation.” While the hermeneutics of suspicion exposed the symbols*, myths*, and messages of revelation* to “masters of suspicion” such as Freud*, Marx*, and Nietzsche*, the hermeneutics of affirmation offered interpretations informed by charity*, compassion*, and hope* – “in spite of all” (en dépit de tout). The smashing of idols* lets symbols speak. There is no affirmation without a prior negation. By squarely facing the critiques of religion* offered by psychoanalysis, Marxism, and structuralism, Ricoeur helped to keep open the study of religion to the critical debates of his times. Eschatology* was, he claimed, his “secret passion,” as summed up in his sentiment that if, like Moses, he would never possess the Promised Land, he could still glimpse it – patiently and passionately – from afar.

RICHARD KEARNEY

Righteousness (Old English, rightwise; cf. Lat rectitudo and justitia), right orientation or uprightness, usually equivalent to justice*. When the Hebrew term tsedaqa designates God’s righteousness/justice (e.g. in the Psalms and Isa 40–66), it refers to God’s saving action, directed to the shalom (well-being, prosperity) of the people. Righteousness/justice as the comportment of the community or individuals is to be consistent with God’s righteousness/justice. In the NT, in addition to these connotations, one finds the concern regarding “being made righteous,” i.e. justification, and being justified. See also JUSTICE, CHRISTIAN THEOLOGICAL VIEWS AND PRACTICES, CLUSTER; JUSTIFICATION, CHRISTIAN THEOLOGICAL VIEWS AND PRACTICES, CLUSTER.

Rings. Christians adopted the Roman use of engagement rings. The bishop’s ring, sign of betrothal to the church, came into use during the early Middle Ages.

Rite, term used to describe all customary acts of worship or the written instructions for them.

Ritschl, Albrecht (1822–89), German Protestant exegete, historian, and dogmatic theologian, professor at Bonn (1846–64) and Göttingen (1864–89).

His many writings, principally Der christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung (3 vols., 1870–74), Unterricht in der christlichen Religion (1875), and Geschichte des Pietismus (3 vols., 1880–86), gained him international reputé and led to the formation of a highly influential “Ritschlian school,” whose leading members included Wilhelm Herrmann*, Adolf von Harnack*, and (for a time) Ernst Troeltsch*.

Ritschl judged that the 16th-c. Protestant Reformers had indeed renewed the Christian religion but had failed (along with their successors) to reconstruct Christian doctrine on the basis of their guiding ideas. Hence he aimed to bring this “unfinished Reformation*” to completion in his own holistic system of theology, centered on the themes of justification* (unconditional pardon) by God, reconciliation* (unconstrained fellowship) with God, Christian freedom from the world’s oppressive burdens through a lively trust in God’s providence (see Faith #2), and freedom for the world’s compelling needs through a love*-prompted action that advances the Kingdom* of God. Partly in response to this last Ritschlian theme, NT scholars began to give heightened attention to the specific role of “kingdom” in the teachings of Jesus.

DAVID W. LOTZ

Rogation Days (Lat rogare, “to ask”), Western Church days of prayer, including intercession, and fasting (April 25 and the three days before Ascension* Day).

Roman Catechism is the popular name for the manual of Roman Catholic doctrine composed by order of the Council of Trent* (1545–1563). Its full title is Catechismus ex Decreto SS. Concilii Tridentini ad Parochos PII V. Pont. Max. Jussu Editus (Catechism of the Council of Trent for parish priests issued by order of Pius V, the Supreme Pontiff).

At Trent a plan emerged for a catechism designed for parish priests to be used in the instruction of the faithful. A committee of theologians composed the manual under the supervision of Charles Borromeo, the archbishop of Milan. Pope Pius V promulgated the text in 1566.

The Roman Catechism follows the four-part division of some late medieval catechisms: (1) the Apostles’* Creed, (2) the sacraments*, (3) the Decalogue, and (4) the Lord’s* Prayer. The Small Catechism and Large Catechism of Luther* also follow this four-part structure, although in a slightly different order.

The Roman Catechism incorporates the doctrines of Trent and prior councils and follows a theology that is largely Augustinian* and Thomistic*. Translated into numerous vernacular languages, the Catechism continued to exert substantial influence until superseded by the Catechism of the Catholic Church in 1992.

ROBERT FASTIGGI

ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Roman Catholicism: The Roman Catholic Church and Its Theology

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Roman Catholicism in Africa: Southern Africa

Roman Catholicism in Africa:
Western Africa

Roman Catholicism in Asia: China

Roman Catholicism in Asia: Philippines

Roman Catholicism in Europe: France

Roman Catholicism in Europe:
Germany and Lutheranism

Roman Catholicism in Europe: Italy

Roman Catholicism in Europe: Portugal

Roman Catholicism in Europe: Spain

Roman Catholicism in Europe:
United Kingdom

Roman Catholicism in Latin America:
Argentina

Roman Catholicism in Latin America:
Brazil: Colonial Period

Roman Catholicism in Latin America:
Brazil: Imperial Period

Roman Catholicism in Latin America:
Brazil: Period of the Republic

Roman Catholicism in Latin America:
Brazil: Two Pastoral Initiatives of the National Conference of Bishops of Brazil
(CNBB)

Roman Catholicism in Latin America:
Brazilian New Movements

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Chile

Roman Catholicism in Latin America:
Colombia

Roman Catholicism in Latin America:
Mexico

Roman Catholicism in Latin America:
Paraguay

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Peru

Roman Catholicism in Latin America:
Uruguay

Roman Catholicism in North America:
Canada

Roman Catholicism in North America:
United States

Roman Catholicism in the South Pacific and Australia

1) Introductory Entry

Roman Catholicism: The Roman Catholic Church and Its Theology. The largest Christian* institution, the Roman Catholic Church has more than a billion baptized members, who are led by local bishops* and are in communion with the pope*, or bishop of Rome. The overwhelming majority of Catholics belong to the Western Church, or “Roman Rite” – generally speaking the church that used Latin for Mass* and the administration of the sacraments* but that now (since the Second Vatican* Council, 1962–65) largely uses vernacular languages for its public worship. There are also 21 Eastern churches in union with Rome (sometimes inappropriately called “Uniate* churches”), which have followed somewhat different traditions for their religious ceremonies and enjoyed a variety of eucharistic* prayers or anaphoras* for the Mass*, unlike the Roman Rite (which until Vatican II used only one eucharistic prayer, the Roman Canon). The Armenian*, Byzantine*, Coptic*, and other major Eastern rites for centuries used Syriac and other ancient languages for worship, but in recent times often switched to Arabic, English, Malayalam, and other contemporary languages.

What characterizes the Roman Catholic Church is not necessarily unique to it. It shares with the vast majority of Christians respect for the Bible* as the inspired* and authoritative Word* of God, the practice of baptism* and the Eucharist*, and the Niceno*-Constantinopolitan Creed of 381. Along with Eastern Orthodox* Christians, as well as some Anglicans*, it accepts and practices seven sacraments*: baptism*, confirmation*, Eucharist, penance*, the anointing* of the sick, holy orders*, and matrimony*. The Roman Catholic Church recognizes 21 general councils* of the Church (though not necessarily giving the same authority to all): from Nicaea* I (325) to Vatican II. Eastern Orthodox* churches recognize only the seven councils, from Nicaea I to Nicaea* II (787); and the Oriental Orthodox* (non-Chalcedonian) churches recognize only three (Nicaea I; Constantinople, 381; Ephesus, 431).

Even before the time of Benedict* of Nursia and his sister Scholastica* in the 6th c., some Christian men and women joined communities, followed the same spiritual rule, and lived celibate, poor, and obedient lives under a superior.

Later orders, such as the Carmelites*, Dominicans*, Franciscans* and Jesuits*, and other religious institutes flourished and have become a distinctive feature of the Roman Catholic Church (see Religious Orders, Roman Catholic, Cluster). Such consecrated life in monasteries* and other religious communities originated among Eastern Orthodox Christians and continued among them, and emerged in modern times in the Anglican Communion and among some Protestants.

Key characteristics of Roman Catholicism include a deep love for Christ, fostered through the regular celebration of the Eucharist, and a sense that all human reality and the whole material cosmos have been blessed and changed by "the Word becoming flesh" (John 1:14). It is also typically Catholic to embrace "both/and" and hold together things that some Christians view as standing in opposition to each other (see Paradox). Hence Catholics, like Orthodox, do not acknowledge an "either/or" in the case of Jesus and his mother. Many Protestant Reformers and their followers hold that honoring Mary* (and other saints*) somehow blurs the unique role of Christ as Savior. But Catholics and Orthodox do not admit a choice here; they honor Jesus and his mother.

Roman Catholics accept both divine grace* and human freedom*, rejecting, on the one hand, a Pelagian*-style "do it yourself" salvation* and, on the other hand, any overemphasis on divine predestination* that would turn salvation in a puppet show arranged by an omnipotent* God*. Debates flared over late works by Augustine* of Hippo that pushed too far God's predestining will and over some Reformers' views on the destruction of human freedom by sin. Yet the interaction of God's sovereign grace with the human will* remains mysterious. The need to endorse both grace and freedom is expressed by the admonition to "pray as if everything depended on God, and work as if everything depended on yourself." Dante* Alighieri (d1321) knew that human salvation is due to God's grace, yet he called free will "the greatest gift God made to his creatures" (Paradiso 5, 19–22).

Another Roman Catholic "both/and," one shared by other Christians, concerns the love of God and love of neighbor. Catholics want to devote time to God in prayer, but they also want to care for their neighbors in need. Catholics, at their best, have combined satisfying the spirit's hunger for God through prayer with feeding the hungry of this world. Another "both/and" is seen in the existence of both contemplative* and active religious institutes. Groups of men and women who follow the Benedictine*, Camaldolese, Carmelite*, Carthusian*, Cistercian*, and other monastic lives of prayer and silence, as well as those who live as solitary hermits, support spiritually the works of consecrated men and women who serve the world through schools, colleges, hospitals, and other social "ministries*."

Education* entails another Roman Catholic "both/and," both faith* and reason* (see Rationalism and Theology). Roman Catholicism has never embraced the opposition between Athens (standing for reason) and Jerusalem (standing for faith) that Tertullian* championed. From the patristic* period, through Thomas* Aquinas (d1274), and down to the 1998 encyclical of John* Paul II, Fides et Ratio (Faith and reason), Catholic Christianity has never accepted any separation between God's gift of faith* and the cultivation of human reason. By leading a renewal in theological learning and recovering the philosophy of Aristotle*, Thomas Aquinas expressed for all time a harmony between faith and reason. Following his lead, Dante* blended human learning and divine revelation in the Comedy. His two companions in that masterpiece were Virgil and Beatrice, the former symbolizing true humanism and the latter divine wisdom. Sometimes, above all with the growth of the natural sciences*, tensions emerged between the truths* of revelation* and worldly learning. Certain tensions arose from rational claims to interpret autonomously all reality. At other times, Catholics, in particular Church officials, were to blame, as in the condemnation of Galileo Galilei* (d1642), whose observations that the earth moved around the sun were wrongly taken to challenge the Church's authority to interpret the Scriptures*. Nowadays advances in the life sciences and biotechnology make a full and honest dialogue between faith and scientific reason more urgent than ever (see Science and Christian Theology).

Some additional "both/ands" that typify Roman Catholicism are both married and celibate priests (the first being typical in Eastern Catholicism and the second in Western Catholicism); both the (very many) lay members and the (comparatively few) ordained ministers; both saints and sinners belonging to the Catholic Church; both institutional structures (essentially the pastoral government of bishops in communion with the bishop of Rome) and fresh, charismatic* initiatives; both permanent beliefs and developments in doctrine and practice. Examples of the former include faith in Christ* as truly divine and fully human, his personal resurrection* from the dead, and such moral positions as rejection of abortion* and euthanasia*. Developments include, for instance, changes in public worship, in the way popes* understand and exercise their authority as successors of Peter, and in attitudes toward the institution of slavery*. After centuries of tolerating that institution, Vatican II and John Paul II rejected it as "intrinsically evil."

The present Roman Catholic Church needs a better balance between the centralized power of Rome and the decisions of local churches and national conferences of bishops. Genuine "collegiality*" or authoritative guidance for the whole Church shared by the bishops with Peter's successor, the bishop of Rome, was a principle endorsed by Vatican II in 1963 but it still needs to be fully implemented. A far wider role for laymen and laywomen in the life of the Roman Catholic Church is another development that many Catholics want. Under the leadership of John* XXIII (d1963) and through the work of Vatican II (which he convoked) and of his successors in the papacy, huge strides have been made in relations with other Christians, Jews*, and adherents of other religions. But much more remains to be done in carrying forward a prayerful and practical dialogue at every level.

From the very beginning of Roman Catholic Christianity, theologians proved an indispensable resource for the church and wider society. They have drawn on the data of God's self-revelation, available inseparably through the inspired Scriptures* and the living tradition* guided by the Holy* Spirit. Vatican II understood Scripture and tradition to be intimately connected in their past origin, present function, and future goal (Dei Verbum, The constitution on divine revelation, 9). Vatican II wanted the study of Scripture to be "the soul of all theology" (ibid., 24).

Western Roman Catholic theology has characteristically engaged in an intellectual pursuit of truth ("faith seeking understanding") making use of terminology and schemes of thought originating with Aristotle*, Plato* and other great philosophers*. Eastern Catholic theologians, like their more numerous counterparts among the Orthodox, have persistently looked to liturgical texts and the infinitely beautiful God in the spirit of "faith seeking worship." Recent Liberation* theology privileges the voices of the poor* and oppressed* and takes a very practical approach as "faith seeking justice." Roman Catholic theology is enriched whenever these approaches are allowed to complement each other. Contexts and audiences that vary around the world will affect the application of these three approaches.

GERALD O'COLLINS, SJ

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Roman Catholicism in Africa: Southern Africa. Roman Catholicism in Southern Africa varies in size and character as a result of different historical dynamics. In Botswana*, Roman Catholics constitute 5% of the population; in Lesotho*, 70%; in Namibia*, 17%; in South* Africa, 6.5%; and in Swaziland*, 5%. Roman Catholicism is culturally more homogeneous in Botswana, Lesotho, and Swaziland, but culturally and racially more diverse in Namibia and South Africa. These five countries (participating in one economic bloc, the Southern African Customs Union) have been under the oversight of one apostolic nuncio from the Vatican since 2000, with three distinct bishop conferences: the South African (South Africa, Botswana, Swaziland), the Namibian, and the Lesotho.

With more than 3 million members, the Roman Catholic Church in South Africa is the largest in the region. Yet it is relatively small compared with the many Protestant churches, owing to its historical marginalization during the period of Dutch colonization (1652–1804) and in the decades of Afrikaner nationalism (1851–1903). Despite the conquest by the British (1806), it was not until 1837 that a Roman Catholic bishop could take residence. This minority status did not prevent it from carrying out its prophetic mission. In fact, some of its clerics, including Archbishop Dennis Hurley (Durban) and Fr. Smangalis Mkhatshe, became most strident opponents of apartheid, advocating freedom and the respect of human dignity.

New challenges emerged after 1994 (when South Africa attained freedom), including poverty, crime, and HIV/AIDS. Inculturation* is also a great challenge, aiming both at making the Roman Catholic faith a part of the life of the faithful and at eradicating disturbing forms of syncretism* or relapse into “paganism*.” For example, Archbishop Buti Tlhaagale searched for an authentic way of integrating the ritual of offering blood libations to ancestors within the Mass*, while resisting the growing practice among African Catholics, both lay and clergy, to resort in times of crisis to “the intervention of ancestral spirits, the engagement of spirit mediums, spirit possession, consulting diviners, . . . magical practices” (2006; see Ancestor Veneration and Christianity Cluster).

The erosion of family* values that has resulted from long-standing migrant labor and the ravages of industrialization in African communities is another challenge for all the countries in this region.

In Lesotho, Catholicism has been historically the dominant religion, in part because of its unwavering commitment to education*, at both the primary and secondary levels. It was instrumental in the founding of the Basotho National Party (1959), which ruled Lesotho from 1966 to 1985.

PAUL H. GUNDANI

Roman Catholicism in Africa: Western Africa.

The history of Roman Catholicism in Western Africa began along the Atlantic coast in the context of disruptive colonial incursions (18th and 19th c.). (Earlier missionaries, Portuguese Capuchins* [15th c.], did not have a lasting impact.) Modern Roman Catholicism gradually evolved from the missions to Western Africa pioneered by Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny, under the leadership of Anne-Marie Javouhey (1779–1851); the Congregation of the Holy Ghost, under the inspiration of François Libermann (1802–52); and the Society of African Missions, founded by Melchior de Marion Brèsillac (1813–58). Since then the number of Roman Catholics has steadily grown (in 2000, c36 million out of 269 million West Africans).

The colonial* legacy endures in the linguistic divide between two regional umbrella bodies: the Association of Episcopal Conferences of Anglophone West Africa and the Episcopal Conferences of French-Speaking West Africa. Phenomenal growth continues in the recruitment of ministers, with some seminaries training more than 500 seminarians (e.g. in Nigeria). Since the late 20th c., indigenous bishops, priests, and nuns have assumed leadership of the Church. As elsewhere in Africa, Catholic religious* orders operate hospitals, schools, and social centers. The increasingly public profile of Catholicism in Western Africa can be attributed to the active roles played by prominent Church leaders in the political sphere.

Two key issues have shaped the character of Roman Catholicism in Western Africa: the challenge of Islam* and the struggle to adapt and integrate indigenous religious traditions. The tense relation with Islam often results in violent confrontations, especially where Muslims constitute the majority, as in Senegal*, Nigeria*, and Burkina* Faso. On the contrary, the encounter with African* Religion has generated various forms of inculturated* theology and worship in countries like Ghana* and Nigeria. This positive view departs from erstwhile attempts to suppress the beliefs and practices of indigenous religions.

Indicators of a vibrant Roman Catholicism in Western Africa include the recent beatification* of the Nigerian Cyprian Michael Iwene Tansi (1903–64) and the development of an active missionary vocation. Many of its priests and nuns serve in churches in the Western Hemisphere. A pivotal example is the Missionary Society of St. Paul founded in 1977 by the Catholic Bishops Conference of Nigeria for the sole purpose of sending priests on mission to other parts of Africa as well as to the First World and elsewhere, which is a confirmation of the maturity of Roman Catholicism in Western Africa.

AGBONKHIANMEGHE E. OROBATOR, S.J.

Roman Catholicism in Asia: China.

After centuries of missionary labor, the Holy See* elevated the China Mission (see Mission in Asia: Catholic Mission in China, 16th–18th Centuries) to the rank of local church (1946). All dioceses were gradually placed under Chinese leadership, bringing about a profound and ongoing transformation of the Chinese Catholic Church.

Shortly after Mao Zedong founded the People's Republic of China (October 1, 1949), the Communist government began to accuse Church leaders of being spies and counterrevolutionaries. In 1951 it expelled the Holy See's nuncio*, and by 1956 it had driven out most foreign missionaries. The regime also fostered a political organization to monitor and direct all Church activities, the Catholic Patriotic Association (CPA, set up in 1957). Local clergies began to choose "patriotic" priests to fill episcopal vacancies following the departure of foreign bishops, but Rome refused to approve these elections. After the first consecrations without his approval (1958), Pope Pius XII rejected the CPA and reaffirmed his sole authority in making episcopal appointments. The Chinese government retaliated by forbidding Church authorities to have further contact with the Vatican and by making sweeping arrests of those bishops and priests who opposed the CPA and the illicit ordinations (1955–59). During the Cultural Revolution (1966–76), all public religious activities were suspended and Church properties confiscated. During this period of great violence, Christians suffered persecution, sisters had to return to secular life, and all religious ministers were sent to labor camps to join those arrested during the preceding decade.

After the 10-year nightmare of the Cultural Revolution, the country began to open to the outside world, and the clergy were allowed to resume ministry. Since 1982 a new constitution has guaranteed freedom of religious belief. The view that religion was the opium of the people is no longer popular and has been replaced by the position that religious believers make good citizens. Most confiscated properties have been returned, and churches are full on Sundays. Since 1989 the government has recognized the pope's spiritual leadership over Roman Catholics.

After the clergy returned to their dioceses, some refused to register their churches with the government Religious Affairs Bureaus and to accept the supervision of the CPA. They carry out their religious ministry for the most part in private and attract a great number of "followers." These "underground" Catholics are often harassed and arrested. Other priests and bishops have chosen to perform their sacramental ministry openly and to submit their churches to CPA control. Although some have compromised themselves in collaborating with the government, the majority give only lip service to the CPA. Following years of mistrust, the two groups have mostly reconciled. Rome has legitimized most of the "patriotic" bishops, and no new bishop accepts consecration without prior papal consent. Thus both the "underground Church" and the "patriotic Church" are faithful to Rome, each in its own way. The Chinese Catholic Church exists in two main forms but remains only one church in communion with the worldwide Roman Catholic Church. A more accurate way of describing the situation in the early 2000s is to speak of registered and unregistered churches. Registered churches are allowed to engage in religious activities under government supervision. Unregistered churches are deemed illegal, and their members are often forced to pay fines and imprisoned.

In 2005 it was estimated that 12 million Roman Catholics worshipped in more than 6,000 churches. There were 110 dioceses with 114 active bishops and 22 inactive bishops. The number of priests exceeded 3,000, and there were more than 5,000 sisters. Informal talks between the Vatican and the People's Republic of China about reestablishing diplomatic relations have taken place periodically since the late 1980s.

JEAN-PAUL WIEST

Roman Catholicism in Asia: Philippines. The first Roman Catholic priests came with Magellan's "discovery" of the islands (1521). But systematic Christianization started only after 1565 when Spanish colonization began. Five religious orders of missionaries came from Spain, four of them orders of friars* (Augustinians*, Dominicans*, Franciscans*, Augustinian Recollects). The fifth order, the Jesuits*, were regular* clergy.

By the time Spanish rule ended in 1898, the vast majority of the population was Catholic. The census of 1903 listed the total population as 7,635,426, and 6,987,686 (91.52%) were Christians – almost entirely Roman Catholics. The Protestant missionaries who started arriving from the USA in 1900 had not yet gained a following, and the Aglipayan Movement, whose members rebelled against the Spanish friars, had not yet seceded from the Roman Catholic Church (see Philippine Independent Church). Tribal groups (animists) remained in the mountains, and Muslims inhabited the Sulu Archipelago and parts of Southern Mindanao.

Organization. The first bishop of Manila arrived in 1581. In 1595 Manila was raised to an archbishopric, with three suffragan* bishoprics. A fifth episcopal see was added in 1865. These five were the only episcopal sees until 1910, when new bishoprics began to be created. The centrality of the Roman Catholic Church in Philippine life and society was symbolized by the organization of the towns around the church and central plaza. Manila was a city of churches. So was Cebu City.

Education and Charities. Under Spanish rule, education* and charitable services were entirely under Church initiative and administration. Mission schools (elementary) were organized from the start. There were two institutions of higher learning (with degree programs in philosophy, theology, and canon law) during the first two centuries of the Spanish regime: the (Jesuit) Colegio de Manila (1595) and the (Dominican) Colegio de Santo Tomas (1611).

In 1768 with the expulsion of the Jesuits, Santo Tomas University (Dominican) alone remained, with law and medicine added in the late 19th c. Secondary education (the European baccalaureate) was provided by colleges in the various episcopal sees*. In Manila the leading institutions were the Dominican Colegio de San Juan de Letran (1620) and the Ateneo de Manila, opened by the Jesuits upon their return in 1859. Parochial schools provided elementary education. Yet the inadequacies of the Philippine educational system were exposed by the national hero José Rizal in his two novels, Noli me tangere and El filibusterismo.

Hospitals maintained by religious orders have been established, the two oldest being San Lazaro (Franciscans) and San Juan de Dios (by brothers of an order of that name, San Juan de Dios). Christian burial for the poor was provided in Manila by the Confraternity of Mercy.

Catholicism in the Philippines during the Spanish regime was beset with problems. One was recurring Muslim raids, during which the coastal settlements were destroyed and much of the population was carried off and sold into slavery. Another was the lack of priests and the long delay in developing a native clergy. A more basic problem, however, was the Patronato* Real (royal patronage), which gave the Spanish monarch the duty to support the Church but also a right to dictate Church policies. While government support was helpful in the early stages of Christianization, long-distance governance from Madrid became a hindrance in the long run. Another basic problem was the latent animism* among the less educated classes, which tinged their Catholic faith with a tendency toward superstition*.

Philippine Roman Catholicism in the 20th Century. The change of sovereignty from Spanish to North American (1898) put an end to the Patronato Real. It freed the Church from government control and established direct communication between the Philippine Roman Catholic Church and the Holy See in Rome. On the other hand, the withdrawal of government support left the Church in financial straits, and the people had not yet been trained to support the Church and its educational and charitable institutions. Moreover, the US principle of separation of church* and state (an excellent principle in itself) was often misinterpreted to mean hostility by officials toward the Roman Catholic Church (see Anticlericalism). There was also much anti-Catholic propaganda in schools and in the press.

The Aglipayan Movement (1902), which led to the establishment of the Philippine* Independent Church (now officially called Iglesia Filipina Independiente), gained a large following (at least 25% of Catholics in 1903), which progressively declined to 6% in 1960, before rapidly growing once again to 15% in 2000.

Gradually a revival took place in Roman Catholicism, aided largely by the arrival of new missionary groups of various nationalities. Catholic schools were greatly improved and more schools opened, and greater impetus was given to the development of a native clergy. Catholic newspapers in English and the native languages and a popular radio program helped the revival. The result became evident in the International Eucharistic Congress held in Manila (1937), attended by more than a million people, the largest crowd in Philippine history.

Further Developments. World War II (1941–45) and the Japanese occupation, with their attendant tragedies, dangers, and privations, aroused a deeper piety and brought clergy and people closer together. Since the end of the war (1945), there has been a rapid increase in the population, particularly in Mindanao as a result of massive migration from Luzon and the Visayas. According to the 2000 census, the total population is 76,332,470 and the number of Catholics is 61.8 million, representing 81.04% of the total. This rapid increase in population, together with an increase in the number of priests, has resulted in the creation of new bishoprics. In 1910 there were only 5 episcopal jurisdictions (1 archbishopric, 4 bishoprics). By 2005 there were 16 archbishoprics and 70 bishoprics. In addition to this numerical increase, there has been an intensification of church life, stimulated by the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65). That vitality was given spectacular expression during Pope John Paul II's second visit to Manila when, on January 19, 1995, an estimated 5 million people joined the pope at Mass, the largest gathering of people anywhere in the world.

The numerical strength and the increased vitality of the Church have had political repercussions. Before 1920 no one in government or the press would have paid attention to a bishop who had raised his voice on a national issue. Today, people listen when the bishops speak. In certain national crises, notably in the ousting of the dictatorship in 1986 (see Human Rights Cluster: And the Churches in Asia: The Philippines), the bishops' intervention was crucial. Nonetheless, the Church faces serious problems, including massive poverty* and widespread social problems. The number of priests is totally inadequate to serve the large population, both urban and rural. There is also a lack of religious instruction among the poorer classes. But the principal problems of the past no longer exist. Instead, there is a friendly spirit among all Christian groups and a desire to cooperate in projects for the common good. See also PHILIPPINES.

FR. MIGUEL A. BERNAD

Roman Catholicism in Europe: France.

Church-State Relations: From Conflict to Appeasement. At the end of the 19th c., wary of the Roman Catholic Church, the Third Republic secularized* hospitals (1879) and teacher training (1880), required seminarians to do military service (1889), and under the leadership of Jules Ferry, created an obligatory, free, secular public school system (1879–82) removed from Catholic influence. Delayed by the “Ralliement” of Catholics to the Republic recommended by Leo XIII (1892), the struggle between church and state culminated in the dissolution of religious congregations (1903), the termination of the Concordat* of 1801, the rupture of diplomatic relations with Rome (1904), and especially the strict law of separation of church and state (1905): “The Republic does not recognize, employ, or subsidize any religion.”

After the “sacred union” during World War I (25,000 priests were drafted for wartime service), church–state relations became less conflicted with the canonization of Joan* of Arc (1920), the resumption of diplomatic relations with the Holy See* (1921), the return of the exiled religious orders, and the preservation of the 1801 Concordat in Alsace-Lorraine. According to the 1905 laws, the municipal governments owned the local churches, while the national government owned the cathedrals. The separation of church and state thus turned out to be financially helpful for the Catholic Church, as public funds covered the upkeep of churches built before 1905. In 1940 religious orders returned to teaching, and laws passed in 1951, 1959, and 1977 granted public subsidies to Catholic education. In 1984, under pressure from public opinion, the Socialist government of François Mitterrand abandoned plans to nationalize Catholic schools, which have since attained parity with public schools and currently educate 20% of France’s students. Catholics such as Robert Schuman were active in politics, and the calmer political climate allowed the Church to invest more energy in pastoral activities and theology.

Vitality Despite Hardship. During the years of intense conflict (late 19th–early 20th c.), the Catholic Church of France proved to be very creative in maintaining relations with the French members of religious orders in exile. Dominican priest M. J. Lagrange (1855–1938) founded the École Biblique et Archéologique de Jérusalem and the Revue biblique. Both provided important support for biblical studies from the start of the Modernist* crisis. Ambroise Gardeil (1859–1931) earned, with his Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques (1907), recognition for the Saulchoir, Dominican Pontifical Faculties, Belgium, which included other influential theologians, such as Marie-Dominique Chenu (1904–90), who restored a historical dimension to Thomism, and Yves Congar (1904–95), who revitalized ecclesiology (Unam Sanctam series) and was a pioneer of Catholic ecumenism. During their exile in England or Belgium, the Jesuits founded the Recherches de sciences religieuses (1910, Léonce de Grandmaison, first editor). Two diocesan priests, Alfred Vacant and Eugène Mangenot, had launched in 1903 the Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. At the same time, a philosophical and literary renewal flourished with the involvement of such lay Catholic intellectuals as Charles Péguy, Paul Claudel, Blondel*, Maritain*, Étienne Gilson, François Mauriac, Georges Bernanos, and Emmanuel Mounier (founder of the review Esprit), while Henri Bremond made classical spirituality accessible to a wider public.

Creativity and the Second Vatican Council (1940–70). The defeat of France during World War II reinitiated renewal within the Roman Catholic Church. Louis Joseph Lebreton, OP, started (1940) the society Économie et Humanisme. The Jesuits Henri de Lubac and Jean Daniélou established (1942) the Sources chrétiennes series (more than 500 volumes) at the Dominican publishing house, Le Cerf; this series was an expression of the renewal of patristic theology. The creation (1943) of the Centre de Pastorale Liturgique formalized liturgical renewal, while two Dominican priests, Pie-Raymond Regamey and Marie-Alain Couturier, directed the review

Art sacré, and artists and architects began working for the Church again. Two priests, Henry Godin and Yvan Daniel, published France pays de mission? (1943), a work that inspired the Worker*-Priest Movement. After the Liberation, the ecumenical group Les Dombes, founded (1937) by Abbé Couturier, went public and took up the same ministry as the Dominican center Istina (established in 1925, publishing the journal Istina since 1954). Important spiritual currents included those of Thérèse* de Lisieux, Charles de* Foucauld, and Teilhard* de Chardin, SJ. The Jesuits supervised the publication of the Dictionnaire de spiritualité, and the worldwide influence of Lourdes* continued.

In the 1950 encyclical Humani Generis, Rome expressed concern about the “nouvelle théologie” that seemed to have abandoned neo-Thomism. Jesuit representatives (Fourvière School) and later Dominicans (in 1954, during the worker-priest crisis) were banned from teaching. John* XXIII did, however, restore their reputations by naming them experts at Vatican* II, where the cardinals Daniélou, de Lubac, and Congar were influential. In 1964 Paul* VI publicly honored French theology, stating that it “bakes the intellectual bread of Christendom.”

The post-Vatican II era was difficult. Following the encyclicals Sacerdotalis Caelibatus (1967), which reaffirmed celibacy for priests, and Humanae Vitae (1968), which prohibited the use of artificial contraception*, many young people drifted away from ministry and religious practice. The public saw these decisions as regressive in light of Vatican II. A small minority of Catholics led by Msgr. Lefebvre, former apostolic delegate in Dakar, refused to accept the Vatican II reforms, resulting in a schism.

The Pontificate of John Paul II: Grappling with Cultural Change. The late 20th c. was characterized by an unprecedented desertion of institutionalized forms of Catholic life. Lay movements (Action Catholique) were in decline after 1970. From 1975 to 2000, the number of Catholic religious marriages diminished by half (now only 32.5% of the marriages in France) and the number of Catholic baptisms diminished by a third (now only 39.5% of children are baptized, although the number of adult baptisms is growing). In a country where 80% of the population is nominally Catholic, only 50% of children attend catechism classes (in Paris, from 1990 to 2001, the number dropped from 34 to 28%). Attendance at Sunday Mass fell to an average of 8%. The clergy and religious orders can no longer fill their ranks. In 1970 there were 92,000 religious sisters active as “feminine clergy” in daily life (parishes, schools, hospitals, and catechesis). In 2000 only 3,000 of them were less than 50 years old. During the same period, the number of priests decreased by half, and their average age was 70. For the past 20 years, on average, one priest has been ordained per diocese per year (five or six in Paris; one for every 10,000 Catholics). The number of Dominicans decreased by 50% in 50 years, while that of Jesuits decreased by 80%. Some religious orders are, however, actively engaged in publishing books (Dominicans) and journals and newspapers (Assumptionists).

The decline has led to some reforms: reorganization of parishes; promotion of the permanent diaconate and lay ministry (often feminine); development of synods; modest growth of Charismatic groups; and new religious communities. Yet creative innovations that can stand up to the serious cultural challenges are still lacking. Theological work informed by ecumenism and concerned about interreligious dialogue continues. Cardinal Lustiger (1926–2007) brought Jews and Christians closer together. Although the dialogue between theology and the humanities (sociology, psychoanalysis, linguistics) continues, the most recent trends are concerned with phenomenology and hermeneutics (Dictionnaire de théologie critique, 2002).

Academic theology rarely reaches the Catholic faithful. The teaching they receive seems either too attached to the past (e.g. the Catholic teaching about “woman”) or too far from the gospel (e.g. regarding divorced and remarried Catholics or the obligation of priestly celibacy). Church teaching also seems unable to take medical progress into account in the areas of reproduction (contraception and assisted reproductive technology) and the end of life, as if biological laws were the immediate expression of the will of God the Creator. The Catholic Church's suspicion of legislators who work in this domain has led the faithful to hope for a more sophisticated articulation of the gospel, ethics, and civil law.

The Catholic Church is searching for new forms of inculturation* of Christian belief in daily life. Without it, secularization* will continue to advance, and a sociologist (Hervieu-Léger, 2003) has already diagnosed an "exculturation" of Catholicism. The long pontificate of John* Paul II did not or could not slow down the process of secularization, despite reinforced Roman centralization and eight visits to a country where he appointed all of the bishops. The media's interest in this pope did not prevent 70% of the French people polled during his 1996 visit from expressing doubt that he had the right answers to today's questions. His refusal to compromise with contemporary culture did, however, gain him some support. In the early 21st c., the Catholic Church in France shared the common lot of Western European churches. Whether they were Catholic, Protestant, Anglican, supported or not by governments, centralized or nationally autonomous, prescriptive or liberal, all were having difficulty evangelizing. At a time when opinion polls indicated that the youngest generations have more interest in religiosity than previous ones, the Catholic bishops' pastoral letter, Proposer la foi dans la société actuelle (1999), presented the new image that the traditional Church has of this country's future. See also FRANCE; SECULARISM AND SECULARIZATION.

HERVÉ LEGRAND

Roman Catholicism in Europe: Germany and Lutheranism. The papal bull Decet Romanum Pontificem (1521), which excommunicated Martin Luther* and his followers, marked the breakup of unity within the Western Church and gave rise to denominationalism: the Roman Catholic, Lutheran, Anglican, and Reformed churches, and the Radical* Reformation churches/communities. However, in Germany, the Roman Catholic and Lutheran Churches remained dominant.

The Roman Catholic Church did not accept the serious theological criticism of the late medieval church voiced by the Wittenberg Reformers. Following the humanists' "back to the sources" program, the Reformers rediscovered the importance of Scripture*, the Word of God, as the only regula fidei* of the church; they honored the dogmatic and ecclesial traditions of the ancient church as true interpretations of Scripture and rejected the medieval additions regarding salvation as superfluous and harmful. The central idea of Luther's theology is a new but biblical understanding of justification* by faith alone and its implications for understanding the sacraments*, the church*, and its constitution. Luther's opponents, especially Johann Eck and Johannes Cochlaeus, defended the inherited organization of the Roman Catholic Church with its late medieval features (e.g. purgatory*, indulgences*, veneration of the saints*, vows*, pilgrimages*). Often with a mixture of misunderstanding and hatred, they rejected Luther's theological convictions, precluding any agreement between Reformers and the Catholic Church, although it could have been achieved at the Diet of Augsburg (1530) or at Hagenau, Worms, and Regensburg (1540–41).

The first biography of Luther, written by Cochlaeus (1549), presented a distorted image of Luther and his theology that deeply influenced the Roman Catholic Church and its theology for more than 400 years (as Herte shows). Ignaz von Döllinger (1799–1890), the most famous Catholic theologian of his time, exemplified this attitude, although he achieved a more positive understanding of Luther after his own excommunication (1872). Heinrich Denifle and Hartmut Grisar (early 20th c.) still followed Cochlaeus's judgment – Denifle, in attacking Luther's understanding of justification as the source of all evil in modern times; Grisar, in making psychological-pathological statements against Luther.

The church historian Sebastian Merkle laid the foundations for serious Catholic research on Luther by seeking to exercise justice in historical research, without prejudice. A breakthrough came with Joseph Lortz's historical and theological research regarding justification (1939–40). For him "Luther fought against a Catholic thinking that was not Catholic." Followed by his students, Erwin Iserloh and Peter Manns, Lortz strove to distinguish the "Catholic" from "the (heretical) Protestant" in Luther's theology. After Vatican* II, Heinrich Fries's school (Otto Hermann Pesch, Johannes Brosseder, and, in the USA, Harry McSorley) abandoned this approach; for them Luther's theology as a whole was a challenge to the Roman Catholic Church and its theology. Thus for Pesch, Luther's theology was new (and remains new for the Catholic Church so long as it does not address the questions raised by Luther), but not so new that a Catholic theologian would not be able to follow Luther's thinking. Nevertheless (in the 1960s–1980s), some (Paul Hacker, Theobald Beer, Remigius Bäumer) continued to adhere to Cochlaeus's prejudices.

After World War II and Vatican II, Catholic and Lutheran theologians in Germany (the "Jäger-Stählin Kreis," now the "Ökumenischer Arbeitskreis") began a serious ecumenical dialogue leading to a remarkable consensus about formerly controversial subjects. The German Bishops' Conference and the Bishops of the United Lutheran Church in Germany founded a bilateral working group and published two important documents (Kirchengemeinschaft in Wort und Sakrament, 1984; Sanctorum Communio, 2000). Another ecumenical document (1986) asks, "The Condemnations of the Reformation Era: Do They Still divide?" The answer was and is: no longer. Indeed, the Catholic Church and Lutheran churches worldwide signed the Joint Declaration on Justification (Augsburg, 1999), the first official document since the Reformation signed by both.

JOHANNES BROSEDER

Roman Catholicism in Europe: Italy.
The history of the Roman Catholic Church in Italy* since the beginning of the Christian Era is almost identical with the history of Christianity in the peninsula south of the Alps (see Italy). But one should not necessarily call this church "Italian."

After the early evangelization, marked by the martyrdom in Rome of the apostles Peter* and Paul*, the conquest of Rome by the Visigoths of Alaric (410; see Goths) constituted a turning point. Rome became the center of Latin culture and assumed for the Christian faith a normative role analogous to the earlier role of Jerusalem. In contrast to the Christian Arian* Visigoths (viewed as "barbarian" invaders), the "true" Christian Church represented and defended the Roman–Latin cultural and social order.

By the 5th c., the evangelization of the countryside led to the establishment of numerous Christian communities, yet without any sense of church unity in a region without national unity. For example, the Episcopal Sees of Milan, Aquileia, and Ravenna had to contend not only with the Episcopal See of Rome but also with the political authority dominating their respective regions. Conversely, events in the Italian Church often had a significance that was more "universal" than "Italian" – e.g. the pastoral experience of Ambrose* of Milan (c338–97) and of Charles Borromeo* (1538–84), the monastic* movement originating with Benedict* of Nursia (c480–c555), and the evangelical witness of Francis* of Assisi (c1182–1226).

The accumulation of landholdings that became a territorial dominion of the Roman Church and its bishop from the 8th c. had a considerable impact on the Italian Church. The actions and programmatic decisions of the Roman Church closely reflected the concern to preserve and expand the temporal power of the Church. The solemn imperial coronation of Charlemagne* (800) revived the ecclesiastical authorities' demand that civil and political authorities be more subordinated to the power of the Sovereign (God, represented by the Church).

In feudal* medieval Italy, dioceses and monasteries constituted the framework of society. In each city, the highest authority was the bishop, who often had the function and title of prince-bishop. The importance of episcopal authority was matched by that of the cathedral chapters*, which claimed for themselves the authority to elect the bishops. This fragmentation of the Italian Church included the founding of “private churches” by important families that established monasteries or churches and retained perpetual control over them.

During the Middle Ages, the bishops were recruited from aristocratic ranks, while the numerous clergy struggled to find minimal living resources and often had very limited education. The central problems of the Italian churches were related to the clergy’s simony* and concubinage*. The reform, promoted by monks, emphasized the distinction between laity and clergy. Italian Christianity gave rise to the Lay* Piety Movement – including religious revivals (e.g. the Alleluia movement, 1233) and the Flagellants of Northern Italy (who from 1260 called the populace to repent) – the reverberations of which were felt way beyond the peninsula, as were those of the Concordantia discordantium canonum (by Gratian*, in Bologna, 12th c.), the nucleus of canon* law, and the Franciscan* movement. Likewise, the Italian bishops had a decisive role at the Council of Trent* (1545–63), which had a similar universal impact.

It is only with the second millennium and the end of the Byzantine presence in the peninsula that Rome and its church progressively gained a major role in all the Italian dioceses. In the 13th c., Italian replaced Latin as the common language of the Italian churches, although the liturgy remained in Latin until Vatican* II. Anti-intellectualism and anticlericalism, based on a biblical literalism and an active concern with poverty*, were the main features of the movements (including that of the Waldenses*) that the Italian Church condemned as heretical*. But Lutheranism and Protestantism did not have a significant impact on the Italian Roman Catholic Church.

With the political unity of the peninsula, the Italian Church began to move toward independence, a process of unification complicated by the great number of its dioceses (about 300). Its primary distinctive feature remained, at least until Vatican* II, its relation to the Roman papacy. The Italian Church’s vocation was to defend the papacy. This vocation was amplified by Pius IX’s decision (1874) that Italian Catholics should abstain from participation in Italian political life as a protest against the government’s “conquest” of Rome. Romolo Murri’s (1870–1944) attempt to bridge the separation of Catholics from Italian political, economic, and social life (a movement that led to the creation of “Christian Democracy”) was met by reaction and repression by the Vatican and resulted in a climate of suspicion within the Italian Church, owing to the constant fear of being denounced. This political conflict engendered the 1871 state law that abolished the faculties of theology in Italian public universities, which had the positive effect of facilitating the development of seminaries for the education of the clergy. Yet these seminaries were under the control of the Holy See, since the Italian Conference of Bishops did not yet exist.

Because of its fear of communism, the Church adopted a positive attitude toward fascism (1922–45) and in the process obtained recognition of the State of the Vatican (1929). After the end of the fascist dictatorship (1945), the Church supported the Christian Democratic Party.

The convocation of the Second Vatican* Council (1959) challenged the views of the large majority of the clergy and the Italian bishops’ passive dependence on Rome. Contact with other churches highlighted the limitations of many features of the life of the Italian Church, while the liturgical reforms – above all, the use of the vernacular – became an occasion for involving all the “people of God” (the laity*) in the life of the Roman Catholic Church.

The election of a non-Italian pope (1978) (the first in four centuries) opened a new phase in the history of the Italian Church. With a pope much less involved in Italian affairs, Italian “movements” (the Focolare*, Communion and Liberation, Sant’ Egidio) played a positive role. The fact that diocesan synods were held in every region demonstrated the revival that Vatican II had introduced in the Italian Church. The recently created Italian Conference of Bishops (Conferenza Episcopale Italiana), presided over by a bishop named by the pope rather than by a bishop elected by the Conference, can focus its attention on the problems the Italian Roman Catholic Church faces in a secularized* Italy. See also ITALY.

GIUSEPPE ALBERIGO

Roman Catholicism in Europe: Portugal.

Ecclesiastical administration is based on 20 dioceses organized into 3 archdioceses (Braga, Évora, and Lisbon, the latter made a patriarchate in the 18th c.). The Portuguese Episcopal Conference was set up (1967) in the wake of Vatican* II. Chaplains to the armed and security forces have their own bishop, and Opus* Dei has eight centers. As of 2003, there were 4,358 parishes served by 3,029 diocesan clergy. The number of those attending seminaries is declining (to 471 in 2003), with the deaths of every two priests matched by only one ordination. The number of those baptized and married in the Church has also declined. Although 91.5% of the population was nominally Roman Catholic in 2003, a church census in 2001 found that only 18.7% were observant. Religious practice has been and is stronger in the north and the islands (Azores and Madeira) than the south and among women than men. In 2004 there were 1,375 resident male religious and 5,919 female religious. In the same year, there were 39,161 pupils in independent Catholic schools. The vast majority of religion and morality classes in state schools are provided by Catholics. The multi-campus Portuguese Catholic University (UCP) was created in 1967. Misericórdias (lay charitable brotherhoods, from 1498) still play a role in health and social services, caring particularly for the young and the aged. About 75% of religious time on television is allocated to the Catholic Church, which owns the popular Rádio Renascença, broadcasting since 1936, and briefly owned a television channel in the 1990s. Seven of the 16 national holidays are Catholic holy days. Well over 1,000 traditional local festivals, processions, and pilgrimages* are still celebrated; among the most prominent is St. Antony's Eve in Lisbon. These events reflect a mixture of unorthodox and traditional influences.

Sameiro, near Braga in the north, was overtaken as the prime national pilgrimage center in the 1930s by Fátima*, in central Portugal, where the Virgin is said to have appeared to three children in 1917 on six occasions. Fátima soon became an international pilgrimage destination, with hundreds of thousands visiting each year. During the cold war, the anti-Communist significance of the veneration of Our Lady of Fátima was enhanced, and the site was visited by Pope Paul VI and notably by Pope John Paul II, who had a particular affection for Our Lady of Fátima. While the Catholic Church remains an influence in Portuguese national life, its opposition to legislation on abortion* since the 1980s has been unsuccessful. See also PORTUGAL.

RICHARD A. H. ROBINSON

Roman Catholicism in Europe: Spain.

Ecclesiastical administration is based on 14 archdioceses and 51 dioceses. In 2000, parishes numbered 22,964, although nearly one-half lacked a resident parish priest. The number of diocesan priests, 19,825, is less impressive than it would appear to be because 41% were retired. The number of male religious was 8,700; the number of nuns, 58,406. Approximately 1,300,000 students were enrolled in 5,197 Roman Catholic schools. The number of Catholic associations, which were engaged in a wide range of activities, was 11,887.

Until the dramatic changes that followed the end of the Franco dictatorship (1975), Catholicism was the state religion. The Church received official financial support and enjoyed other privileges. The democratic Constitution of 1978 declared that the state had no official religion, but according to the terms of four diplomatic agreements with the Vatican between 1976 and 1979, the government continued to provide limited financial support for clerical salaries. It also subsidized the Church's schools. These arrangements were accepted later by successive Socialist governments, although with certain modifications.

The Church's gradual disengagement from the Franco regime between 1960 and 1975 proved divisive and controversial. The apparent consensus that once had supported the interdependence of church and state began to disintegrate. The directives of the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65) on religious liberty and the right of political communities to determine their own future sent shock waves through the Spanish Church. During the 1960s and early 1970s, a wave of protest swept through the clerical ranks. Some priests were motivated by support for regional autonomy (Catalonia and the Basque Provinces), others by a sense of social justice*, and still others by a concern with human* rights.

From a religious perspective, Vatican II stimulated, perhaps unintentionally, a surge in theological debate. Liberation* theology arrived from Latin America. The ideas of liberal European Catholic theologians, such as Hans Küng, received an enthusiastic reception in a rapidly growing number of theological faculties (in universities) that had reached 39 by 1980. The intensity of theological studies should be kept in perspective, for it corresponded to a crisis within the ranks of the clergy that produced a significant decline in the number of priests and seminarians.

In the decade following Vatican II, a "parallel church" made its appearance among Roman Catholics. It did not form a coherent or unified movement, but offered alternatives to traditional models of evangelization. The Popular Christian Communities followed the model of Liberation theology. Christians for Socialism (since 1973) caused controversy by asserting that socialism and Christianity were fully compatible. The "Neocatechumens" (since 1966) attempted to follow the example of the early church in evangelizing campaigns, and the Popular Charismatic* Communities (since 1973) offered a Roman Catholic version of Pentecostalism*. The activities of these groups often distressed the hierarchy. But it is important to note that the "parallel church" enlisted only a small minority of the faithful, an estimated 200,000 members in 1982.

The age of religious effervescence and optimism characteristic of the 10 or 15 years that followed Vatican II could not be sustained. There were clear signs by the early 1980s that it had run its course. Diocesan bishops, many of whom were less than enthusiastic about what they saw as excessive theological restlessness and the bold criticism of some in the "parallel church," began to assert firmer control over expressions of dissent. Pope John Paul II, elected in 1978, appointed bishops who could be relied on to maintain effective control over clergy and laity* (see Opus Dei). Voices of dissent have not disappeared by any means, but they have become less influential among the faithful.

WILLIAM J. CALLAHAN

Roman Catholicism in Europe: United Kingdom.

From the 16th to the 18th c., following the Reformation, Roman Catholics became a small minority, known as recusants*, who were deprived of civil privileges by penal laws, sometimes actively persecuted and suspected of treachery. Nevertheless, significant communities survived, especially in areas where Catholic noble families gave some protection, notably in the remote parts of the north of England and in the highlands and islands of Scotland. The Roman Catholic Church was led by vicars apostolic, holding episcopal status but without territorial sees.

In the late 18th c., the penal laws began to be relaxed; in 1829 the Catholic Emancipation conceded the right of Catholics to sit in Parliament. By this time, the number of Catholics was growing steadily: in England from c80,000 in 1770 to c750,000 in 1850; in Scotland from c30,000 in 1760 to c325,000 in 1878. The increase was attributable largely to immigration from Ireland*, especially during the famine years of the 1840s, but there was also significant growth in the indigenous English and Scottish Catholic communities. The restoration of episcopal hierarchies – England, 1850; Scotland, 1878 – gave the Roman Catholic Church in Britain a formal institutional identity, which was strengthened by the building of cathedrals and the expansion of monasteries and nunneries.

The Catholic population continued to grow substantially in the late 19th and early 20th c., and by 1950 amounted to an estimated 2.75 million in England and Wales and 745,000 in Scotland. It remained somewhat insulated from the mainstream of national life. The Church was run by a conservative hierarchy, and a strong commitment to education secured its influence on successive generations. It was exposed to continuing Protestant antagonism, especially in Scotland and Lancashire.

After 1962 the changes brought by the Second Vatican* Council were enthusiastically embraced, although in 1968 Pope Paul* VI's condemnation of artificial contraception* dismayed many British Catholics. The spiritual and sexual transitions in the English Catholic Church of the 1950s and 1960s were brilliantly evoked by David Lodge in his novel How Far Can You Go? (1980). Although the visit of Pope John* Paul II (1982) gave a short-term boost to morale, the last quarter of the century saw a serious decline in Catholic observance. Paradoxically, though, as the Church's grassroots situation weakened, it secured greater integration into the mainstream of British Christianity and increased social and cultural acceptability.

JOHN WOLFFE

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Argentina.

The largest church in Argentina, the Roman Catholic Church has 68 ecclesiastical districts organized in archdioceses, dioceses, and other prelatures. From the 1930s, Catholicism adopted an Integrist* perspective, with various anti-Modernist* stances and an active presence in the public domain with the goal of Christianizing society and the state. Catholic* Action (established in 1931) was a decisive factor in the growth of the Catholic Movement and its social advance.

The growth of the Catholic Church also reflected the establishment of powerful ties with the Holy See. The Church's quest for autonomy from the state did not interfere with the development of a Rome-centered church that provided internal cohesion and discipline. Thus the Catholic Church in Argentina is one of the most "Italianized" churches in the Americas.

The establishment of religious* orders was an essential part of the "Romanization" process. Among them, the Salesian order is preeminent. Since their arrival in the country (c1875), the Salesians, working closely with the government and the army, have succeeded in establishing many schools, hospitals, and presses.

"Romanization" included a struggle against liberalism and communism in an Argentine context where the state promoted a vision of laicism* (in the sense of anticlericalism), economic and social progress, and reason (associated with the development of an intellectual middle class). Until 1930 Catholicism was on the defensive, seeking accommodation with the liberal state. But since the 1930s, the Integrist* model of Argentine Catholicism was consolidated through close relations between the Church and the army. Catholicism began to act as the provider of national identity.

Urbanization following the crisis of 1930 reinforced the importance of the presence of the newcomers in Buenos Aires. Institutionalized Catholicism was ready to receive them and to help them become integrated in the life of the city. Catholicism occupied the public domain; thus it could gather more than 1 million persons for the International Eucharistic Congress in Buenos Aires (1934).

Then the Church sought to "re-Catholicize" the state and society by establishing ties with the different military governments, as well as with the popular Peronist Movement. Mandatory religious teaching was restored in public schools (1943); social rights were emphasized; and the state controlled non-Catholic religious groups.

Under the influence of the Second Vatican* Council and as a result of political events in the country, reforms were initiated (mid-1960s), including sociocultural, liturgical, and political renewals in large segments of Argentine Catholicism. The rise of the Movement of Priests for the Third World contributed to tensions and conflicts both within and between ecclesiastical and political spheres. The expulsion of 40 priests by the bishop of Rosario, because they disagreed with the Integrist episcopal authority, illustrates the tensions within the Church. Examples of the changing relations and tensions between the Church and state include the Church's fight against the law permitting divorce during the government of Raúl Alfonsín (1983–89), the Church's cooperation with the government of Carlos Menem (1989–99) in defense of the "rights of the unborn" and on sociopolitical issues, and the Church's distance from the government of Néstor Carlos Kirchner (2003–7).

Central Catholic practices include massive annual pilgrimages* to the shrines of the Virgin of Lujan, the Virgin of San Nicolas, and the Virgin of San Cayetano in Buenos Aires, where the unemployed pray for work. Popular* religiosity of this kind is very important for Catholics in Argentina. Social work organized by Caritas and nongovernmental organizations related to the Catholic Church includes the distribution of food and a large number of social programs for the poor*. See also ARGENTINA; CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS: IN LATIN AMERICA: ARGENTINA.

DAMIÁN SETTON

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Brazil: Colonial Period (1500–1822).

Brazilian colonial Roman Catholicism started taking shape during the 16th and 17th c. through the activities of missionaries and Catholic settlers in the context of the system of royal patronage (Padroado* Régio). Brazilian Catholicism became well defined in the 18th c. when the Brazilian colony underwent a massive geographic transformation in its central southern region, with the discovery of gold in the present-day states of Minas Gerais, Goiás, and Mato Grosso. Gold-mining towns, with strong economic, social, and religious characteristics, were the setting of highly visible confraternities typical of the 18th and 19th c. There was also a territorial expansion of the colony in Northern Pará. Within this context, two movements defined Catholicism: one linked to the Church as an institution and another reflecting lay religious practices.

The institutional movement was marked by the reaffirmation of the Church as an institution that defined and demanded the implementation of a code of standards, known as the First Constitutions of the Archdiocese of Bahia (1707; first printed in 1720). The Constitutions were designed to normalize the sacramental and canonical practices of the Church according to the Council of Trent*. This institutional movement was evident in the creation of new dioceses (Mariana and São Paulo) and parishes and in the establishment of control mechanisms, including pastoral visits, as a reaction to the changes taking place in the colony. Yet a shortage of priests made these pastoral visits relatively rare in many places, and thus the effect of Trent on most lay Catholics was often minimal.

The second movement, popular* Catholicism (see Popular Christian Practices Cluster: In Latin America: Brazil), was distinguished by the religious practices of laypeople, including illiterate people and slaves*, in the everyday life of the colonial Church. These laypeople were in charge of organizing, funding, and often leading the processions and festivities in honor of Our Lady and the patron saints*. Laypeople were also responsible for the construction of chapels, churches, and sanctuaries, over which they kept control. Hermits, members of brotherhoods, and sextons acted as respected religious leaders in many towns, in the absence of clergy and regardless of the presence of members of the Church hierarchy. This lay movement introduced many popular Catholic practices (processions, devotions to the Virgin Mary*), including the reaffirmation of popular devotions of Portuguese origin, such as those of Bom Jesus (Good Jesus) and Our Lady, which incorporated Brazilian popular features, especially during local festivals such as those of Nossa Senhora de Aparecida (who became the patroness of Brazil), Bom Jesus da Lapa, and Círio de Nazaré.

FERNANDO TORRES-LONDOÑO

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Brazil: Imperial Period (1822–89).

This was a time of consolidation of the Roman Catholic Church throughout Brazilian society. After the political emancipation (1822) and the accession to the throne of a sovereign of Portuguese origin, the royal patronage (Padroado* Régio) continued. Conversely, a clerical elite was actively engaged in the politics of the First Empire (1822–31) and the Regency (1831–40) in the sphere of religious affairs and also occupied high political positions; e.g. Fr. Diogo Antônio Feijó (1784–1843) was regent of the Empire (1835–37) during the minority of Emperor Pedro II.

Around 1840 the Ultramontanist* Catholic tradition (emphasizing the centralization of the Church, giving preeminence to Rome) gained political importance. Ultramontanists followed the Council of Trent*, zealously training the clergy, evangelizing the faithful, and reforming religious practices as directed by the Holy See in Rome. They “Romanized” the Brazilian Church; e.g. Romualdo de Sousa Coelho, bishop of Pará (1819–41), and Romualdo Antônio de Seixas, bishop of Bahia (1827–60), were deeply committed to training priests and sent them to study in Europe. Leaders of Ultramontane theological thought, such as bishops Antônio Ferreira Viçoso (Mariana, 1844–75) and Antônio Joaquim de Melo (São Paulo, 1851–61), reformed the clergy (confining their activity to the realm of religious affairs) and supported the union of church and state. At the same time, they affirmed the autonomy of the clergy regarding religious affairs and the absolute authority of the pope, and promoted devotions to the saints* as Church practices (resisting the excessive role of lay fraternities in such devotions). Ultramontanists were supported by Lazarist priests (founded by Vincent* de Paul to champion the Catholic* Renewal) dedicated to the education of clergy and laypeople.

Following the anti-liberal movement launched by the encyclical Quanta Cura and the Syllabus* of Errors (1864), which rejected Modernist* ideologies such as rationalism and naturalism, and especially the foundations of liberalism (e.g. freedom of worship, secularized education, church– state separation, civil marriage), the Ultramontanists criticized imperial authorities for their lukewarm support of the training of priests and of religious education, and especially for their lax attitude toward lay fraternities. This led to a direct clash regarding the “religious issue” (1872–75), which involved the imprisonment of two bishops, Antônio de Macedo Costa (of Pará) and Vital Maria Gonçalves de Oliveira (of Olinda), who, following Vatican directives, imposed canonical penalties on members of lay brotherhoods and Third* Orders who participated in Masonic lodges, although the emperor himself was a Freemason*. Despite its distancing from the declining Empire, amplified by other factors such as the abolition of slavery* (1888), the Brazilian Roman Catholic Church continued to support and legitimize the established order. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: BRAZIL.

CÉSAR AUGUSTO ORNELLAS RAMOS

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Brazil: Period of the Republic (from 1889).

When the Republic was proclaimed (1889), the interim government established the separation of church* and state and ended the Padroado* Régio (system of royal patronage). The Brazilian bishops reacted by publishing the 1890 collective “Pastoral Letter.” Nevertheless, the republican Constitution of 1891 ended the privileges historically granted to the Roman Catholic Church, and the laicization* of institutions (including education*) began. Yet the Church maintained a policy of collaboration with the republican government, seeking rapprochement. In order to strengthen its religious influence on society, especially after 1920, the Catholic Church maintained a strong presence in the press, with Catholic intellectuals intervening regularly in public questions; held large faith demonstrations (eucharistic* congresses); proclaimed Our Lady of Aparecida the patron saint* of Brazil (1930); and inaugurated the statue of Cristo Redentor (Christ the Redeemer) in Rio de Janeiro (1931).

These and many other interventions were led by Sebastião Leme* Cintra, archbishop of Rio de Janeiro; Alceu Amoroso Lima*, an intellectual layman; and the laypeople involved in the Brazilian Catholic* Action.

The 1929 crisis followed by the 1930 civil and military coup that brought Getúlio Vargas to the presidency created an unstable atmosphere. To achieve legitimation and stability, the state approached the Church for help in maintaining order. The Catholic hierarchy used the situation to push the Church's agenda. An implicit alliance between the Church and the state was established (and lasted until 1945) in the "new state" led by the president-dictator Vargas and Archbishop Leme.

With redemocratization in post-Vargas Brazil (1945–64), the Church changed course. The National Conference of Bishops of Brazil (CNBB, created in 1952; see the present cluster: In Latin America: Brazil: Two Pastoral Initiatives of the National Conference of Brazilian Bishops) initiated a pastoral action focused on social and political problems. During the governments of Juscelino Kubitschek (1956–61), Jânio Quadros, and João Goulart (1961–64), the CNBB led the Church to cooperate with the government by mobilizing people to support Brazilian social reform projects, such as the Movement of Basic Education. Workers, peasants, and students were mobilized to address injustices in their respective spheres of society.

But when a military coup installed an authoritarian government (1964), the Church hierarchy was divided. More conservative members of the CNBB, fearing the progress of Communism in the country, sided with the government; others were concerned by the dangers represented by an anti-democratic regime and did not want to give up the social reform process they had launched. The government violently repressed any opposition, imprisoning and torturing both clergy and laity. After the 1968 promulgation of a law reinforcing military dictatorial powers, the Church withdrew its support of the government. Several bishops (including Candido Padim, Hélder Câmara*, Paulo Evaristo Arns*, and Waldir Calheiros) and many laypeople defended human* rights and the poor*, even as social-political organizations were forbidden, and assumed the prophetic role of being the "voice of those who had no voice" and of actively participating in the struggle for the redemocratization of the country. The Base* Ecclesial Communities (Comunidades Eclesiais de Base) became the privileged space for the Church's pastoral actions in pursuit of social justice* in urban and rural areas.

Since the restoration of democracy (1988), changes in the directives from the Roman Curia and in the leadership of the CNBB have shifted the attention of the Brazilian Church toward ecclesial issues. See also BRAZIL. BEATRIZ DE VASCONCELLOS DIAS

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Brazil: Two Pastoral Initiatives of the National Conference of Bishops of Brazil (CNBB). The CNBB, founded in 1952 in Rio de Janeiro, was viewed by Dom Helder Câmara*, one of its foremost protagonists, as necessary for facilitating communication among Brazilian bishops, overcoming their individualistic behavior, and creating a holistic structure for pastoral services beyond parishes.

In the prophetic* tradition of the Bible, of Jesus' ministry and his proclamation of the Kingdom* of God, and of the Church, the CNBB was created in response to the bishops' deep concern with social issues in Northeast Brazil and to a national Catholic lay organization, the Catholic* Action, which promoted the people's engagement in the struggle for social reforms. The strong support of these two movements by priests, members of religious* orders, and laypeople, together with the new openness of the Church brought about by the Second Vatican* Council, prepared the way for the work of the CNBB. Even though from 1964 the leadership of CNBB was assumed by conservative bishops unwilling to overtly oppose the military coup, in the 1970s changes within the CNBB and growing repression by the military government led the CNBB to take publicly the side of the various sectors of the Brazilian society that were struggling against the regime in the pursuit of human* rights. During the 1960s and 1970s, the CNBB pursued two pastoral initiatives:

1. The Campaign of Fraternity sought to raise the political consciousness of the entire Brazilian population (and not merely of Catholics) through a series of widely publicized activities focused on annual topics chosen by the CNBB following recommendations by regional representatives of the Church. The actions of the Campaign of Fraternity were initially driven (1964–72) by a quest for the internal renovation of the Church and its individual members; in 1973, however, the Campaign turned to social issues. With a prophetic undertone criticizing the social situation, it promoted a critical assessment by the entire population of the grave problems that plague contemporary Brazilian society.
2. Social pastoral ministries are another expression of the prophetic efforts of the Catholic Church in Brazil. They help the Catholic Church and its members to deal effectively with social problems by increasing their understanding of the structural causes of social problems and empowering them through the development of political consciousness.

See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER; IN LATIN AMERICA: BRAZIL; LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER; PREFERENTIAL OPTION FOR THE POOR. WAGNER LOPES SANCHEZ

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Brazilian New Movements. Initiated in the second half of the 1980s following John* Paul II's project of "New Evangelization," these new Catholic movements are of three types.

The first type has opted for communitarian life, following a spirituality model concerned primarily with conversion* and the refounding of the Christian community. Laypersons predominate in the leadership and the organization of communities, which favor various forms of participatory liturgy and liturgical leadership, as transparent manifestations of the "communion* of saints." The religious authorities, who officially approve these communities, intervene as little as possible, if at all, in their administration. This is not because of tensions between communities and religious authorities. Rather than expecting guidance from authorities, laypeople work together to develop the communities by sharing a vision of what the communities should be. These groups can be defined as ecclesiolae in ecclesia (little churches within the Church). In Brazil, some examples of such Catholic communities are Canção Nova (New Song), Shalom Community, and Neocatechumenate.

The second type of movement follows an Integrist* model. It either advocates a return to medieval Christianity or conceives of Catholicism as a historical project aimed at total control of the Church community and society, a totalizing project viewed as an authentic and accurate expression of the gospel. This demands that Christians pledge themselves to obtaining, holding on to, and defending political power, ideally in the form of a monarchic regime, because such political power is an indispensable instrument for the realization of the gospel by bringing about the Kingdom* of God. The principal groups in this movement are University Front Lepanto, Tradition, Family and Property, and the Heralds of the Gospel.

The third, relatively recent type of movement can be called reformist. The reform of the world is its primary concern. It seeks to focus on the classical issues and concerns of both Integrism and social Catholicism. Its goal is to enlist, select, and shape the economic and political leadership (from intermediate social levels to the top of the political hierarchy) in all the societies where the movement can establish itself and gain recognition. Moreover, this reformist movement operates according to the organizational logic of "religion as a social-political enterprise" aimed at a Catholic reconquest of the secularized* world (Enzo Pace). Examples are Opus* Dei and the Legionnaires of Christ.

See also CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: BRAZIL. SÉRGIO COUTINHO

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Chile. The Roman Catholic Church arrived in Chile with the conquistador Pedro de Valdivia (1540), accompanied by the priest Rodrigo González Marmolejo, who became the first bishop of Santiago. From the beginning, the Church sought to evangelize the natives, even as it sought to come to their defense in the midst of colonization, especially through the work of religious orders: Mercedarians (1540), Franciscans* (1551), Dominicans* (1557), and Jesuits* (1593).

When Chile achieved independence, priests participated in the first national government (1810). Bernardo O'Higgins, head of the new country, although tolerant of other religions, sought to establish relations with the Holy See and helped formalize the Church hierarchy in Santiago and Concepción.

The Constitution of 1833 established a state-church union that excluded other denominations. Inspired by Pope Leo* XIII (1878–1903), social Catholicism replaced the conservatism that dominated the 19th c. Between 1940 and 1950, strong social Christian currents became characteristic of Chilean Catholicism. In the 1960s, the Second Vatican* Council had a great influence on the Church and the hierarchy, even to the point that the Church supported agrarian reforms. And the Church remained in dialogue with the Socialist government of Salvador Allende.

Confronted with the military state, the Chilean Church played an important role in the defense of human* rights. This prophetic role, along with the promotion of sociopolitical debates, mark this period of Church life in Chile, exemplified by Cardinal Silva Henríquez.

As democracy was reestablished (1990s), the Church turned away from public affairs, focusing on family* values and individual morality, although continuing to pursue many initiatives regarding social issues. CRISTIÁN G. PARKER

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Colombia. Roman Catholicism was introduced in Columbia with the Spanish* explorations, conquests, and colonization (early 16th c.). The mendicant* orders were directed to evangelize the conquered indigenous peoples through doctrinal instruction. Dominicans*, Franciscans*, Augustinians*, and Jesuits* struggled in this work, which was hampered by controversy and contradiction and combined conquest and evangelization – a “ministry” conceived by the Spanish crown, despite the protests of some missionaries.

As the ecclesiastical institutions were established with the help of colonialist authorities, in turn the ecclesiastical institutions, including male and female religious communities, came to support the colonial system. They propagated a baroque religiosity accepted by both the dominant and the dominated people. In the social sphere, the Spanish Creole elites and other sectors of society wove alliances through guilds, brotherhoods, and other corporations that became the spine of the regime. In the economic sphere, chapels helped clergy, as well as female and male religious, to acquire extensive properties for their financial support. The Church shaped education* and was in total control of the few high schools and universities (Universidad Santo Tomás, Colegio del Rosario, Colegio de San Bartolomé, Universidad Javeriana). Finally, ecclesiastical institutions attended to the poor, the sick, and the destitute, and even had responsibility for the distribution of water in villages and cities, in effect carrying out the responsibilities of the state.

The symbiosis between church* and state started to crumble when the Spanish Bourbon dynasty (18th c.) tried both to reform the clergy and to reduce its autonomy for the sake of administrative unification. This attempt to put the clergy under closer control by the crown did not succeed with the regular* clergy, as the expulsion of the Jesuits (1767) exemplifies.

However, the Bourbon reforms made possible the introduction of Enlightenment* ideas and their acceptance by the secular clergy, as well as some laypeople, such as Francisco Antonio

Moreno y Escandon (with his views of education) and José Celestino Mutis (with his botanical studies), which led to the reform of the educational system of New Granada. Using their intellectual skills and social influence, the clergy mobilized people and supported theologically both sides of the civil wars leading to independence (1810–19). Many priests participated in the fighting and even led troops, as Ignacio Mariño did. Popular religiosity also supported these causes.

After independence (1819), the new government, with a majority of liberal Catholics, continued the Patronato* system, the new government (replacing the Spanish crown) using the clergy to support its regime. In a cultural climate filled with a sense of “newness,” liberal ideas from several origins were adopted by members of the clergy; many of them supported Freemasonry* and even promoted the foundation of a Protestant Biblical society. Meanwhile, a campaign was launched to discredit the regular clergy, the small convents were closed down, and the religious communities were beset by internal chaos (early 19th c.). This campaign against religious orders was driven, behind the scenes, by the government’s desire to confiscate the many properties of the orders in order to supplement the income of the state’s weak treasury.

A second and more radical generation of liberal leaders founded the Liberal Party, which took power in 1849. The Party undertook a number of reforms, which exacerbated the confrontation between the state and the clergy; among these reforms were the suppression of the tithe* and of ecclesiastical laws (fueros), the expulsion of the Jesuits, the total separation of church and state (1853), and ultimately the confiscation of ecclesiastical properties, a “cult tax” (a law requiring priests to acquire special licenses to preach), and the suppression of all religious communities (1861).

These events coincided with the beginning of the Romanization of the Church by the Vatican. Since 1863, and during the Olimpo Radical government (1863–82), the Colombian Church tried to reorganize under Roman rules and, with the support of the Conservative Party, to assume a confrontational attitude vis-à-vis the government and Liberalism. This attitude became more and more Integrist* and intransigent in the dispute between the parties, the religious issues becoming fuel for the civil wars that exploded during that epoch.

In 1886 the new regime adopted Catholicism as its ideological support, leading to a new period of partial symbiosis between the Church and the state. The Church controlled the educational system and was in charge of the social services through hospitals, orphanages, charity organizations, and lay programs related to the emerging Catholic* Action.

In 1930 the Liberals regained power; this gave rise to another period of confrontation between the government and the Conservative Party and its ally, the Church hierarchy. The intransigence of both sides led to a new period of uncontrolled violence in Colombia, especially in the rural and village areas (1940s–1950s). During those years, the Church attempted to engage in dialogue with the modern world through individual and collective initiatives, e.g. among workers (Jocists*, Catholic Union Movement) and students (Specialized Catholic* Action, testimony groups). Yet the Integrist* positions of the Church hierarchy and the intransigence of Conservative and Liberal politicians engendered a tense situation that led to a radicalization of the proposals, as in the case of Camilo Torres, the Golconda group, and several priests and women religious who ended up supporting or being part of the guerrilla movements.

The transformations called for by the Second Vatican* Council (1960s) took the Colombian Church hierarchy and most of the clergy by surprise. They generally interpreted its declarations in a superficial way. Pastoral initiatives like the Base* Ecclesial Communities collapsed as a result of internal contradictions, the opposition of the Church hierarchy led by Alfonso López Trujillo, and the intensification of the military conflict among leftist guerrillas, the national army, and paramilitary groups. In the 1980s, the Colombian Church was perceived as having lost legitimacy and popularity.

After Lopez Trujillo's departure to Rome (1991), the Colombian episcopacy became more committed to helping resolve the conflict. It initiated negotiations among the parties, supported economic development, and struggled to reduce violence, intervening especially through laypeople and members of the female and male religious orders.

The Roman Catholic Church of the early 21st c. had gained institutional strength and a broader presence in society. Yet the maturation and growth of Pentecostalism*, the Charismatic* Movement, and other religious organizations was challenging it.

WILLIAM ELVIS PLATA

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Mexico. See CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: MEXICO; MARY, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER: OF GUADALUPE; MEXICO; MISSION CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: CATHOLIC MISSION IN MEXICO; POPULAR CHRISTIAN PRACTICES CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: MEXICO; RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC, CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: MEXICO.

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Paraguay. The Roman Catholic Church is by far the largest church in the country, with an archdiocese and 11 dioceses. In 1992 the National Constitution discontinued the recognition of Catholicism as the state religion. This change of status is part of a cycle in which the Church and the state have experienced periods of close collaboration and periods of separation, if not conflict. From 1929, when the Archdiocese of Asunción was created, through the 1950s, the Church and the state collaborated. During Stroessner's dictatorship (1954–89), the Church opposed the government. The visit of Pope John* Paul II (1988) provided support and mobilized the Paraguayan Church, especially because the pope canonized the Jesuit Roque González de la Cruz.

At present the Paraguayan Episcopal Conference denounces the neoliberal economic system and seeks to deal with rural problems, fighting for a complete agrarian reform that would give land* to the poor farmers. Mass is conducted both in Spanish and in Guaraní, as well as in Japorá, which combines both languages. The main popular devotions include pilgrimages to the Virgin of Caacupé (December 8) and to San Blas, patron saint* of Paraguay (February 3). See also PARAGUAY.

DAMIÁN SETTON and

VERÓNICA GIMÉNEZ BELIVEAU

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Peru. Roman Catholicism in Peru is highly centered on devotions, processions, sanctuaries, rituals, and images. Although 85% of Peruvians are nominally Catholics, only 10% actually follow all the practices prescribed by Roman Catholicism. Nevertheless, the vast majority practice some form of popular* Catholicism: participation in the great Lord of Miracles procession in Lima or in the many other processions held in honor of Mary*, St. Rose* of Lima, St. Martin de Porres, and other saints*. Homes and cars are typically adorned with rosaries* and images of saints. Some figures, such as Sarita Colonia, are very popular but have not been recognized by the Church. Committed churchgoing Catholics often belong to one of many lay organizations: the more traditional belong to a confraternity or the Legion of Mary; the more conservative belong to Opus* Dei or Sodalitium Vitae Christianae; and the more progressive belong to the Christian Life Communities of the Jesuits. Liberation theology, closely identified with Gustavo Gutiérrez, a Peruvian priest, had a major impact on progressive Catholics in university circles and among the poor. Although Rome questioned elements of Liberation theology, and the episcopate is now largely conservative, Father Gutiérrez continues to be perceived by many Christians, in Peru and beyond, as a symbol of the Church's commitment to the poor.

The official Church consists of 46 jurisdictions, administered by 7 archbishops, 18 bishops, and 19 prelates who are not bishops. Eight bishops belong to Opus* Dei. There are 2,599 priests: 1,488 diocesan and 1,111 religious. The Church has a missionary character: around 60% of the priests and half the bishops are foreign born. Women religious number more than 4,000. The Church administers hundreds of parishes, many parish schools, several seminaries, clinics, orphanages, and many retreat houses. There are several Catholic universities. Since 1980 the separation between church and state has been official. But Catholicism is still part and parcel of Peruvian culture. All national events, including presidential inaugurations and Independence Day, begin with a Mass or a ceremony in the cathedral. See also PERU.

JEFFREY KLAIBER, SJ

Roman Catholicism in Latin America: Uruguay. Since the mid-19th c., Roman Catholicism in Uruguay has been marked by the radical confrontation of church* and state; this has affected the role of the Church in education*, as well as the Church's understanding of all aspects of life in society, including family* and the place of women*.

The state that emerged in Uruguay in this period was a modern state driven by secularization* and led by rationalists, Freemasons*, and liberals. The church that reacted against what it viewed as an invasion of its traditional role by the secular, irreligious, irreverent, and skeptical state was (as in the rest of Latin America) a new Catholic Church in the process of both "Romanization" and reformation. Following an institutionalization of the church-state conflict (1859–85), and a period of adjustment to this new church-state relation (1885–1906), the constitutional separation of church and state (1906–19) opened a new phase in the history of the Uruguayan Catholic Church. The Church constructed itself as a "Catholic ghetto," a besieged Catholicism, a "private Christendom," "a Christian enclave in a laicized country" (Segundo and Rodé), framed by a fear of what was not Christian and resulting in the absence of the Church in vital parts of Uruguayan life. (Protestantism has a similar attitude, according to Julio de Santa Ana.)

Aware of this problem, in the 1960s – a time of economic, cultural, and political crisis that threatened the very existence of social order (Alberto Methol Ferré) – a number of priests and laypeople developed a network of Catholic groups that intervened in all domains of Uruguayan daily life: schools, recreational institutions for youth, health care, business, social works, political life, and media (including the press). Within this gigantic social network, Catholics lived as a majority in a Catholic "nation" that protected Catholic faith and practices against the laicized*, secularized*, and de-Christianized environment (Rodé). This change of attitude was triggered and supported by the Second Vatican* Council, which challenged the Uruguayan Church to adopt a renewed sense of mission* in the country; a response to this challenge was spearheaded by Archbishop Carlos Parteli, despite significant opposition. In the face of a global cultural crisis paired with society's insensitivity to the poor, exiled, and marginalized in the context of a growing political authoritarianism, the 1968 Socio-Pastoral Archdiocesan Conference emphasized that the urgent mission of the Church was to foster a sense of social responsibility. The Church was not to do this by itself: instead of appealing to the "good-will" of those in power, it was to contribute to an awakening of the people, so that they might participate in their own liberation and development.

During the dictatorship (1973–85), despite contradictory positions (some Catholics supporting the dictatorship, other resisting it), participation in the antidictatorial movement was prevalent. Parishes and Catholic schools served as refuges for professors and intellectuals pursued by the state; Church hierarchies adopted nonconformist positions against the government; many priests (like Luis Pérez Aguirre) and lay Catholics were militants in social organizations that defended human* rights, justice*, and peace, and supported political prisoners.

The Church's antidictatorial role renewed its social legitimacy during the democratic recovery period. Yet since 1985, the Church has been confronted by new phenomena, including the shift in the location of the "religious" in life from institutional life to individual life and independent groups, and a change of the relations between religion and politics. These new phenomena have deep roots in Uruguayan history but are also part of the process of globalization. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: URUGUAY.

GERARDO CAETANO

Roman Catholicism in North America: Canada. See QUEBEC.

Roman Catholicism in North America: United States. Statistics published in the Official Catholic Directory (2007) state that there are almost 70 million Roman Catholics in the USA, although this figure is difficult to verify. It includes persons of varying commitment to Catholicism and does not imply that all are actually “practicing,” however practice is measured. Among Catholics there are different levels of participation in the Church’s liturgical and community programs. Some disagree with certain diocesan or papal directives regarding reception of the sacraments*, social obligations, and sexual* norms within marriage*. Among practicing US Catholics, tensions exist between “conservative traditionalists” and “progressive liberals.”

Catholics in the USA, after those in Brazil and Mexico, constitute the third-largest Catholic population of a country worldwide. Catholics represent some 25% of the US population, although their distribution varies from one section of the country to another. Regions heavily populated by Catholics are found on the East Coast and in such major cities as Los Angeles, New York, Chicago, and Boston. There are some 195 dioceses (of which 146 are Latin Rite and 17 are Eastern Catholic). Latinos/as constitute 39% of the US Catholic population (2007): c25 million, i.e. 73% of the US Latino/a population (c35.3 million). Among African Americans (36 million in the USA) only some 2.5 million, or 7%, are Catholics; however, their voice, long neglected, is gradually being heard. With the arrival of immigrants, especially from Asian countries such as Vietnam and the Philippines, ethnic diversity among Catholics has grown, especially in some sections of the country.

Roman Catholicism originally came to what is today the USA even before the Reformation through Spanish explorers and settlers in present-day Florida (from 1513) and in various parts of the Southwest. The California missions, dating back to 1769, also introduced Catholicism to that area of the country. The English colonies in the East were largely Protestant, with the exception of the Maryland settlement, which after 1634 allowed religious toleration of Catholics. At the outbreak of the American Revolution (1776), US Catholics were less than 1% of the population within the 13 colonies. A large proportion of present-day American Catholics trace their origins to the massive immigrations in the 19th and early 20th c., especially from such countries as Ireland, Germany, Italy, Poland, and French Canada.

In general, because of the immigrant character of most US Catholics, it was difficult until the second half of the 20th c. to identify a vibrant intellectual life among them. Few of the bishops and priests had more than a seminary education, which was often constricted by measures taken by the Vatican to prevent the spread of Catholic Modernism*. Beginning in the 1960s and especially after the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65), a notable shift in theological training took place, with the emergence of laymen and laywomen scholars. Controversies over the conciliar reforms of the liturgy and divergent opinions about the force of certain papal teachings contributed to internal tensions in the US Church. Finally, toward the close of the 20th c., with the disclosure of sexual abuse of minors by some members of the clergy, as well as the perception that priestly predators had not been appropriately punished by bishops, a widespread malaise gripped the Church. Among the challenging issues facing the US Catholic Church today are the notable decline of ordinations to the priesthood and the financial viability of some dioceses in the wake of change and crises.

MICHAEL A. FAHEY, SJ

Roman Catholicism in the South Pacific and Australia.

The Australian Roman Catholic Church was composed largely of Irish settlers until the coming of European (and later Asian) migrants after World War II. This influx strained Church resources, especially the voluntarily funded Church school system, until government aid was received in the 1960s. Catholicism was dependent on overseas members of religious orders who staffed schools, overseas clergy who provided pastoral care, and overseas Church personnel who maintained many charitable institutions. Organizing Church life in Australia has been beset by the "tyranny of distance," although most Australians now live in the large coastal cities. The 1960s provided a watershed for Australian Catholicism with the impact of the Second Vatican* Council and the increasing secularism* that eroded widely accepted Christian values. Leadership in the Australian Church was originally in the hands of English Benedictine* monks, although increasingly Irish bishops were appointed and were prominent in Church leadership until the death of Archbishop Daniel Mannix of Melbourne (1963). He featured largely in the turbulent relations between the Church and the Labour Party, which resulted in "the split" of 1955, diminishing Catholics' support for Labour and their move toward more conservative parties. However, a strong commitment to social and justice* issues remains a characteristic of Catholicism.

New Zealand Catholics also depended on overseas clergy and often supported the Labour Party and the country's advanced social services. With 13% of the population, the New Zealand Catholic Church has continued to be a vocal presence in the public discourse. Catholic bishops have often voiced strong liberal views in series of short, readable statements. The Irish tradition in Catholicism was tempered by French missionaries such as Bishop Jean-Baptiste Pompallier and the Marists. Catholics supported the resurgence of the Maori people in the early 20th c. and the appointment of the first Maori bishop in 1988.

Small island communities scattered over the vast distances of the southern Pacific Ocean offered major challenges to missionaries. Generally Catholics came later than Protestants and, like them, faced hostility, which resulted in the murder of missionaries, and tropical diseases, which decimated their ranks. Numerous languages, a lack of Christian literature in indigenous languages, and little appreciation for local cultures exacerbated the missionary challenge. The Marists, Missionaries of the Sacred Heart, and many orders of women served on these islands. Among these numerous islands, New Caledonia has the largest percentage of Catholics (60% of the population). AUSTIN COOPER, OMI

Roman Catholic Worship. See MASS.

Roman Curia (often referred to as "the Vatican" or "Rome") is the administrative apparatus of the Holy See* and, with the pope*, is the central governing body of the entire Roman Catholic Church. It includes the "Secretariat of State," nine Roman congregations (including the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith), tribunals, pontifical councils, the Synod of Bishops, and various other offices and pontifical commissions.

Romanesque Architecture, church building style (c1000–1150) characterized by round arches and heavy piers and columns. See also HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

Romania is a secular state, and is thus without a state church. Yet almost all the inhabitants of Romania are Christians, and the dominant religious body is the Romanian Orthodox* Church, an autocephalous church within the Eastern Orthodox* Church.

The territory now occupied by Romania in Southeastern Europe has a recorded history that encompasses the Dacian era, the Roman Empire, and the medieval era of principalities (voivodats) of Walachia, Moldavia, and Transylvania. According to tradition, Christianity first arrived in present-day Romanian territory with the apostle Andrew, who preached the gospel in Scythia Minor (modern Dobrogea). Dacia was conquered by the Romans under Emperor Trajan (106 CE) and heavily colonized by people who came primarily from Asia Minor, many of whom were Christians. During a relatively short period of Roman occupation, the inhabitants of this territory emerged as a major Romance people, with a powerful Christian Church, represented at the first ecumenical* councils, as the church fathers duly recorded. Historians appropriately say that the Romanian people were born as a Christian people. In any case, when the Romanians formed a nation, it is clear that they already had the Christian faith, as apparent not only from tradition but also from archeological and linguistic evidence. In either 271 or 275, the Roman army and administration left Dacia, which was invaded by the Goths*.

Yet the Romans and their successors were ruthless with the Christians, as is shown by the great number of martyrs. Bishop Ephrem, killed in 304 in Tomis, was followed by countless other martyrs. The 1971 archeological digs under the paleo-Christian basilica in Niculitel (near ancient Noviodunum in Scythia Minor) excavated an old martyrion that contains the relics of Zoticos, Attalos, Kamasias, and Filippos, who suffered martyrdom under Diocletian (304–5), and, under the crypt, the relics of two earlier martyrs who died during the repressions of Emperor Decius (249–51).

The Orthodox Church in the Romanian principality of Wallachia (founded c1310), also known as Ungro-Vlachia (Hungary-Wallachia), north of the Danube, became in 1359 a metropolitanate, with Curtea de Arges as the first see*. Similarly the Church in the principality of Moldavia (founded c1352) became a metropolitanate in 1401, with its first see in Suceava. The Church in the principality of Transylvania (though part of the Hungarian kingdom between the 10th and 16th c.; officially a principality in 1711) became a metropolitanate in the 15th c., with its first see in Alba Iulia.

While Wallachia slowly fell under the suzerainty of the Ottomans during the 15th c., Moldavia reached its most glorious period under the rule of Stephen III the Great (1457–1504), a highly successful political and military leader. After his victory against the Ottomans in 1475, Pope Sixtus IV deemed him “true champion of the Christian faith.” However, after his death, Moldavia also came under the suzerainty of the Ottoman Empire.

During the following centuries, the Orthodox Church flourished mainly in Wallachia and Moldavia. Many well-known churches and monasteries (e.g. Cozia, Voronet, Putna, Sucevita) were erected at that time. In 1859 the modern state of Romania was created by the union of Moldavia and Wallachia, becoming a kingdom in 1881. In 1872 the Orthodox Metropolitanates of Ungro-Vlachia and of Moldavia were united to form the Romanian Orthodox Church. This Church became autocephalous* (1885) and was raised to the rank of a patriarchate (1925).

In 1918, after World War I, Bessarabia, Northern Bukovina, and Transylvania became part of the Kingdom of Romania. With World War II, Bessarabia and Northern Bukovina were lost to the Soviets, who imposed their harsh rule. The monarchy was abolished in 1947. From 1947 to 1964, many people were arbitrarily imprisoned and even killed for political, religious, economic, or unknown reasons. After the retreat of Soviet troops in 1958, Romania started to pursue independent policies. But the dictatorial regime of Nicolas Ceausescu (from 1965) continued the oppression and exhausted the Romanian economy, leading to his overthrow and execution in a bloody revolution (1989).

The new democratic Romania joined NATO (2004) and the European Union (2004). With freedom of travel, 2–3 million Romanians emigrated, leading to the creation of many new Orthodox communities (and dioceses) in Western Europe, the USA, Canada, and Australia.

A first translation of the Bible into Gothic was completed by Bishop Ulfila* (4th c.) during the Goth occupation. However, given the complex relationship with the Byzantine Patriarchate and Bulgarian kingdoms, Romanians adopted Church Slavonic in the liturgy (from the early 9th c.). Yet this was never the language of the people, and the priests always preached in Romanian. More and more Bible texts and liturgical books were translated and later printed in Romanian. Consequently, since the 16th–18th c., Slavonic has been progressively abandoned in favor of Romanian as the liturgical language (in contrast, other major Orthodox nations do not use their own spoken language as a sacred language). The Bucharest Bible (Biblia de la București) was the first complete Romanian translation of the Bible. Published in 1688, it is a mature and highly developed work that was founded on much previous translation work (as older manuscripts and early printed works show).

Although they remained for a long time under foreign suzerainty, Romanians characteristically kept their Orthodox faith, which proved to be an essential part of their national and ethnic identity. The Romanian Orthodox Church has since 1885 been an autocephalous* Orthodox church, with its own Holy Synod presided over by its own patriarch.

The oldest traces of Roman Catholic activities in present-day Romanian territory have been found in Transylvania, recorded in connection with the extension of Magyar (Hungarian) rule. The Roman Catholic Diocese of Alba Iulia was probably established in the 11th c. Other dioceses were created later in Cenad and Oradea. In 1304 Pope Boniface VIII sent Catholic missionaries over the Carpathian Mountains, where Eastern Orthodox churches and dioceses were already present. A Catholic diocese was created in this area.

In the 16th c., some of the Catholics in Transylvania embraced the Reformation*; most of the Saxons adhered to the Lutheran Reformation as early as 1547, and large groups of the Hungarian population converted to Calvinism* (Reformed* Church).

In 1698, under great pressure from the Austrian imperial authority, the metropolitan and a small number of Orthodox priests in Transylvania became Uniates*. This action was simply a political move designed to secure equality of rights with Catholics in the region. Powerfully sustained by the imperial authority that persecuted the resistant Orthodox, the "Greek Rite Roman Catholic" Church became part of Romanian life in Transylvania.

But in 1948, the Uniate Catholics joined the Orthodox Church, a union supported by the regime. Some of the Greek Catholic clerics who refused to make this move were jailed. The Greek Catholic Church regained legal status after the fall of Communism, but most of its former members chose to remain Orthodox. The Romanian Church United with Rome, the church of Greek Catholics, now has a separate jurisdiction, a number of bishops, and an archbishop. In May 1999 Romania was the first country with an Orthodox majority to be visited by Pope John* Paul II. But problems between Orthodox and Uniates continue, mostly with respect to the status of Greek Catholic properties.

The newer evangelical denominations (Pentecostal*, Baptist*, Seventh*-day Adventist) arrived in Romania mostly after World War I. The Pentecostals and Charismatics* are most numerous, followed by the Baptists.

Statistics: Population (2002): 22.3 million (M). Christians, 22 M, 99% (Orthodox, 18.9 M, 82.1%; Protestants, 1.41 M, 6.4%; Roman Catholics, 1.02 M, 4.7%; Pentecostals, 0.33 M,

1.5%; Greek Catholics, 0.19 M, 0.9%; Baptists, 0.13 M, 0.6%; Seventh-day Adventists, 0.08 M, 0.4%; Unitarians, 0.06 M, 0.3%); Muslim minority, mostly of Turkish ethnicity (c0.06 M); with the emigration of many Jews to Israel, a very small Jewish minority (6,200). (Based on the 2002 census.)

VASILE MIHOC

Romans, Epistle to the, Paul's* most influential letter, underscores central Christian doctrines, especially "justification* by faith*." The letter (c54–58) also addresses issues the house churches in Rome confront concerning the relations between Jews and Gentiles (1:16–11:36, 14:1–15:33) and between Christians and Roman imperial authorities (1:1–15, 12:1–13:14).

Paul was leaving Corinth* with some apprehension (15:25–31) to take the money collected from Gentile churches in Greece (Macedonia and Achaia) to the Jewish-Christian churches in Jerusalem*, before going to Rome, then Spain (15:23–24). Although he was not personally acquainted with the Romans (1:10–13, 15:18–22), he was aware of the tensions between Jewish and Gentile Christians and of the uncertainty regarding how Christians should relate to Roman authorities. Claudius's expulsion of the Jews from Rome in 49 and Nero's reversal of it might have generated these tensions because of the Jewish Christians' return to predominantly Gentile churches.

Paul addresses the issues by interpreting the gospel about Jesus' sacrificial* death (3:25) and resurrection* (1:4) in relation to traditions about imperial Roman authority and Jewish Scriptures (Moses' Law*, 2:12–3:31, 7:1–8:39; Abraham*, 4:1–25; Adam*, 5:12–21; Israel*, 9:1–11:36).

In an ironic challenge to Roman authority, Paul portrays the spreading of the gospel as an imperial conquest in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, by servants who "put on" Christ as an armor of light (13:12–14) to bring everyone to the "obedience of faith" (1:5), just as the Roman legions brought everyone to "voluntary" obedience to the emperor. Thus the emperor is not the true Lord, but simply a "servant of God" (13:1–7); one should not conform to "this world" (12:2). "Obedience of faith" is righteousness*, justification, the right relation to God exemplified by Abraham and fulfilled in Christ's faithful death, which makes possible the justification of both Gentile and Jewish sinners (1:18–4:25). The Law is "holy, just, and good," but not sufficient, because it fuels sin* instead of overcoming it (7:1–24). When God justifies Gentile sinners "through faith," even though most Jews did not join the Gentiles who believed (9:1–11:12), God remains just (1:17). Mysteriously God's covenant* with Israel remains irrevocable (11:29). Thus Gentile Christians should not boast (11:13–36, 15:31).

Romans and its powerful theological argument for Christians in Rome was appropriated by believers in many other contexts. Romans influenced, e.g., the Gnostics* and Origen's* understanding of evil* and salvation*; Augustine's* understanding of sin* and grace*, faith, the bondage* of the will*, predestination*, and church* and state; Luther* and the Reformers'* understanding of justification by faith; and certain Liberation* theologians' understanding of salvation as liberation from bondage.

DANIEL PATTE

Romanticism and Christianity. Anglo-American romanticism, as distinct from Euro-Continental romanticism of either a French rationalist or a German idealist stripe, generated religious, as well as philosophical, language. This local habitation of the long Romantic Movement sensed, rather than deduced or intuited, "whatsoever things" were true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and "of good report" (Phil 4:8). Thus a radically immanent* Christianity hovered near romanticism. The empirical and experiential dimensions of Arminian* (free-will) Evangelical practice, as opposed to the antiexperiential aspect of Calvinist* theology, stiffened romantic Anglo-America's "spiritual sense." This romanticism proclaimed the imperatives "Trust in Experiment!" "Test Religion!"

The two pioneers of transatlantic revivalism, John Wesley* (1703–91) and Jonathan Edwards* (1703–58), absorbed and spiritualized the sensationalist epistemology of John Locke* (1632–1704) and, through the complex process of cultural osmosis, passed on to the 19th c. an empirical idiom of Evangelical expression. As a result, the British romantics William Blake*, William Wordsworth, Samuel Taylor Coleridge*, Percy Bysshe Shelley, and John Keats could conceive of the physical senses as portals to epiphany*, and not just as analogies of spiritual insight. Thomas Carlyle, Alfred, Lord Tennyson, and Ralph Waldo Emerson*, as an illustrative Anglo-American trio of late romantic writers, continued to blend "the language of the sense" (Wordsworth's phrase) with "poetic faith" (Coleridge). Even Emily Dickinson, herself as much (or more) of a late romantic poet as a Victorian American (anti-romantic) or pre-modern author, dwelled in the possibility of, and gravitated toward, the synthesis of scientific method with the varieties of religious experience. Like her precursors and coevals on the high to late romantic arc (the ark back and forth across the Atlantic), Dickinson proved more apt to expect truth, joy, and grace (after the manner of Locke, Wesley, and Edwards) than to suspect false consciousness (à la Karl Marx*, Friedrich Nietzsche*, or Sigmund Freud*).

Experience and faith emerged from the Anglo-American climate as "contraries" that produced "progression" (Blake's dialectical terms). Science* and religion, it is true, may seem to be "non-overlapping magisteria" (Stephen Jay Gould). Faith, moreover, scarcely moved mountains "so well / As she was fam'd to do, deceiving elf" (Keats, "Ode to a Nightingale," 1819). Nonetheless, Anglo-American romantics imagined that faith* in experience, for better or worse, would lead, through dust and heat, to an experience of faith. Thus instead of nihilistic unbelief, constructive skepticism informed all that the Anglo-American century from 1770 to 1870 found resonant in "the burden of the mystery" (Wordsworth's language).

RICHARD E. BRANTLEY

Rome, the location of Vatican* City, the pope*, and the Holy See*. The term "Rome" often refers to the Roman Curia located in it or to the pope, the bishop of Rome.

Romero, Oscar Arnulfo (1917–80), archbishop of El* Salvador (1977), assassinated by an ultra-Right death squad while saying Mass* in the chapel of the Divina Providencia Hospital. The "martyred bishop of the poor" lived in solidarity with the most impoverished in his country and the victims of human* rights violations perpetrated by security forces and other armed groups. His commitment was reinforced by the murder of Jesuit Priest Rutilio Grande (1977), and from that time he devoted himself to the struggle of the persecuted and the poor. While extremely critical of the army, he did not promote any political ideology; he also criticized popular organizations and leftist parties that gave priority to their organizations or political ideals over suffering people and their hopes. He denounced the attacks against peasants, workers, and religious leaders, the "disappearances," and the assassinations. The day before his own assassination, he said in his homily, "In the name of God, in the name of this suffering* people whose cries, every day more distraught, reach the heavens, I implore you,

I beg you, I order you in the name of God, stop the repression." "Monseñor Romero" or "San Romero of America" (his popular designations) became an international and interconfessional symbol of the struggle for human* rights. Procedures for his beatification are in process. See also POVERTY CLUSTER; PREFERENTIAL OPTION FOR THE POOR.

ELSA TAMEZ (translated by Gloria Kinsler)

Rosary, prayer involving the recitation of 15 sets of 10 Hail* Marys, each set of Hail Marys being preceded by the Lord's* Prayer and followed by the Gloria Patri*; thus the rosary beads with which one prays are divided into five groups of 10 to assist the recitation. Despite popular lore, this practice was introduced not by Dominic*, but rather after him, although similar practices existed earlier on at Cluny and elsewhere.

Rose, St., of Lima (1581–1617). Born Isabel Flores de Oliva, she is the patron saint* of Lima, the Americas, and the Philippines, the first saint of the New World to be canonized (1651), and a symbol of a new Creole identity. Born in Lima, called "Rose" because of her rosy cheeks, she became a member of the Third Order of St. Dominic (1606) and usually wore the Dominican* habit, although she was not formally a nun. She lived in her family's home, practiced severe penances*, and performed works of charity. St. Rose is the patroness of the police and unofficially of couples about to be married. See also PERU.

JEFFREY KLAIBER, SJ

Rouse, C. (Clara) Ruth (1872–1956), British Anglican evangelist, promoter of foreign mission and ecumenism, international pioneer among women students, and foremother of the modern ecumenical movement. She traveled, together with John R. Mott*, to five continents organizing Christian student unions among both women and men (1897–1924).

As a student at Cambridge she committed herself to the Student* Volunteer Movement (1894), became a missionary in India, and subsequently worked for the World* Student Christian Federation, visiting universities, evangelizing students, organizing unions, planning and implementing camps and conferences, and choosing and training future leaders for Christian work all over the world.

No hard-core feminist, she nevertheless was a resolute modern reformer. The World Student Christian Federation was for Western Protestant men only; she was instrumental in opening it up to women on equal terms (1905–20), to Orthodox and Catholic Christians (Constantinople, 1911; a reflection of her conscious ecumenical stance), and to non-Westerners (Tokyo Conference, 1907). She was secretary to the Missionary Council of the Church of England (1924–38); she later served as president of the World's YWCA* (1938–46). She devoted her last years to writing a history of the World Student Christian Federation (1948) and to editing a first history of the ecumenical movement (published, 1954).

RUTH FRANZEN

Rufinus, Tyrannius (c345–411), monk, historian, translator. He studied in Rome, becoming Jerome's* friend. After some years in Egypt* (373–81), he and Melania* the Elder founded a double* monastery on the Mount of Olives* (381–82). His translations into Latin include Origen's* On First Principles (a translation made after Jerome attacked Origenism*) and Origen's commentary on Romans, the Clementine* Recognitions, works by Basil* of Caesarea and Gregory* Nazianzen, and Eusebius's* Church History (adding a narrative through the triumph of Theodosius*). His commentary on the Apostles* Creed gives the earliest text of the form of the creed as used in Aquileia and Rome.

Rufinus the Syrian (d401), priest member of Jerome's* monastery in Bethlehem, who probably translated the Pauline Epistles in the Vulgate* and represented Jerome in Rome during the Origenist* dispute (399). He opposed the nascent doctrine of original* sin, saying that the soul is created with a mortal body, death is punishment for individual sins, and there were sinless persons before the advent of Christ.

Rule of Faith. See REGULA FIDEI.

Rules, Monastic. See AUGUSTINIAN RULE; BENEDICT, RULE OF; MONASTICISM CLUSTER: MONASTIC RULES.

Rupert of Deutz (c1075–1129), scriptural exegete, monastic theologian. From an early age a monk of St. Laurent, Liège, Rupert experienced periods of exile before becoming abbot of Deutz, Cologne (1120–29). He produced scripturally based treatises on the liturgy and on the Trinity* and its works, and innovative commentaries on many biblical books that emphasized historical* as well as allegorical* interpretation and the role of the Holy Spirit in history. A defender of monasticism* and ecclesiastical reform, he came into conflict with Scholastics* and faced accusations about his own orthodoxy. CONSTANT J. MEWS

Russell, Charles Taze (1852–1916), founded the movement that became known as the Jehovah's* Witnesses. He grew up in Pennsylvania and as a young man was strongly influenced by "Millerite*" teachings (see Adventism), which shaped his millennial* convictions and analytical approach to Scripture*. Russell sold his businesses while in his 20s to concentrate on religious work. He founded Zion's Watch Tower Tract Society to distribute religious tracts and Bibles. By using colporteurs (traveling book-sellers), he established the missionary methods continued by Jehovah's Witnesses today. Russell wrote a number of books, including seven volumes entitled Studies in the Scriptures.

DAVID VOAS

Russia. Dominated by the Orthodox* Church, Christianity in Russia has developed somewhat separately from its Western European and Mediterranean counterparts. Though planted in Russia by Greeks, Christianity has grown and flowered in many and rare ways, ranging from Catholic influence along the western Russian frontier to homegrown mystical sects and traditionalist Old* Believers. Religious life in contemporary Russia is experiencing a period of rapid transition; Christianity seeks to return to its deep roots in Russia even as it struggles with the legacy of militant atheist policies of the Soviet period.

1. History of Christianity in Russia. The arrival of Christianity in Russia is dated to 988, when Prince Vladimir of Kiev baptized his subjects en masse (see Ukraine). According to tradition, Vladimir had sent emissaries to explore the major monotheistic religions. Each religion came up short except Orthodoxy. "We knew not," exclaimed the emissaries after experiencing the Orthodox liturgy, "whether we were on heaven or on earth!" While the story is certainly apocryphal, it does illustrate two major themes: the supremacy of Orthodoxy in Russia and an emphasis on the transformative power of Christianity.

Though he was revered, the admiration for Prince Vladimir cannot match the love traditionally shown for the first Russian saints*, Boris* and Gleb. These Christian princes chose to accept suffering and lay down their lives rather than fight their brother Sviatopolk for political dominance. In doing so, they created a particularly Russian form of saintliness* that still influences Russian Christianity. Their 11th-c. canonization as "passion bearers" (not martyrs) showed that human beings could act in a Christ-like way even in political or social situations. Although their deaths were political, their actions were quintessentially Christian.

As it spread northward and eastward from Kiev, Orthodoxy was layered over existing magical and animist beliefs. Soon Christianity outwardly replaced "pagan" religion, but many animist traditions (including the belief in forest sprites and other supernatural beings) were integrated into rural Christian traditions. Thus Russian Christianity can be seen as a mixture of high theology, monasticism*, parish life, and popular* culture.

Mongol occupation of Russian Lands (13th–14th centuries) influenced Orthodoxy, paradoxically strengthening it even as the Mongols stamped out political opposition. When Muscovy broke free of Mongol dominance, its religious traditions began to dominate Russian Christianity. Muscovite Orthodoxy tended to emphasize ritual, liturgical, and communal themes over those of personal piety. Still, the monastic tradition in Russia long struggled between the "Non-Possessor" and "Possessor" teachings. The Non-Possessors were spiritually led by Nil* Sorsky, who taught that monks ought to live in small hermitages, spend their days in prayer, and not accept worldly gifts (following the model of Sketic monasticism in Egypt). The Possessors, exemplified by Joseph of Volokolamsk, emphasized the creation of large monasteries with significant wealth and strictly hierarchal structures that would interact with the world. While the Muscovite Possessors became the dominant strand, the Non-Possessor spirit remained alive in hermitages, informal women's monastic communities, and "sketes," the smaller outgrowths of major monasteries (see Monasticism Cluster: In the Russian and Ukrainian Tradition.)

First peak of Muscovite Orthodoxy (1589).

This peak was reached when Moscow's bishop received the status of patriarch*, which placed him on equal terms with the most senior Orthodox leaders worldwide. Russian Orthodoxy was now autocephalous*. In fact, the fall of Constantinople to the Ottomans (1453) convinced some theologians that Moscow was the "Third Rome" and thus the undisputed defender of Orthodox Christianity. Indeed, Moscow completely opposed an attempt at union with Rome (1596).

17th century. During this period, Russian Orthodoxy suffered its most important internal upheaval, known as the "raskol" (schism) of the Old Belief. A new patriarch, Nikon*, introduced (1650s) ritual changes to attune Russian Orthodoxy to its contemporary Greek counterparts. Aghast at the changes and their theological implications, many Orthodox refused to implement Nikon's reforms. He then used his considerable influence over Czar Alexei Mikhailovich (1645–76) to force acceptance, sometimes at gunpoint. The result was a religious rebellion rather than the centralization of control that Nikon pursued. Those Orthodox who refused to accept either ritual reform or centralized administration became known as Old* Believers (or Old Ritualists). Without a hierarchy, the Old Believers split into many groups called "concorde," with various eschatological*, apocalyptic*, ideological, and political views. The Russian Orthodox Church condemned both Nikon and the Old Believers at a church council (1666–67). Unfortunately, during the schism, the Orthodox Church lost many of its most zealous adherents, and the Old Believers were pushed out of the religious mainstream. Some Old Believers lost their sacramental life as their priests died off, while others sought to "convert" priests from the state-sponsored church or imported bishops from other Orthodox jurisdictions. Old Believers suffered persecution until 1905.

Reign of Peter I (1682–1725). The symbolic power of Russian Orthodoxy was further eroded during the reign of Peter I ("the Great"), who abolished the throne of patriarch, replacing it with the Holy Synod – first known as the Spiritual College – to administer the Church. Many Old Believers viewed Peter I as the Antichrist* for his Westernizing tendencies, although as a pragmatist Peter let most Old Believer communities thrive. Western Christians were welcomed by Peter as part of his project to Westernize Russia.

The Russian Orthodox Church's financial independence next came under fire, when Emperor Peter III secularized Church land and property (1762). This freed up significant land for state use but effectively cut off much of the Church's source of independent income. Still, Orthodoxy commanded the loyalty of most Russian Christians, even though some quietly preferred the rituals and autonomy of the Old Belief.

Catherine II (1762–96) through Alexander I (1801–25). During the reigns of these monarchs, Russia became home to many non-Orthodox Christians. Catherine II invited German Mennonites into Russia to act as model farmers in Ukraine*. Concurrently, the expansion of Russian power into Europe led to the incorporation into the Russian Empire of millions of Polish Roman Catholics and Finnish Lutherans. The Eastern Rite Catholic Church (often known as "Uniate*") retained significant support, especially in Western Ukraine. Interaction among these groups fostered the growth of new Christian communities in the Empire, while expanding contacts with the West helped to develop some influence of Pietists*, Freemasons*, and even Jesuits* in Russian high society. The Russian Bible Society was first lauded and then suppressed in this period.

Orthodoxy responded to its many new neighbors by strengthening its own educational system and championing a quasi-scholastic view that deemphasized mystical elements of the faith while simultaneously rationalizing church administration. The priesthood remained split between monastic clergy ("black") and parish clergy ("white"). Church leadership came only from the ranks of monks, while married parish clergy tended to serve with poor pay, little real power, and even less prestige. The introduction of widespread seminary training helped, but very little, since the schools tended to train clergy in Latin and dogmatic theology rather than in the liturgical and pastoral duties that they would perform in the parishes. Each year some priests fled to the Old Believers, who promised better financial support and more autonomy at the parish level.

19th century. During this time, Russia experienced an explosion of new religious forms. Many homegrown groups protested against Orthodoxy's prayers to the saints*, its sacramental life, icons*, and allegedly poor moral development. Some of these, such as the Molokans, Dukhobors, and Shtundists (a movement that included many traditional Protestant groups), tended toward theological and community structures resembling those prevalent in Anabaptism*. The Russian Orthodox Church denigrated these as "rationalist sects." Other groups became increasingly radical; among these, which the Russian Orthodox Church denigrated as "mystical sects," were the Khlysts (Flagellants) and Skopts (Castrators), who participated in ecstatic group worship and sometimes even ritual castration, mutilation, and dismemberment. The Church and the state maintained a legal monitoring of these "schismatics" or "most pernicious sects," which tended to develop in or move toward the Russian borderlands in the Caucasus and Ukraine. By the late 19th c., Shtundist communities in Ukraine openly identified themselves as Baptists. Some embraced female leadership, which was less likely to exist in Russian Orthodox communities.

This foment also gave rise to a renewal of Russian Orthodoxy in the 19th c. The Slavophile Movement promoted the idea of “community” or “conciliarity*” (sobornost’) as a social and cultural agenda for Russian development, both supporting Orthodoxy and challenging the autocratic status quo. Likewise, Slavophile ideas helped to revive Orthodox philosophy, monasticism, and social activism. For instance, Fr. Zosima in Dostoevsky’s* Brothers Karamazov was a composite character taken from the spiritual fathers of the Optina community, a center of Orthodox renewal.

Concurrently, academic ethnographers began to analyze the syncretism* of popular religion in the Russian countryside, deriding it as a “dual faith” that masked “pagan” belief with Christian themes. Yet the peasantry possessed not a dual faith so much as a view of Christianity which differed from that of academics or theologians. Indeed, for a Russian peasant, it was not odd to invoke Christ, Mary, or the saints when reciting a magical incantation in a bathhouse or at a crossroad, both of which had heightened religious importance in rural Russia. (For similar phenomena elsewhere, see Inculturation Cluster; Popular Christian Practices Cluster.)

For the majority of Russian Christians in the countryside, the liturgical calendar was inextricably tied to the agricultural year. The various summer holidays celebrating Christ’s life (called “Christs,” for short) also marked important days of harvest. Russian Christians would speak of the “Apple Christ,” for example.

The emancipation of the serfs by Alexander II (1861) further strengthened public celebrations of Orthodoxy, as peasant pilgrimage* grew exponentially in the late 19th c. While some Orthodox believers traveled to the Holy Land, thousands more made pilgrimages to Russian holy sites, such as the famed monastery of Solovetskii near the Arctic Circle. Likewise, the greater mobility of peasants and workers strengthened both the Old Believers and non-Orthodox Christian communities. Women’s religious communities, either official monasteries or unofficial groups, became more prominent as an alternative to parish life in the Orthodox Church.

20th century. This period dealt blow after blow to Russia, including its Christian population. Social and economic upheaval during the explosive industrialization of the late imperial period was exacerbated by the disastrous Russo-Japanese War, the revolution of 1905, World War I, and the ensuing revolutions of February and October 1917 (led by Alexander Kerensky and Vladimir Lenin, respectively). Millions of Russian Christians suffered, although denominations responded in different ways to the ravages of war and revolution.

Significantly, the period 1905–17 offered a window of opportunity for Christians outside of the state-sponsored Church. The Edict of Toleration of 1905 legalized all denominations within the Russian Empire. For the first time, all groups could build churches, publish openly, proselytize, and receive converts from Orthodoxy. The result was a short-lived golden era for groups ranging from Old Believers to Baptists, which saw their numbers rise very quickly. Significantly, during these years, many of these groups held regional and national meetings for the first time to develop a national presence in Russia.

Although the Bolshevik Revolution had an expressly atheist agenda, response to the revolution was quite varied. The Russian Orthodox Church, meeting in its first all-Russian council in centuries, roundly decried the revolution. Its newly elected patriarch, Tikhon*, allowed Church leaders to go into exile. Other groups, however, tentatively welcomed the change in power. Some Baptists, e.g., embraced revolutionary fervor as a way to revitalize and expand their faith throughout Russia.

The young Bolshevik state nationalized all religious property and regularly looted and burned buildings while martyring religious leaders and laity alike. The League of Militant Godless (from the mid-1920s to 1940) began an often unsuccessful campaign of atheist propaganda across the USSR. Although the official line against all forms of religion was unrelenting, the state sometimes tried to co-opt sectarian groups that had been persecuted by the imperial government. In addition, rank-and-file Communist Party members were often caught between the appeals of militant atheism* and their own (or their family’s) Christian heritage. Parishes often tried to recast themselves according to new Soviet laws to avoid being liquidated. The situation on the ground was therefore considerably more complicated than propagandists on either side might portray.

Once Soviet power was well established, Christian groups had to discern how best to respond. The Russian Orthodox Church split along three lines: the Church in exile, the Church underground, and the patriarchal Church, which made peace with the Soviet government in 1927 under the leadership of Patriarch Sergii. The short-lived “Renovationist” or “Living Church,” which sought to integrate itself into the Bolshevik agenda, died out during the 1920s.

Smaller denominations, especially Protestant ones, thrived for about 10 years. Their numbers swelled, especially as the government focused its attacks on the Russian Orthodox, which the Communists perceived as the most counterrevolutionary of all Christian churches. In fact, officials complained that the Baptist Youth Organization – Bapsomol – was sometimes more effective than its Communist counterpart, the Komsomol.

The cultural revolution of the late 1920s–1930s was tied to the extremes of the Five-Year Plans, collectivization, and the purges. The government redoubled its efforts to persecute the faithful by killing thousands, exiling even more to the Gulag camps, and liquidating churches. Priests and ministers were deemed to be social parasites and lost their rights to work and even their food rations. Together, these phenomena crushed much of the organized Christian activity in Russia.

Outward signs of Christian worship abruptly revived as the Soviet regime roused its people to defend Mother Russia against the Nazi invaders (1941). Churches reopened and priests even blessed tanks as they left for the front. While this was surely a cynical ploy to enlist the support of its citizens, the Soviet thaw did provide room for Christian churches to grow. Ironically, the government threw most of its support behind the Russian Orthodox Church, which it had recently condemned as an enemy of socialism.

After the 1945 victory, the relationship waxed and waned between Christian denominations and the state. Except for a short revival of militant atheism under Krushchev, Christians were less overtly persecuted than they had been a generation before. Yet throughout the Soviet period, the state retained the constitutional right of antireligious propaganda while simultaneously criminalizing all attempts of Christian propagation. Openly active Christians, though sent to jail less frequently than before World War II, were precluded from professional advancement or elite education; the exceptions were those few men who rose through the Russian Orthodox hierarchy with the support of the Soviet government.

As a result, those who attended church often seemed to be old women (“babushkas”) who no longer had to worry about state interference. The Soviets used this as an example of the dying away of religion in the USSR, without taking into account that new generations of “babushkas” were taking the place of older ones as they died off. The rites of passage for Christians (e.g. baptism) were often kept secret. Marriage* became a civil act rather than a religious one.

The Soviet government also tried to control non-Orthodox denominations, especially those they feared as hotbeds of national resentment. The Soviet Ministry for Religious Affairs in the Baltic Republics of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia, e.g., considered Lutheranism and Roman Catholicism to be potentially anti-Soviet. Russian Old Believers in these countries, however, sometimes received good treatment from the state, which saw them as a bastion of Russian patriotism.

The year 1988 – the millennium anniversary of “Russia’s baptism” (when Vladimir baptized his subjects en masse) – provided an opportunity for Christian groups to test the limits of Mikhail Gorbachev’s policies of openness (glasnost) and restructuring (perestroika). Hence 1,000 years after its introduction, Christianity began to find a voice again. Scholars were allowed to publish actively on religious matters, churches were reopened or renovated, and the restive borderlands saw a resurgence of religious activity.

When the Soviet Union fell, Christianity exploded across Russia. The Russian Orthodox Church revived. Well-established Protestant groups renewed their presence in Russia, while Evangelical denominations found extremely fertile ground in Russia. Suddenly, instead of signs proclaiming Marxist slogans, subways were full of advertisements for Charismatic* preachers proclaiming their own brand of Christianity. Western groups sought to re-Christianize Russia, while Orthodoxy hoped to regain its own position of dominance in the country.

At the beginning of the third millennium, retrenchment of organized Russian Christianity paralleled that of the resurgence of state authority. In 1997 the law on religious associations gave privileged status to the traditional Christian churches found in Russia – Orthodox, Old Belief, Roman Catholic, Baptist, and some others. New denominations and Evangelical preachers have found it more difficult to open churches or attract members, since they are not listed among the accepted denominations. The Russian Orthodox Church, on the other hand, has tried to increase its public role, hoping to be the accepted moral arbiter during the post-Soviet period. A welcome sight for Christians across Russia is that of renovated church buildings, once closed by Soviet authorities and often turned into clubs, garages, or barns. These historic sites are increasingly being returned to use as parish churches and monasteries.

2. Distinctive Features of Christianity in Russia

Experiential, not rational, faith. In general terms, Russian Christianity places higher value on experiential faith than on intellectual faith. As Athanasius* wrote, "God became human so that human could become God." Without taking this statement literally, Russian Christianity has nevertheless developed in response to it. Salvation* for many Russians is a process rather than a state, a spiritual struggle (podvig) to be transformed into the image and likeness of God. While this is Orthodox theology, the emphasis on transformation through action has also influenced Protestants and other Christian communities in Russia.

A good marker of difference between the Russian Orthodox tradition and its Western counterparts can be found in the earliest years of life of its members. The Russian Orthodox Church baptizes children at a very young age, typically 40 days after birth. Immediately after baptism and chrismation* with oil, the child is a full member of the Church; he or she can take Communion immediately and does not have to be confirmed in the faith. The transformative power of baptism and the Eucharist, therefore, does not rely on rational understanding. These "mysteries" (as the Orthodox call sacraments*) are transforming agents no matter what the age or mental abilities of the believer.

The Divine Liturgy. For the Orthodox and Old Believers (which make up the large majority of Russian Christians), Christian life revolves around the Divine* Liturgy, which culminates, if possible, in the partaking of the Body and Blood of Christ. The process of worship in a liturgical setting asks a lot from those taking part: services are notoriously long and endlessly complex, involving the chanting or reading of Psalms and passages from the OT, canons, prayers, sermons, and NT readings. The most important parts of the liturgy for many Russians are not the words, however, but the associated actions: kissing icons*, singing, receiving blessings, bowing and prostrating, making the sign of the cross, and lighting candles. Worship in the Russian Church is the experiential opposite of Quaker* worship.

Liturgy and ritual can be understood as "theology in action" rather than as "theology of the mind." In some ways, this is well suited to a country with historically low literacy rates, since the Divine Liturgy does not require that people read the Bible by themselves. Yet the liturgy is not simpleminded; it often introduces complex ideas through its chants, prayers, and readings.

The liturgical cycle (fully carried out only in monasteries) confirms the authoritative texts of Orthodoxy: readings from the Psalms and OT; NT readings; teachings of the seven ecumenical* councils and others; recitation of canons and prayers that follow a lectionary year; and practices based on the generally accepted Holy Tradition, as well as on local religious traditions.

Icons. Icons* play an important role; touched, kissed, and revered, they are considered more than pictorial representations of heaven on earth. The people depicted on icons are in a symbolically transfigured state, identifiable but different because they have become the image and likeness of God. Put another way, salvation for Russian Christians might be defined as the change of a person from an earthly form to an iconic state, as portrayed by the holy images. Icons are therefore almost portals to a divine state of being. For that reason, they are often understood to have miraculous power that can help believers on their way to salvation.

The 17th-c. Old Believer schism highlights the importance of ritual. When Patriarch Nikon introduced ritual changes into Orthodoxy, he called into question the efficacy and truth of these rituals. For many Russians, this was tantamount to changing theology or creed. The most important ritual change had to do with how a person made the sign* of the cross on his or her body. When Nikon obliged Russian Orthodox to change the position of the hands (from a "two-fingered" gesture symbolizing the joined human and divine natures of Christ to a "three-fingered" gesture symbolizing the Trinity), they considered it equivalent to discounting the icons in their churches and the instructions in their psalmbooks, which explicitly showed the older Russian style of the sign of the cross. In fact, a century earlier, the Stoglav Council had condemned anything but the “two-fingered sign.”

Emphasis on spiritual transformation in other Christian groups. As some Russian Christian groups broke away from the Orthodox tradition, they often retained its emphasis on transformation. The most extreme cases were those of the Dukhobors, the Khylsts, and especially the Skopts, who physically transformed themselves through ecstatic worship, flagellation, and sometimes self-mutilation. Even groups that developed a theology similar to Anabaptism occasionally retained Orthodox ritual actions, e.g. bowing, making the sign of the cross, and prostrating. The Baptist view, emphasizing individual salvation through adult baptism, was rare in Russian Christian history. Charismatic Christianity, however, through its emphasis on transformation (related to the Holiness* Movement), has undergone an explosive growth in the post-Soviet period.

For Russian Christianity, community practices have been particularly important, and individual practices have been deemphasized. The liturgical year, including holy days, periods of fasting, and personal or regional commemorations, is given strong emphasis. For the peasantry in most of Russian history, especially when serfdom prevailed, the large number of holidays provided a respite from work. Parishes generally took the name of a saint, holiday, or miraculous icon, and celebrated the appropriate day of the calendar. In the post-Soviet era, rural communities sometimes continue this tradition even though, as is often the case, the parish church building has been demolished.

Religious authority. For centuries the Russian Christian tradition has grappled with the question of authority*. Should it reside at the community level or should it have a centralized hierarchy? Traditionally, the Orthodox Church was considered complete when it had laity, clergy, and bishops. After the 17th-c. reforms of Patriarch Nikon, Russian Orthodoxy tended toward centralization of authority. The bishop's seat (with its administrative bureaucracy) increasingly became the locus of decision making. Today, Orthodox parishes are led by priests who have been appointed by a local bishop. Yet, historically, the huge geographic space of Russia has also played an important role in the community structure of Christian groups. In the far north and Siberia, for example, Orthodox communities could go for months or years without the services of a priest. The lack of a clergy member deprived these communities of a complete sacramental life and yet strengthened their independent spirit.

Old Believers prefer a less centralized structure. They are organized in parish-like “conCORDS,” some with bishops, but the control of the parish remains more clearly in local hands. Old Believers are joined together in a “textual community” (as Crummey has argued) through their shared liturgical traditions rather than through their organizational structures.

The small Roman Catholic presence in Russia is governed by the centralized Apostolic Administration for Latin Rite Catholics. Protestant and sectarian groups have tended toward even greater local autonomy than Old Believers.

The monasteries. The monastic tradition in Russia has been very rich. As in the West, medieval Russia depended on its monasteries for cultural and social cohesion in addition to their primary functions: prayer and work. In Russia, as in other Orthodox countries, there is no monastic order and not even a word for “nun.” All monastic people wear similar clothing.

Monasticism waned during the 18th and early 19th c., although it saw some revival from 1860 to 1917, especially in female monasticism, both in unofficial hermitages and in sanctioned female monasteries. Many young women were educated at these institutions, and even some of the most elite aristocrats took the veil. The Soviet regime particularly targeted monastic communities during the Revolution and afterward, closing and destroying many monasteries and persecuting the monastic population.

The early years after the end of Communism saw a rise in the number of monks and nuns, a trend quite different from the rest of Europe. That phenomenon, perhaps in response to years of enforced public atheism, has since tapered off (see Monasticism Cluster: In the Russian and Ukrainian Tradition).

Women and Russian Orthodoxy. Although Russian monasticism* is in some ways gender neutral in its symbolism, the Russian Orthodox Church has generally retained conservative gender roles. Only men are consecrated into the priesthood and can be part of the hierarchy (see Women's Ordination Cluster: And the Orthodox Church); in fact, only men can serve at the altar. Women tend to take part in the liturgy by reading and singing and may take on traditionally male roles in the Church only in some circumstances, although they never serve as clergy. Russian priests may marry, however, and the matiushka, or “priest's wife,” receives respect for her position.

As in many other countries, Russian Christianity has undergone a profound feminization at the parish level. Women are far more likely than men to attend church and to serve it in nonclerical positions. They are likely to be the practical leaders of the parish. Old Believer women have often taken on more public leadership roles than women in the rest of the Orthodox tradition. In some congregations without a priest, women have served in pastoral roles. In the Protestant and sectarian traditions, women have played a far greater official role than they are allowed in Orthodoxy, although in conservative Protestant churches, women are still less likely to take leadership positions than are men.

Lay Christians (and some monastics) may take part in all forms of legal economic and social activities and may serve in the military. The Social Gospel tradition is not emphasized in Orthodoxy. Charity and almsgiving tend to take the form of individual initiatives rather than the intervention of institutionalized organizations. Yet a system of unofficial mutual aid has been most prevalent among Old Believers, Protestants, and sectarian groups and among rural Russian villagers.

3. Russian Christianity after the Soviet Era. The Russian Orthodox Church has recently begun concelebrating with the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia after years of fighting over the legacy of Communism. The Moscow Patriarchate maintains cordial relations with other Christian denominations through the World* Council of Churches and other ecumenical bodies, although Orthodoxy tends to embrace ecumenism far less actively than other Christian traditions.

The Roman Catholic Church and Protestant denominations have representatives in Russia, but in practice these tend to be somewhat separated from their Western European counterparts. Most of the Eastern Rite Catholic, Lutheran, and Roman Catholic believers in the former Soviet Union are now citizens of recently independent states in Central Europe.

If Russian Christianity has been dominated by Orthodoxy, its history during the past century has been overshadowed by Marxism*. All Christian faiths now struggle with the legacy of the official atheist policy and of a sometimes murderous regime. Hierarchical church structures were often infiltrated by the secret police: How should those men be treated now? Church attendance is low by historical Russian standards: Is it the fault of atheist education or of a broader secularization* of Russian society? Should the church that was most severely persecuted during the Soviet period – the Russian Orthodox – be restored to its status as state* church? Should “Christians” from outside Russia be allowed to “re-Christianize” Russia? Should there be an open marketplace for religion, or should some churches receive preference? Will Russian Christianity follow a separate path or will it come to resemble Christianity in Western Europe? All of these questions have yet to find long-term answers.

Statistics: Population (2000): 147 million (M). Christians, 84.3 M; 58% (Orthodox, 75.9 M; independents, 7.8 M; Protestants, 1.6 M; Roman Catholics, 1.5 M; marginal Christians, 0.2 M); Muslims, 11.2 M, 8%; Jews, 1 M, 0.7%; non-religious, 48 M, 33%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

ROY R. ROBSON

Russian Literature and Christianity. Until the 17th c., Russian literature was mostly religious, influenced by the Byzantine* Orthodox* tradition and the Bible and written in Church Slavonic, the alphabet invented by the Greek missionaries Cyril* and Methodius (9th c.).

The first notable text was Metropolitan Hilarion's Sermon on Law and Grace (c1050–51), which praised Grand Prince Vladimir, who converted his people to Christianity. Nestor wrote a life of the brothers Boris and Gleb, Russian princes canonized in 1072 as “passion bearers” (strastoterpets), because they suffered and died like Christ, not resisting when they were murdered. Russian hagiography developed its distinctive typology of sainthood (about 150 hagiographies by 1917).

The Russian Primary Chronicle (c1113) gives a Christian account of the history of Eastern Slavs (up to 1110). Many heroic epic tales and poems, like Zadonshchina (Battle beyond the Don, c1390), depict Russian princes as Christian warriors defending Holy Russia against the Tartar invasion (1237). Epiphanius the Wise wrote Life of Sergius of Radonezh* (1418), the national saint who encouraged resistance against the Tartars and developed kenotic* monasticism.

Starting in the 11th c., apocryphal stories from folklore were very popular (Descent into Hell, King Solomon and Queen of Sheba, Tale of Babylon). Literature in the 16th c. portrayed Russia as a powerful Christian empire. Domostroy (House order) emphasizes the fear of God, obedience in everyday life, and the proper way to revere icons*. The first theater (1672) staged many religious plays: Simeon of Polotsk's Comedy of the Prodigal Son, Tragedy of Nebuchadnezzar, and Holofernes and Dmitry of Rostov's Christmas Drama and Repenting Sinner.

After the 17th-c. Old* Believers schism (arising from resistance to revisions of the Russian Divine* Liturgy), a leader of the Old Believers, Avvakum*, wrote a polemical spiritual autobiography and several biblical commentaries, using the simple language of the peasantry. During the more secular 18th c., Russian classical writers, such as Gavriil Derzhavin, wrote religious odes, and the scholar Mikhail Lomonosov stated that Truth and Faith, daughters of the Almighty Parent, could never quarrel. Despite anticlericalism, 19th-c. poetry abounded in biblical themes: thus the romantic Vasily Zhukovsky wrote Tale of the Handsome Joseph, Death of Jesus, and From Apocalypse and composed the lyrics for the national anthem God Save the Czar!; Alexander Pushkin and Mikhail Lermontov developed the romantic idea of the poet as prophet*; and Alexander Griboedov wrote David. The theme of inexpressibility stemmed from the apophatic* tradition of Eastern Orthodoxy.

Two realist writers turned from writing fiction to preaching Christianity: Nikolay Gogol, in Meditations on the Divine Liturgy, and Leo Tolstoy*, in The Kingdom of God is Within You. Fyodor Dostoyevsky* addressed the problems of theodicy*, holiness*, and sin* and its consequences, e.g., in interpreting Christ's temptation ("the Grand Inquisitor" in Brothers Karamazov).

A religious renaissance began at the end of the 19th c. with Vladimir Soloviev's* philosophy, which influenced the "Silver Age" Symbolists with their reconsideration of the Bible and Orthodoxy and their view of literature as a new religion; among their works were Dmitry Merezhkovsky's Unknown Jesus, Leonid Andreev's Judas Iskariot, Alexander Kuprin's Sulamif, and Andrei Bely's Symbolism.

The 1917 revolution led to persecutions when religious literature was banned. Mikhail Bulgakov's novel The Master and Margarita portrays Moscow during the Great Terror with its "God-less" Five-Year Plans ruled by the Satan-like figure of Woland. In the 1980s, the Orthodox priest Alexander Men (murdered 1990) helped inspire a religious revival through his books on Christian faith and history of religion. With the 1988 celebration of the millennium of Christianity in Russia, most of formerly banned religious literature was republished. Many lives of martyrs of the Communist period were written; 1,154 martyrs were canonized at the 2001 church council.

ELENA VOLKOVA

Ruth, a book of the OT, narrates the story of Ruth, a foreign woman from Moab who journeys to Israel with her widowed mother-in-law, Naomi, where she meets her future husband, Boaz, and becomes the ancestress of the great King David.

Ruth was written either as an apology for the Moabite ancestry of David (c10th c. BCE) or during the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (5th c. BCE), when intermarriages between Judeans and the indigenous peoples of Yehud became a serious issue.

The book highlight Ruth's conversion from belief in the gods of Moab to the religion of her Israelite mother-in-law, Naomi. To support Naomi, Ruth gleanes in the fields of Boaz, a kinsman of Naomi and a rich landowner. As Naomi's kinsman, Boaz is obligated to marry Ruth under the law of the levirate (Deut 25:5–10), in which the closest male relative must marry the widow of a man who dies childless. Boaz marries Ruth, and they produce a son named Obed, the father of Jesse, who is in turn the father of David.

Although often read as a tender love story between a man and woman, the book covers a greater range of social relationships: those of husband and wife; mother and son; mother-in-law and daughter-in-law; owner, overseer, and laborers; resident and foreigner; native and immigrant. How one reads Ruth depends on one's context and social location. For example, readings of the Book of Ruth in cultures such as China, where mother-in-law/daughter-in-law relations are conflicted, will be different than those in cultures where this relationship is more harmonious.

Ruth 1:16–17 ("Where you go, I will go . . .") is a favorite text in Christian marriage ceremonies. The original context, however, is that of a foreign woman pledging herself to her Israelite mother-in-law. See also MEGILLOTH.

GALE A. YEE

Ruthenian Churches. See UKRAINE.

Ruusbroec (Ruysbroeck), Jan van (1293–1381), Flemish mystical* writer who ministered as a priest in Brussels until the age of 50, then retired to a more solitary setting. While in Brussels, he completed 5 treatises, including his masterpiece, The Spiritual Espousals, and subsequently wrote 5 more, leaving an 11th unfinished at the time of his death. Jan van Ruusbroec was unequalled in his descriptions of all stages of the spiritual life, from the practice of the most basic virtues to the experience of intimate union with the triune God. A critical edition of his works, including English translations, was completed in 2006.

JAMES A. WISEMAN, OSB

Rwanda was first evangelized by the White* Fathers (Society of Missionaries of Africa, since 1868), led by Bishop Jean-Joseph Hirth, who arrived in 1900 from Uganda, where there had been intense religious wars. Impressed by the strong monarchy and the large population of Rwanda, the White Fathers met with King Musinga, who authorized their presence. In order to “conquer the country before the arrival of Protestants and Muslims,” they created a network of stations around the country (1901–13).

Protestant missionaries (of the German Bethel Missions) arrived from Tanzania* (1907) and established a series of stations before being replaced by missionaries of the Society of Belgian Missions, which came from Congo (1916). Anglicans and Seventh-day Adventists from Uganda, Danish Baptists from Burundi, and Methodists and Swedish Pentecostals from Congo successively arrived (1920s–1940s). An alliance of Protestant churches of Rwanda and Burundi, created (1930) for the sake of cooperation in education* and to avoid cross-proselytism*, split when the two countries became independent (1962). In 1978 out of 7.8 million Rwandans, 65% identified themselves as Roman Catholics and 22% as Protestants.

Within the Catholic Church, mass conversion known as the “tornado” ended with the conversion of the ruling class (1930s). In 1931 King Musinga, accused of threatening evangelism, was deposed and replaced by his son, Mutara Rudahigwa, a Roman Catholic catechumen. Baptized together with the queen mother, the king offered Rwanda and its people to the Virgin and to Christ (1947).

The Protestant “East African revival” emerged from Gahini, an Anglican missionary station (1936), but needed to be revived in the 1970s among the younger generation in missionary schools led by Peter Guillebaud (son of the first Bible translator in 1925). After the 1994 genocide, new religious groups emerged, including the Zion Temple and the Restoration Church, mainly among the refugees who returned but refused to join existing churches accused of being linked with the regime that caused their exile and even organized the 1994 genocide.

Church–State Relations. The overwhelming influence of the Roman Catholic Church up to the 1994 tragedy has been documented by many observers. It had the status of a state* church, which it maintained by defending the idea of the supremacy of the Tutsis – the idea of “Hamite supremacy,” promoted by educating an elite among the Batutsi social group as colonial and missionary subordinates. However, following the independence movement in Africa (1950s), the Catholic Church shifted its alliance to sponsor the Bahutu (Hutus), who in the “1959 social revolution” took power and held it until 1994. This new control of power coincided with the exile of many former ruling elite (Tutsis) and their families. The Catholic Church had been headed by Europeans – Mgrs. Classe, Deprimoz, and Perraudin (1907–73); they were succeeded by a local bishop, Vicent Nsengiyumva (1974–94), who was also appointed a member of the central committee of the governing party, the MRND. Furthermore, the regime of the Hutu Habyarimana (1973–94) initiated new relations with Protestants. Catholic and Protestant church leaders were given political and diplomatic status. Then, when many human* rights abuses occurred (the murder of political prisoners during the Kayibanda regime, 1962–73; the repression of religious dissidents, 1986; the October 1990 war and the massacre of those involved in the rebellion; and ultimately the 1994 genocide), Church authorities were unable to condemn the regime.

Interaction with African Religion. Roman Catholicism assumed its dominant position to the detriment of African* Religion, as well as of Protestantism and Islam*, which had no political protection. Converting to Catholicism meant being open to progress; adherents of the traditional African Religion were considered old-fashioned followers of a demonic* religion* and were legally repressed. The Catholic Church had abundant material, economic, and cultural means (e.g. schools, hospitals) to impose its worldview. The new converts had to adopt Catholicism as the true religion of the true God.

Although no dialogue between the two religions was tolerated, some Catholic believers, like Father Bernardin Muzungu (author of God of Our Fathers, three volumes on African Religion), found issues of common interest. Yet Catholicism was suspicious of a religion that was integral to the Rwandan civilization. The name “Imana” (“God” in the Rwandan language) was replaced by the Swahili name “Mungu.” Any association with the practices of African Religion, such as consulting diviners (kuraguza), appeasing the spirits of ancestors* (guterekera), or participating in the cult of religious heroes (Lyangombe and Nyabingi), was considered sacrilege.

Ecumenism. Despite the ecumenical proposals of Vatican* II and the efforts of the World* Council of Churches to achieve unity, the likelihood of implementing ecumenism remained distant. For example, in 1968 and 1972 documents of the Conference of Roman Catholic Bishops of Rwanda and Burundi, only three categories of people were acknowledged: Roman Catholics, catechumens, and pagans. This was a reflection of a long anti-ecumenical history, fueled by the Protestants’ lack of unity, their anti-Catholicism, and their lack of trained theologians to discuss the relevant issues with well-trained Catholic clergy. Nevertheless, a few common initiatives were undertaken, including the translation of the Bible into a revised Kinyarwanda language (1981); the establishment of Bufmar (Bureau des Formations Médicales Agréées du Rwanda), a church-affiliated health organization that interacts with the government regarding church-sponsored hospitals and clinics; the creation of the Committee of Contacts for Protestant and Catholic hierarchies amid the political turmoil of 1990, in order to minister to politicians and influence them; and joint but unsuccessful efforts to play a reconciling role in the 1993 crisis, which led to the April 1994 genocide during which more than a million people were killed.

Today, three entities – the Conference of Roman Catholic Bishops, the Council of Protestant Churches, and the new Alliance of Evangelical Churches – are competing to win over people by operating their own schools and universities, hospitals, rural projects, and programs in healing* and reconciliation*. Some churches, like the Presbyterian Church in Rwanda and the Council of Protestant Churches, confessed and repented for having failed to stand against the genocide. Others, including the Roman Catholic Church, still have to declare their position.

Statistics: Population (2000): 7.7 million (M). Christians, 6.4 M, 83% (Roman Catholics, 4 M; Protestants, 1.6 M; Anglicans, 0.6 M; members of African Instituted Churches, 0.17 M); African Religionists, 0.7 M, 9%; Muslims, 0.6 M, 8%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

THARCISSE GATWA

Ryerson, Egerton (1803–82), born in Upper Canada*, had an Evangelical* conversion* experience, was ordained in the Methodist Church (1827). As an itinerant preacher, Egerton soon became the leading challenger of Strachan* and of Tory and Anglican privilege, publishing letters and articles, and editing (1829–39) the Methodist journal The Christian Guardian, which argued for the equality of religious denominations. Appointed school superintendent in Upper Canada (1844–76), Ryerson fashioned Ontario’s dual public school system (highly centralized nondenominational schools, allowing public Roman Catholic schools for the Catholic minority). See also CANADA.

ROBERT CHOQUETTE

S

Sabbatarianism, emphasis on the observance of the Sabbath (Sunday) as a day of rest, found especially among English and Scottish Calvinists. More generally, a tendency toward a legalistic view of Christianity. See also SPORTS, BOOK OF.

Sabbath, in the Bible the seventh day of the week, a day of abstinence from secular work to be observed as a day blessed and consecrated by God (Exod 20:10–11). It has religious, social, and humanitarian significance, as emphasized in Isa 58:13–14; Jer 17, 19–27; and Ezekiel. In the Gospels, Jesus worships on the Sabbath (e.g. Luke 4:16), although he also heals on that day. He declares himself Lord of the Sabbath in controversial debates, which some interpret to mean that Jesus abrogated the Sabbath and some that Jesus restored the Sabbath as a day of benefit for humankind. The Sabbath is observed in Judaism, by Seventh*-day Adventists, and by the Ethiopian* Church. Since the Reformation, “Sabbath” has also referred to Sunday as “the Lord’s Day,” a day of rest. See also LABOR, THEOLOGIES OF.

Sabellianism, the Monarchianist* views held by Sabellius, possibly a presbyter active in the debate over Modalism* in Rome (c217–20). See also MONARCHIANS.

Sabiniana, intrepid female deacon* of Antioch, aunt of John* Chrysostom. She followed him into exile in 404; although she was of advanced age and travel was difficult for her, she declared she would go anywhere with him, “young in her willingness and insensitive to her sufferings.” John praises her in a letter to Olympias*. Palladius* was impressed when meeting her earlier in Antioch. As a deacon of the church in Antioch, she was active in ministry. See also DEACONESS.

CAROLYN OSIEK

Sacramental, (1) as an adjective, pertaining to the sacraments, especially the Lord’s* Supper; also, like the sacraments, as in “sacramental universe,” manifesting God and mediating grace; (2) as a noun, a rite or observance like the sacraments but not included among them (e.g. anointing with oil).

Sacramental Theology in Eastern Orthodox Churches. The Byzantine theological tradition calls the sacraments “mysteries” because every sacramental celebration represents and actualizes, by the work of the Holy Spirit, the original and fundamental mystery*: the self-giving of Christ to the Father for the salvation* of the world. Every liturgical celebration of the Orthodox Church draws on and participates in this mystery through the symbols* of the bread*, wine*, and water* and the acts of the imposition of hands (see Laying on of Hands) and the blessing, and the text associated with them. On a personal and ecclesiastical level, the sacraments have a “mystical” function: the union of people with God and participation in the divine life. Because of this perspective, individual Eastern Orthodox churches have not felt the need to define an exact number of sacraments. Theodore* Studite (759–826), e.g., following Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite, lists six “mysteries” (illumination, Eucharist, chrismation*, ordination, monastic profession, and funerals). At present the Eastern Orthodox Church has seven sacraments (as the Roman Catholic Church does), possibly by association with the sacred number seven or with the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit (as suggested by Symeon of Thessalonica; d1419).

Modern Greek theology underscores the dynamic character of the “mystery” and tends to reject the sevenfold medieval doctrine of the sacraments, reintroducing among them the monastic profession and funerals. Because of the doctrine of theosis* (divinization), it is pointless to specify which “particular grace” is attached to each sacrament.

The acknowledgment of the sacraments celebrated in the other Christian churches, baptism included, is a delicate issue. Two principles are in tension: (1) strict orthodoxy (akribeia), which denies any liturgical action of the Holy* Spirit outside of the Orthodox Communion – since recognizing the efficacy of another church’s sacraments would mean acknowledging they are “Orthodox”; and (2) ecumenical openness (oikonomia), according to which, for the sake of the faithful, improper liturgical acts can be, case by case, “healed” or “filled with life.” In the absence of a common declaration of the Orthodox churches on the efficacy of the sacraments celebrated outside of the Orthodox Church, there is no way to know, when Orthodox churches have recognized other churches’ sacraments, whether they did so because of oikonomia or because of akribeia. The principle of akribeia has been applied against the Roman Catholic Church only since the 15th c. as a reaction to the “Decree of Union” of the Council of Florence*. See also SACRAMENTS AS MYSTERIES IN EASTERN ORTHODOX CHURCHES.

STEFANO PARENTI

Sacramental Theology in Western Churches.

is the systematic study of those ritual ceremonies, especially baptism* and the Eucharist*, that the church traces back to Jesus’ public ministry, his post-Resurrection appearances, or even to the Holy* Spirit’s inspiration during the church’s formative apostolic era. Reflecting on its firm belief in the incarnation* of the Son of God, the church recognized that matter, including the human body of Christ, can be a bearer or channel of grace*. Thus, in response to an instruction by Christ, the ritual of pouring water* on the head of a catechumen in order to initiate him or her into the church “in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit” is believed to convey countless spiritual blessings and privileges on the recipient. Similarly, the bread* and wine* liturgically blessed, as Jesus blessed them during the Last Supper, is seen by faith to allow the believer to enter into sacramental communion with the body and blood of the Savior. These two rituals constitute the foundation of sacramental theology.

Along with baptism and the Eucharist, the first-millennium church recognized other rites as conveying God’s blessings, healings, and covenantal* renewal through matter and a specifying prayer. Among these rites were anointing* with blessed oil or chrism* to designate the outpouring of the Holy* Spirit. (For Eastern Orthodoxy, see Sacramental Theology in Eastern Orthodox Churches; this anointing was part of the triple rite of initiation, whereas the Western Church came to separate the actions, reserving anointing for a later conferral by a bishop.) Public or private avowal of post-baptismal sin to a minister of the church, with the assignment of a penance*, was practiced in response to Jesus’ instruction to the Twelve about “binding or loosing sins.” Anointing of the sick* was another ritual that sought to remind those who suffered about Jesus’ healing ministry and the responsibility of the believing community to provide care for those who were ill. The public designation of official church ministers was practiced by the “laying* on of hands,” a ritual borrowed in part from Judaism. Eventually, even the church’s blessing on the exchange of marriage vows came to be associated with liturgical celebration.

In addition to these principal rites, the undivided church practiced rituals that at first seemed to fit into the same category: Christian burial rites, consecration by anointing of Christian kings or queens, consecration of abbots and abbesses, distribution with blessed ashes, and the use of blessed water to sanctify. Eventually, to avoid confusion and discord, the Western Church adopted the teaching that there were, strictly speaking, only seven “sacraments*” and that the other rituals should be considered “sacramentals*” or legitimate devotional practices.

With the Reformation, Protestant theologians gave pride of place to baptism and the Eucharist (which could be clearly traced to the NT), but felt uneasy about designating the other rituals as sacraments. They preferred to see them as church ordinances with grounding in the tradition of the church. Thus Reformation churches teach that there are two sacraments.

When medieval theologians reflected on the similarities of the seven principal rituals, they began to draw on philosophical categories to systematize these acts of Christ and of the church. This medieval and post-Reformation sacramental theology was heavily influenced by the juridical considerations of canon* law and even moral theology. Much attention was given to the sacrament-celebrating ministers, the recipients’ intention, the “matter” (e.g. water or oil), the “form” (the wording accompanying the ritual), the “effects,” and the valid and licit nature of the rituals.

Although medieval Scholasticism brought order to the understanding of the chief ritual celebrations of the church, it has appeared in recent times that the decision to combine the sacraments into a single doctrinal treatise de sacramentis in genere has somewhat obscured the uniqueness of each rite. The differences among the sacraments are more notable than their commonalities. Consequently, modern ecumenical consensus statements, with rare exceptions, have explored, how, e.g., unity of Christians through baptism, complementary understandings of the eucharistic memorial, the meaning of ordination, and other rites illustrate the incarnational principle operative in Christian communities worldwide.

In modern Roman Catholic theology, what binds the sacramental actions together is the fact that each action, to a greater or lesser extent, illustrates what is meant by the “incarnational* principle,” namely that material, human realities can be vehicles of divine grace*, not because of any intrinsic connection, but solely because God has so designated these acts to bestow divine favor on those who receive them with faith*. The rituals are not intended to be private, individualistic actions; each in its own way is a communal act of worship* praising God. See also WORSHIP CLUSTER.

MICHAEL A. FAHEY, SJ

Sacramentarian, Luther’s* term for the position of those Protestants* (especially Zwingli* and Bucer*) who claimed that the Body and Blood of Christ were only “sacramentally,” not physically, present in the Lord’s* Supper. The term has been used more recently in the opposite sense of taking a “high” view of the sacrament and its efficacy.

Sacramentary, service book of the Western Church in use until the 13th c., containing the canon* of the Mass* and the proper* prayers to be recited on particular days of the church year, but not all readings and chants; replaced by the missal* and the pontifical*.

Sacraments as Mysteries in Eastern Orthodox Churches. Byzantine churches defined their sevenfold sacramental doctrine only in the 13th c. under the influence of Western theology and officially confirmed it in the Confession of Faith (1672) of Dositheos*, patriarch of Jerusalem. As in the Roman Catholic Church, the seven sacraments are baptism*, chrismation*, Eucharist*, orders, matrimony*, confession*, and anointing* of the sick*. Their celebration was definitely fixed in Greek liturgical books printed in Venice (late 16th c.; see Sacramental Theology in Eastern Orthodox Churches).

Until the late 13th c., every sacrament was either celebrated in connection (before or after) with the Divine* Liturgy or was followed by the Eucharist. This tie was weakened through the centuries because of the privatization of baptism, matrimony, and anointing of the sick. Also in the 13th c., the rite of the ordination of women to the diaconate disappeared from the liturgical books.

In the Eastern Orthodox* churches, baptism is administered by the total immersion of the child or adult, and is always followed by chrismation and the Eucharist. Ordination to the diaconate and the presbyterate (priesthood) is conferred on married candidates (but if candidates are celibate when receiving ordination, they remain celibate). Regarding matrimony, the wedding is preceded by the betrothal (the couple exchanging rings) and performed by crowning the couple (sign of the glory bestowed on them by God and also of martyrdom*, i.e. self-sacrifice; see Marriage, Theology and Practice of, Cluster: In Eastern Orthodoxy). Confession is made not to the priest, but to Christ (the priest stands only as witness and guide); it can be personal, but also collective, without a specific identification of the sins. The anointing* of the sick is ideally performed by seven priests (but can be performed by fewer, and even by one) and may be performed over the healthy (usually before Communion). The sacramental formulas, when prescribed, are always in the passive tense (e.g. he/she is baptized, is crowned, is anointed) rather than the indicative (e.g. I baptize you), to indicate that it is God, and not the priest, who acts.

In the different Orthodox churches, there are no significant differences in the celebration of the sacraments, except that the churches of Russia and Ukraine adopted (late 17th c.) the indicative formula of absolution (“I absolve you” rather than “you are absolved” [by God]). In the Eastern Catholic churches (Uniates*), the Byzantine ritual has been abbreviated and partly modified in terms of the Roman Rite.

STEFANO PARENTI

Sacraments in Western Churches are ritual acts that are rooted in a firm belief in the Incarnation* (the human body of Christ as bearer of the divine) and in which matter, including the human body*, water*, bread*, wine*, and oil (chrism*), are bearers or channels of grace*, as well as divine presence and favor.

In continuity with the salvific actions of Jesus and his specific instructions to his disciples to baptize believers and to celebrate the Lord’s* Supper “in remembrance of me,” the early church faithfully continued these rituals and gradually structured them into liturgical formulas. There is evidence that the early church anointed with oil and prayed over the sick* and dying; there is also evidence that the church felt authorized to absolve believers from post-baptismal sin, and that the laying* on of hands was conferred on those who were to carry special responsibilities within the ecclesial community. Gradually these signs of grace and prayerful rituals came to be associated within a cluster of special rites entrusted to the church. Their number underwent some fluctuation, since actions such as funeral rites, distribution of blessed ashes, pilgrimages*, and the consecration of abbots and abbesses were seen as extensions of the established rituals. Pope Eugenius IV listed seven sacraments in his apostolic bull Exsultate domine (1439). This number was formally established by the Council of Trent*, which decreed, in opposition to the Protestant Reformers, that there were seven sacraments, no more, no less.

The Continental Protestant Reformers, such as Luther*, Calvin*, and Zwingli*, in reaction to what were seen as serious abuses in the sacramental practice of the Roman Catholic Church and a neglect of sacred Scripture, argued against the accepted sevenfold doctrine, identifying baptism and the Lord's Supper as the two authentic sacraments. Without necessarily denying the meaningfulness of the proper celebration of the other rituals, Protestants generally relegated these rituals to the rank of church ordinances.

Besides the conciliar and papal statements about the seven sacraments, a stunning altarpiece painted by Rogier van der Weyden (c1445–50) of the Netherlands depicts the seven sacraments. These sacraments were baptism*, confirmation* or chrismation*, the Eucharist*, penance* or confession*, anointing* of the sick*, holy orders*, and matrimony*. Medieval theology, partly by borrowing classical philosophical categories as well canonical notions, elaborated a vast systematic explanation of the sacraments (de sacramentis in genere), which focused on the matter and form of a sacrament, the minister and recipient of a sacrament, and other categories, such as one's intention as well as the valid and licit character of a sacrament. Baptism, confirmation, and holy orders were seen as conveying a permanent and indelible character or seal, so that they could not be repeated. To explain how it was possible for a sinful priest to administer an efficacious sacrament, the medieval Scholastics argued that the efficacy of a sacrament occurs ex opere operato (by the very fact of its being administered). This expression, actually a shortened form of the phrase ex opere operato Christi, did not deny the importance of faith* in the recipient (ex opere operantis) or the desirability that the one administering the sacrament be a person of integrity and committed belief in Christian revelation (see Sacramental Theology in Western Churches).

At the Second Vatican* Council, the Roman Catholic Church initiated a general reform of the sacramental rituals to enhance their meaning as communal acts of worship and to enhance the symbolic or sign value of the rituals. By entering into ecumenical dialogue with other churches and by concentrating on individual sacraments, Catholics and Protestants have ascertained vast areas of consensus and agreement. These mutual understandings have highlighted the fact that Protestants and Catholics alike both appeal to "Word" and "sacrament." The Lord's Supper, e.g., is regarded as a preached Word intensified by a symbolic, ritual action. Sacred Scripture* prepares for, illuminates, and undergirds what the sacraments symbolize. Roman Catholic doctrine describes the Church itself, by its relationship with Christ, as a kind of sacrament or sign of intimate union with God and of the unity of all humankind.

MICHAEL A. FAHEY, SJ

Sacrifice refers to a group of practices in which offerings are made for religious purposes, ostensibly as gifts to deities. The offerings vary (grains, liquids, possessions) and sometimes include sacrificed animals or humans. Such rites in some form have characterized virtually all ancient human societies, although there is no agreement as to whether they have a common origin and purpose or what their roots might be. Some prominent theorists see sacrifice as the ritualizing of early human hunting activities; others consider it to be based on an economy* of reciprocity where gifts are offered to the gods in return for benefits (such as renewed agricultural or biological fertility). According to some theorists, sacrifice was focused on a communal meal or was part of a patriarchal attempt to reorder kinship ties. Others view it as having been patterned implicitly on the violence* associated with scapegoating, by which human groups resolved internal conflicts. Although what actions sacrifice entailed is clear, their meaning is not.

Historic Israel and Second Temple Judaism engaged in specific sacrificial practices that provided the background for the thinking and terminology of rabbinic Judaism and early Christianity. Animal sacrifice was central, but other types of sacrifice (e.g. involving grain offerings) were also common. Sacrifice figures prominently in Scripture: the sacrifices of Cain* and Abel*, the "sacrifice" of Isaac* (see Sacrifice of Isaac: The Aqedah), the use of blood in covenant* making, the sacrifice of the paschal lamb during each Passover*, and the system of rites centralized in the Jerusalem Temple. Sacrifice is a paradigmatic act of worship. Indeed, the monotheism* of Judaism – the refusal to worship gods other than the God of Israel – is concretely defined by the refusal to offer sacrifice in any other name. An “anti-sacrificial” theme is also found in the Bible: in the averted death of Isaac, in the Prophets (Amos 5:21–24; Hos 6:6), and in Jesus’ critical attitude toward the Temple.

Sacrifice explicitly figures in Christian interpretations of Jesus’ death and, more broadly, in understandings of the role that Christ plays in the life of believers. Jesus’ death took place in the context of the Passover celebration with its lamb offerings. In the Gospel of John (19:14, 36), 1 Corinthians (5:7), Ephesians (5:2), and Hebrews (10:5–10), Christ is regarded as a sacrificial victim, an interpretation consistent with the words of Christ at the Last Supper about his death being offered for the sake of others, as presented in the Synoptic Gospels. The Eucharist* was called a sacrifice in the 2nd-c. church, based on its character as a representation of Jesus’ death and as a functional substitute for sacrificial rites in other traditions. The concept of sacrifice has been central in later theological controversies among Christians about the nature of the Eucharist (see Priesthood).

It is not surprising that there are different theological interpretations of the sacrificial metaphors* related to Jesus’ death, because (1) the key root term, “sacrifice,” can be understood in different ways, (2) there is both positive and negative material in Scripture bearing on Israel’s specific sacrificial practices, and (3) Jesus’ death is presented in the Gospels as the result both of God’s saving purpose and of human sin. Thus sacrifice can be regarded as having a positive quality, which the death of Jesus maximizes and fulfills. It can also be seen as essentially misguided and inadequate, abolished by the cross. Jesus’ death can be emphasized as a divinely mandated sacrifice to atone for human sin or as a divine identification with the victims of human sacrificial impulses (see Atonement; Sin).

These various interpretations converge on the same conclusion: whatever reconciliation* between believers and God or among believers had been sought by means of sacrificial practices (and particularly by the blood of victims), this reconciliation is now realized through one’s relation with Christ – hence the diversity of views of Christ’s death on the cross as sacrifice, of the atonement (see Atonement), and of the Eucharist (see Eucharist Cluster). One of the reasons that early Christians were regarded as irreligious by their neighbors was precisely their belief that ethical behavior, spiritual worship, and communal life rooted in Christ fulfilled the essential role formerly held by sacrificial rituals. Thus they could think of the Eucharist as a sacrifice of praise and of the Christian life as a means of presenting their bodies before God as a living sacrifice.

S. MARK HEIM

Sacrifice of Isaac: The Aqedah (Heb “binding”). Genesis 22:1–19 tells the story of God’s testing of Abraham by commanding him to sacrifice his son; Abraham obediently binds Isaac, only to be stopped from carrying out the sacrifice at the last moment. The language, “fraught with background,” leaves much to the imagination while introducing a poignant refrain, “The two of them walked together.” Readers learn that Abraham’s agonizing decision is only a test and that the deity is acutely aware of the patriarch’s ordeal. Deuterocanonical references to this story (Sir 44:22; Dan 3:35 [LXX]; Jdt 8:26) add nothing new, but later Jewish fantasy soared.

In 2 Macc 7, the mother of seven martyrs* rhetorically chides Abraham with the words: “Yours were the trials, mine the performances.” As if in response, a passive Isaac of biblical tradition becomes a volunteer who joyfully hurls himself on the altar (Josephus), making the incident a veritable sacrifice (Philo). The Book of Jubilees* links the story with the paschal sacrifice, and various Targums amplify this view (Neofiti Codex associates the sacrifice with a lamb bound for holocaust and has Isaac plead, “My father, bind me well so that I do not kick you in the way that your offering might be invalid”). Before the Christian interpretation of Gen 22 as prefiguring Christ, the Aqedah was probably understood to be a redemptive act, although the evidence is unclear.

Some theologians of the patristic period viewed Isaac as a perfect sacrifice and interpreted the story allegorically*, and mystery plays relate the story to suffering imposed on Jews. For many, Gen 22:19 opens the possibility that at one time the story ended with Isaac’s death. Jewish tradition refers to a divine resuscitation in the Garden of Eden. Poets, artists, and philosophers have been fascinated with this text (Wiesel, Rembrandt, Chagall, Kant*, Kierkegaard*).

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

Sadducees, Palestinian Jews, 2nd c. BCE to 1st c. CE, with conservative beliefs and practices. Although their name suggests a connection with the Zadokite priesthood, and a few known Sadducees had connections with the governing priestly aristocracy, the priestly and aristocratic status of all Sadducees cannot be demonstrated. In Jewish and NT sources, they are paired and contrasted with the Pharisees*, whose belief in resurrection* and angels* they denied and whose liberal interpretations of the Torah they opposed. Some of their conservative interpretations of biblical norms are paralleled in the (Zadokite) laws of the Qumran* community.

GEORGE W. E. NICKELSBURG

Sahagún, Bernardino de (1501–90), Franciscan* missionary and historian, director of the School of Santa Cruz de Tlatelolco in Mexico. In collaboration with students trilingual in Nahuatl, Spanish, and Latin, such as Antonio Valeriano, he produced the 12-volume General History of the Things of New Spain (Historia general de las cosas de Nueva España), the first, remarkable trans-cultural work. See also MEXICO.

MARÍA ALICIA PUENTE LUTTEROTH and
ELIZABETH JUDD

Saints. Eastern Orthodoxy, Roman Catholicism, and Protestantism have various understandings of who the saints are and their role in the life of the church.

According to Eastern Orthodox, all are “called to be saints” (Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:2), i.e. called to be personally holy (1 Pet 1:13–17, 22–23). Generally speaking, the formally canonized saints are Christians who lived with such virtue, through real communion with Christ, that their lives radiated purity and sanctity* to an exceptional degree, and usually with a significant impact on many people. Their designation as saints in no way implies that they are the only Christians to have lived with such sanctity. Canonized saints often demonstrated extraordinary wisdom in helping others spiritually and otherwise. Often, miracles were worked through their prayers during their lives, and especially after their deaths; miracles are necessary in order to for someone to be acknowledged as a saint. Today, saints are acknowledged and proclaimed as such through a ceremony of glorification (or canonization), conducted by a regional or national church in response to popular acclaim. The first Christians popularly honored as saints were the martyrs*, who had demonstrated exceptional faith in Christ (see Rev 6:9–11). Gradually a more ordered canonization process developed for saintly Christians who did not die as martyrs, though this process is much less formal than that in the Roman Catholic Church.

The basic current Roman Catholic understanding of saints is close to that of the Orthodox. However, the saintly OT figures (Heb 11:1–12:1) are not included in the calendar of the Roman Church. Canonization is a very detailed, legal procedure carefully delineated in canon* law, including an intermediate stage called beatification*. It is the pope who makes the final declaration for the entire Church about the canonization of every saint.

The Protestant Reformers vigorously rejected the understanding of saints of the late medieval Roman Catholic Church, since these ideas had led to serious abuses, especially practices – like indulgences* – associated with “the treasury of merits.” Despite some variations, Protestants consider all Christians to be “saints” (1 Cor 1:2; 2 Cor 1:1; Col 1:2), in that the righteousness of Christ is “imputed” to them (1 Cor 1:30; cf. Rom 4:3–11). Hence there is little or no recognition of canonized saints in Protestantism.

Special recognition of certain people exemplary for their great faith and personal holiness arose quite naturally very early on. Saints continue to be formally recognized in both the Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches.

DAVID FORD and MARY FORD

Saints, Devotion to, in the Orthodox Tradition. Saints are given veneration* (Gk proskune-sis) (not worship [Gk latreia], which is given to God alone) by the faithful in many complementary ways.

Each saint is commemorated on the day of his or her death* (a practice dating from the mid-2nd c.). Hymns devoted to the saint are included in the regular liturgical services for that day, and a service dedicated to the saint (an “Akathist hymn”) may also be held.

Icons* of saints are painted on boards of various sizes. Orthodox Christians usually have an “icon corner” in their homes where icons are kept and venerated. In the church, icons of saints are painted on the iconostasis (icon screen) and traditionally on the walls of the church; icons of the saints are also displayed for veneration on the day of their commemoration.

Relics* of saints are embedded in the altars of churches when the altars are consecrated. If a church has additional relics, they are displayed for public veneration at various times, especially on the day of a saint's commemoration.

During baptism each Orthodox Christian is given the name of a saint, who thus becomes his or her patron* saint. (The Serbian Orthodox have a patron saint for the entire family instead.) Through prayer, one can develop a special spiritual relationship with this saint, looking to the saint as a role model. Some cities and nations have patron saints, e.g. St. Demetrius for Thessaloniki and St. Sava for Serbia.

In the Orthodox Church, the prayers of the saints are considered especially effective because of the saints' exceptional closeness to the Lord and because many miraculous healings have occurred as a result of their prayers. Hence in public worship and in private devotions, the faithful frequently ask saints for their prayers and intercessions. Although not so systematically as in Roman Catholicism, some saints are associated with helping in particular situations, e.g. St. Nicholas in marriage* and St. Xenia of St. Petersburg for finding employment.

Biographies of saints and collections of their teachings are published to guide and inspire the faithful. Believers make pilgrimages* to the graves of saints, where their spiritual presence is often felt; many healings have taken place at these sites.

In the Orthodox Church, devotion to saints brings believers into meaningful fellowship with them, enriches their lives, and strengthens the bonds that link the church on earth with the church in heaven.

DAVID FORD and MARY FORD

Saints, Devotion to, in the Roman Catholic Tradition. The communion of saints is the great company of "friends of God and prophets" (Wis 7:27) in every generation of people who seek union with God. In this company, particular individuals embody certain values of their faith community in striking ways. Such individuals are customarily called "saints," although they are but a segment of the community, living and deceased, who support one another through memory and hope on their spiritual journeys.

Traditionally, the faithful express devotion to the saints by calling on them to act as benefactors for earthly petitioners. In this patron-saint model* of devotion, believers approach the saints as their intercessors before the throne of God. Saints rank higher than the living in the spiritual hierarchy and so can plead their causes and obtain blessings for them. Devotions based on this pattern include pilgrimages*, novenas*, veneration of relics*, and use of medals through which the faithful implore their heavenly patrons to intercede on their behalf with a distant God.

A more ancient pattern of relationship, that of companionship, emphasizes equality within the communion of saints. In this model, based on Scripture and early Christianity, the living and the dead are a community of the redeemed at different stages of their journey. They are related in mutuality across time and space and are drawn by the mystery* of love* that is poured out from Christ for the cosmos and its creatures. This model draws on devotional practices of memory* and hope*. Through icons*, lives* of the saints, and hymns of companionship, the graced community of the living have the memory of others' lives to spark their religious imagination and increase their hope. In prayers of praise*, the living proclaim gratitude for their past companions and confidence in God's ongoing providence*. The lives of those who have gone before provide inspiration and example and kindle a new fire of fidelity*, justice*, and love.

Liturgical celebrations like that of All* Saints celebrate this company of the redeemed, acknowledged and anonymous, living and dead, who are encircled in divine embrace and sustained by divine grace*. Such remembrances crystallize in the powerful litanies of the Easter vigil* and of particular faith communities. The rhythmic naming of ancestors* in faith makes present the empowering and subversive memory of lives that continually witness to the power of resurrection*. With the stirring response of the gathered community, such litanies create solidarity* in faith and hope across the expanses of time and space. See also POPULAR CHRISTIAN PRACTICES CLUSTER.

ELIZABETH A. JOHNSON and
GLORIA L. SCHAAF

Salome was one of the women at the cross and the tomb (Mark 15:40, 16:1). Tradition has taken Josephus's* word that Herodias's daughter (not named in Mark 6:14–30 and parallels) was another Salome. This Salome has loomed large in Orientalist Western art and opera, portrayed as both seductive and lethal. By placing blame on the daughter's sexuality* for John the Baptist's execution, Christians tend to excuse Herod, although he appears to have blamed himself (Mark 6:16).

NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Salvation. For most Christians, the concept of salvation suggests spiritual and future salvation – salvation from what separates people from God (sin* and evil*) and from the disastrous consequences of this separation (especially death*). Biblical views are more diversified. Salvation generally refers to deliverance from this-worldly bondage, threats, danger, illness, or death – from whatever endangers the existence or identity of a people, of a community, or of individuals – although salvation also has spiritual and future dimensions. Since self-salvation is relatively rare in the Bible, three questions must be asked: (1) Who needs to be saved, and from what predicament? (2) By whom are they saved and how? (3) What is the state of “being saved”?

Salvation in the Old Testament

1. Saved from What? In the OT, the broad terminology of salvation refers to deliverance and rescue (Heb nasal, malat, yasa), bringing to safety (palat), and redemption* (Heb gaal, “ransoming,” “setting free”; translated in the LXX as sozo, the main NT term). The paradigmatic salvation event is the deliverance of the people of Israel from bondage in Egypt (Exod 1–15). Other salvation events are found in the Genesis narratives (e.g. Joseph’s family is saved from starvation by escaping to Egypt; Gen 37–50) and the many texts referring to the deliverance of Israel from other peoples (salvation from Canaanite oppression, Judg 4–5; salvation from exile) and from oppression and social* injustice – a salvation that other nations will also experience “in the last days” (Isa 2:1–4, 49:6–23, 60:1–14). The OT also includes many references to the salvation of individuals from threat, disease, or death (Ps 7, 12, 43, 86, 109) and from barrenness (Judg 13; 1 Sam 1–2).

2. Saved by Whom and How? All these instances of deliverance are credited to God as Savior, “God of salvation” (Ps 17–78). Yet the texts also underscore the role of human actors, such as Moses*, “judges” (e.g. Deborah*, Gideon, Samson), kings, including David* and his everlasting dynasty (2 Sam 7; Ps 89), as well as the “Servant” (Israel, or a representative individual) in the Servant Songs of Isaiah (42:1–4, 49:1–6, 50:4–11, 52:13–53:12). Nonetheless, God’s role is always preeminent.

3. What Is the State of “Being Saved”? In the OT, there is a strong emphasis on this-worldly salvation as the restoration of the collective and individual good life. Yet this salvation also has a spiritual character: the overcoming of separation from God through the intervention of this God of grace* (hesed). The salvation from bondage in Egypt culminates in the Sinai covenant* and the giving of the Law; the salvation through the kings culminates in the building of Solomon’s temple; the redemption* from exile and the restoration of Israel (Isa 43:14–44:6) is also a revelation of the redeemer God that Israel is called to worship* and serve (Ezek 36–48; Jer 31). Furthermore, in many passages of the Prophets, salvation concerns the future. It is not simply past or present. A future and more radical salvation is expected beyond the present state of Israel, through new divine interventions (Amos 7–8; Hos 2–3), with a new exodus (Isa 40), a new covenant (Jer 31), and a new Davidic king (Isa 9, 11). These expectations progressively gained an eschatological* dimension, already in Isaiah, but mainly in Joel, Zech 14, and Daniel.

Salvation in the New Testament

1. Saved from What? The terms for salvation (related to the Gk verbs sozo, “save” and ruomai, “rescue,” and to “healing*,” “exorcism*,” and the “Kingdom* of God”) frequently refer to deliverance from physical threat (drowning, Matt 8:25, par.; shipwreck, Acts 23, 27, 28), death (Mark 5:23, 15:30–31), illness (Mark 5:28, 34), and demonic or satanic* possession (Mark 1:34). Salvation is both healing (from sin as disease) and deliverance/redemption from bondage to the pervasive power of evil (Matt 6:13, in the Lord’s Prayer) or of sin (Rom 2–7), which is directly related to death (1 Cor 15:56). Eschatological salvation is a “rescue from the wrath that is coming” (1 Thess 1:10). Since sin involves separation from God, salvation is also a reconciliation with God conceived of as redemption (from the bondage to sin), healing, or forgiveness (rather than condemnation, John 3:17, 12:47).

2. Saved by Whom and How? Although healing, deliverance, and redemption from the powers of evil and sin are at times credited to the faith* of the beneficiary (“your faith saved you”; Matt 8:13; Mark 5:34; 10:52; Luke 17:19), they are credited primarily to God and Jesus Christ. Such is the case of all the healings and exorcisms in the Gospels that are associated with the “Kingdom of God” as manifestations of God’s powerful kingly activity (Mark 1:15), as well as the declarations that Jesus came to save the world (John 3:16–17) and that Christ died on the cross for our salvation (1 Cor 1:18). Thus salvation has three components: faith; the intervention of divine power to overcome evil powers (in healings and exorcisms); and the power of the cross, the paradoxical power of kenosis* (the embracing of human vulnerability by the divine) resulting in resurrection* and exaltation (Phil 2:6–11).

3. What Is the State of “Being Saved”?

Although salvation is the restoration of the good life through healing, exorcism, or deliverance (as in the Gospels and Acts) and includes, for Jesus’ followers, participating in this salvation by addressing the needs of the poor, the oppressed, and victims of injustice (Matt 25:31–46), in the NT salvation is primarily spiritual: an overcoming of the separation from God because, in Jesus, God is among us (“Emmanuel,” Matt 1:23) and because, through Christ’s death, humans are “reconciled to God” (Rom 5:7–11; 2 Cor 5:17–21). The Synoptic Gospels express this by presenting salvation as “entering” the “Kingdom of God” (Mark 10:23–26, par.), “accepting” it as a child would (Mark 10:15, par.), and as “sit[ting] at table in the Kingdom of God” (Luke 13:29, RSV). Yet the Kingdom is also present in Jesus’ ministry (and beyond). Thus participation in the Kingdom is viewed as a deliverance at the Last Judgment* and as an eschatological entering into God’s presence for eternal life (Rom 13:11; 1 Pet 1:5). But those who will be delivered are already delivered in the present (they “were saved” and thus “have salvation” [Rom 8:24]; they already have eternal life [John 5:24]). Now they are, at least partially, healed or freed from sin, guilt*, bondage* of the will, captivity to Satan*, and spiritual death (justification*), although the resurrected Christ is still in the process of “putting all his enemies under his feet” (1 Cor 15:24–25).

Throughout Christian history, the necessity for salvation has been attributed to the loss of proper relationship with God, which, for many, results from the Fall*, i.e. the beginning of human sin* and hence alienation from God. In the Western* tradition, Christ’s death on the cross is the event through which guilt, the chief obstacle to salvation, is overcome (atonement as forgiveness and being saved from condemnation; see Atonement #2).

The Eastern Orthodox* tradition emphasizes salvation as healing from sin as a disease and underscores the positive effects of renewal through Christ: through the Incarnation*, divine presence transforms human life; salvation is not merely forgiveness*, but primarily liberation of the human mind from delusion and the renewal of human nature by union with the God-man Christ, whose healing presence is experienced through the church and its sacramental* mysteries*. Salvation is a process rather than a state, a spiritual struggle to be transformed into the image and likeness of God (see Theosis, Deification). Put another way, salvation for Orthodox Christians might be defined as the change of a person from an earthly form to an iconic state, as portrayed by holy images; the people depicted on icons* are in a symbolically transfigured state, identifiable but different because they have become the image and likeness of God.

The contemporary Charismatic* Movement puts much emphasis on salvation from evil powers now as well as for eternal life. For Liberation*, Feminist*, Womanist*, and other theologians and the large number of Christians who are marginalized and oppressed, the primary concern is with present-day salvation from oppression*, poverty*, and injustice; eschatological salvation is not a primary issue, though it remains important; for many the necessary salvation has been or will be met by Christ.

As already suggested, salvation is not an end in itself; humans are saved for a purpose. This teleology* becomes visible as one notes how salvation is related to such concepts as covenant*, election*, vocation*, justification*, and predestination*. See also ORDO SALUTIS; REDEMPTION.

DANIEL PATTE

Salvation Army (the) developed out of English Methodism* (mid-19th c.). It was founded as the Christian Mission by William and Catherine Booth* (1865), before becoming the Salvation Army (1878). Concerned with ministering to the physical and spiritual needs of the growing population of working poor* in London, the Booths created a unique blend of a denomination and a service organization.

William and Catherine Booth intended to supplement the work of other churches among the poor, but formed their own organization when new converts were not comfortable within, or accepted by, traditional churches. They structured their mission along the lines of the military, with William Booth as the general, the ministers as officers, and the laity as soldiers in God’s army. They developed their own flag and hymnody, and the local church was called a “corps.” The “Articles of War” formed their statement of faith, and William and Catherine Booth established a strong line of authority from the general down to the local corps, along with an efficient system for training leaders.

To become one of its officers, little formal education is required, but a commitment to serving the poor* and preaching the gospel is imperative. In many countries, people identify the Salvation Army exclusively with social* services. But the Army considers itself a church where members live out the Christian gospel in their daily lives. This dual emphasis allows the Army to adapt to local needs. When a Protestant presence is needed, the local corps functions mainly as a church. When strong churches are present, the Army, while maintaining a local corps, implements more service programs and becomes a major player in social welfare issues.

Although initially opposed to gender equality, William quickly accepted Catherine's assertion that women and men must be equal as officers and lay leaders. General Booth later noted that "some of the best men in the Army are women." Married couples who enter officer training are both ordained and share their social work and local corps duties. The Army has had two women generals. Evangeline Booth (1865–1950, youngest daughter of Catherine and William Booth) served as general from 1934 to 1939. She had begun to assume leadership roles in 1882; she then organized disaster relief after the 1906 San Francisco earthquake and the Army's famous canteens during World War I. Eva Burroughs (born in Australia, 1929) acted as general from 1986 to 1993 after serving in Zimbabwe, Great Britain, and Ireland.

The Salvation Army has corps in more than 100 countries. It operates evangelical centers, hospitals, schools, and social welfare agencies with about 15,000 officers and more than 1 million soldiers in more than 140 languages. With international headquarters in London, the Salvation Army remains committed to traditional Methodist theology while placing a strong emphasis on meeting people's physical and spiritual needs.

ROSALIE BECK

Salvation History (German, Heilsgeschichte), a view of the biblical narrative based on the romantic* and Hegelian* assumptions that the divine is expressed in and through history. This view, which originated in 19th-c. Germany, enabled many Christians to accept historical studies of the Bible; it was often overconfident, however, about what could be read from the historical data. See also HISTORIOGRAPHY OF

EARLY CHRISTIANITY AS DEVELOPED IN THE 19TH AND 20TH CENTURIES.

Salve Regina (Lat "Hail, Queen"), one of the oldest Western antiphons*, used since c1100, included in the canonical* hours and the Breviary*.

Samaria, Samaritans. Now nearly extinct, Samaritans, Jewish descendants of inhabitants of Samaria not deported by the Assyrians (722 BC), used their own version of the Pentateuch, remaining committed to the Law, keeping festivals, practicing circumcision, awaiting the Messiah, and worshipping on Mount Gerizim. Rejected by other Jews for their mixed Gentile ancestry, Samaritans were a focus of Jesus' ministry; he traveled through Samaria, spoke of the good Samaritan (Luke 10:25–37), and met with a Samaritan woman (John 4), an outrageous notion to righteous Jews. Early church fathers favored John 4, interpreting it from numerous allegorical* perspectives. Samaria welcomed the gospel (Acts 8:1b–28).

JEFFERY C. DAVIS

Samaritan, Good, the man who lived out the great* commandment in the parable that Jesus told (Luke 10:30–37) in response to the question "Who is my neighbor?" A priest* and a Levite* passed by a traveler who had been robbed and beaten by brigands, but a Samaritan* took him to an inn and promised to pay for his care.

Samson, last of the "judges*" (Judg 13–16). A Nazirite (ascetic*), he did not drink wine or cut his hair. He used his miraculous strength to conquer the Philistines (Judg 13–15). He revealed to Delilah the secret of his strength, leading to his capture. Brought to the Philistine temple of Dagon, with a new burst of strength Samson razed the building, killing many, including himself (Judg 16).

Samuel, 1 and 2, Books of. Named for the key character, Samuel, a judge (1 Sam 1–7), prophet (1 Sam 8–28), and priest (1 Sam 3), these books are included in the "Former Prophets" as the 8th and 9th books of the Hebrew canon, while they belong to the historical books (part of the Deuteronomistic* History) as the 9th and 10th books of the Christian canon.

The end of the period of the judges is the setting of the opening chapters (1 Sam 1–7). The demand for a king and the conflicting sentiments about monarchy in Israel (1 Sam 8–11) set the stage for the two main cycles of tradition: the election and rejection of Saul* (1 Sam 13–31), followed by the rise and reign of David* (2 Sam 1–24). In these accounts, 1 and 2 Samuel wrestle with the legitimacy of kingship and eventually establish David as the deuteronomistic template against which all other kings shall be assessed.

Authorship and sources remain matters of debate. Duplicate narratives (e.g. Saul's rejection as king, 1 Sam 13, 17; David's sparing Saul's life, 1 Sam 24, 26; the death of Saul, 1 Sam 31, 2 Sam 1) have led some to try to trace pentateuchal* traditions J and E across these texts. However, the continuity of theme, language, and character development emblematic of these pentateuchal traditions are lacking here. Others have studied the doublets in conjunction with pro-monarchic vs. anti-monarchic sentiments with little success. Based on themes and stylistics, Leonard Rost proposed that 2 Sam 9–20 and 1 Kgs 1–2 constituted a succession narrative traceable to a composer close to the events. By contrast, Martin Noth argued that the books of Samuel along with the rest of the Deuteronomistic History were written much later during the exilic period. Abandoning compositional questions, recent studies explore the narrative dimensions of plot, themes, and characters of the final form of the text. Close readings expose the vast array of characters – including the audacious Abigail (1 Sam 25), the wise woman of Tekoa (2 Sam 14), and the maimed Mephibosheth (2 Sam 9) – that contribute to these rich and engaging stories. Socio-rhetorical studies reveal the personal struggles (Saul's jealousy of David, 1 Sam 18), individual aspirations to act virtuously (David's kindness to Mephibosheth, 2 Sam 9), and even personal sin (David's adulterous and murderous deeds, 2 Sam 11) that confronted the communities with exemplars of moral issues. GINA HENS-PIAZZA Sanctification, process by which persons are purified and become holy. As God is holy, persons, times (e.g. the Sabbath), and things dedicated to God are called holy in the OT; the Christian life is described as holy (Rom 12:1); Christians as a community are called "saints"* (Phil 1:1, 1; Cor 6:2; Rom 8:27, 12:13, 15:25). The veneration of individuals as saints (first martyrs*, then ascetics* and other persons of unusual holiness) developed after the 2nd or 3rd c.

In the NT, sanctification is effected by Christ (1 Cor 1:30; Eph 5:25–26; John 17:19) and the Holy* Spirit (1 Thess 4:3–8; 1 Pet 1:2), is manifested through baptism (1 Cor 6:11), and becomes a human responsibility (Rom 6:19, 22). Good actions come from a "good tree" (Matt 7:17 = Luke 6:43), made so by God.

While Paul makes much of justification*, he says little about its relation to sanctification. Through the centuries, in the West he has been read as ambivalent – as assuming that all will be judged according to their actions (Rom 2:6; 1 Cor 3:8; 2 Cor 5:10) but mercifully justified by faith*; these actions are fruits of sanctification by God, as the passive forms "You were sanctified," "You were justified" express (1 Cor 6:11; 1 Thess 5:23).

Luther* differentiated between justification (God's imputation* of Christ's righteousness to sinners through faith*) and sanctification (God's transformation of their hearts through the Spirit), and based salvation* on the former alone. The Reformed* churches added sanctification as a factor in salvation, with the proviso that good character and actions, while far from sufficient, are considered holy on the basis of Christ's own holiness.

The Roman Catholic tradition links justification with sanctification more closely, affirming that pure motives and good works merit* salvation, but not in the strictest sense, as a reward, since they are the fruit of divine grace*.

The Eastern Orthodox* churches emphasize deification (theosis*), i.e. participation in the divine nature (2 Pet 1:4) through Christ and the Holy Spirit; because of the Incarnation*, not only the human world but the natural world is sanctified (purified of sin* as disease).

The Puritan* Movement looked for signs that a person was indeed predestined* to attain salvation. While faith in the grace* of Christ had been regarded as sufficient for the assurance of salvation, Puritans sought evidence of sanctification and found it in purity and holiness of life, in the renunciation of worldly pleasures (dancing, the theater), and in self-discipline and thrift, which gave rise to the "Protestant ethic."

Wesley* and his followers sought holiness of life, and their emphasis on "entire sanctification" or "Christian perfection*" gave rise to the theory of a "second blessing." Debates over its meaning led to several divisions within the Wesleyan Movement and gave rise to the Holiness* and Pentecostal* churches. EUGENE TESELLE

Sanctuary, a holy place, specifically the part of the church containing the altar*.

Sanctuary, Right of (cf. Gk asylon, "asylum," "free from harm"). By the 4th c., an offender who took refuge in a church could not be removed for a period of time. In the Middle Ages, this came to be 40 days after the taking of an oath of abjuration*, during which there was an opportunity to depart from the church. Secular rulers acknowledged the church's right of sanctuary and sometimes established their own procedures. After the Reformation*, the right was abolished in most countries, often in stages. In recent times, churches have offered sanctuary to conscientious* objectors to war, to undocumented refugees fleeing from violence, and to other people viewed as unjustly threatened by the law. See also REFUGEES AS A THEOLOGICAL CONCEPT AND AN ETHICAL ISSUE.

Sanctus (Lat "holy"), cherubim's* hymn in Isa 6:3: "Holy, holy, holy is the LORD of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory"; also "Blessed is the one who comes in the name of the Lord" (Matt 21:9).

Sanhedrin (Heb form of Gk synedrion), highest Jewish "council" and court of justice in Jerusalem under Roman rule. In the rabbinic literature, the Sanhedrin had exclusively religious functions (as in the talmudic period). But it is more likely that, as both Josephus* and the NT say, the Sanhedrin also had civil functions, subject to the wishes of the Roman governor (Saddarini), and thus the power to sentence Jesus (Mark 14:53–15:1, par.), Stephen (Acts 6:12), and Paul (Acts 22:30). Because these accounts and their interpretations overlooked the fact that the Romans held Jewish leaders responsible for maintaining order in their own society, these biblical texts led to anti-Semitic views.

DANIEL PATTE

Sarah (or Sarai) first appears in the Bible as the barren and beautiful wife of Abraham. When they travel to Egypt, he endangers her, to save himself, by passing her off to the pharaoh as his sister. God protects her and eventually blesses her with a son, Isaac (Gen 11–23). Judaism recognizes Sarah as the matriarch of the people Israel (Isa 51:2). Christianity claims her as a symbol of the new covenant* (Gal 4:24–26) and as a model of an obedient wife (1 Pet 3:6). Islam recognizes her as a paragon of piety and purity, who shunned adulterous advances by appealing to Allah (Surah 11:69).

PHYLLIS TRIBLE

Sarai (Heb "princess") was in Gen 12–25 the original name of Sarah* (also "princess"). The giving of a new name to the matriarch (Gen 17:15) as part of the covenant to Abram*/Abraham* confirmed that she was included in the covenantal promise; from this point in her story, she was no longer a barren woman.

Sarcophagus, stone coffin, often adorned with bas-relief carvings and inscriptions, used by Christians in late antiquity and into the Byzantine* period.

Satan (Heb "adversary"), in the OT, angelic being and tempter, prosecutor, or adversary of God; in the NT, tempter and chief of the demons. See also DEVIL, SATAN, DEMONS, AND DEMONIC POWERS.

Saturninus (2nd c.), Syrian Gnostic known only through Irenaeus*, said to be part of a tradition originating with Simon* Magus, who taught in Antioch. Saturninus was considered a heretic* for his doctrines concerning God as unknown to all and the creation of the world by angelic powers. See also BASILIDES.

Saudi Arabia. The Arabian Peninsula, which today is known for the near absence of indigenous Christianity, is one of the regions where Christianity was present as early as the 2nd c. In the 7th c., it became the heartland of the new religion of Islam*, which, although tolerant of Christianity in most of the countries it conquered, soon started to force Christians to leave its sacred center. Even today, Saudi Arabia requires its citizens to be Muslim, preferably of the purist Salafi type, which in the 18th c. was propagated by Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab; other Islamic schools encounter government discrimination. Nonetheless, over the past decades, the country has seen the growth of a considerable Christian community, whose size is difficult to establish. These Christians are part of the large group of immigrant workers and foreign military service members that make up about 20% of the population. The Christians among them, such as Philippine* Catholics, Indian Syrian* Christians, Palestinian Greek Orthodox*, Eastern Rite Catholics, and Egyptian Copts*, reflect a wide variety of nationalities and denominations. In addition, Protestants and Evangelicals of all kinds, as well as Latin Rite Catholics, are found among US, European, and African expatriates. Roman Catholicism, represented not only by Western Catholics, but also by Philippine, Indian, and Middle Eastern Christians, forms the largest denomination, followed by various forms of Eastern Orthodoxy. The size of the Evangelical and Pentecostal groups can only be guessed at. Public worship of religions other than Islam, much less any attempt to convert Muslims, is not permitted; one may assume, however, that some groups of Christians do include local converts. Although officially private worship is allowed, all Christian gatherings, including those in private homes, are viewed with suspicion, and if they are discovered, members are usually expelled from the country. This results in styles of worship and community that are small-scale, lay-oriented, and often without formal affiliations.

Statistics: Population (2006): 27 million (20% resident foreigners: Indians, 25%; Bangladeshi, 18%; Filipinos, 17%; Pakistani, 11%; Egyptians, 13%; Westerners, 2%); Christians, 10–30% of this group, i.e. 2–6% of the total population.

HELEEN MURRE-VAN DEN BERG

Saul, first king of Israel*, chosen after Samuel*, guided by God, reluctantly consented to Israel's having a human king in addition to, or instead of, God (1 Sam 8: 4–22; see Theocracy). God rejected Saul after he committed several acts of disobedience (see David). His visit to the woman of Endor* to consult Samuel's spirit is a source of much controversy.

Saul of Tarsus, the name of Paul before his conversion, according to Acts 7–26. See also PAUL THE APOSTLE.

Savior, one who delivers others from evil*, originally from physical harm or captivity, then from moral* evil and punishment. God is often called Israel's deliverer, especially in 2 Isaiah*. In the OT, the term was applied to human beings (Judg 3:9; 2 Kgs 13:5; Neh 9:27). In Hellenistic culture, saviors included deities, mythic heroes, and rulers. In the NT, "savior" is used exclusively for God and Christ; 12 of the 24 instances of the title are found in the Pastoral* Epistles, suggesting that its use (augmenting "Christ" and "Lord") developed in the late 1st c. in order to venerate Christ rather than the Roman emperor, also hailed as "savior." See also SALVATION.

Savoy Conference, gathering called by Charles II to review the Book* of Common Prayer (1661), with equal numbers of Episcopalians and Presbyterians. The Presbyterians, led by Richard Baxter*, offered a revised service book and asked that ministers who had not been ordained by a bishop be recognized. Both the revised book and the request were rejected. The 1662 Book of Common Prayer was unacceptable to the Presbyterians, and the Act of Uniformity (1662) required episcopal ordination; more than 2,000 ministers were removed from their positions in the Church of England.

Savoy Declaration, statement of Congregationalist* principles (1658). Its Confession of Faith, an adaptation of the Westminster* Confession, claims to be only an expression of the faith shared at the time, allowing congregations to frame their own confessions. Its Platform of Discipline declares that all the powers of the church rest with the congregation; broader bodies were given only an advisory rather than a jurisdictional function.

Sayers, Dorothy Leigh (1893–1957), an advertising copywriter, poet, crime writer, and impeccably orthodox Church of England theologian, had an exceptional talent for communicating the importance of theological thinking. A pioneer of religious radio broadcasting, she tirelessly argued for theological reengagement with lay* dedication to the business of living, with creativity in the arts, and with work and politics, and fiercely criticized the secular and ecclesiastical devaluation of women*. World War II renewed her appreciation of Dante's* Divine Comedy, and her translations, theological introductions, notes, and commentary on Hell and Purgatory remain unsurpassed. ANN LOADES

Sayings of the Fathers. See APOPHTHEGMATA PATRUM.

Scandinavian Literature and Christianity. In her Revelations, Birgitta* (1303–73) of Sweden combines theology and politics in an earthy realism, branding the king, the pope, and the aristocracy in biblical visions.

The Swedish translation of the Bible (1541, revised 1703) provided a source of inspiration for novelists and poets until 1917. The hymnbooks (1695 onward) and Christian lyrics, e.g. by Haqvin Spigel (1645–1714), Jesper Svedberg (1653–1735), Israel Kolmodin (1643–1709), Peter Dass (1647–1707), Thomas Kingo (1634–1702), Hans Brorson (1694–1764), Nicolaus Grundtvig (1783–1872), and Johan-Olov Wallin (1779–1839), remain a living part of Scandinavian literature.

Anders Arrebo's (1587–1637), Haqvin Spigel's, and Henrik Wergeland's (1808–45) great epics on the creation* mark the end of an era when literature was closely related to the Bible. The romantic poets found inspiration in old Northern mythology, and scientific developments in the 19th c. led to biblical skepticism. However, a new interest in Christian themes emerged. Søren Kierkegaard's (1813–55) Pietist* and existentialist* philosophy and theology influenced the early plays of Henrik Ibsen (1828–1906) and August Strindberg (1849–1912). After his “Inferno crisis,” Strindberg also drew on the OT.

Pietism played an important part in 19th-c. religious life and indirectly in 20th-c. literature. Selma Lagerlöf's Jerusalem (1901–2) tells the story of a revivalist group's emigration to the Holy Land. Vilhelm Moberg's emigration epic (1949–59) deals with political and religious oppression and new life in the USA. The corresponding Norwegian story was told by Alfred Hauge (1961–65). The novelists Sara Lidman (1923–2004), Torgny Lindgren (b1938), and Per Olov Enquist (b1934) are stylistically and thematically influenced by their Pietist background.

Despite the prevalence of secularism* and anticlericalism in 20th-c. Scandinavian literature, many writers, e.g. Jacob Knudsen (1858–1917), Kaj Munk (1898–1944), and Pär Lagerkvist (1891–1974), were concerned with religious and sacred themes. Gnosticism* is noticeable in the novels of Lars Gyllensten (b1921) and Sven Delblanc (1931–92), while Lars Ahlin (1915–97) developed an aesthetic* that made him a Lutheran theologian in his own right. Birgitta Trotzig's (b1929) poetry and prose are influenced by mysticism* and Orthodox iconography*.

Biblical rhetoric is still frequently employed in Scandinavian literature, e.g. in Christine Falkenland's (b1967) and Hanne Ørstavik's (b1969) novels.

ANDERS TYRBERG

Scapular, garment worn over the shoulders, hanging down in front and behind, a required part of the monastic* habit; in smaller dimensions, a sign of affiliation worn by tertiaries* and other persons living in the world.

Schaff, Philip. See MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY.

Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von (1775–1854), German idealist philosopher and speculative Christian thinker. Educated at Tübingen with Hegel* and Hölderlin; professor of philosophy at Jena, Würzburg, Munich, and finally Berlin. As a celebrated prodigy linked to German romanticism, he overshadowed Hegel, who later became his more famous rival. A Lutheran, he influenced Roman Catholic thinkers of the Tübingen school and Bavaria, especially Franz von Baader. His early writings include systematic philosophies of nature, of art, and of the absolute identity of subject and object knowable by intellectual intuition, and his System of Transcendental Idealism. Influenced by the theosophical speculation of Boehme*, he focused on issues of will* and evil* in Of Human Freedom. His voluntarist view of God as bipolar, as ultimate will, and as self-constituting, in The Ages of the World, contrasts with medieval and rationalist* doctrines of God, and influenced the thought of Tillich* and Berdyaev*. His ultimate “positive philosophy” embraces ancient mythologies and religions in a “philosophy of mythology and revelation” and sets Christianity at the apex of God's long process of self-realization and historical self-disclosure. The young Kierkegaard*, before attacking Hegelianism, attended Schelling's Berlin lectures on revelation*.

ROBERT F. BROWN

Schism, a breaking of the unity of the visible church, or the consequent state of division, usually involving doctrinal differences or accusations of heresy*. See also GREAT SCHISM.

Schlatter, Adolf. See NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY.

Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst (1768–1834), father of modern theology; professor and four-time dean of the theological faculty of the University of Berlin from 1810 to 1834. His early education was provided by the Moravian* Brethren (Herrnhuter) of Southeastern Saxony, a strict Pietist* sect. Even as he reconceived the meaning of religion, Pietism remained an influence throughout his life.

Schleiermacher's “Copernican revolution in theology” sought to come to terms with Kant's revolutionary philosophy, the scientific worldview, and the higher biblical criticism. Key to this revolution is the idea that the basic datum of Christian theology is not dogma, the letter of Scripture, or the rational understanding, but the feeling of absolute dependence as it has been awakened in and through the believer's relation to Christ. In On Religion (1799, 1806, 1821, 1831), Schleiermacher grounds religion in an original unity of consciousness preceding the subject-object dichotomy; in The Christian Faith (CF, 1821–22, 1830–31), the feeling of absolute dependence is grounded in the immediate self-consciousness (see Religion as a Concept and Christianity). In The Christian Faith, Christian doctrines are defined as “accounts of the Christian religious affections set forth in speech” (CF, §15). Rather than assume that pious feeling is the result of an individual's reaction to the content of a belief apprehended through cognitive capacities, Schleiermacher prioritizes religious experience. Kant's denial of the possibility of objective knowledge of supersensible objects played a role in the development of Schleiermacher's position. We have access to God only as God stands in relation to us, as the whence of our active and receptive existence. Hence we know God only as God is experienced in the immediate self-consciousness. The original expressions of piety are the poetic and rhetorical, from which arise symbols pointing past themselves to the ground of all that is (CF, §§15, 16). Christian doctrines are second-order statements reflecting and systematizing these original expressions (CF, 79, §16.1). Sin* is the blocking of the God consciousness, i.e. “an arrestment of the determinative power of spirit, due to the independence of the sensuous functions” (CF, §66.2). Through our relation to Christ, the power of sin is broken and the God consciousness awakened. In the eternal divine decree, God ordained that human nature should achieve its completion in Christ* (CF, §95). Jesus Christ is the archetype of perfect human nature, which, as perfect, expresses the divine love completely (CF, §97.3); our own perfection is achieved through our incorporation into the divine life of Christ, through which “[h]is motive principle becomes ours” (CF, §104.3). Christ’s saving work is his inauguration of the Kingdom* of God, a kingdom of divine love.

Regarding the Trinity*, Schleiermacher denied that the Christian experience of redemption implied original and eternal distinctions within the divine essence. Nevertheless, a proper understanding of the divine nature needs to show how the union of God with human nature in both Christ and the human community is possible. Such an understanding does not affirm eternal distinctions in God but is “capable of exhibiting in their truth both unions of the Essence with human nature” (CF, §172.2). In his influential Brief Outline (1811), Schleiermacher divided theology into three branches. Philosophical theology, the “root” of theology, identifies the essential features of Christian faith; historical theology explores its historical manifestations; and practical theology, the “crown” of theology, is the craft through which theological conclusions are implemented for the care of souls.

Schleiermacher played a foundational role in developing a general hermeneutic theory. He defined hermeneutics* as “the art of understanding...the discourse of another correctly” (Hermeneutik und Kritik, 75) and identified two dimensions of interpretation. “Grammatical” interpretation concerns the meaning of utterances in relation to the givenness of language: the vocabulary, syntax, morphology, and phonetics of a language all preexist the subject.

The “psychological” or “technical” dimension of interpretation concerns how the subject employs given structures and meanings already present within language for his or her own purposes. Both dimensions of interpretation are crucial if interpretation is to be complete. Schleiermacher’s theory of interpretation developed as he struggled to interpret both Plato and NT texts. His translations of Plato’s dialogues appeared from 1804 to 1828 and are still widely used today; his interpretation of Plato is considered a watershed in the history of Plato interpretation. Schleiermacher stood at the forefront of the development of higher criticism of the NT. His prioritizing of the experience of Christ over Scripture freed him to investigate NT documents just as one would any other historical text.

Schleiermacher’s philosophical ethics are only now being recovered in the English-speaking world. His focus on the transcendental ground of character allowed him to develop a theory of the relation of ethics to religion that avoids heteronomy and to combine the advantages of virtue ethics with an ethic affirming the significance of duty. He also developed an understanding of the significance of culture for ethical relations.

JACQUELINE MARIÑA

Schmalkaldic Articles, confessional statement written by Martin Luther*, endorsed by Lutheran theologians in 1537 in Schmalkalden, Germany, and included in the Book of Concord (1580). The statement was requested by Elector John Frederick of Saxony in response to the call of Pope Paul III for a council. The Articles have three parts: (1) trinitarian doctrine, which was not disputed; (2) Christ the only savior* (see Uniqueness of Christ) and justification* by faith alone, neither of which could be negotiated; (3) matters that could be discussed “with learned, reasonable people or among ourselves.”

SCOTT H. HENDRIX

Scholarios, George. See GENNADIOS II (GEORGE SCHOLARIOS).

Scholasticism is a method of inquiry, influenced by Aristotle*, that developed in the schools and universities of the Latin West between the 12th and 15th c., in relation both to the liberal arts and to theology. Its foundations were laid by Boethius* (c475–c525) through his writings on logic and his brief essays on theology. In the early Middle Ages, however, there was only limited awareness of the peripatetic tradition, the dominant philosophical system being shaped by the Christian Neoplatonism* of Augustine*. Scholasticism started to assert itself as a dominant movement in the 12th-c. schools of Northern France (see Hugh of St. Victor). Monks viewed some Scholastics as promoting a way of teaching theology that emphasized logic and disputation rather than meditation and silent reflection. In fact, Scholastics developed a range of perspectives while adopting a common educational method, which emphasized both argument and the critical study of written authority, whether in the liberal arts or in theology.

Although certain early Scholastics, like Peter Abelard* and Gilbert* of Poitiers, provoked controversy for applying Aristotelian principles to theology, theologians like Anselm of Laon and Peter* Lombard (mid-12th c.) succeeded in making systematic and rational inquiry into theological questions a standard method in the Parisian schools. Even if there were serious differences of opinion between schools of thought (as documented in John of Salisbury's Metalogicon), the consensus was that questions should be debated rationally, by recourse to both authority and reason* (see also Rationalism and Christian Theology).

In the 13th c., growing awareness of Aristotle's scientific writing, initially mediated by translations from Arabic versions and commentaries, but subsequently by direct translations of the Greek (many by William of Moerbeke), both challenged and gradually transformed Latin Scholasticism. When statutes were drawn up for the University of Paris (1210, 1215), an ecclesiastical prohibition was placed on lecturing on the scientific writings of Aristotle, including the Metaphysics. After 1231, however, this prohibition gradually ceased to be enforced. This led to a significant growth of Scholastic inquiry into many philosophical areas, namely logic, ethics, natural science, and theology, leading to the enduring achievements of Albertus* Magnus and Thomas Aquinas*. The Scholastic method continued to shape European universities at least until the Renaissance, if not beyond.

CONSTANT J. MEWS

Schweitzer, Albert (1875–1965), philosopher, ethicist, theologian, musician, physician. Born in Alsace, he earned degrees in philosophy, theology, and medicine, and after an early career as a Lutheran minister and scholar, he turned to humanitarian work. He left for equatorial Africa (1913) with his wife, Hélène Bresslau, a nurse, to establish a hospital in Lambaréné, in present-day Gabon*. For the rest of his life, Schweitzer devoted himself to his work in Africa and was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize (1953). During his last years, he spoke out in opposition to nuclear weapons.

Schweitzer published studies of Kant* and Bach*, autobiographical accounts of his life (Out of My Life and Thought; Memoirs of Childhood and Youth; On the Edge of the Primeval Forest; More from the Primeval Forest), and several significant books on religion and ethics (The Mystery of the Kingdom; The Quest of the Historical Jesus; The Mysticism of Paul; Indian Thought; The Philosophy of Civilization). His contributions on Jesus, in the spirit of rational* thought combined with a mystical* sense, called into question previous scholarly efforts to understand the historical Jesus. He concluded that although Jesus was a 1st-c. apocalyptic* preacher and a stranger to our own world, he proclaimed a message of love (e.g. in the Sermon* on the Mount) that continues to resonate in the contemporary world. Schweitzer's approach to Jesus, with its emphasis on ethical mysticism, shaped scholarship on Jesus for decades. In ethics and philosophy, Schweitzer relied on the insights of Goethe, Nietzsche*, and Schopenhauer, and his ethic elaborates on themes found in Jesus and early Christianity, as well as Indian religions (see Hinduism and Christianity Cluster). He was committed to a life of service and to the articulation of an ethic of reverence for all forms of life, human, animal, and plant. MARVIN MEYER

Schwenckfeld von Ossig, Caspar (1489–1561). A nobleman and irenic reformer, Schwenckfeld attempted to provide a “middle way” for Christian unity in the midst of 16th-c. religious division. He held that the Last* Supper celebration was properly understood as a daily “spiritual eating” by which faithful Christians are nourished on Christ's celestial flesh. He therefore called for a cessation of this ritual practice until all Christians once again lived together in peace. A mystical* spiritualist, he distinguished sharply between the written word and spiritual Word* of Scripture*, the visible and spiritual church, and emphasized the need for growth in Christian holiness (see Sanctification).

PETER C. ERB

Science and Christian Theology. The relationship between theology and the natural sciences depends on their respective definitions and on the worldview assumptions that underlie these definitions.

1. No-Contact Views. If one understands Christian theology to be an internal self-examination of the Christian faith* with reference to its distinctive views of God* and humanity, science is of no central importance for theology. No-contact views have been strong in 19th- to 20th-c. Protestant theologies. Schleiermacher*, the father of liberal* Protestantism, held that theology should elucidate the doctrine of creation* by excluding “every alien element,” scientific or metaphysical (The Christian Faith, 1821–22). Likewise Barth*, the initiator of neo-orthodoxy, contended that theology should not submit itself to standards valid for other sciences, nor should scientific descriptions interfere with theological expositions of the Christian credo (Church Dogmatics, 1932). Similarly in Personalist* and existentialist* theologies, faith in the Word* of God entails an I-thou* relation distinct from the objective I-it relationships investigated by the sciences. In his program of demythologization*, Bultmann* argued that although faith is compatible with modern science, theology should explain Christian faith only with reference to constant features of human self-understanding. Within Wittgensteinian* programs of theology, Christian practices are likewise claimed to constitute specific “language games” that are distinct from scientific practices with their corresponding rules. Theology has one territory, the sciences another.

2. Contact Views. This territorial view is hard to maintain if God is the creator and sustainer of the world at large. Then inevitably the world of which theologians speak is also the object of scientific descriptions, although languages and perspectives may differ. Hence theology must accommodate nontheological descriptions of reality, including scientific theories prompted by the observation of data and subsequently tested by experiments (Wolfhart Pannenberg). In classical Roman Catholic theology, we find a hierarchical version of the contact view: God the Creator is the principle or universal cause (causa prima) of the universe, who then gives a certain independence to the workings of the secondary causes (causae secundae) within the created order. While these causes are investigated by the sciences, theology complements the scientific perspective with a teleological* one: God uses natural causality to implement divine intentions – hence the Thomistic* principle “Grace* does not abolish, but perfects nature*.”

In modernity, however, theology is no longer the queen of the sciences. The order is reversed: Big Bang cosmology and Darwinian* evolution* (in their differing interpretations) provide the common foil for doctrines of creation and anthropology*. In the new dialogue* between theology and the sciences (initiated in the 1970s by Ian Barbour, Arthur Peacocke, John Polkinghorne, and others), critical realism* became the default position: there is but one world to which theology and the sciences can refer; no language can elucidate all aspects of reality in a one-to-one relation; yet both science and theology seek intimations of an endemically rich world. Critical realism exemplifies a contact view with ample space for mutual interactions between science and theology. Despite their similarities and differences in approach, science and theology both focus on the search for truth, or verisimilitude.

Other proponents of the dialogue are worried about critical realism’s emphasis on reference and representation. The coherence model argues more modestly that science and religion meet horizontally rather than in putative objects “out there” (world or God). Both science and theology include hypotheses about reality, yet the only accessible criterion of truth lies in the respective integration of relevant data into a coherent whole. The goal of the dialogue is thus to reach the highest possible cognitive equilibrium between theological contents and established results of science.

This dialogue may take place at different levels: (1) data (e.g. fossil records), (2) theories (e.g. Darwinian evolution), (3) modes of thinking (e.g. relational thinking), (4) metaphors and bridging concepts (e.g. “field” or “law and contingency”), and (5) worldview assumptions (e.g. determinism vs. indeterminism; naturalism vs. theism). Science is expected to have epistemic priority on levels (1) and (2). Under the constraints of science, theology therefore has to accept serious revisions. For example, there would be no Adam* and Eve* 6,000 years ago, and hence no explanation of natural evil* on the basis human sinning* and no harmonious divine design of the world of biology. At levels (3)–(5), however, theology may become a more active partner in the dialogue. It may both adopt scientific modes of thinking (e.g. evolutionary thinking) and be critical of specific scientific worldview assumptions (e.g. a closed universe).

From this perspective, the task of theology is to offer re-descriptions of a world already described and (partially) explained by the sciences. According to the coherence model, however, theology cannot resort to authoritarian thinking; the dialogue requires philosophical mediation. For example, a core theological assumption is that God is the author of the laws of nature (not their competitor). How, then, should one conceive of continuous divine action throughout the history of the universe? Divine actions would be more coherent with science if laws of nature emerge in time (rather than being flatly eternal), if laws of nature describe the habits of nature (rather than being strictly prescriptive), and if the statistical laws of quantum mechanics imply a structural openness of physics (rather than a closed deterministic system). Then divine creativity can be maintained by presupposing laws of nature without violating them (rather than remaining in painful tension). Similarly, a theological anthropology is more plausible if the emergence of intelligent life builds on a general evolutionary propensity toward complexification and self-directed agency (rather than humanity being an accidental by-product of evolution). Here a number of sciences become relevant to theology: not only the fundamental sciences of physics and (bio)chemistry, but also historical disciplines (e.g. geology, paleontology, paleoanthropology) and the sciences of complexity dealing with vast interconnected systems (e.g. astronomy, meteorology, ecology).

A third area of contact, apart from ontology and interpretation, is ethics*. Both science and religion are cultural forces that both interpret and transform the world. Concerns of research ethics, as well as of bioethics and ecological ethics, bring theology into dialogue with other sciences, such as medicine, applied genomics, ecology, and the many technical sciences. Alongside philosophy and the human sciences, theology is a source of information about ethical and practical issues.

3. Monistic Views. Apart from the independence and contact view, we find various monistic approaches. Some seek a synthesis of science and theology.

Teilhard* de Chardin's "Omega theory" of evolution exemplifies a theological synthesis encapsulated in a grand-scale religious interpretation of evolution; holistic religious approaches are similarly popular in New* Age circles. Followers of Whitehead's* process* philosophy exemplify a synthesis based on a philosophical metaphysics that includes a philosophical theology.

Scientific expansionists, by contrast, opt for a science-alone approach. Scientism entails the worldview that science is the only and self-sufficient source of reliable information about reality. Some representatives broaden the definition of science to include ethical and aesthetic* dimensions (e.g. E. O. Wilson's program of a "consilience" of knowledge). Other proponents claim that science is the only valid source of information about reality, while admitting that religion, like poetry, may have a legitimacy in the celebration of the natural wonders of nature (religious naturalism).

Finally, religious expansionists take a Christianity-alone view of reality, presupposing stark conflicts between science and religion, as normally defined. Examples are the young-earth creationism* of the Fundamentalist* Movement, which asserts the geological and historical inerrancy of the biblical creation stories or the more philosophically attuned Intelligent Design Movement.

NIELS HENRIK GREGERSEN

Scotfield Reference Bible. See BIBLE TRANSLATIONS CLUSTER; DISPENSATIONALISM.

Scopes Trial, sometimes known as "the Monkey Trial," in Dayton, Tennessee (July 1925), the most famous court case occasioned by the teaching of evolution* in the USA. John T. Scopes was found guilty of violating a law (the Butler Act) that prohibited the teaching of Darwin's* theory in the public schools of Tennessee and fined $100. Scopes's conviction was, however, overturned on a technicality. The public prosecutors in Tennessee made no further effort to enforce the provisions of the Butler Act (repealed in 1967). Nevertheless, the court proceedings attracted national attention in part because two famous public figures – Clarence Darrow for the defense and William Jennings Bryan for the prosecution – took part in the trial. Bryan died five days after the trial and came to be seen by some fundamentalists* as a martyr in the crusade against evolution. Many educated North Americans, however, regarded the proceedings in Dayton as an atavistic embarrassment. For many the Scopes Trial highlighted the connections between fundamentalism and anti-intellectualism. DAVID HARRINGTON WATT Scotism. See DUNS SCOTUS, JOHN.

Scotland, Church of. The Church of Scotland, a Reformed* Church, is the largest denomination and faith group in Scotland (c500,000 professed members plus baptized children and nonprofessed adult adherents). Reformed by John Knox* and others in the Calvinist tradition (c1560), its polity* was further developed by Andrew Melville (c1590). The 17th c. was dominated by struggles over state control with the Anglican monarchy after the union of crowns (1603, King James* VI/I); the resistance was partly inspired by federal Calvinist thought, which led to the signing of the National* Covenant (1638) and the ensuing Wars of the Covenant. In the British colonial era, the Church was responsible for extensive evangelism and church planting throughout the British Empire. The modern solution to the problem of the church*–state relationship was enshrined in a 1921 constitutional document (the Articles Declaratory) recognized in civil law, providing a separate church jurisdiction for spiritual matters. In the 20th c. the Church of Scotland declined in strength in the context of British secularization* and increased Roman Catholic strength in Scotland.

The Church holds the Scriptures* of the OT and NT (but not the Apocrypha*) as the supreme rule of faith and life, and maintains the Westminster* Confession of Faith as its subordinate standard, but with great variation in adherence to its terms. The denomination has broad theological diversity within the Reformed tradition; only a minority of its most conservative ministers and members would adhere to a recognizably Calvinist or federal* theological tradition. The Church includes proponents of different approaches to scriptural interpretation, and debates on matters of personal, social*, and political ethics are often significant in its corporate life. The Church is a full member of the World* Council of Churches, the World* Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the Conference of European Churches, as well as of national ecumenical organizations.

Worship is mainly preaching*-based, with a variety of attitudes toward the proper frequency of Holy Communion*. Baptism* was historically administered to infants, and this remains the principal practice, although many adult members are now baptized at the point of profession of faith. Praise includes hymns and choruses, but most congregations continue a tradition of singing metrical Psalms. As a Reformed Church, it has no cult of place and no significant "Holiness*" tradition as found in other Protestant traditions.

With its view of itself as a national institution, the Church of Scotland engages national and international issues at an institutional level, although, locally, congregational activity is more likely to focus on the immediate parish community and on partnership between the congregation and projects abroad. The Church always had a strong focus on issues of its own governance and on the Reformed model of decision making by tiered courts consisting of ministers of Word and sacrament, professional deacons, and local elders, all of whom are ordained and any of whom, since the 1960s, can be women. In ascending order of superiority, the Kirk Session (congregation and parish authority), Presbytery (regional), and General Assembly (national) administer the law of the Church, comprising common law and legislation. There is constant debate about, and adjustment of, the jurisdictional extent of the Church's authority (subject to no control by civil law) in four traditional areas: worship, doctrine, discipline, and Church government.

The Church of Scotland remains a significant institution in the life of the Scottish nation, with extensive social capital in local community work and high visibility in national debate. It remains overwhelmingly the denomination providing the ordinances of religion to those who profess Christian adherence without Church membership. Its missionary activity leaves a legacy of Presbyterian churches throughout the English-speaking world, all now self-governing but recognizing their historical connection with their parent denomination. See also UNITED KINGDOM.

MARJORY A. MACLEAN

Scotland, Free Church of. The Free Church of Scotland came into being on May 18, 1843, when some 400 ministers walked out of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland* and hours later constituted themselves as the Church of Scotland Free.

The "freedom" was very specific: freedom from state control. The roots of the problem lay in the 1712 Patronage Act, in which the UK Parliament invested in local "heritors" (usually landowners) the right to choose parish ministers, even in defiance of the wishes of parishioners. The Patronage Act bred instant and lingering resentment, with serious opposition arising in the mid-19th c., when the Evangelical revival* prompted a movement for spiritual independence. During the "Ten Years' Conflict" (1833–43), it became clear that so long as the Church remained established, it would be subject to interference by the state. This was a price Evangelical leaders were no longer prepared to pay. The result was "the Disruption" of 1843:

not a disruption of the Church, but a disruption of the Church–state partnership.

The new Church, enjoying popular support, proceeded to build hundreds of churches, establish three fully staffed theological colleges, set up a nationwide network of schools, and plant mission churches in every continent. In 1863 union negotiations began between the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church. To facilitate this union, the Free Church radically altered its relation to the Westminster* Confession. Instead of subscribing to “the whole doctrine,” ordinands now subscribed only to “the substance of the faith.” Union took place on these terms in 1900, creating a denomination of half a million members, the United Free Church of Scotland. However, 26 Free Church ministers and some 40,000 people refused to enter the union, arguing that the new terms of subscription opened the door to unlimited theological pluralism and created an entirely different church. Unfortunately, but inevitably, the union was followed by litigation. In 1904 the House of Lords found in favor of the minority and declared it to be the legal Free Church.

In 2000 the Free Church of Scotland had 180 congregations served by 125 ministers. It operated a youth program, maintained a theological college offering validated degrees, and supported international missions in South Africa, India, Colombia, and Peru.

Theologically, it adheres to the Westminster Confession; liturgically, it practices exclusive psalmody; ecumenically, it is linked to the International Conference of Reformed Churches; ideologically, it remains rigidly conservative on such issues as homosexuality* and women’s* ordination.

DONALD MACLEOD

Scotus, John Duns. See DUNS SCOTUS, JOHN.

Scribes, in the Hebrew tradition, interpreters of Torah whose teachings came to be transmitted orally in conjunction with the written text; later deemed authoritative among some Jewish sects (e.g. Pharisees*); eventually codified into Mishnah* and Talmud*. The NT frequently portrays scribes teaming with Pharisees in disputes against Jesus.

More generally, scribes manually reproduced personal or official documents, including sacred texts. Recent scholarship on the work of Christian scribes has shown that various social and historical influences, including early Christological controversies, anti-Judaic bias, and apologetic interests, appear to have led them to modify their exemplars (the manuscript from which they copied) and thus the transmitted NT text.

WAYNE C. KANNADAY

Scriptural Criticism, critical study of the Bible* as Scripture*, i.e. as read by believers for whom it is a Word-to-live-by. Reception* studies of Scripture (Wirkungsgeschichte) show that any scriptural interpretation has a threefold frame, reflecting three kinds of interpretive choices: (1) a textual choice of certain features of the text as most significant; (2) a hermeneutical* choice of a set of theological issues raised in dialogue with the biblical text, because of readers’ positive or negative concerns arising from religious experiences and convictions; (3) a contextual choice of a set of pragmatic* issues raised in dialogue with the biblical text, because readers’ life contexts must be ethically assessed in terms of their practical consequences.

The history of scholarship shows that, despite claims to the contrary, critical biblical scholars themselves always make these three interpretive choices. By choosing a method, they choose to view certain textual features as most significant; by striving (consciously or not) to demonstrate that believers’ interpretations are biased and providing alternatives, they make hermeneutical and contextual choices: there is no exegesis* without preunderstanding. These interpretive choices are quite visible when one compares, e.g., the sharply distinct scholarly interpretations of Paul (see Paul the Apostle).

Most readers of the Bible are not aware they have made such interpretive choices. As a pedagogical tool, scriptural criticism helps these readers to recognize that there are alternative interpretive choices, putting them in a position to assume responsibility for their own choices of interpretation and how they affect others. For exegetes scriptural criticism brings the different kinds of “advocacy readings” (e.g. feminist* or postcolonialist* Bible* interpretations) on a par with other scholarly readings. It also highlights the close formal similarities between scholarly and religious interpretations and offers the possibility of scholarly clarity in the process of exegesis seen within this (inevitable) context. See also BIBLE INTERPRETATION CLUSTER; SCRIPTURE; SEMIOTICS AND THE STUDY OF CHRISTIANITY.

DANIEL PATTE and CRISTINA GRENHOLM

Scripture. By saying that the Bible is Scripture, Christians affirm that this collection of texts (see Canon) is the Word* of God, the rule of faith* (regula fidei*) and life, or more specifically a “Word-to-live-by” that speaks to them as individuals and/or religious communities in specific domains of their lives, including their most intimate and private experiences, and their familial, liturgical, social, cultural, political, and universal life contexts.

Biblical texts are received as authoritative Words-to-live-by because they are viewed as having divine origin. Thus most Christians affirm that Scripture is “inspired” (originating from the Spirit*), written by persons “inspired” by God or the Spirit – prophets*, apostles*, sages, and teachers (e.g. 2 Tim 3:16; 2 Pet 1:21). For Jesus, according to the Gospels, Scripture is the Word of God (Matt 22:31), the Word of the Father (John 5:33–41), and inspired by the Spirit (Matt 22:43); the authority of Scripture is such that “not one letter, not one stroke of a letter, will pass from the law until all is accomplished” (Matt 5:18; see also Luke 24:44); it is “bread” with which believers should nourish themselves (Matt 4:3–11). Yet there have been disagreements regarding which books are “inspired” and thus are parts of the canon* of Scripture; whether Scripture has a unique authority* (for those following the Protestant Reformation) or an authority shared with the church and its councils and the pope (Roman Catholic Church) or shared with Holy Tradition* (Orthodox churches; see Patristic Thought in Orthodox Christianity); whether the Bible is the Word of God or contains or conveys it; whether the Bible is inspired and thus infallible* in all aspects (including scientific and historical statements) or only in matters affecting the human relationship with God; and whether the Bible as inspired should be understood as inspiring believers.

Christian views of the Bible as Scripture vary according to three equally important factors: (1) believers’ convictions* about God’s* role in human affairs and in these texts, (2) their reading/hearing of the biblical texts, and (3) their perception of those aspects of their lives that require a Word-to-live-by. Rather than being prescriptive (from an orthodox* doctrinal perspective or from that of an orthopraxy* regarding the way of relating Scripture and life), it is possible to make sense of the numerous debates about the authority of Scriptures by describing (using a phenomenological* approach) some of the roles that Scriptures play for believers, as summarized by common metaphors.

As lamp to my feet and light for my path (Ps 119:105), Scripture provides (individual) believers with knowledge of what is good and evil, a sense of direction for their lives, and thus also doctrinal instructions.

As rule of the community for assessing behavior, Scripture provides the community of believers with knowledge of God’s will and shapes believers’ moral life, so that the community/church might fulfill its mission.

Both of the preceding uses of Scripture are based on the position that believers search Scripture for inspired (moral and doctrinal) “knowledge”; the inspired, infallible Word is identified with the “content” of the text (“what the text says”). These roles of Scripture are most common in the North Atlantic world, so much so that they are often taken to be the only ones or “the” literal readings of biblical texts. But they are not.

As good news or as warning (as rule of the community can also be), Scripture motivates believers to do God’s will in response either to the good news of God’s love or to threats of punishment. Thus the inspired, infallible Word is the motivation “conveyed” by the text (rather than the knowledge of God’s will).

As book of the covenant (testament), Scripture conveys to the community of believers a vision of their identity and vocation as members of God’s people; by entering the story of God’s people, believers participate in this story and gain a true sense of relationship to others, the world, and to God.

As corrective lens and prophecy being fulfilled, Scripture conveys to the community of believers a vision of God’s interventions in their present life experiences; believers can recognize that the Scriptures are fulfilled (a role of Scripture strongly emphasized by the Gospels and Paul).

As empowering Word, Scripture is a performative* word through which powerless people are transformed and empowered to be agents of the Kingdom (as the poor are in the Beatitudes*).

As Holy Bible, Scripture is itself a divine manifestation; the encounter with the holy through Scripture iconoclastically* shatters believers’ previous convictions. Scripture is sacramental* (e.g. as in mystical* readings and in the Orthodox tradition; see Bible Interpretation Cluster: In Eastern Orthodoxy).

Each time Christian believers read Scripture, they adopt one or another of these views of the role of Scripture to the exclusion of other views, although in other life contexts the same believers might make other choices. Disputes readily erupt over the authority of Scripture among believers – who accuse each other of neglecting or denying the authority of Scripture – when they do not recognize the diversity of roles that Scripture can play as a Word-to-live-by for believers in different life contexts.

DANIEL PATTE

Scripture Principle, the Protestant insistence that the Bible, or the Word* of God conveyed through Scripture*, is the supreme authority for faith* and practice (sola scriptura, “by Scripture alone”). While the historic creeds* and confessions* of the church are honored, they are regarded as interpretations of what is taught more authoritatively in Scripture. The Reformed* churches stemming from Zwingli* and Calvin* adopted what has been called the “negative Scripture principle”: nothing is to be believed or done that is not explicitly taught in Scripture. Other Protestants tolerated devotional or liturgical* practices that were not found in Scripture so long as they did not contradict it. See also PROTESTANT PRINCIPLE; TRADITION CLUSTER.

Seal of Confession (the) prohibits, upon pain of automatic excommunication, a confessor from betraying a penitent in any way for any reason (1983 Codex Iuris Canonici* 983, 1388). Absolution need not have been conferred for the seal to apply; disclosure need not be express to qualify as betrayal. Can penitents release confessors from the seal? This is disputed. The safer, minority opinion is that they cannot. Others who might come into confessional knowledge are bound not to disclose such information, but their obligation is rooted in natural*, not divine, law. The seal of confession does not apply to other kinds of communications, but obligations of confidentiality might still arise.

EDWARD N. PETERS

Sebastian, St (d c288), martyr* said to have been killed during Diocletian’s* persecutions*. Ambrose* mentioned in a sermon that he was from Milan and was venerated there as a saint*. Sebastian is commonly depicted in art and literature as having been shot with arrows.

Second Coming of Christ, term used for Christ’s coming at the Parousia* (e.g. 1 Thess 2:19, 3:13). When the term “coming” (Lat adventus, “arrival,”) was also applied to his incarnation*, the Parousia became the “Second Coming.” The season of Advent* both celebrates the first coming and awaits the second. See also ESCHATOLOGY CLUSTER; MILLENNIALISM CLUSTER.

Sect (Lat sequor, “follow”; etymologically similar to “heresy*” in Gk), group of persons who adhere to definite beliefs and practices and form a distinct organization. The term can be used for any religious denomination*, but it has come to apply to zealous groups separated from major churches; the term “cult”* usually connotes a smaller group with more unusual beliefs. In sociology*, “sectarian” movements are those that, in a given historical context, adopt stricter ideals and ways of life than the mainline churches; many major movements and denominations started as sectarian movements in Christian history.

Secular Arm, medieval term in the West* for government. Unlike the church, it used coercive means, yet it was understood to be one part of the corpus christianum.

Secular Clergy. Unlike regular* clergy, members of religious* orders who live according to a rule*, secular clergy are priests who live according to the customs of the culture* of which they are a part.

Secular Institutes, Roman Catholic, since 1947, have given laypeople the opportunity to consecrate their secular way of life (in the world), under the three vows of poverty*, celibate* chastity*, and obedience, following a rule*, usually inspired by a religious* order.

Secularism and Secularization, terms in Western Europe and in the former colonies of France, Spain, and Portugal (where the term “laicization*” is also used) referring to movements, starting with Voltaire and the French Revolution, and laws that sought to implement anticlericalism* in social life through a strict separation of church and state, especially by transferring responsibilities for education* and other civic roles (e.g. registration of birth, marriage, death; burials) from the state* church (usually Roman Catholic) to the secular state, so as to avoid religious interference in social life. (For the cultural movement, see Secularization and Desecularization in Europe and North America.) See also ANTICLERICALISM; LAICIZATION.

Secularization and Desecularization in Europe and North America.

The Secularization Thesis. Max Weber* (1918) described modern society as a disenchanting world where the supernatural and mysteries* of transcendence have no meaningful place: as societies modernize, the social* significance of religion* diminishes. Since secularization theorists have focused their analysis largely on modern Western societies, particularly Europe, "religion" usually refers to Christianity and the institutional church. The "loss of social significance" is taken to mean both a decline in the power and influence religion has over social organization, and the decreasing salience, plausibility, and usefulness of traditional religious beliefs and practices for the majority of people in their daily lives.

Secularization theorists suggest that this uneasy relationship between religion and modernity results from a number of socio-historical factors, especially the processes of rationalization and the fragmentation of community. Rationalization is part of the progressive urge of modernization to harness and control the world so that life might become more predictable, productive, and efficient. Rationalization challenges tradition* to the extent that beliefs and practices are continually under review, judged according to their utility and effectiveness. This posed problems for the church, because much of its organization and authority* relied on tradition. As the processes of rationalization took hold in early modernity, particularly in the development of science* from the Enlightenment* onward, the church had to confront not only doubts* about specific teachings, but a change in how people thought about the world. It became possible first to query the religious worldview and then to explain the world* in its own terms, without any reference to a divine order. Although the Enlightenment was important for accelerating rationalization, secularization theorists have, ironically, argued that rationalization has been an inherent part of the history of Christianity itself, most notably in the Protestant Reformation. By stripping down ritual* to a minimum, Protestantism* took much of the mystery* out of religion. Moreover, by giving people more freedom to read and interpret Scripture* for themselves, Protestantism contributed to the individualization of beliefs and practices, which further attenuated the church's authority.

Rationalization forms a central theme in the Weberian analysis of secularization. A more Durkheimian* perspective highlights the significance of the fragmentation of social organization that arose as new technologies came into operation and society moved from small, close-knit, agricultural communities to large industrialized urban centers where economic production was divided into discrete functions and specialist institutions took over some of the social* responsibilities the church had previously fulfilled. More significantly, the church's role in integrating, celebrating, and marking communal life was undermined to some extent. Social differentiation left neighbors with less in common, and the maintenance of social order gradually moved away from reliance on shared faith* and common values to a shared recognition of mutual dependence and the operation of rational bureaucratic institutions and impersonal legal systems of the nation-state.

Secularization in Europe. Empirically there is little doubt that if Christianity and the church are taken as the focal point, there is a trend toward secularization in Europe. All the main indicators show that there is less interest and involvement in Christianity than there has been in past. Church membership and attendance have declined (particularly since the 1960s) and continue to do so. Fewer people hold traditional Christian beliefs, and for those who do such beliefs appear to make little impact on daily life. But Christian practices and, especially, beliefs are more robust than secularization theorists first predicted and are far from disappearing altogether, especially among the female population. The European Values Survey for 1999–2000 suggests that about a third of Western Europeans still attend church at least once a month, while a little more than three-quarters believe in God*, approximately half in heaven* and life after death*, and a third in hell*. The British sociologist Grace Davie characterizes the overall nature of religious belief and practice in Western Europe as "vicarious": most people like to know that the church is there and available to them should they need it, but otherwise are happy to let a minority maintain the tradition on their behalf. The fact that European culture is still steeped in its Christian past helps preserve the Christian memory*, and the significance of Christianity is further bolstered by the various links that have emerged between church* and state throughout European history. The secularization process in Europe is therefore far from complete. There are also considerable differences across the Continent.

In Western Europe, for example, the Protestant countries in the north tend to be less overtly religious than the Roman Catholic countries farther south. More precisely, while the Lutheran Church in the Nordic countries has benefited from close state ties, and religious identification remains high (and linked to national identity), church attendance is considerably lower than the European average. This contrasts with the Roman Catholic countries in Southern Europe (and the Republic of Ireland*), where levels of belief and practice remain reasonably high. Church attendance, however, is declining and there is a degree of anticlericalism that is not apparent in the north. An exception to countries with a relative endurance of faith among Roman Catholic populations is France*, where church attendance is particularly low. The French state is explicitly secular, and religion is not taught in state schools. This has meant the Christian memory is not easily passed from one generation to the next and consequently is atrophying at a fast rate. Though less severe elsewhere, the problem of transmitting faith from one generation to another is apparent throughout Europe.

In between the Protestant north and Catholic south are the countries where denominational affiliation is more equally balanced (notably the Netherlands* and Germany*). These countries display levels of belief and belonging midway between the northern and southern countries, but more people believe than actively belong.

In Eastern Europe, the secularization trend is complicated by the fact that, for a large part of the 20th c., many of these countries were influenced by the secular ideology* of communism*, which expressly sought to limit the church's potential for social significance. Church movements were therefore either marginalized or driven underground. The effects of this can be seen in the low levels of religiosity in, e.g., the former East German region and the Czech* Republic. A rather different reaction to this secularizing trajectory, however, can be found in Poland*, where the Roman Catholic Church played an important part in the eventual overthrow of the Communist regime (late 1980s). Catholic identity and Polish identity merged, each protecting the other. (For Eastern Europe, see Church and State Relations Cluster: In Europe: Orthodox Perspective; Gospel and Culture Cluster: In Eastern Europe; History of Christianity Cluster: In Europe: Eastern Europe.)

Secularization in North America. The USA is one of the world's most modern societies and yet, on all the standard measures, it turns out to be far more religious (Christian) than Europe, particularly in the southern and central "Bible Belt" (less so in the north and toward the coasts). Yet it is unclear exactly how much more religiously inclined North Americans are compared with Europeans; indeed, there is some evidence that secularization is also occurring in the USA, albeit at a slower rate than in Europe. (Canada lies somewhere between the two, although Quebec* is highly secularized.) Nevertheless, it is still regarded as a "good thing" for individuals to be seen as churchgoers in the USA, and while the state is essentially a secular institution, religious (Christian) language still features in political rhetoric, and vocal, religiously and politically conservative social movements (such as the New Christian Right) keep traditional Christian beliefs and values in the public domain.

The reason North America has maintained its Christian identity to a greater extent than Europe is a matter of debate. One important explanation draws on rational choice theory, according to which religion enables people to meet inherent psychological and emotional needs that cannot be met in any other way. Free of the constraints of a specific state*-church relationship, the USA allows for a greater degree of religious diversity by way of immigration and religious innovation, both of which have ensured that people have had enough religious choice to maintain their preferences of religious expression; hence religion remains relevant and its presence strong.

Desecularization. Rational choice theory is contested, but it raises interesting questions about the importance of religious diversity as a means of countering secularization. Furthermore, although traditional expressions of Christianity may be receding in the public sphere, it is becoming increasingly apparent in both the USA and Europe, that "new" or "renewed" forms of religious expression are developing. Some theorists have even argued that modernity has reached a point (sometimes called postmodernity*) where the conditions are set for a process of desecularization.

This changing face of religion in North America and Europe has three main facets. The first relates to an increase in the population of minority religious communities through natural growth and immigration. Islam in particular has a growing presence. Converts from Christianity, however, are still relatively rare. The second is a turn toward more conservative forms of religious expression within both Christianity and other world faiths. Sociological explanations for this include people's need for certainty in an increasingly uncertain world and the use of religion to articulate distinctive ethnic identities. Conservative religious groups tend to be more vocal than liberal ones and at the very least raise popular awareness of religion. Moreover, since 9/11 it has been clear that radical Islam potentially has considerable social significance for North America and Europe. In terms of the reestablishment of ethnic identity, the current interest in Orthodox* Christianity in parts of the former Soviet countries of Eastern Europe can also be noted. The third facet of religious diversification is a growing interest in personal spirituality* – a potential “spiritual revolution” (at least in Britain), according to sociologists Paul Heelas and Linda Woodhead. The continuing decline of traditional institutional Christianity appears to have made room for the rise of “new” forms of spiritual expression that focus primarily on the development of the inner self and healing and emphasize the experiential and emotional sides of spirituality over doctrinal “truths.” An important characteristic of the spiritual revolution is that it eschews institutional organization. Individuals are the authors of their own spiritual identity and expression, free to choose from a range of spiritual traditions – in line with the modern consumer ethos. Spirituality becomes a matter of personal choice rather than of public obligation. Sources of spirituality in this sphere are diverse, ranging from Eastern religions and Western psychology to pre-Christian folk religions and cosmologies of ancient civilizations – yoga, reiki, crystallogogy, astrology, Wicca, and paganism, to name but a few. Such practices are sometimes brought together under the broad heading of “New* Age” or Heelas and Woodhead’s term, the “holistic milieu.”

How socially significant are these new forms of spirituality? Do they constitute a desecularization of Europe and North America? It is uncertain. At present New Age is favored by a minority of middle-aged, middle-class women, many of whom were influenced by the 1960s–1970s counterculture. There is little evidence in either Europe or North America that New Age is of much interest to young people. That said, in the early 21st c. spirituality in its various forms has given rise to a growing and significant market in self-improvement books and magazines; it is in vogue in popular entertainment and the leisure industries; and the language of spirituality has appeared in mainstream health care (especially in the UK). Where does this leave us? Europe, to use Davie’s phrase, seems to be an “exceptional case” in the extent of its secularization, at last in comparison with North America and the rest of the world. It is true that modernity appears to sit uneasily alongside certain forms of traditional religion, but that is by no means the whole story. Religions*, including Christianity, are flexible – they can and do evolve. Only time will tell what forms of Christianity will flourish in the rest of the 21st c. What shape will Christianity take in Western Europe and North America as Christian memory mutates into private forms of spirituality, and as the Charismatic* Movement and developing “independent*” churches diversely emphasize individual experience, emotion, healing, personal choice, and suspicion of institutional organization? (For examples, see France; Uruguay.)

SYLVIA COLLINS-MAYO

See (Holy See, Episcopal See, Patriarchal See) designates (1) the seat (Lat sedes) from which authoritative teaching is given; (2) the authority figure on the seat: the pope* (on the Holy See), patriarch*, archbishop, or bishop; (3) the location of the seat: and (4) the assisting bodies of the authority.

Seleucia, Council of. See ARIMINUM AND SELEUCIA, COUNCILS OF.

Self-control (Gk enkrateia; Lat continentia). In Greek philosophy, control of the passions was highly desirable among public figures. Aristotle* thought that self-control, which involves an inward struggle, was inferior to habit*, by which one spontaneously does what is good. In the NT, the word and its cognates are sometimes used with philosophical generality (Acts 24:25; Tit 1:8; 2 Pet 1:6; Gal 5:23) and are sometimes used to refer to the control of desire (1 Cor 7:9). The latter became the usual meaning among Christians, for whom sexual discipline and asceticism* were of major importance. Christians whose ascetic practices seemed extreme were called “encratites*” (see Tatian).

Self-definition, Christian. See HELLENISTIC RELIGIOUS TRADITIONS AND CHRISTIANITY’S SELF-DEFINITION.

Semi-Arianism, a movement, named by Epiphanius*, that arose in opposition to Arianism*. Semi-Arianism, or more accurately “homoiousianism*,” was developed by George* of Laodicea and Basil* of Ancyra (358–60): the Son is “like in being” to the Father. Its emphasis on God’s threeness was harmonized with the Nicenes’ emphasis on unity, producing the orthodox doctrine: God is one nature in three persons. See also ARIANISM.

Semiotics and the Study of Christianity. Semiotics (Gk semeiotikos, an interpreter of symptoms and signs), the study of sign-communication and of signification (the production of meaning) provides theoretical models for understanding (1) sacraments* and religious symbolism and (2) the ongoing inculturation* of Christianity in a plurality of social, cultural, and religious contexts.

1. Sacraments, Religious Symbolism, and Signs. Communication through signs and the relationship of signs to the world were already concerns of Plato* and Aristotle*. Augustine* wrote of signum as the universal means of communication and examined the relationship between natural signs (symptoms, e.g. in medicine) and human-made signs (language and other cultural artifacts). Augustine pondered consistent symbol* systems (which presume connections between individual, community, and ultimate reality) and sacraments* ("sacred signs") as ritual acts in which material signs (e.g. water, bread, wine, oil) are bearers of grace* and divine presence. As a metaphor* suggests that two unlike "things" are actually the same despite their strong incongruity, Augustine, following Aristotle, maintained the intrinsic relation between sign/symptom and the signified; although the material signs (words of different languages) vary, they refer to the same concept for all humans. This symbolic understanding of sign is most helpful for theology as a discourse about a mystery, God who transcends human language.

2. General Semiotic Theories and the Study of Christianity. General semiotic theories seek to account for the overall signification process, because a sign is always also part of a signification process, as Augustine emphasized: "A sign is something that shows itself to the senses and something other than itself to the mind." Augustine's triadic view of sign provided the framework for semiotic reflections and its implications in logic from Boethius* (5th–6th c.) to Anselm* of Canterbury and Abelard* (11th c.), later Scholastics*, Bacon*, John Duns* Scotus (13th c.), and, following them, Charles Sanders Peirce (1839–1914), who further explored the implications of this triadic definition of sign for logic, pragmatism, and communication.

Peirce and the linguist Ferdinand de Saussure (1857–1913) initiated modern semiotics. For Saussure, a sign is the arbitrary (not intrinsic) relation of a signifier (e.g. the four letters and uttered sounds in "tree" or five letters and sounds in arbre) and a signified (the similar but not identical mental concept of the reality "tree"). Thus Saussure challenged the universalist view of the signified (all humans have the same signified concept) posited from Aristotle and Augustine to the Enlightenment* (when cultural diversity was viewed as being transcended in an intelligible realm).

From Saussure's perspective, any theological discourse (creeds, sermons, church doctrine, set of personal beliefs) or Christian practice (liturgy, prayer, family life, community life, social and political involvement) is a semiotic system through which Christians make sense of their lives as Christian participants in a culture*, characterized by a series of semiotic systems, including specific languages. Thus an understanding of Christianity depends not only on abstract concepts and theories about the divine, but also and primarily on its concrete, everyday involvement at all levels of social interactions and communications and in concrete religious practices, including the use and reception* of symbols, rituals, and beliefs in the semiotic systems that shape its life. Thus traditional theological and biblical studies must be complemented by the study of the conflicted daily practices of the Christian masses throughout history and today in different cultural settings.

The question is: how does one proceed with such a study? Semiotics provides methodological tools by exploring further the implications of the triadic character of sign: a sign is always a sign of something to some mind. Beyond Peirce, for the linguist Charles W. Morris, this triad refers to three aspects of linguistic communication: syntax, semantics, and pragmatics. Saussure's followers, including Louis Hjelmslev, Roland Barthes, Umberto Eco, and A. J. Greimas, broadened the application of this triadic view of communication to any semiotic system.

Thus, for Greimas, any semiotic system is characterized by three kinds of structure. For instance, in a narrative as semiotic system one can distinguish (1) the "narrative syntax," the plot and the interactions of the characters in time and space; (2) the "narrative semantics," the convictional* value system that spontaneously distinguishes between what is euphoric and dysphoric, real and illusory (this value system frames the perception of the narrative syntax); and (3) the "discursive structure" through which the storyteller pragmatically addressing an audience (with a different perspective) seeks to "make realistic" for this audience the narrative plot and characters and to "make sensible" the value system posited by the narrative (by constructing through the analogical* imagination a symbolic system).

Beyond its complexity, this semiotic structure (found in all semiotic systems) provides a simple general model for the study of all aspects of Christianity – e.g. theological concepts, liturgical, community, and social* practices, Scriptures and traditions, figures, movements, and sacred spaces (hierotopy*). From a semiotic perspective, one can anticipate that there exist several understandings of any given theological concept (e.g. Christ*) throughout history and across cultures because, implicitly or explicitly, each of these understandings is the result of a hermeneutical process through which three variable components are interpreted in terms of each other: (1) a tradition viewed as authoritative by the interpreters (e.g. a biblical story, a teaching by Augustine; narrative syntax), (2) the interpreters' religious, theological, or ethical concerns (narrative semantics), and (3) the interpreters' pragmatic concerns for people's needs in specific cultures and life contexts (discursive structure). From a semiotic perspective, this plurality is not problematic; without this inculturation*, the given theological concept would be meaningless for Christian believers beyond the original context in which it was formulated.

See also SCRIPTURAL CRITICISM.

DANIEL PATTE

Semi-Pelagianism, the name later given to the movement led by John Cassian* and Vincent* of Lérins. While they did not deny the role of grace* and condemned Pelagianism*, they insisted on a role for human freedom*, specifically at the "beginning of faith." Prosper* of Aquitaine reported their views to Augustine*, whose last treatises were directed against them. The position continued to be held in Gaul, especially by Faustus* of Riez (c472). It came under attack in the early 6th c. and was condemned at the Council of Orange* (529).

Senegal. This former West African French colony is known for its religious and political stability. In 1960 Léopold Sédar Senghor, a practicing Roman Catholic, was elected the first president by 90% of the Muslim community and the African* religionists (6.2%). More than 65% of Muslim students attended Catholic schools, and many Muslim elders were active members of groups called "Friends of the Christians." This stability continued well after Senghor's resignation in 1981.

Christianity was established as early as 1763. Modern Roman Catholic mission was pioneered by Mother Javouhey (Anne Mary Javouhey, 1779–1851; canonized, 1961), founder of the Congregation of St. Joseph of Cluny. She sent her first sisters to take charge of hospitals in St. Louis and Gorée (1819). She started a society dedicated to pastoral assistance among local people and to the formation of an indigenous clergy (1822). She believed that "civilization must go together with Christianity in the conversion of Africa." In 1840 six African priests were ordained in a seminary founded (1836) by Fr. Baradère, then apostolic prefect. A Carmelite convent was built (1953) beside the existing Grand Séminaire Libermann, then the Benedictine monastery Keur Moussa (1963).

Christians in Senegal are found among the Serer, Diola, and Wolof peoples. After the Second Vatican* Council, the liturgy was inculturated; it was practiced in the Serer, Diola, and Wolof languages using some of their symbols, ritual gestures, and musical instruments. Until 1970 the development of this Christian community was slow, as the Islamic presence (88%) left little room for evangelization. Since 1970 the number of Protestants and Charismatics* has rapidly increased. In recognition of the prominence of the Roman Catholic Church in Senegal, Pope Paul VI made Hyacinthe Thiandoum the archbishop of Dakar (since 1960) and a cardinal (1976). The archbishop was the president of the Regional Episcopal Conference of Franco-phone West Africa.

Statistics: Population (2000): 9.5 million (M). Christians, 523,000, 5.5% (Roman Catholics, 441,000; independents, 14,000; Protestants, 10,000); Muslims, 8.3 M, 88%; African Religionists, 592,000, 6.2%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

VALENTIN DEDJI

Sentences, Books of, compilations of doctrinal statements by earlier teachers of the church, the most notable of which is that by Peter* Lombard (1155–58).

Septuagint (LXX), earliest and most influential Greek translation of the HB and the Apocrypha*, undertaken by Hellenistic Jews c250–100 BCE. According to Jewish tradition (Letter of Aristeas and Josephus*), Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt (285–46 BCE), initiated the translation on behalf of the Jewish diaspora in Alexandria; 72 translators working independently for 72 days (hence the name) found that their versions coincided, suggesting divine inspiration. The LXX was the Bible of the Hellenistic synagogue and subsequently the Greek-speaking church; it was quoted by the NT writers and became the basis for other versions of the OT (such as the Old Latin Version). It is still used in the Greek Church. See also BIBLE TRANSLATIONS CLUSTER, EARLY TRANSLATIONS/VERSIONS.

Seraphim, highest-ranking celestial beings (followed by the cherubim*), who declared God's glory (see Sanctus) and purified the prophet's lips (Isa 6:2–3, 6). See also ANGELS.

Serbia. See YUGOSLAVIA.

Sergius (d638), patriarch of Constantinople (610–38), champion of Monothelitism*. Hoping to effect a reconciliation with the Miaphysites*, Sergius taught two natures but one divine-human activity in Christ; he received the assent of Pope Honorius, and the doctrine was enforced by the emperor Heraclius in his Ecthesis (638), but it was condemned by the Third Council of Constantinople (680–81).

Sergius of Radonezh, (c1314–1392), monk and founder of a monastery near Moscow, now called the Trinity-St. Sergius Lavra. Born to a high-ranking Muscovite family, Sergius became the father of Muscovite monastic life and is perhaps Russia's most beloved saint. His followers founded hundreds of monasteries across Russia based on his example of a simple communal life. Sergius blessed Prince Dmitrii Donskoi before his battle against the Tatars at Kulikovo Field. He was canonized in 1452. ROY R. ROBSON

Sermon on the Mount, the customary name, used as early as Augustine*, to designate Jesus' first programmatic discourse in Matt 5–7, summarizing his radical ethics of the Kingdom*. Comparison with Luke 6:20–40, "the Sermon on the Plain," shows that these two "sermons" are presenting alternative interpretations of similar traditions arising out of Jesus' teaching (see Jesus, Quest for the Historical) that apparently had already been compiled in the source "Q" (see Q, a Collection of Sayings Ascribed to Jesus). Throughout its history, the church read the Sermon on the Mount as conveying divergent teachings according to the church's ever-changing life contexts (see Reception Studies of Scripture). Contemporary biblical scholarship includes a similar diversity of interpretations (Betz) reflecting a diversity of critical approaches.

The Sermon on the Mount as a Perfectionist Ethics. "Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Matt 5:48): for minority church communities developing a way of life radically different from the dominant culture*, this was a kind of perfectionist* ethics. For such communities – e.g. early monastic* communities, Greek fathers (e.g. John* Chrysostom), Waldenses*, Franciscans*, Cathars*, Anabaptists*, Quakers*, early Methodists*, and various 20th- and 21st-c. Base* Ecclesial Communities and radical Evangelical communities – the Sermon provided a vision of the Christian community (a symbolic* worldview) that believers were called to enter and implement in a radical way of life marked by love* for others, voluntary poverty*, and nonviolence*. The ethical teaching of the Sermon could be fulfilled in this alternative society and functioned (along with the rest of Matthew) as a kind of "church* order."

Contemporary scholarship that analyzes Matt 5–7 as a religious discourse, through comparison and contrast with biblical discourses and later Jewish and Hellenistic religious discourses (using a history* of religion critical approach), as well as through close attention to its literary and figurative organization (e.g. Davies, Luz, Betz), generally supports this perfectionist reading of the Sermon on the Mount by emphasizing the vision of the Kingdom* and the fatherhood of God – a reading of the Sermon from the perspective of its center, the Lord's Prayer (6:9–13).

The Sermon on the Mount as a New Law. For the church, which was integrated into society and was often a majority group (since the conversion of Armenia*, 301; Constantine*, 312; and Georgia*, 330), the Sermon as a whole often remained a "perfectionist" teaching (as Augustine* and Thomas Aquinas* interpreted it), yet viewing the Sermon as a "new law" progressively led to a two-level ethics that appeared in the interpretations of individual commands. While some of these teachings are "precepts" or "commands" (praecepta) that can realistically be implemented in daily life, and thus are for every Christian, other teachings are "counsels" (consilia) for consecrated life, summed up in the monastic vows* (the three counsels of perfections) of poverty, chastity, and obedience taken in the Roman Catholic Church by members of religious* orders. The distinction between "precepts" and "counsels," first explicitly formulated by Rupert* of Deutz (c1075–1129), was systematized by Thomas Aquinas.

Similarly, certain contemporary scholars analyze Matt 5–7 as a series of discrete ethical teachings of Jesus (found in Q and oral traditions) “redacted” in a specific way by Matthew – e.g. transforming the beatitude “Blessed are you poor” (Luke 6:20) into an exhortation-like ethical teaching, “Blessed are the poor in spirit” (Matt 5:3) (Strecker; see Redaction Criticism). Thus, beyond the specificity of each command, one can recognize the basic ethical principles conveyed by the Sermon that readers are called to implement in various ways in their different life contexts (as in deontological* ethics).

The Sermon on the Mount as a Consequentialist Ethics. The Reformation churches, integrated into society while refusing a two-level ethics, struggled with the idea that, because of sin*, the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount could never be fulfilled. Thus for these churches, the Sermon reveals our sinfulness. But because in daily life one acts in relationality* (in relatione, Luther*), our acts affect our neighbors. For example, renouncing possessions, while good in and of itself, also affects one’s family. The essential teaching of the Sermon is to help believers distinguish between consequences: “fruits” from thorns, or true prophets and blessed ones from false prophets (7:16–27, 5:3–12).

Similarly certain contemporary scholars analyze the diverse teachings of Matt 5–7 by setting them within the eschatological* and apocalyptic* framework of the Sermon (Matt 5:3–10, 7:16–27). This framework is the horizon of Jesus’ proclamation of the Kingdom (Weiss, Schweitzer*), even if this horizon needs to be demythologized* in a secular* world (Bultmann*). From this perspective, the overall teaching of the Sermon is a radical call to decision and obedience, based on the discernment of the fruits (an implicit consequentialist* ethics, also sometimes called ethics of intention).

This brief review of the main types of interpretations of the Sermon on the Mount in various contexts of Western Church history and scholarship suggests that other types of interpretations are to be found in other sociocultural and religious contexts, as seen in the present-day diversity of ethics. See also ETHICS AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

DANIEL PATTE

Service of Worship, or Worship Service, modern designation of acts of public worship that reflect the original meaning of “liturgy*” as a work of the people for God’s sake, e.g.

praising God or sanctifying* parts of human existence. See also LABOR, THEOLOGIES OF; LITURGIES, HISTORY OF; LITURGY; LITURGY OF THE HOURS; WORSHIP CLUSTER.

Seven Last Words of Christ on the Cross. Often read, or sung to music, on Good* Friday, they are, in traditional order: “Father, forgive them” (Luke 23:34); “This day you will be with me in Paradise” (Luke 23:43); “Woman, behold your son” (John 19:26–27); “My God, why have you forsaken me” (Mark 15:34); “I thirst” (John 19:28); “It is finished” (John 19:30); and “Into your hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit” (Luke 23:46).

Seven Saints, seven persons, possibly of Syrian origin, credited with the late-5th-c. restoration of the Ethiopian* Church.

Seventh-day Adventist Worship. Worship among Seventh-day Adventists* is typically Protestant in that it centers on the proclamation of the Word. The liturgy is quite uniform around the world. After a few brief experiments with Charismatic expression, early Seventh-day Adventists adopted the conventional Protestant style. In the 1980s, a more celebratory style emerged.

Sacred Time. The sacrality of the Sabbath* is demarcated by opening and closing rituals at home or at church: typically the singing of certain hymns, recitation of the Sabbath commandment, recitation of the Lord’s* Prayer in unison, and the expression of wishes for a “happy Sabbath” (repeated three times in South America). Family members embrace each other; some light a “Sabbath candle.”

Format. Instruction dominates in Sabbath school (attended by those of all ages), praise and exhortation in formal worship services. Early Adventist camp* meetings and “social meetings” (personal testimonies) produced a strong sense of community in marginality. This function is still served in many non-Christian cultural contexts by daylong worship, which maintains the sanctity of the Sabbath.

Hymnody. Millerite and early Adventist hymns were explicitly doctrinaire, unique in message, and lively in cadence. They were supplanted by the more conventional hymns of US Protestantism as Seventh-day Adventism moved into mainstream forms.

Architecture, Decor. In North America, early Seventh-day Adventist “meetinghouses” were austere, as they still tend to be in mission settings. The central pulpit reflects a focus on proclamation. The cross, once spurned as a symbol of "apostate Protestantism," is now standard in most countries. Symbolism may include a replica of the Ten Commandments. In Japan the central floral arrangement is taken as a silent sermon. Internal baptisteries are common in North America but are rare elsewhere.

Lord's Supper. Communion*, observed quarterly, is regularly preceded by foot*-washing, a ritual that is an affront to cultural sensibilities in some Asian contexts. With some exceptions in Europe, unfermented wine is used in the Seventh-day Adventist ritual. A common chalice is standard in Europe. The Communion service concludes without a benediction, echoing Mark 14:28.

Cultural Adaptation. In style, African American Seventh-day Adventist congregations have traditionally mediated between their European-American counterparts and more enthusiastic "black" expressions. In mission contexts, there were two stages: (1) Before the 1990s, vernacular hymnals were used; these were simply translations of North American hymnals, although a few compositions were in the local idiom. Outside of the Caribbean, there was little use of indigenous instruments. (2) Since the 1990s, there has been an increasing localization of style, instruments (such as the tabla and harmonium in Southern Asia), and composition.

Leadership. Women have historically exercised considerable leadership in Seventh-day Adventist worship, evangelism*, and church life in North America and Europe, especially Scandinavia. Today, women's leadership roles vary greatly by culture: women leaders are universally accepted in Sabbath school but are rejected as leaders in formal worship in Confucian*, Hispanic, and some African cultures. The Seventh-day Adventist polity* presently treats ordination* as a worldwide authorization, which effectively denies it to all women. On their own authority, congregations in North America are increasingly "ordaining" women to ministry, locally the functional equivalent of ordination of men.

Seventh-day Adventist worship ritually integrates personal holiness* with Sabbath sanctity. It connects the believer with the divine and with a worldwide movement by interpreting these vertical and horizontal axes as one cosmic reality. The Church's challenge is to retain this sense of larger community, while providing for increasingly contextualized expression. The church's theology of ordination, e.g., remains caught between these two imperatives. See also ADVENTISM; WHITE, ELLEN GOULD.

JOHN R. JONES

Severus, Patriarch of Antioch (512–18), anathematized Chalcedon*, the Tome* of Leo, Nestorius*, Eutyches*, Diodore*, and Theodore*. Expelled from Antioch under Emperor Justin (518), he fled to Egypt but returned to Constantinople (534) when summoned by Justinian*. Although he initially received support, the political tide (Western interests) turned against him. He was condemned (536), banished, and died in Egypt c538. His books were banned, but survived in Syriac translation.

Severus's controversial but important works have a common thread: he was a faithful disciple of Cyril* of Alexandria, from whom he inherited Miaphysite* language (affirming the unity of divine and human nature in Christ). A traditionalist, defensive thinker, not an innovator, he was equally hostile to Nestorian* Dyophysitism (two natures in Christ) and to Eutychian* Monophysitism* (only one nature in Christ), and attempted to walk between these two extremes, armed only with Cyrillian vocabulary.

Was Severus able to endow the Miaphysite vocabulary with sufficient elasticity to cope with the questions raised by the Theopaschite* and Monothelite* disputes? He did succeed in continuing to elaborate a dynamic view of the union of divine and human in Christ, as opposed to the Chalcedonians' static view. The most important Greek theologian between Cyril and Maximus*, Severus remains the major exemplar of the Oriental Orthodox churches. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL, CLUSTER.

IAIN R. TORRANCE

Sexism and Christianity. Sexism is the attitude and belief that one gender is superior to the other. In Christian theology and churches, sexism links Christian status and worth to gender, usually conferring superior status and worth on men over women.

At a time when the assumption that gender identity consists of only two opposite categories – male and female – is increasingly contested in contemporary societies, sexism upholds the idea that characteristics associated with femaleness are inferior to those associated with maleness, regardless of whether they are attributed to women, men, or transgendered persons. Christian sexism is a systemic arrangement of power advantaging men and maleness through privileges, status, and control of church institutions, attitudes, and beliefs that generate norms in Christian faith. This arrangement has been supported by Christians regardless of their gender, although some have opposed it.

Christian sexism creates a rationale for devaluing women. Historical Christian doctrines, written predominantly by men from elite social sectors, have portrayed women as inferior to men in intellectual, emotional, and bodily makeup, and in their overall ability to reflect the image* of God. Repeated statements in Christian Scripture, produced in the patriarchal ancient eastern Mediterranean, affirm that women should not speak in church because they are subordinate to men and because Eve*, their progenitor, created after Adam*, was deceived and sinned* (1 Cor 14:34–35; 1 Tim 2:11–14). In influential European medieval and modern theology, claims about women’s inferiority often focus on their blameworthiness, especially for tempting men to commit sexual sins. Yet from Christianity’s earliest movements as reflected in Christian Scripture to the present, church women have resisted such bias.

Discriminatory church practices concretely express Christian beliefs about women’s inferiority by limiting women’s access to power and authority, especially in public forums, and by restricting or barring them from teaching, preaching, baptizing, consecrating sacraments, ordaining clergy, and/or selecting a pope. These limitations are official church policy in the Roman Catholic, the Orthodox, and some Protestant traditions; they are de facto institutional patterns in other traditions without such official policies. Feminist leaders across Christian traditions worked to dismantle these barriers and had some success, especially in the Protestant churches (late 20th c.).

Christian sexism is linked to the shaming* of women in the broader society and amplifies other forms of social devaluation. For example, it was by stigmatizing poor black and Latina single mothers, in ways that poor white women were not, that late-20th-c. US Christian political leaders advocated Christian moral standards in public policy. See also ANDROCENTRISM; PATRIARCHY AND CHRISTIANITY; SEXUALITY, ISSUES OF, CLUSTER. TRACI C. WEST

SEXUALITY, ISSUES OF, CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Sexuality, Issues of

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Sexuality, Issues of, in Africa

Sexuality, Issues of, in Asia

Sexuality, Issues of, in Latin America

1) Introductory Entry

Sexuality, Issues of. Sexuality refers to a human’s deepest most fully embodied response to his or her world. Among Western Christians, sexuality is generally assumed to include genital sensation, activity, and fantasy. But should sexuality be understood much more broadly, to include its connections to the ways societies are structured economically and how we understand race and class? One of the most hotly contested issues in the early 21st c. among Christians in the West (and throughout the world in cultures whose understanding of sexuality is significantly shaped by Western Christianity), sexuality is therefore understood in different ways by Western Christians.

Sexuality as a Basis of Patriarchal Social Relations and Religion. Male dominance, patriarchy* understood as a spiritual good and religious necessity, undergirds major segments of Christianity. Accordingly, the male possesses both a natural ability and a supernatural* authority to exercise sexual power over the female, whose nature is submissive and cooperative. This concept of sexuality characterizes Roman Catholicism, Eastern Orthodoxy*, and much of conservative Protestantism*. Its historical roots lie in literal* readings of Scripture* and in many theological sources, including those of Augustine*, Aquinas*, and Luther*. It is the official position of the Vatican and churches such as the Southern* Baptist Convention, the self-proclaimed largest Protestant denomination in the USA. This attitude toward sexuality has resulted in the exclusion of women from ordained* ministry; mandatory celibacy* for Roman Catholic priests* and all nonmarried persons; the elevation of marriage* above all other human relationships, especially in Protestantism*; the rejection of feminism* as a social movement; the spurning of Feminist* theology as a creative resource for thinking about God; the denunciation of efforts to affirm gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender Christians; and general suspicion of movements that espouse the liberation of women and children from traditional marriage and family* structures. One of the most devastating consequences of this Christian view of sexuality is its implicit sanctioning of sexual violence* against women and children.

Sexuality as a Source of Complementary Gender and Sexual Relations. Here sexuality arguably is not so much an instrument of patriarchal power relations as a foundation for harmonious relations between men and women who are naturally and, religiously speaking, supernaturally endowed with unique powers that each brings to the dyadic relationship. Sexually, men, who are the more “masculine,” are assertive; women, the more “feminine,” are receptive. During the 20th c., much of Western Christianity was impacted by the social sciences, especially psychological* theories, including those of Sigmund Freud and of the more spiritually inclined Carl Jung and his followers. Under the influence of both psychology and feminism*, liberal Roman Catholics and Protestants developed (late 20th c.) this complementary understanding of sexuality. Theologically, this position presupposes a Western version of a “yin-yang” spiritual energy in the universe. This “masculine-feminine” sexual energy is embodied by men and women in accordance with their given (or assigned) biological identity as male or female. This theory has been challenged as the stability of male/female biological identity has become less certain and assumptions about gender, as a psychosocial construct, have become more fluid. Sometimes used by liberal, or progressive, Christians to discredit gay, lesbian, and other sexual liberation movements, the complementarity theory has served primarily as a way to soften, rather than seriously challenge, patriarchal social relations and religion.

Sexuality as a Spiritual Energy for Shaping Mutual Relations in the World. Feminist* Liberation theologies and some Womanist* theologies have seriously challenged both of the preceding interpretations by asserting that sexuality is a deeply embodied yearning for right, mutual relations in the world that include those persons closest to us, but extend to the larger realms of social* justice*. According to this view, one’s sexual partners need not be of the “opposite” sex. “Opposite” is itself misleading for imagining right, mutual relations between men and women, just as “opposition” is a mistaken way to think of how people of different races*, tribes*, religions*, and cultures* are rightly related. Feminist and Womanist theologies, later joined by Queer* theologies, introduced in the late 20th c. passionate, intelligent voices to Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant Western traditions. In the USA, the Unitarian* Universalist Association and the United* Church of Christ have taken the Feminist theological critique of traditional sexual understanding most seriously in theory and practice. From this perspective, most of Christianity is held fast and more or less static by its patriarchal moorings. So long as this prevails, Christian discourse will not transcend its polarized understandings of human beings as either male or female, and as either heterosexual* or homosexual*, without any variation or spectrum of identities. Thus Feminist and Queer theologians argue that the church will remain mired in patriarchal power relations and sexual injustice until it begins to catch up with the best that science and other arenas of human culture and discovery have to offer by acknowledging sexuality as shaping mutual relations.

Western churches, and much of the rest of global Christianity, are likely to remain bitterly divided between those whose faith* is anchored in patriarchal or complementary understandings of sexuality and those who believe the Spirit* is leading them to an understanding of sexuality as a passion for mutual relations. See also HETERONOMY; RELATIONALITY.

CARTER HEYWARD

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Sexuality, Issues of, in Africa. Silence surrounds sexuality and all its difficulties in African Christian communities as well as in African society as a whole. Although sexuality is a central and intimate aspect of human life, probably it is the most misconstrued, misused, and violated, especially among women and children. In Africa, sexuality is experienced and expressed through rituals (female genital mutilation, puberty rituals, marriage), beliefs (about life under God and African cosmology), attitudes, thoughts, behaviors, roles, and relationships (in marriage*, family*, society), but these aspects remain largely unexplored. However, since the 1990s, in addition to the HIV/AIDS pandemic, two other items have forced Christians (and others) in Africa to study sexuality: the highly controversial issue of homosexuality* and the increased awareness of gender-based violence against women and children (see Abuse as Pastoral Care Issue; Patriarchy and Christianity; Sexism and Christianity; Violence Cluster). Most significant is the introduction of gender and theology courses in theological education and ministerial formation that is forcing future church leaders and theologians to explore issues related to sexuality, among them African masculinity and sexual violence. Yet these are strongly resisted. How can one teach students about sex and sexuality on the "holy" grounds of the seminary? Yet such teaching takes place in a growing number of seminaries. Another sign of hope is a renewed call for African theological and religious scholars to study African cosmology and African* Religion in their own light and as framing the understanding of sexuality in Africa. Yet much remains to be done, because there is a rich and wide diversity of African cultures, religions (including Christianity), and languages in terms of which sexuality must be understood.

NYAMBURA J. NJOROE

Sexuality, Issues of, in Asia. Although Asia is a vast region with diverse and rich cultures, religions, and traditions, the expression of Asian sexuality can be characterized by three shared assumptions: sex is a cultural taboo; sex is usually restricted to procreation; and women's bodies are regarded as ritually unclean and inferior. Consequently, sexual pleasure becomes a privilege only for men.

With the importation of Christianity into Asia, accompanied by European colonialism* and imperialism, Western Christian sexual conventions in which sex is permitted only in a one-on-one heterosexual* marriage* relationship became a dominant legal practice in most Asian societies. However, in the past few decades, the impact of the global human* rights movement and of the Feminist* and Queer* movements has challenged such a narrow religious interpretation of sexual norms.

Today issues of sexuality discussed in Asian Christian communities include whether procreation and heterosexual marriage should be the only goal of human sexuality and how the Father God who comes to symbolize male dominance legitimizes the power of the church to subordinate women to male authorities. Regarding issues of sexual violence* in Asian societies as well as in Christian communities, many pressing concerns are being addressed, including domestic violence, sexual harassment, discrimination against people of sexual orientations that differ from what is considered the norm and against those with HIV/AIDS, double standards with respect to virginity* and its impact on women's sexuality, forced abortion* in China*, and the dowry system in India*. Furthermore, the borderless societies promoted by the global economy continue to exploit girls and women by selling them as "wives" or forcing them into prostitution. As many Asian Feminist theologians point out, in analyzing sexuality, we cannot focus on sex just as a personal moral issue. Rather, we must examine the unequal power structures and the social and religious constructions of gender, sexuality, class, and race that create systems that exploit the vulnerable, especially poor, young, and socially outcast women.

Throughout church history, the narrowly conceived authority of Scripture* and Christian doctrines has been used as the language of Christian imperialism, exclusivism, and domination. Bringing liberation to women and sexual minorities demands that we construct a Liberation* theology truly framed by a holistic understanding of sexuality that reflects the justice* and love* of God among all people, because sex is a gift from God. The criteria by which to measure any sexual relationship are based neither on gender nor on the form of sexual activity; rather, these criteria are whether there is any abuse of power, domination, and exclusion, or holistic justice* and love*. ROSE WU

Sexuality, Issues of, in Latin America.

To understand the relationship between sexuality and Christianity in Latin America, one must start with the assumption that sexuality is not static, defined by essential aspects or biological identity. Rather, it is a social construct that varies according to sociocultural and historical contexts. Sexuality consists of activities and practices related to human bodies and their genital organs, as well as to the satisfaction of desires and the choices of relationships.

One must also make the assumption that Latin America is a collective unit. Despite the enormous differences among regions, whether on the Latin American continent or in the Caribbean, there are some shared characteristics that give a basic homogeneity to the region: increasing poverty* and domination by external economic powers; a history of colonization*, authoritarianism, fragile attempts at democracy, and machismo; cultural diversity influenced by African, indigenous, and European roots; and the political and religious predominance of the Roman Catholic Church. Thus in dealing with the relationship between sexuality and religion in Latin America, one must take into consideration the predominant Catholic sexual morality in the region.

In moral and sexual terms, Christian thought connected pleasure with sin*. Sex, seen as a tool for procreation (see Pregnancy), was relegated to the heterosexual* realm; premarital relations were prohibited. This approach, combined with the absolutization of the Christian family model (see Family, Christian Views of, Cluster) and female submissiveness, shaped the sense of what sexual practices were permitted and morally acceptable. In the area of legislation and public policies, the influence of the Catholic Church has also been perceptible, despite the formal separation of church* and state in most countries. For women, especially poor* women, the religious regulation of sexuality has meant strict control over their behavior and their possibilities for autonomy in this area, as well as in decisions regarding their reproductive capacity. Christian codes on virginity* and the indissolubility of marriage vows (see Marriage, Theology and Practice of, Cluster), along with the concept of women as "natural" mothers, served to maintain religious institutions' control over women's bodies.

But despite the persistence of Christian sexual morality in Latin America, there is an enormous distance between it and the real practices of the faithful, men and women alike. To adhere to a religion does not necessarily mean to obey its dicta. Moreover, different Christian churches vary in their thinking on sexual morality. Also in the public sphere, the dissemination of new ideas such as the inclusion of sexuality in the human* rights sphere has brought considerable changes in political agendas in the region. Recent years have been marked by intense feminist mobilizations, in which Christian women are included, in favor of liberalizing access to abortion*. Studies in different Latin American countries indicate growing popular support, especially among the more educated, for the idea that marriages can come to an end and new relationships can then be formed. The idea of homosexual* unions and other ways of expressing sexuality and affectivity is also gaining acceptance. Indices of approval for condom use and rejection of official Catholic doctrines on the subject (see Birth Control and Contraception, Christian Views of) are significant, even among Catholics. Further contributions to these divergent positions have been made by Feminist* theology, which takes into account the social reality of the lives of women, especially poor women. Such formulations approach sexuality in a positive way, affirming the religious validity of experiencing pleasure from sexuality.

MARIA JOSÉ FONTELAS ROSADO-NUNES

Sexual Violence. See ABUSE AS PASTORAL CARE ISSUE; PATRIARCHY AND CHRISTIANITY; SEXISM AND CHRISTIANITY; SEXUALITY, ISSUES OF, CLUSTER; VIOLENCE CLUSTER.

Seymour, William Joseph (1870–1922), early Pentecostal* leader, pastor of Apostolic Faith Mission on Azusa Street, Los Angeles; born to former slaves Simon and Phyllis Seymour (1870, Centerville, Louisiana). He traveled north to Indianapolis, Indiana (1895), for employment. Possibly converted in an African* Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church, he embraced the Holiness* theology of the Evening Light Saints and attended God's Bible School (1901–2). In Houston, Texas (1902–4), Seymour joined an African American church led by Lucy Farrow. He met the Pentecostal leader Charles F. Parham (1905) and accepted his teaching on Spirit baptism* with “biblical evidence” of glossolalia*. In Los Angeles (from February 1906), he was the pastor of a Holiness congregation. As a result of the Pentecostal revival* (from April 1906), the services moved to the former Stevens AME Church on Azusa Street. Under the leadership of Seymour and others, the “Azusa Street revival” (1906–9), the best known of the early formative Pentecostal revivals, was unique because of its interracial nature. Seymour and Clara Lum edited Apostolic Faith (1906–8), a newspaper providing worldwide coverage. Seymour's humility, belief in the restoration of charismatic* gifts*, concern for world evangelization*, and work toward reconciliation* in a segregated society continue to inspire many, including those living in contexts of oppression*.

GARY B. MCGEE

Shaker Theology reflects the experiences of Ann Lee* (1736–84), the English founder of the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing, and of her US followers in subsequent generations. Lee was a powerful charismatic visionary who emigrated to the New World in 1774. Many of the Believers, who called her “Mother Ann,” regarded her as the beloved daughter of God, a second manifestation of the Christ spirit. The Shakers applied this theme of gender duality to the nature of God, identifying God as both father and mother. Shaker theological traditions progressively became more systematic, especially through the efforts of 19th-c. Believers. But Shaker theology has consistently involved ethical responsibilities linked to the practice of communal living. Shakers regard carnality and sexual relations as a major source of sin*. Therefore, they reject the institution of marriage* and require a commitment to celibacy*. The Shakers reconstitute family* life with all Believers, living in community as brothers and sisters under the leadership of elders and eldresses. They practice a community of goods and require a vigorous work ethic. They steadfastly pursue the Spirit* in their worship meetings, which through the centuries have been filled with song and dance, personal testimonies, ecstatic experiences, together with scriptural readings and reflections. The construction of Shaker communities (up to 6,000 members in the mid-19th c.) was a conscious effort to separate those intent on being part of the kingdom* of Christ from the sinful ways of the “world*.” The pursuit of righteousness* also called for Believers in the Millennial* Church to practice peaceful ways and to live simple lives. In doing so, for more than 200 years down to the present, when only a few members remain, Shakers have offered a striking and distinctive expression of Christian faith and practice. See also APOCALYPTICISM CLUSTER; PROLONGATION IN THE MODERN PERIOD; MILLENNIALISM CLUSTER; IN NORTH AMERICA.

STEPHEN J. STEIN

Shakespeare and Christianity. The amount and range of Shakespeare's religious usage show him to be an unusually well informed Christian layperson during a period energized by repeated religious persecution and religious discourse. Among the many religious words, used with Reformation* overtones, in Shakespeare are *altar, beads, *candle, *charity, *confession, controversy, *cross as object and gesture, equivocation, *grace, *idolatry, *justification, *Mass, *miracles, *Pope, *Puritan, *sacrament, *scripture, and zeal. Words evoking religious commonplaces range from hundreds of references to some form of God (or the gods), *heaven, damn, and *sin to single uses of esoteric words like pax, unanel'd, and unhousel'd. Complex words like *angel, blessed, *devil, grace, *soul, and *spirit take on from three to six discernible meanings in Shakespeare. Some of his most informed and imaginative religious usage is figurative, like the metaphor of the *pilgrim and the *saint that informs the first exchange between Romeo and Juliet. *Religion has five different meanings in Shakespeare, including the figurative. He names 33 saints and even more biblical characters.

Equally important, religious themes are often central to Shakespeare's plays. Examples include penance* and repentance* in Hamlet, The Winter's Tale, and King Lear; providence* in Richard III, Measure for Measure, and Hamlet; merit* vs. grace and Old Law* vs. New in The Merchant of Venice; the Last Judgment* in Othello and Macbeth; analogies between romantic and religious faith* and love* in A Midsummer Night's Dream and Much Ado about Nothing; and edifying humiliation and forgiveness* in Lear, Hamlet, and most of the comedies and romances. So numerous and profound are Shakespeare's biblical and liturgical allusions that scholars have even shown him alternating between the Bishops' and the Geneva Bibles* in his quotations or allusions. Shakespeare's works also refer to religious art, the mystery plays, religious lyrics, and religious festivals.

Some readers have tried to define Shakespeare's own positions on Reformation controversies through his persistent and informed religious usage. More reserve judgment on just what and how Shakespeare believed. The plays never clearly advocate sectarian positions; characters sometimes do, but their voices are not necessarily Shakespeare's. Documentary evidence shows that Shakespeare and his children were baptized in the Church of England; his will contains traditional if formulaic references to "God my Creator" and "Jesus Christ my Saviour," as well as his hope "to be made partaker of life everlasting." Aside from this, on the religious issues of his time his works are deeply informed, but he is profoundly silent.

R. CHRIS HASSEL, JR.

Shamanism and Christianity

Age-Old Shamanism. Shamanism is a holistic spirituality inseparably linked to shamans and their initiation rites, their indigenous cosmology and mythology, and the rituals that they perform, with accompanying signs and symbols. It is an age-old religiocultural institution, intact to various degrees, wherein beliefs and practices are communicated and sustained by practicing communities of the past and present. Beyond the communal shamanic beliefs and practices are the interrelated worlds of spirits and the supreme spirit-beings, including the spirits of ancestors*, of living or dead animals, and plants, whether they are bound to the earth, with its underworld, middle world, and upper world, or are extraterrestrial. Shamanism, as practiced today, remains ever subversive of the one-dimensional positivistic perception of the world and ever creative in imagining a sustainable livelihood in harmony with creation. Shamanism remains a web of relations ritually manipulated by shamans.

The arduous apprenticeship, under the aegis of a renowned shaman and/or a visiting spirit-guide, has contributed to the prominent centrality of shamans in practicing communities. On the strength of the filial bond and the mutuality of trust established with the local community, not a few of the reputable shamans confide the source of their power, the ethical codes they follow, and their ability to distinguish the moral intentions of fellow shamans. With their intimate knowledge and experience of the sources of shamanic power, they differentiate between shamans empowered by benevolent spirits and those empowered by malevolent spirits. Shamans of integrity are known to have overpowered wicked shamans through exorcism* that neutralized the evil effects the wicked shamans intended. With the consent of the inflicted persons, the evil* is turned back on the wicked initiator as an admonition. Unfortunately, such reversals have sometimes proved to be fatal because the originators were killed by the evil* they themselves had initiated.

The growing though uneven regional assertion that Shamanism is the living tradition of human civilization calls for a paradigm change that allows shamanic realism, a perspective beyond scientific rationality acknowledging realities that are knowable to the extent that they can be experienced.

The Relationship between Shamanism and Christianity can be approached in terms of the current hermeneutical critique by Christian theologians of the demonization* (1300–721 BCE) of ancient Near East spirituality, particularly of Canaan. In the light of ethnographic studies of Shamanism, this process of demonization can be attributed to a strategy of domination, characterized by the relentless pursuit of an ideology* of conquest when Yahwism became politicized under a fledgling monarchy in the Kingdom of Israel. This critique has created the discursive space to generate some refreshing biblical insights. The Genesis* account (1:1–2:3) affirms God as the creator of a creation* suffused with God's goodness (Gen 1:4, 10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31). Such pervasive presence of divine goodness cannot be juxtaposed with evil, which is in no way connected with Gen 1. Evil appears with Gen 3. Evil already exists in the world (as the serpent), and humankind does not so much introduce evil as sustain the already-present evil through acts of immorality. In spite of the prevalence of evil, the creator God sustains creation and humankind by initiating the covenant* with Noah (Gen 9:8–17), Abraham and Isaac (Gen 17:4–22), and Israel (Exod 19–20). The Christ event definitively seals God's covenantal presence with creation through Jesus, the God-with-us who becomes the God-in-Spirit* whose creative power is mediated through the moral agency of integrity.

God's creative power has been mediated through healing* rituals that are shamanic in nature. Tobit applied a fish's gall to Tobias's eyes (Tob 11:5–17), and God healed the father's blindness. In Bethsaida a shamanic ritual of healing involved Jesus (John 9:1–7; Mark 8:22). He spat on the ground, mixed his saliva with mud, and applied it to the eyes of the blind and healed him. The Gospels (Matt 12:35; Luke 6:45) emphasize the store of goodness in the hearts of the moral agents whom Mark (9:40) and Luke (9:50) empathically foreground, even if they do not explicitly belong to the Christian community. The account of Jesus and Beelzebul (Matt 12:22–32) lends salvific importance to the shamanic practices of exorcism* by demonstrating that shamans, albeit not professed Christians, mediate God's creative and salvific power. The moral legitimacy of shamans, as alluded to in Matt 12:30, 32, rests in their implicit openness to God's saving powers through their trust in the Spirit. The mediation of the creative and salvific power of God by life-giving shamans with upright intentions aimed at the greater good of individuals and the overall well-being of communities constitutes the fundamental morality of Shamanism. See also EXORCISM; HEALTH, HEALING, AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: SPIRITUAL HEALING AND IN NORTH AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN PENTECOSTAL/CHARISMATIC MOVEMENTS;

JOJO M. FUNG, SJ

Shame. See HONOR AND SHAME.

Shaw, Anna Howard (1847–1919), clergywoman, social reformer, suffrage leader, orator. Licensed to preach (1873) by the Methodist Episcopal Church, she earned degrees in theology (1878) and medicine (1885) at Boston University and was ordained by the Methodist Protestant Church (1880). She served as pastor in Massachusetts (1878–85), as national superintendent of franchise for the Woman's Christian Temperance* Union (1886–92), and as vice president (1892–1904) and president (1904–15) of the National American Woman Suffrage Association.

Shaw challenged Victorian cultural assumptions and practices that denied women equal opportunities with men, working closely with other leaders in the Suffrage Movement, especially Susan B. Anthony*, to win the vote for women. Forced to justify her calling as a woman to ministry, Shaw countered the theological arguments aligned against her with historical and biblical precedents, her own success in ministry, and a feminist* interpretation of Bible verses traditionally used to deny women equal privileges with men.

Using her exceptional oratorical skills, she promoted new ways of thinking about women's roles in society, politics, and the church, by emphasizing the authority of God over women and men and a progressive interpretation of the Bible. Her life story provides an authoritative model for Christian leadership in relationship to social reform.

WENDY J. DEICHMANN EDWARDS

Shekinah, in Judaism, the majestic presence or manifestation of God that has descended to "dwell" among humans, as in the Tabernacle or among the people of Israel (Exod 25:8, 29:45–46) and in Jerusalem (Zech 8:3; Ps. 135:21). Since the Shekinah is light, NT passages mentioning radiance and the glory of God (Gk doxa), as in Luke 2:9, and the Transfiguration* (Mark 9:2, par.) refer to the Shekinah and identify Jesus with a manifestation of the Shekinah.

Shema, confession of the Jewish faith, recited morning and evening, consisting of Deut 6:4, "Hear (Heb shema), O Israel: The LORD is our God, the LORD alone" or "The LORD our God, the LORD is one," followed by Deut 6:5–9, 10:13–21 and Num. 15:37–41, including Deut 6:5, "You shall love the LORD your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might." Thus in giving the "first commandment," Jesus recites the Shema (Mark 12:29–30; only a part of it is in Matt 22:37).

Shenoute (348–465), leader of an Egyptian monastic federation; first great stylist of the Coptic language. A director of souls, not a theologian, Shenoute urged fear of Jesus' judgment* and the need for confession*, remorse, and good works. He was an active opponent of pagan religion and defender of the poor*. His monastic federation (near Sohag, Egypt), which was modeled on that of Pachomius*, provides our best documentation of cenobitic* monasticism* in late antiquity, including remains of monastic buildings, religious art, ecclesiastical architecture, two standing 5th-c. churches, monastic rules, and thousands of pages of his writings. The Coptic* Orthodox feast day of Shenoute is celebrated on July 1. BENTLEY LAYTON

Sheol, Hebrew for the place of the dead; translated in the LXX* as "Hades*," the term used in the NT and the Apostles* Creed for the abode or state of the dead before the Last Judgment*, or before the resurrection*, sometimes a hell*-like place of punishment (Luke 16:19–31, Lazarus and the rich man).

Shepherd, one of the earliest occupations. Shepherds provided food, water, and protection for their flocks (1 Sam 17:34–35; Amos 3:2). The term is used as a metaphor* for a leader (2 Sam 7:7) or for one who offers spiritual care. Thus God is the ultimate shepherd (Gen 48:15; Ps 23). Jesus is the good shepherd (John 10:1–18, 25–30; cf. Mic 5:1–3; Heb 13:20; 1 Pet 5:4). Jesus commands Peter to feed his sheep (John 21:15–17), and others are told to care for their flock (Acts 20:28; 1 Pet 5:3). Ignatius* of Antioch and Clement* of Rome favored the shepherd metaphor, used today when ministers or priests are called "pastors." JEFFRY C. DAVIS

Shinto and Christianity. Shinto, the indigenous tradition of Japan, is translated as "the Way of the Kami/Deities." Being a non-membership-based tradition, Shinto pervades Japanese culture and, except for a brief period (late 19th–mid-20th c.), has been compatible with and non-contentious toward all religious traditions that it has encountered. Shinto turns on an axis of purity and impurity, rather than on concepts of good and evil. It focuses on concrete particulars here and now in a seamless worldview – seamless in the sense that no ontological distinctions are made between animate and inanimate.

Without ontological distinctions, all natural phenomena, including rocks, people, and plants, can be recognized as kami (deities).

Shinto's ultimate point of reference – myriad deities animating the landscape and dynamics of the natural world – contrasts with the Christian concept of a transcendent deity. Christian missionaries during the Christian century (1549–1650) in Japan were challenged by this seamless ontological orientation, which did not include abstract concepts like omniscience*, omnipotence*, and absolute truth*. Hence exclusivity was an elusive concern. Although many Japanese became Christian after undergoing a profound conversion* experience, numerous others maintained a Shinto orientation to the world and saw the Christian god* as a kind of kami. Other points of contrast are that Shinto is nondogmatic* and does not have a scriptural tradition. A Shinto worldview focused on concrete phenomena excels at perfecting detailed forms in material and motion, and it does not engage in abstract philosophical analysis as is found in a Christian worldview.

Although concepts of self are based on different root assumptions, Christianity and Shinto share an understanding about responsibilities that hold people together in a relationship of mutual concern. The Sermon* on the Mount teaching to "love* your neighbor" resonates with the Shinto awareness that all things affect each other and should be respected. Placing stress on the quality of activity focuses attention on the present moment and direct interaction among people. Thus the Christian goal to love and the Shinto goal to live in harmonious respect are embodied. Central to both Shinto and Christianity is the impulse to express gratitude and respect through ritual offerings at their respective altars. Both raise a vessel of wine (Christian red and Shinto rice wine) toward God or kami in a ritualized mode that signals a similar concern to embody respect in explicit action.

See also JAPAN.

PAULA ARAI

Shoah (Heb "calamity," "devastation"), term for the Holocaust* preferred by many Jews, especially in Israel and parts of Europe (used in Poland in the 1940s), because of its origin in the Hebrew Bible (in contrast to the Greek origin of "Holocaust," with potentially problematic pagan connotations, although "Holocaust" is used in the LXX*). Holocaust has remained the most common name since the 1950s, in part because of its broader meaning. See also HOLOCAUST, JEWISH (OR SHOAH).

Shroud, white sheet in which a corpse is laid out for burial. The Shroud of Turin, known since 1578, bears the image of a human body with the stigmata* and is claimed to be the sheet in which Christ was wrapped for burial; debate continues over its authenticity and origin.

Sibylline Oracles, large collection of prophecies ascribed to Greco-Roman prophetesses, notably Sibyl, but partly of Jewish, though mainly Christian, origin. Book III is Jewish (praising Judaism as the perfect example of a proper, natural religion), as are Book IV and possibly parts of I and II as well. The rest of the 14 books are Christian, often containing prophecies that refer to Jesus Christ. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA. JOHANNES TROMP Sick, Visitation and Anointing of. Christian care for the sick is rooted both in the 1st-c. cultural commonality of family and friendship and in the specificity of NT Christian teaching. Care for the sick was modeled on examples of Jesus responding to pleas for healing, and the early church saw prayer with the sick as a primary vehicle for continuing Christ's ministry. Incorporated within visitation to the sick was prayer, the laying* on of hands, and anointing* with olive oil (Mark 6:13; Jas 5:13–15). The developing Christian practices were seen to be expressions of faith in God, hope in the *eschaton, and love for one's neighbor.

Blessing prayers, liturgical texts, letters, hagiographical* writings, and homilies* encouraging visitation by all indicate that, in the first Christian millennium, there were a variety of rituals for caring for the sick. From these sources, we can discern some commonality. First, the oil blessed by a bishop* (or passed through the grave of a martyr*; see Relics) carried an ecclesial* association different from the work of a charismatic* individual. Second, anointing in the context of prayer was related to the healing of all aspects of a person, physical, emotional, mental, and spiritual, with the important distinction that curing spiritual ills involved the forgiveness* of sins*. Third, geographic differentiation was most apparent in those who ministered to the sick. In some places, they were the simple faithful using blessed oil to anoint themselves and their family members when ill (such as in Gaul*); in other places, widows, deacons, and deaconesses* were ordained to pray for the sick and to visit and anoint the sick as extensions of the bishop's ministry (such as in Christian Egypt*).

In the second millennium, different emphases arose as ritual care for the sick was influenced by changes in views of reconciliation*, atonement*, and life after death. The growing emphasis on spiritual healing overshadowed physical healing, and the anointing of the sick became the last (extreme) anointing (unction*) before death, no longer a sacrament* for the living. Apart from this ritual of last rites, visitation to the sick continued, as did pilgrimages* to healing shrines and prayers to saints*.

Protestant Reformers uniformly rejected extreme unction as unscriptural, but encouraged prayer for and visitation to the sick, and some retained or restored anointing for physical healing. A 20th-c. return to broader pastoral and ritual practices in caring for the sick was seen in Roman Catholicism, in Anglicanism, and in many Protestant churches.

The theological and practical arguments of the present day focus on who may be anointed, who may anoint, what is healed, how charismatic* and ecclesial healing are related, and what is the Christian meaning of suffering*, sickness, and health. See also HEALTH, HEALING, AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

LIZETTE LARSON-MILLER

Sierra Leone represents (with Liberia*) a curious paradox in the history of African Christianity. Established as a Christian settlement for former African slaves* (1787) and home to the first modern church of tropical Africa, it presently has the lowest percentage of Christians of any non-Islamic country in West Africa. A partial explanation is that the small coastal region (which contains a fifth of the population and includes Freetown, the capital) became a British colony (1808) that was subsequently conjoined to the larger hinterland as a British protectorate (1896) and fully integrated when it achieved independence (1961).

In the early 19th c., the Sierra Leone colony was a successful Christian experiment owing to extensive missionary efforts by European missionaries and African American settlers, mass conversions among tens of thousands of slaves freed from slave ships captured by the British navy, and Protestant mission schools; Roman Catholics arrived in the late 19th c. The Fourah Bay Institution (now a university college) trained many African clergy, including Samuel Adjai Crowther* (c1806–99) – the slave boy who became the first Anglican African bishop – and produced a vigorous African missionary movement that took Christianity to Southern Nigeria.

This robust Christian growth took place in an interreligious environment that included Islam* and African* Religion. This dynamic ensured interpenetration and religious tolerance. The form of Christianity that emerged was outwardly Europeanized but well adapted to the indigenous culture. Today the Krios, descendants of early settlers and recaptured slaves, are the most highly Christianized group.

The spread of Islam limited Christian expansion beyond the costal region, despite missionary efforts (early 20th c.). African* Instituted Churches and Pentecostal*/Charismatic* movements (from the 1960s) gave rise to new missionary vigor. Despite chaotic political conditions, including a decade-long civil war that triggered massive migrations to Freetown, there has been a burgeoning of Christian ministries and major revivals*, although the long-term impact remains to be seen. But the influence of Christianity on public life and institutions in Sierra Leone remains substantial despite the small Christian presence.

Statistics: Population (2000): 4.8 million (M). Christians, 0.55 M, 11.5% (Protestants, 0.17 M; Roman Catholics, 0.17 M; members of African Instituted Churches, 0.17 M; Anglicans, 0.03 M); Muslims, 2.2 M, 46%; African Religionists, 2 M, 40.4%; nonreligious, 0.09 M, 2.0%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

JEHU J. HANCILES

Siger of Brabant (c1240–c1284), Averroist philosopher. As a master of arts at the University of Paris, he commented on the works of Aristotle* with the aid of the commentaries of Avicenna* and Averroes*, pointing out that Aristotle seemed to teach the eternity of the world and the unity of the intellect in all persons (thus denying the immortality of individual souls*). He was accused of teaching “double truth,” but this was also an expression used by Thomas Aquinas*. Some of his views were condemned by the bishop of Paris (1270, 1277), as were some of Aquinas’s. Dante* puts him in Paradise, probably because of his defense of the role of reason*.

Sign of the Cross. As early as Tertullian*, Christians traced the cross on their foreheads for sanctification and protection against temptation. In the early Middle Ages, the sign began to be made by moving the hand from forehead to breast, then from shoulder to shoulder (left to right in the West, right to left in the East), either, in the West, with the open hand or, in the East, with the thumb, index, and middle finger brought to a point (symbolizing the Trinity) or, in the Russian* Orthodox Church before Patriarch Nikon’s* reform (17th c.), with two fingers (symbolizing the human and divine natures of Christ).

Signs. See SEMIOTICS AND THE STUDY OF CHRISTIANITY.

SIKHISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

Sikhism and Christianity: A Christian Perspective

Sikhism and Christianity: A Sikh Perspective

Sikh Scriptures and the Bible

Sikhism and Christianity: A Christian Perspective. In 1834 the North American Ludhiana Mission was established in the Sikh kingdom of Punjab, but Christian activity was limited until its British annexation in 1849. Christian missionary pressure and the work of the Hindu Arya Samaj Movement caused much consternation among the Sikhs, who responded by establishing several Khalsa Colleges and making their scripture, the Guru Granth Sahib, widely available in printed form. The British regarded the Sikhs as a martial people, and the studies they undertook tended to serve the administration’s purpose of gaining their loyal support.

Sikhism is a monotheistic* and universalistic spiritual movement founded on the teachings of Guru Nanak and his successors, contained in the Guru Granth Sahib and Dasam Granth. These are the foci of all life and worship. Aspects of Christianity that might be of interest and concern to Sikhs are its evangelistic and hierarchical traditions; these are not present in Sikhism, which believes that the Divine Light (joṭ) is to be found in everyone and thus that all human beings are equal. Consequently, Sikhism rejects caste* discrimination, the low status or impurity of women*, religious hierarchy and ministry, and the concept of God as male.

W. OWEN COLE

Sikhism and Christianity: A Sikh Perspective.

The encounter with Christianity had both detrimental and beneficial effects on Sikhs (c20 million in 2000). The conversion to Christianity of the 14-year-old Maharaja Dalip (Duleep) Singh (1853) was hailed as "the first instance of the accession of an Indian prince to the communion of the church." The gift of a Bible inscribed, "You have gained a rich inheritance," after he was dispossessed of his kingdom and the Kohinoor diamond (at one time the largest in the world) seemed ironic. Such conversions jolted the Sikhs into vigorous restorative action through preaching by the Nirankari, Namdhari, and Singh Sabha movements, books for developing the Sikh identity by writers like Bhai Kahan Singh and Vir Singh, and the struggle to manage by themselves their gurdwaras (places of worship), which were often in Hindu hands. The observance of the Sikh Code of Conduct (Rehat Maryada) became a requirement for joining the British army.

In the Western diaspora, Sikhs responded to racism* with successful campaigns for the right to wear Sikh symbols. Christian influence is evident in the "King James English" used in translations of the Sikh scriptures, stained glass windows, Sunday worship services, seating in (some) gurdwaras, and young Sikhs' perception of their faith. With self-confidence Sikhs participate in interfaith activity and scripture studies.

CHARANJIT KAUR AJITSINGH

Sikh Scriptures and the Bible. There are two bodies of Sikh scripture: the Guru Granth Sahib and the Dasam Granth. The Guru Granth Sahib (1,430 printed pages) contains poetical compositions, similar to the biblical psalms, set to 31 musical forms by Guru Arjan, its original compiler in 1604 CE. Unlike the Bible, it contains very little biographical, historical, or specifically ethical material, although its message of spiritual liberation based on a God-centered life permeates the whole text. These compositions were revealed to 6 of the 10 gurus, to Hindu and Muslim poets, and to men like Kabir who rejected any sectarian allegiance.

The scriptures are written in the Gurmukhi script (used for everyday Punjabi), but their language varies from medieval Indian dialects to Persian. This is especially true of the Dasam Granth, a 1,428-page compilation of poems attributed to the 10th guru, Gobind Singh, and compiled some years after his death (1708 CE). Both collections are canonical but emphasis is placed, in practice, on the first, which is also the primary focus of worship and the authoritative basis of the Panth (Sikh community), no religious activity being valid that does not take place in its presence.

W. OWEN COLE

Sillon, Le, periodical founded (1894) by Marc Sangnier, a Roman Catholic legislator from Paris, to promote democracy, social* justice*, and the French Republic. It was condemned by Pope Pius* X (1910). Action Française represented the opposing tendency.

Simeon Stylites (c390–459), Syrian hermit*, most famous of the "pillar" saints. He began as a monk, then moved to pillars of increasing height. Widely admired, he was often consulted for his advice; he championed the doctrines of the Council of Chalcedon*. Imitators included Simeon Stylites the Younger (521–97), who was ordained a priest at the age of 35 and whose followers climbed a ladder to receive Communion from him.

Simon of Cyrene, a passerby, from Cyrene in present-day Libya, compelled to carry Jesus' cross to Golgotha*, the place of crucifixion (Mark 15:21, par.).

Simon Magus, "magician" in Samaria (Acts 8:9–24) who claimed to be the "Great Power" (i.e. God) and was rebuked by Peter for trying to buy the gift of the Holy* Spirit. Irenaeus* called him the father of Gnosticism*. He was said to have been accompanied by Helen, identified with the First Thought, whom he had redeemed from a brothel (this may be one source of the Faust legend). This tradition, and the authorship of the Apophysis ascribed to Simon, continue to be debated.

Simony, sale or purchase of spiritual offices, named from Simon* Magus's attempt to buy the Holy* Spirit. The sale of offices was prohibited by some early councils and popes, but it became a crucial issue in the age of feudalism*, when lay appointment to office and investiture* with the symbols of office was widespread. Humbert* (Against the Simoniacs, 1058) called simony a heresy*, an erroneous view of the Holy Spirit as being less than the Father and Son, subject to human control (see Trinity in Eastern Orthodoxy; Trinity in the Western Tradition). But other reformers, including Peter* Damiani, saw Humbert's position as Donatist* in claiming that sacraments administered by simoniacs were invalid. A Lateran synod (1060) ordered the removal of simoniacs but decreed that clergy ordained by simoniacs but not purchasing their office needed only the laying* on of hands.

Sin refers to any human activity or stance opposed to God and God's purposes, separating humans from God. It initiates a process of destruction ruinous for the human community, the natural world, and sinners themselves (see Violence Cluster). It is typically understood in Western churches as a moral evil involving individual guilt and responsibility (see Atonement #2), although early traditions (often Eastern) emphasized that satanic deception or disease-like manifestations were intrinsic to the nature of sin; similarly, contemporary interpretations often stress systemic sin related to environmental and structural factors (see Atonement #1).

The term "sin" comprises a vast biblical vocabulary (about 50 Hebrew words, more than a dozen Greek words), with themes of rebellion and disobedience prominent. "Sin" applies to acts ("sins") violating the divine law by commission or omission (1 John 3:4; Matt 25:31–46; Prov 24:11–12); to a moral state of being ("sin") in which human nature is fundamentally disordered or depraved (Matt 15:19; Jer 17:9); and sometimes, especially in Paul, to a seemingly active agent with power over humankind (Rom 5–7). Humans as slaves to sin (Rom 6:17) cannot free themselves but depend on the atoning (see Atonement #1) or redemptive* work of Christ.

The individually oriented understandings of major traditions differ somewhat among themselves. Roman Catholicism privileges the intellect: sin violates both God's law and right reason*, especially through inordinate sensual appetites; sin is by definition a voluntary act (see Will). Protestantism*, in line with the Reformation*, emphasizes pride and unbelief, seeing sin as corrupting humanity in all of its aspects, including motives (will), and thus views sin as radically limiting human freedom*. (Arminian* and Anabaptist* strands of Protestantism give a larger place to human freedom.)

Many contemporary feminists complain, however, that in Protestantism the signature sins of pride and self-assertiveness over against God represent typically male rather than female temptations: many women are prone to sin by self-abnegation and the refusal to take proper responsibility for their lives.

Eastern Orthodoxy*, with its less individual-centered anthropology, sees sin more in terms of error (being deceived by the devil*) and illness that need correction and healing. Sin afflicts the whole person, regarded as a psychosomatic unity.

Other contemporary interpretations (with roots in biblical and early tradition and influenced by the modern social sciences and socioeconomic realities) tend to reduce the emphasis on individual responsibility. Some stress constraints on individuals, including finitude (is it possible, in a finite world, for creatures not to be at cross-purposes with one another?); the negative formative effects of environment; genetic predispositions and psychological weaknesses; and basic human immaturity and the need for growth. Such constraints suggest responses of compassion and attempts at healing or education rather than the judgment and repentance typical of classical Western paradigms. Others, including Liberation* theologians, emphasize structural or systemic sin: unjust economic and political structures produce larger and more pervasive evils than do individual sinners, and may leave individuals caught up in them with no good options. No moral probity at the individual level suffices to fix the faulty structure.

The way one fundamentally conceives of sin is critical to how one conceives of its proper remedy. Less individual-centered interpretations call attention to important aspects of the problem that have received too little attention, at least in Western traditions. However, any tendency to treat sin as a small matter, or merely as a normal part of an interesting character structure, denies the fundamental Christian affirmation that sin is not intrinsic to our humanity but radically defaces it (the church has confessed Jesus, the model of genuine humanity, to be sinless) and calls into question the meaning of the incarnation*, death, and resurrection of Christ, who came specifically to save us from our sins (Matt 1:21; Rom 8:3). See also ANTI-SEMITISM; COLONIALISM

AND IMPERIALISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; PENANCE AND FORGIVENESS: POVERTY CLUSTER; RACISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; VIOLENCE CLUSTER.

MARGUERITE SHUSTER

Singapore. For many young and well-educated women and men in Singapore, Christianity is modern, rational, and English-based, in comparison with their parents' religions, namely a combination of Buddhism*, Daoism*, and ancestor* worship, which they consider illogical and superstitious.

As a free port founded in 1819 by Thomas Stamford Raffles, a British Indies administrator, Singapore was opened to the London Missionary* Society, the Church* Missionary Society, and the Roman Catholic mission. Initially the missionary work proved to be difficult. However, mission schools become important evangelistic channels for the propagation of the Christian gospel and opportunities for female education*.

During the Japanese occupation (1941–45), interned missionaries and Western laypersons realized the importance of indigenous Christian leadership. Hence 1948 saw the birth of Trinity Theological College and the present National Council of Churches of Singapore.

From 1970 to 2000, the number of male and female Christians steadily increased; the majority tended to be Chinese, younger and better educated than the rest of the population, to attend English-speaking schools, and to have a higher socioeconomic status. The significant growth of the Charismatic* renewal movements is attributed in part to more expressive worship, emphasis on evangelistic zeal, more fundamentalist interpretation of the Bible, and demand for greater commitment to the church. Although the church leadership is male dominated, the role of female pastors and laity is gradually gaining recognition and acceptance.

The Religious Harmony Act (1991) seeks to maintain religious tolerance and to minimize religious interference in politics in multireligious Singapore.

Statistics: Population (2000): 3.6 million (M). Christians, 0.44 M, 12.3% (Roman Catholics, 0.14 M; Protestants, 0.13 M; independents, 0.09 M; Anglicans, 0.04 M); native religionists, 1.5 M, 42.7%; Muslims, 0.66 M, 18.4%; Buddhists, 0.52 M, 14.5%; Hindus, 0.18 M, 5.1%; nonreligious, 0.17 M, 4.7%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

TAN YAK-HWEE

Singing in Worship. In Israel, praise for God was typically sung. The song of Miriam* (Exod 15:20–21) celebrates the passage through the Red Sea; the song of Hannah* (1 Sam 2:1–10), the birth of Samuel*. Mary's* Magnificat, Zechariah's Benedictus, and Simon's Nunc Dimittis (Luke 1:46–55, 68–79; 2:29–32) celebrate the coming of salvation. Temple worship and the Passover* and other rituals involved singing psalms*. The early church sang "psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs" (Eph 5:19; Col 3:16–17). Hymns, composed through the centuries for the Eucharist* or the daily Divine* Office, were sung by priests*, monks*, and canons* in choir* (with boys or castrati* instead of women). Singing by the people took place mostly in settings outside formal worship.

The Reformation* encouraged the singing of hymns by the entire congregation, and this also entered Roman Catholic practice. In Germany, both Lutherans and Catholics encouraged singing by skilled choirs, accompanied by instruments. Reformed and Anglicans restricted singing to psalms and "canticles*." In Britain and the USA, congregational singing was enriched first by the Dissenters'* metrical* Psalms, then by the Wesleys'* many hymns, and translations of Greek and Latin hymns by participants in the Oxford* Movement.

In the USA, spirituals* were part of revivalism* and the African* American Church. Missionaries, after initial resistance, now encourage the use of indigenous music in worship, as independent churches always did. After the Second Vatican* Council, guitars, drums, and folk-style melodies became acceptable in Roman Catholic churches. EUGENE TESELLE

Siricius, Pope (384–99), born and died in Rome, venerated as a saint. A deacon under Pope Damasus, his choice as bishop was popular with the people of Rome and the emperor Valentinian II. Little is known of his pontificate except that, in the manner of the imperial court, he issued decrees that he regarded as binding on much of the Western Church, thus marking an important stage in the growth of papal authority. Although an opponent of Priscillianism*, he rebuked those who had Priscillian put to death.

MICHAEL J. WALSH

Skepticism, the doctrine that certain knowledge is unattainable, at least in some areas of concern; thus the term refers to doubt* about Christian beliefs.

Sketic Monasticism, in the area of Skete or Scetis (in the desert bordering the Nile valley in Egypt*), near other Anchorite* monastic centers (Nitria, Ta Kellia), emphasized withdrawal from the world for contemplation* and prayer in small communities or individually. It continued to be a vivid image among later monks who developed the method of hesychasm* and was especially influential in Russia*, particularly through Nil* Sorsky. Forsaking the large monasteries of the region around Moscow and reviving the monastic ideals of “non-possession” and working with one’s own hands, Nil promoted a “third way” between cenobite* and eremite* monasticism in the forests north of the Volga. Suppressed by the czars, the movement continued within larger monasteries; staretsi were respected by the people and influenced many intellectuals (e.g. Dostoyevsky*, Tolstoy*, Soloviev*, Berdyaev*, Bulgakov*).

Slave in the Bible. See SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN THE BIBLE: SLAVES AND SERVANTS.

SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Slavery and Christianity: In the Bible:
Slaves and Servants

Slavery and Christianity through the Centuries

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Slavery and Christianity in Brazil
Slavery and Christianity in North America

1) Introductory Entries

Slavery and Christianity: In the Bible: Slaves and Servants. Both doulos (Gk) and ‘ebed (Heb) are ambivalent terms in the Bible (hence the double English translation, “slave”/ “servant”).

In the Roman Empire, slavery was a common social institution. Slaves were owned by their masters and remained in bondage until they were redeemed. The slaves’ brutalization and their shameful* status stood in contrast to that of “free” persons (Gal 3:28). In metaphorical phrases (“slave to Christ,” “slave to sin”), the connotation of “bondage” often remained, along with that of “redemption*” as freedom from bondage.

Slaves as members of the household often carried out tasks with the authority of their master (as the “slaves of Caesar” did). Thus the NT term “servant” or “slave” may have this connotation, e.g. in the parables where slaves act in their masters’ names; metaphorically, the designation “Paul, slave of Christ” (Rom 1:1) might carry the connotation of one who acts with the authority of Christ.

The NT term “servant” or “slave” may also evoke the metaphorical designation as “servant of God” of figures – e.g. Abraham, Moses, David, prophets, the “servant of YHWH” (Isa 49:1–8), the entire people of God – who willingly submit to the authority of God, e.g. as Christ did “taking the form of a servant” (Phil 2:7) (see Isaiah, Book of). These three meanings are potentially present in each use of the term in the NT.

DANIEL PATTE

Slavery and Christianity through the Centuries. Slavery existed throughout the ancient world in which the Christian churches originated and expanded. The early church consisted of both slaves and slave owners, and both were known to suffer martyrdom*. A reciprocal relationship existed in which slaves were urged to be obedient and industrious, and slaveholders were compelled to act with kindness, fairness, and respect. Paul addressed the issue in the Epistle to Philemon* in one way; the later pseudonymous Pauline literature (Eph 6:5–8; Col 3:22–4; Titus 2: 9–10; cf. 1 Pet 2:18–25) addressed it in another way (see Household Codes). Slavery had a great impact on the institutional life, teachings, and practices of the apostolic church.

During the early Middle Ages, Slavs in Eastern Europe were enslaved, often being sold in the Muslim world; the word for “slave” in all European languages is derived from “Slav.” In the context of the feudal* system, the acceptance of slavery in the medieval churches and beyond was equally unquestioned; neither Roman Catholics nor Protestants condemned the standard definitions and values of human bondage. To various degrees, the same applied to the churches in all the countries in Latin America (see History of Christianity Cluster: In Latin America), the Caribbean* Islands, and North America, all of which embraced from the 17th to the 19th c. a system of slavery that targeted indigenous people and particularly African peoples. Missionaries were implicated in slave trade. For example, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (1701) inherited a slave plantation in Barbados, and its first missionary to Africa, Thomas Thompson, published a book in defense of the slave trade (1756). In the French Caribbean colonies (e.g. Guadeloupe*, Haiti*), Roman Catholic missionaries followed the 1685 Black Code, which made evangelization a fundamental part of the slavery system, until the official abolition of slavery in all French colonies (1848) (see Mission Cluster: Thematic Issues: Anti-slavery).

Anti-slavery sentiment did appear in various parts of the so-called New World. Even though few Christians questioned the legitimacy of slavery in the 16th c., some Spanish priests in the Americas (e.g. Bartolomé de las* Casas and, later, Jesuits*) urged that slaves be treated humanely. But it was only with the Enlightenment* (from the 18th c.) and its emphasis on the equality of all humans and their potential to become “civilized” that churches progressively embraced first the ideology that all Christians, including slaves, could improve by grace* and later became champions of slave emancipation (e.g. Protestant missionaries in the British Empire from 1833 to 1834). Yet these issues were highly contentious in political and economic life, as well as in the churches, as tragically exemplified by the Civil* War in the United States (1861–65) and, in the preceding decades, by the division of Methodists* (1844), Baptists* (1845), and Presbyterians* (1857) into Northern abolitionist and Southern pro-slavery churches. By that time the colonies of Sierra* Leone (1807) and Liberia* (1820) had been founded for freed slaves (both African and African American). The colonization movement was widely supported in the period before the Civil War, since many people in the USA could not envisage a society in which people of African descent would have full participation.

By the mid-19th c., the abolition of slavery was promoted by many churches and missionary societies – first by African* American churches (especially the African* Methodist Episcopal [AME] Church) and their leaders (e.g. Richard Allen*, Frederick Douglass*, Harriet Tubman*, Nat Turner*) and later by Adventists*, American* Baptists (the Baptist* Missionary Society secured the abolition of slavery in Jamaica*, 1833–34), Mennonites*, Quakers* (with leaders such as Sarah and Angelina Grimké*; Hicks*; Woolman*), Anglicans (e.g. Wilberforce*), and members of the Holiness* Movement and revivalism* (including Finney*; Phoebe Palmer*; Sojourner* Truth) and of the Salvation* Army (founded by Catherine and William Booth*). In the late 19th c., anti-slavery became a preoccupation of Roman Catholic missionaries, especially the White* Fathers (in central and Western Africa).

More than a century after the official abolition of slavery (although it still exists in various forms, often designated as “human trafficking”), lingering questions abound regarding the long history of slavery in Christian churches as a whole, the most pressing among which are the following: What exactly did Jesus say, if anything at all, about the benefits and/or evils of human bondage? How have the churches from apostolic times reconciled slavery with the gospel’s message of love, charity, and human equality and community? To what extent did pro-slavery churches in the New World and elsewhere find precedent in the early and medieval churches? See also RACISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER. LEWIS V. BALDWIN

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Slavery and Christianity in Brazil

The Roman Catholic Church. The position taken on slavery by the Roman Catholic Church in Brazil reflects the alliance agreed upon by the Holy See and the Portuguese crown and codified in the papal bulls Dum Diversas (1452) and Romanus Pontifex (1455). These and other bulls granted the Portuguese the power to either convert the “infidels” to the Catholic faith or enslave them and sell them. During colonial times, the just war* theory provided the theological basis for slavery; those who refused to accept Christianity could be enslaved.

The Roman Catholic Church was pro-slavery, and its concerns regarding black slaves were incidental and occasional. The First Constitutions of the Archdiocese of Bahia (1707) – the most important legal-canonical document of the Church in colonial times – deals exclusively with the salvation* of the souls* of black slaves and completely ignores their physical pain. Similarly, the document “A Brief Instruction on the Mysteries of Faith,” for slaves, is concerned primarily with the compulsory and superficial conversion of blacks.

Conniving with slavery, the Roman Catholic Church benefited from the slaveholding system, a fact kept silent for many years and presently brought to light by historiography. Catholic priests and male and female members of religious orders (e.g. Benedictines*, Jesuits*, Carmelites*, Mercedarians, Franciscans*, Clarissas, Ursulines, Discalced Carmelites) owned male and female slaves, who worked in convents, farms, and mission colonies (“reductions*”).

The structural link between the Church and slavery was so strong during colonial and imperial times that the Church not only refused to hear theologians’ objections, but also reprimanded and punished the few priests who spoke up against it (e.g. the Jesuits were expelled in 1750), and never even questioned slavery. It was only in 1885 that it took a stand against “slave traffic,” although without advocating the abolition of slavery.

Protestantism was regarded as a heresy* in the Portuguese colonies and a threat to the unity and integrity of Christianity. In 1630 the Dutch of the West Indies Company conquered the city of Recife and held it for 24 years. The Dutch reviewed the issue of replacing cheap and abundant slave labor. But they soon realized that slavery was necessary to accomplish the project of colonization. Thus they gradually abandoned the Calvinist ethic, which defended the dignity of labor*, and initiated mechanisms for slave trafficking.

Among Protestants the moral discussion regarding the legitimacy or immorality of slavery had been taking place since 1599, involving businessmen, politicians, theologians, and ministers. During the occupation years, approximately 50 ministers strove to build a Reformed Church in the Dutch colony. But the general government of Brazil, under pressure from economic interests, declared that Africans were indispensable to the colony. Furthermore, the Reformed Church benefited from slavery; even its ministers were slave masters. The Church was concerned with saving the souls* of slaves and tried to teach them the Christian religion. The religious tolerance granted by the Dutch to the Portuguese and indigenous people was not extended to blacks. They all had to be brought to the Reformed Church worship services, even if their masters were Catholic.

The path followed by Dutch merchants – from mere interceptors to regular slave traffickers – marred evangelization by Protestants in the colony. The anti-slavery reaction of Protestant churches appeared with the Pietists* toward the end of the 18th c.

The Golden Law, signed by Princess Isabel on May 13, 1888, put an end to slavery in Brazil. The signature was preceded by intensive action on the part of the Abolitionist Movement, with the support of both public opinion and many members of the Catholic and Protestant churches.

ÊNIO JOSÉ DA COSTA BRITO

Slavery and Christianity in North America. In the 17th–19th c., a close relationship existed between slavery and the Christian churches in British North America. From the very beginning of the African slave trade, the conversion* of slaves to Christianity had been the justification for the enslavement of African peoples. After European Christians and African captives arrived on the North American continent (early 17th c.), slavery developed among Anglicans* in the colony of Virginia as early as 1619. The acceptance of slavery was initially unquestioned by both the Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church, in which the institution was believed to be supported by natural* law and sanctioned by Scripture and tradition, and the practice of owning slaves also existed among Congregationalists*, Presbyterians*, Baptists*, Methodists*, and even Quakers* and Moravians*. Colonial statutes stipulated that baptism* did not alter the earthly status of slaves; churches were encouraged to convert and monitor the spiritual welfare of the enslaved, and slaveholders were told to exercise Christian charity in the treatment of slaves. Quaker involvement in the owning of slaves had essentially ended by the 18th c., as “the Friends” embraced quietistic forms of abolitionism, and Presbyterians, Baptists, and Methodists increasingly experienced sharp divisions over slavery. Such divisions were most evident in the aftermath of the American Revolution, as slavery faded in the North and became more deeply entrenched in the South, and as churches confronted the paradox of a new nation born in freedom while some 700,000 Africans languished in bondage.

The early 19th c. witnessed both increased missionary activity among slaves and the emergence of prominent pro-slavery and anti-slavery voices in the churches. Slaves were converted in greater numbers than in the colonial period, but the remnants of African* Religion in slave culture remained strong, even as the churches sought to discourage and eliminate them. Pro-slavery elements in the Protestant churches of the agrarian South defended slave missions and slavery on the basis of Scripture, tradition, and federalist social theory, thus fashioning an evangelical slaveholding ethic that highlighted the sense of Christian obligation and duty that slaves and slave owners should display toward each other. Slaves were admonished to be passive, obedient, and productive, and slaveholders were expected to meet the material and spiritual needs of the slaves. Roman Catholic Churches in the South had a similar perspective on the reciprocal relationship between slaves and their masters, and this tempered anti-Catholic bias and made the intermingling of the Church and Southern life and culture easier for them. In contrast, anti-slavery voices in the Northern churches, and especially African* American churches, denounced slavery as un-Christian, immoral, and an impediment to the physical, psychological, and spiritual well-being of slaves. African American churches were uniform in their opposition to human bondage, and militant abolitionists like David Walker and Henry Highland Garnet surfaced among those in the North. Disputes along regional lines resulted in schisms in the white churches. Northern and Southern Methodists (1844), Baptists (1845), and Presbyterians (1857) split from each other. Differences over slavery generally translated into divided loyalties during the Civil* War (1861–65), as Northern churches tended to support Union efforts and Southern churches the Confederate cause. LEWIS V. BALDWIN

Slovak Republic. The beginnings of church organization in this region are associated with the Byzantine mission of Cyril* and Methodius. But very little survived the fall of the Moravian Empire (906), and Christianity ultimately spread (in its Latin form) from the West as the region became part of medieval Hungary* (Upper Hungary) and was incorporated into its ecclesiastical structures (archbishopric of Esztergom, 1025–28).

The Reformation, especially Luther’s teaching, found a favorable response, particularly among the (partly German speaking) population of mining towns. In the same period, the Ottoman Turks gained control over a substantial part of Hungary, and the seat of the Hungarian archbishopric moved from Esztergom to Trnava (1543–1822). Although most of Upper Hungary remained under Hapsburg control, the tense political situation prevented the Hapsburgs from implementing their re-Catholicization policy to the same extent as in the Western parts of their empire. The existence of three minority churches (Lutheran, Reformed, and Greek Catholic) was ultimately legalized by the Act of Toleration (1781).

In the 19th c., the religious situation became increasingly complicated by national tension between the (dominant) Magyar- and Slovak-speaking populations. In 1918 Slovakia became part of Czechoslovakia; in 1939 Slovakia became an independent state under Hitler's tutelage. The role of the Roman Catholic Church, owing to its involvement in political life, is seen as highly controversial: a Roman Catholic priest who was president of the state, Jozef Tiso, was later executed as a war criminal.

Incorporated into Czechoslovakia again in 1945, Slovakia was exposed to a Communist regime (1948–89). Although less successful than in the Czech part of the country, the Communist antireligious campaign contributed to the secularization* of society. Present-day Slovakia (an independent state since 1993) experiences a situation common in other European countries: stagnation of membership in traditional churches. See also CZECH REPUBLIC.

Statistics: Population (2001): 5.4 million (M). Roman Catholics, 68.9%; Evangelicals, 6.9%; Greek Catholics, 4.1%; Reformed, 2%; others, 2.1%; without religious affiliation, 13%; unknown, 3%. (Source: 2001 census.)

MARTIN ELBEL

Slovenia. Slovenia became a nation-state in 1991, the first of the six former Yugoslav republics to declare independence. Its population is largely homogeneous in ethnic and religious terms, with a large Roman Catholic majority. In 2006 a total of 41 religious groups and associations were officially registered with the state's Office for Religious Communities. Public opinion surveys, however, reveal a considerably lower percentage of regularly practicing believers (in surveys conducted in the 1990s, one-third of the population declared that they did not follow any religion). Thus some authors concluded that secularized* Catholics form the majority of the country's population.

The Roman Catholic Church championed the cultural and linguistic identity of the Slovenes in the 19th c. by endorsing the use of the Slovenian language in Church services. Although the first translation of the Bible was undertaken by Protestants (mid-16th c.), Protestantism was suppressed in the late 16th and early 17th c. In 1918 Slovenes were included in the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (renamed Yugoslavia*, 1929). During World War II, most of the Catholic clergy sided with the German and Italian occupiers and their collaborators, while in some areas it actively supported the anti-Fascist movement. In Tito's Yugoslavia, the Catholic Church was marginalized but not strongly oppressed and it gained prestige after the reestablishment of diplomatic relations with the Holy See (1970). After Slovenia achieved independence, the government signed agreements with the Catholic Bishops' Conference, which were followed by agreements with other denominations.

Social attitudes toward minority religions are generally tolerant. An issue of concern has been the absence of mosques for the country's Muslim population, a matter discussed for more than three decades. See also HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: THE BALKANS; YUGOSLAVIA.

Statistics: Population (2002): 2 million. Christians, 60.9% (Roman Catholics, 57.8%; Orthodox, 2.3%; Evangelicals, 0.8%); Muslims, 2.4%; other religionists, 3.5%; atheists, 10.1% (others did not specify). (Source: 2002 census.)

INA MERDJANOVA

Smith, Joseph (1805–44). An influential 19th-c. US religious figure, Joseph Smith was a 14-year-old boy living in New York when, by his own account, God the Father and Jesus Christ appeared to him, urging him not to join any organized religion. Three years later, he reported, the angel Moroni came to him and identified himself as a resurrected prophet and guardian of an ancient sacred record that was buried nearby. In 1827 Smith retrieved this record, which he said was inscribed on gold plates, and began to translate it "through the gift and power of God," making use of a "seer-stone" and an instrument called "interpreters." In March 1830, Smith published the resulting Book of Mormon*. Days later, Smith organized the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. A dynamic and charismatic leader with a prodigious talent for scriptural production, Smith was a locus of angelic visitations and heavenly revelations, claiming to restore ancient texts, doctrines, rituals, priesthood keys, and sealing powers.

He relocated converts to Kirtland, Ohio, and to areas in Missouri, and then founded the town of Nauvoo, Illinois. His teachings were centered on a fully restored church, modern-day prophets and apostles, premortal existence, eternal families, and the human potential for godhood.

Rumors of his practice of polygamy enraged opponents suspicious of his local and national political activity and a mob murdered him in 1844 in Carthage, Illinois. See also LATTER-DAY SAINTS; MORMON, BOOK OF; MORMON WORSHIP; YOUNG, BRIGHAM. TERRY L GIVENS

Social Darwinism. See DARWINISM.

Social Encyclicals. From 1891 to 1991, popes* of the Roman Catholic Church promulgated a series of 10 documents addressing issues of economic* justice*, political* relations within and between states, the proper ordering of cultural* values, and life in society. The purpose of these social teaching documents is not to propose detailed blueprints for how secular* society should organize its social and economic institutions, but rather to offer general moral guidance that can then be applied to specific local issues by those with the requisite expertise. Among the most prominent principles and concepts highlighted in social encyclicals are the following: the protection of human dignity, universal solidarity, the common good, the importance of family* life, the urgency of peacemaking and disarmament, the rights and responsibilities attached to property* ownership, the proper role of government, special protection for the poor*, and the full range of human* rights, including the right of workers to organize and the right of nations to sovereignty and self-determination.

Drawing on scriptural and theological sources, each encyclical attempts to interpret contemporary social realities in terms of Christian values, often praising certain courses of action (such as commitment to achieving living wages and the alleviation of poverty) and condemning others (such as environmental degradation and quick resort to wars* of aggression). Most of these documents devote considerable space to commenting on the dominant 20th-c. economic systems. Communism is consistently condemned for trampling on human freedom, while capitalism receives a mixture of praise for its virtues of free enterprise and efficiency, and criticism for its tendency to devolve into a system of overly materialistic competition in which market mechanisms are indifferent to dire poverty, severely inequitable concentrations of wealth*, unmitigated consumerism, and other inhumane outcomes.

The social encyclicals are supplemented by several other genres of related documents, such as pastoral letters of national or regional conferences of bishops, exhortations from synods of bishops, and other less authoritative papal writings and addresses concerned with social issues. The following are the “social encyclicals” (the documents can easily be found under their Latin titles):

Leo XIII	1891	Rerum Novarum
Pius XI	1931	Quadragesimo Anno (see Subsidiarity, Principle of)
John XXIII	1961	Mater et Magistra
John XXIII	1963	Pacem in Terris
Paul VI	1967	Populorum Progressio
Paul VI	1971	Octogesima Adveniens
Paul VI	1975	Evangelii Nuntiandi
John Paul II	1981	Laborem Exercens
John Paul II	1987	Sollicitudo Rei Socialis
John Paul II	1991	Centesimus Annus

See also CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM.

THOMAS MASSARO, SJ

Social Ethics entails normative reflection on society and its institutions in light of theological principles or shared moral commitments to justice* or human* rights. Emphasis may be placed on general Christian principles or on the issues that arise in a specific social context. In a modern, pluralistic society, Christian social ethics must strike a balance between a distinctive religious witness and relevance to wider social discussion.

Theologians have always thought that Christian ethics provides guidance for social, as well as individual, moral problems. The principles of natural law* articulated by Thomas Aquinas*, e.g., provide guidance for distinguishing between just and unjust laws. Calvin* derives general principles for the organization of society from the Ten* Commandments. In these traditions, social ethics consists primarily of reasoning from principles to social policy conclusions that share in the normative authority of the principles from which they are derived (see Deontological Ethics). More recent statements, however, emphasize the complex relationships between facts and principles that govern specific moral choices, so that conscientious Christians may disagree about how principles apply to cases.

Finding solutions to social problems often requires cooperation among different religious traditions and secular philosophies. To participate more effectively in these discussions, social ethics often seeks to formulate principles of justice* or statements of human* rights that can be widely affirmed, independently of the authority of the religious traditions involved. Sometimes called “middle axioms,” these principles provide starting points from which all groups can move toward shared normative judgments about particular situations. North American Protestant churches have made extensive use of this type of social ethics. While reliance on generally shared principles risks losing distinctive elements of the Christian witness that fall outside of the consensus, many theologians regard participation in these public discussions that allow justice to be done for needy and marginalized people in the whole society as the distinctive task of Christian social ethics today.

Some recent critics question whether the consensus approach to social ethics relies too much on the expertise of educated elites. For Liberation* theologies, social ethics involves primarily the creation of alternative social communities, where people establish the conditions for justice and human dignity among themselves. Understood in this way, social ethics builds on the commitments and values that constitute a Christian community. It relies less on general principles than on specific, local experience, and it may result in resistance to the wider society rather than reform of it. See also ECONOMY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; ECONOMIC ETHICS AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; ETHICS AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; LAW. ROBIN W. LOVIN

Social Gospel Movement (the) took form in the USA from 1907 to 1920 to Christianize social, economic, political, and family life. With a growing conviction that the Kingdom* of God embraces all of human life, its advocates believed it was the church's duty to be the conscience and guide for "the Christian transfiguration of the social order," in the words of Walter Rauschenbusch*, pastor, professor, author, and one of its prominent leaders. Another leader was Washington Gladden, a nationally renowned preacher and orator, who was called "father of the Social Gospel."

Basic ideas and actions grounded in the OT prophets* and the social teachings of Jesus were not widespread until Protestant denominations created the Federal Council of Churches (December 1908). Social service programs were created by leaders of its new Church and Social Service Commission (1908–12). The Council also adopted the Social Creed of the Churches, based on a small-scale social creed first adopted by a Methodist General Conference, which Federal Council member denominations enlarged and approved, creating the Social Gospel Movement.

Social Gospel ideology was not accepted by all Protestants. Fundamentalists* during the 1920s attacked Federal Council assumptions that God's Kingdom could be attained on earth before the millennium* and that the church could be directly involved in politics*. Neo-orthodox* theologians attacked the Federal Council for its overly optimistic understanding of human nature and unrealistic ideas of social change. Reinhold Niebuhr's* Moral Man and Immoral Society (1932) convinced several denominations to abandon social pronouncements like the Social Creed of the Churches.

The economic depression of the 1930s, the impact of Hitler and Mussolini in Europe, and World War II overwhelmed Social Gospel optimism. The Federal Council responded by changing its Social Creed to Social Ideals, and was replaced by a new National Council of Churches in 1950. In the new organization, modified Social Gospel ideas continued to be implemented by four departments of its social service and social action, Division of Christian Life and Work. But the National Council abandoned the Social Ideals. Many denominations by then believed it was not possible for Christianity to transform the social order, but it could continue to be helpful in meeting human needs and offering social services. Christianizing the social order, as early advocates believed, was not feasible, but helping the needy has been a continuing ministry. See also CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM.

DONALD K. GORRELL

Society of Jesus. See JESUITS.

Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. See SPCK, SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

Socinus, Faustus (1539–1604), Italian reformer, scholar. In On Christ the Savior (1578), he concluded from biblical studies that Christ was divine only by office, not by nature; Jesus was totally human, but God shared his divine power with him, making him an adopted deity who could be worshipped. Fearing accusations of heresy*, he settled in Krakow, Poland* (1579), where he was the prime inspiration for an anti-trinitarian movement. For him, reason* is the foremost authority in interpreting scripture; God's nature is one, not three; and humans have free will*. Many of his views were embodied in the Racovian* Catechism (1605). See also UNITARIANISM. MARK W. HARRIS began in the 19th c., as modernization called into question established social institutions. The key figures were Ernst Troeltsch* (1865–1921) and Max Weber* (1864–1920). Both related Christian life and teaching to its wider social contexts. This aim remains definitive of the sociological study of Christianity, a special field within the sociology of religion.

Sociological Studies of Christianity. Like sociology itself, the sociological study of Christianity

Rather than focusing on “the church*,” and rather than invoking divine agency and individual human acts to explain its nature and development, sociological study views churches as social institutions that exist in relation to other institutions and structures. Like all sociology, there is a foundational commitment to the belief that “society” is a reality that shapes individuals, just as much as individuals shape society. Sociological studies of Christianity employ a range of methods. Troeltsch and Weber related general observations about premodern and modern societies to observations about the churches and Christianity. Subsequent sociologists have developed a range of more systematic and replicable methods for collecting and analyzing data. Quantitative methods (e.g. surveys) are used to collect information from a large number of sources (e.g. from a representative sample of the population). This makes them particularly suitable for testing theories and hypotheses. Qualitative methods include interviewing, participant observation, focus groups, and discourse analysis. These are useful in gathering in-depth information about social life and in generating new theories and hypotheses. Some significant studies of Christianity combine both approaches. There is a close relation and significant overlap between sociological and anthropological studies of religion. The latter are usually defined by their focus, through participant observation, on small-scale societies.

Sociological studies of Christianity differ in the scale of their social focus. Microlevel studies look at individual congregations (e.g. Ammerman). Mesolevel studies may investigate a denomination, network, or association (e.g. Griffith). Macrolevel studies consider topics like the growth of Pentecostalism* (e.g. Martin), the state of religion in the USA (e.g. Wuthnow), or the relations between Protestantism and capitalism (e.g. Weber).

Sociological studies of Christianity are undertaken both by committed Christians and by those who stand outside the tradition. There is a lively debate about the relative merits of “insider” versus “outsider” approaches. There is also an ongoing debate about the compatibility of theology and sociology. Sociological insights are sought by some Christians who seek to halt church decline and encourage church growth.

LINDA WOODHEAD

Sodality (Lat sodalis, “comrade”), a term used primarily in the Roman Catholic Church to designate religious organizations, Christian communities, or church groups defined by a specialized, task-oriented ministry, be it a devotional, missionary, or social ministry. Comparable to confraternities* in the Middle Ages, sodalities have similarities today to parachurch* organizations.

Sodom, portrayed as a place inhabited by wicked people (Gen 13:12–13), where Lot settled but from which he fled when God vowed to destroy it (Gen 19; cf. Amos 4:11; Isa 13:19; Jer 50:40). Condemned for sexual* perversion and violation of hospitality* (Gen 19:5) and neglect of the poor* (Ezek 16:48–50), Sodom is described as subject to eternal fire (Jude 7). Yet it will be more bearable for Sodom than for those towns that reject Jesus (Matt 10:15; 11:23–24; Luke 10:12), for as God destroyed Sodom, God will destroy the ungodly (2 Pet 2:6–8). Augustine* saw Sodom, like Babylon*, as the earthly city at the Last Judgment*, representing God’s wrath.

JEFFREY C. DAVIS

Sojourner Truth (c1797–1883) was born into slavery* in New York as Isabella. She was sold several times, and while owned by the John Dumont family in Ulster County, she married Thomas, another of Dumont’s slaves. They had five children. In 1827, New York law emancipated all slaves, but Isabella had already left her husband and run away with her youngest child. She went to work for the family of Isaac Van Wageningen in Ulster County.

In 1843 she took the name Sojourner Truth, believing this to be in accord with the instructions of the Holy* Spirit, and became a traveling preacher. She was a popular speaker with the Abolitionist Movement (late 1840s) and later began speaking on woman suffrage (1850). She delivered her most famous speech – “Ain’t I a Woman?” – at a women’s rights convention in Ohio (1851).

During the Civil* War, Sojourner Truth collected contributions of food and clothing for black regiments. She met Abraham Lincoln at the White House (1864), and while there she challenged the racial discrimination that condoned the segregation of streetcars.

After the Civil War, Sojourner Truth organized efforts to provide jobs for black refugees from the war, then continued speaking on women's rights and human* rights. See also AFRICAN AMERICAN CLUSTER: HOLINESS; DOUGLASS, FREDERICK.

MONYA A. STUBBS

Sola Scriptura (by Scripture alone). See SCRIPTURE PRINCIPLE.

Solemn League and Covenant, agreement between the Scottish and English Parliaments (1643) when the Scots, engaged in warfare with King Charles I, needed military assistance from the English. It pledged a "reformation of religion" in the three kingdoms of Scotland, England, and Ireland, outlawing both papacy and prelacy (bishops) in favor of the presbyterian form of church polity*. The work of the Westminster* Assembly was shaped by this political context, including the presence of the Scottish army in London. The Covenant pledged to "preserve and defend" the king's "person and authority"; this led to an alliance between the Scots and the king against Cromwell's army and Presbyterian opposition to the execution of the king (1649).

Solidarity, unity of interests and aspirations, sometimes through participation in a collective response to a concrete situation, sometimes through mutual commitment. See also PREFERENTIAL OPTION FOR THE POOR.

Solomon. The son of David* by Bathsheba*, Solomon succeeded to the throne of Israel* and ruled with magnificence and wisdom, according to 2 Samuel and 2 Chronicles. His 40-year reign is regarded as Israel's golden age of prosperity and peace. His theological importance is based on his role as the builder of the Temple* in Jerusalem*, whose physical plan and sacrificial rituals represent the actualization of the Israelite faith. Solomon's reputation for wisdom* gave rise to later traditions of his exorcistic* powers and mystical* knowledge, elaborated in the apocryphal Wisdom* of Solomon. The authorship of the Song* of Songs as well as Proverbs* was traditionally attributed to him. In the deuteronomistic perspective of 2 Samuel, Solomon succumbs to apostasy late in his reign, bringing about the gradual disintegration of the united Kingdom of Israel. In the NT, Solomon is rarely mentioned directly, but the identification of Jesus as "the son of David" (Mark 10:46–52) in connection with healing may refer indirectly to Solomon. The church fathers, particularly Augustine*, regarded the biblical traditions connected with Solomon as theological allegories*. The Song of Songs was seen as an allegorical expression of God's love for the church.

NEIL SILBERMAN

Solomon, Odes of, collection of 42 Christian hymns transmitted together with the Psalms of Solomon in the 2nd c. CE. Themes include gratitude for deliverance, purity and holiness*, and the love between God and believers. The alleged authorship of Solomon is not suggested by the manuscripts or the content of the Odes, and the reference to Solomon in the title may be secondary. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA.

JOHANNES TROMP

Solomon, Psalms of, 18 Jewish poems, written in Judea in the 1st c. BCE, in the tradition of the biblical psalms and representing an unpretentious piety of holiness. A number of them seem to reflect the political circumstances of their age. Psalm 17 gives an elaborate description of the coming of the awaited Davidic Messiah. Psalm 18 is sometimes held to be a Christian addition. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA.

JOHANNES TROMP

Solomon Islands. Christianity has a strong, pervasive, and diversified presence in Solomon Islands. The churches play an important public role as the only institutions outside the government with the capacity to provide a moral basis for civil society.

Spanish explorers (16th c.) and subsequently French Roman Catholics (1840s) made the first, unsuccessful attempts to introduce Christianity to Solomon Islands. The Melanesian Mission of the Anglican Church, based in New* Zealand, arrived in the 1850s. Its first bishop, J. C. Patteson, was killed (1871) and is regarded as a martyr. The British protectorate (1893) opened the door to Roman Catholic, Methodist, South Sea Evangelical, and Seventh*-day Adventist missions, which generally had a comfortable relationship with the colonial government. They provided basic medical services and education (one of the main attractions of Christianity was its association with literacy and Western education). The Pacific War (1942–45) brought severe disruption. In 1961 the Christian Fellowship Church, an indigenous religious movement, separated from the Methodist mission. The Anglican and Protestant missions became self-governing churches with local leadership (1960s and 1970s). By the time Solomon Islands had become an independent state within the British Commonwealth (1978), the great majority of the population had adopted Christianity.

Since the 1950s, the historic churches have been challenged by new religious movements: Jehovah's* Witnesses, Baha'i*, and numerous Evangelical*, especially Pentecostal*/Charismatic*, bodies; the latter gained a strong following in expanding urban areas. Starting in 1999, ethnic conflicts and a breakdown in effective government pushed Solomon Islands almost to civil war. Some within the older churches played important roles as mediators, encouraging disarmament. Seven members of the Melanesian Brotherhood, an indigenous Anglican religious community, were killed (2003) while doing this peacemaking work.

Statistics: Population (1999): 0.40 million (M). Christians, 97.5% (Anglicans, 0.13 M; Roman Catholics, 0.08 M; members of South Sea Evangelical Church, 0.07 M; Seventh-day Adventists, 0.05 M; members of United Church [formerly Methodist], 0.04 M; members of Christian Fellowship Church, 0.01 M; other Christians, 0.02M); traditional religionists, 0.8%; other religionists (including Muslims), 1.2%. (Source: 1999 census.)

DAVID HILLIARD

Soloviev, Vladimir Sergeevich (1853–1900), philosopher, poet, Orthodox lay theologian. Born and educated in Moscow; briefly a university lecturer; thereafter an independent scholar and writer. He was a pioneer of ecumenism and interfaith dialogue, and a collaborator in Russia's first professional philosophy journal, Questions of Philosophy and Psychology.

The historical context of Soloviev's work was the bitter debate about whether Russia* should become a European liberal society or promote the religious and communal values of Orthodox* Christianity. Soloviev believed Russia could do both. He envisioned the reconciliation of Russia and the West, Orthodoxy and Western Christianity, Christendom and Judaism*, the gospel and the secular* world.

The theological core of Soloviev's thought is the concept of bogochelovechestvo, translated as "Godmanhood," "theandry," "divine humanity," or "humanity of God." The concept thematizes the Incarnation* as the foundation for universal reconciliation. Soloviev promoted human* rights and called the Orthodox Church to philanthropic service in the world. He also renovated the notion of Sophia, or Wisdom* of God, describing his encounters with Sophia in a small but important body of lyric poetry.

The epitome of a lay Christian intellectual, Soloviev had an influence extending far beyond philosophy and theology to law, politics, and literature. See also BERDYAEV, NIKOLAI ALEKSANDROVICH; BULGAKOV, SERGEI NIKOLAEVICH.

PAUL VALLIERE

Song of Songs (Song of Solomon), a poetic biblical book, dated as late as the 3rd c. BCE, is strikingly secular. It does not allude to God or the sacred, and refers only in an uncommitted manner to some biblical names like Jerusalem and Solomon. In the form of a dialogue between two lovers (not spouses), the praises that each sings of the other's handsomeness are exquisite, although surprising metaphors signal that the poem's topic is not purely aesthetic (see 4:4). Historically, the Song has been allegorically* interpreted in both the synagogue and the church: "he" represents God (or Christ) and "she" Israel or the church or the individual soul. Such interpretations may have been instrumental in the canonization of the poem (Rabbi Aqiba [2nd c. CE]: "All Scripture will pass, but not the Song").

Today, by scholarly consensus, the poem is read literally: it is about carnal, embodied love, and the latter is glorified as the most precious human sentiment. To detect a magnificent gift of God behind this hymn of praise to eros is not illegitimate. But love here is subversive (see 3:3–4, 5:7); the female author shuns customs and conventions. Love is not dictated (by external authority) or made commonplace by being institutionalized. In this way, the Song is challenging all power that be. It ends as it started, with the lover escaping and jumping "upon the mountains of spices." For "love is strong as death, passion fierce as the grave" (8:6); no one can domesticate it (8:7). See also BODY; LOVE; SEXUALITY, ISSUES OF, CLUSTER.

ANDRÉ LACOCQUE

Song of the Three Children, a section of 68 verses in the Septuagint* and Vulgate* versions of the Book of Daniel* but not found in the Aramaic–Hebrew text. Since it has little connection with the story of Daniel, it appears to have been written for another occasion, then inserted into Daniel (between 3:23 and 3:24). It includes the prayer of Azarias and the canticle of the three young men, used in both Eastern and Western liturgies and called the Benedicite.

Son of God in the New Testament has different connotations in the Synoptic* Gospels, Paul's letters, the Gospel of John, Hebrews, and other texts. Later Christologies* and debates about the Trinity* are based on these NT texts, each emphasizing one set of NT texts or another, but without exhausting their meaning.

1. "Son of God" refers to the divine nature of Jesus Christ when understood in light of the NT texts about the incarnation* of a preexistent* divine being (e.g. John 1:1–14), which was identified with the "Logos" and the wisdom* of God (1 Cor 1:24), was with God at the creation (Heb 1:1–4), and was in the form of God yet took that of a human (Phil 2:6–8). The divine nature of the Son was much debated in the controversies over Christologies and the Trinity* that arose from the ecumenical* councils and, later, in both the Western* and the Eastern* churches.
2. "Son of God" refers to a father–son relationship with God and the specific role that Christ has because of this relationship, when the NT texts (especially the Synoptic Gospels, including about the virginal conception in Matthew and Luke, and Pauline texts) are read in terms of the OT. Jesus as the Christ/Messiah*, like his followers (who pray "our Father in Heaven" or "Abba") as the people of God (see Children of God), is in a father–son relationship with God, just as were the kings in Israel–Judah (especially David and his descendants, 2 Sam 7; Ps 2) and the people of God (Israel; e.g. Exod 4:22–23; cf. Matt 2:15). Because of this special relationship, Christ has divine authority and speaks in God's name, manifesting the divine Wisdom (as in Matthew), just as the kings reigned in the name of God and as the people represented God among the nations (e.g. Exod 19:4–6).
3. "Son of God" refers to Jesus as filled with divine power (e.g. Mark 1:11; Rom 1:3–4) or with God's Spirit (e.g. Luke 4:1, 14, 18) or as empowered by God to free people from bondage (to evil powers/diseases and to sin; Mark 2:1–12). This meaning is found when the NT texts are read in terms of Jewish apocalyptic texts, and in terms of the Hellenistic traditions about miracle workers (theios aner), and when one takes into account the dual designation of Jesus as the Son of God and the Son* of man. See also CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER; TRINITY IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY; TRINITY IN THE WESTERN TRADITION.

DANIEL PATTE

Son of Man (also translated "Son of humanity"), a self-designation of Jesus in the canonical Gospels, is understood in two ways: (1) "Son of man" as a Semitic expression referring to a specific human being is popularly and dogmatically taken to be an affirmation of Jesus' humanity ("Son of God" refers to his divinity). While this interpretation is plausible in many passages (referring to the lowliness of Jesus; e.g. Matt 8:20) and can be grounded in the use of this Semitic phrase in the OT, especially to designate the prophet in Ezekiel*, it is unlikely in most passages of the Gospels. (2) "Son of man" as a reference to Jesus as an apocalyptic figure, namely the judge and supernatural deliverer of the end-time, is quite common in the Gospels. "You will see the Son of Man seated at the right hand of Power and coming on the clouds of heaven" (Mark 14:62, par.) is a quasi-quotation of Dan 7:13–14, apparently interpreted as in 1 Enoch* 37–71, Wis 1–6, and 4 Ezra 11–13 to refer to Jesus as God's anointed one, the eschatological judge and deliverer, who will come back as the exalted Jesus as judge (at the Parousia*); but in Jesus and his ministry, the Son of man already had an earthly existence and was persecuted because he initiated the end-time.

DANIEL PATTE

Sons of God. See CHILDREN OF GOD.

Sophia. See WISDOM.

Sophia ("Second Phoebe") was a deacon* of the Jerusalem* Church, according to an elegant funerary inscription of the Byzantine period found incomplete and broken into five pieces on the Mount of Olives, Jerusalem (1903), perhaps from a cemetery of one of the many monasteries built on the west side of the mount facing Jerusalem. The inscription, now in the museum of the White* Fathers, Church of St. Anne, Jerusalem, reads, "Here lies the slave and bride of Christ, Sophia, deacon, the second Phoebe, who slept in peace the twenty-first of the month of March in the eleventh Indiction... the Lord God..."

"Slave*" or "servant" of Christ or God is a common early Christian term (cf. Rom 1:1). The comparison is to Phoebe* (Rom 16:1–2) as deacon* but probably also as benefactor. A female deacon of Jerusalem would have had an important role in the care of pilgrims*, instruction and assistance at baptism*, and liturgical leadership of women in the choir. The titles "deacon" and "deaconess*" seem to have been interchangeable for women. Benefaction of prominent women included adorning churches, supporting clergy and hospices, and giving direct assistance to the poor* and needy.

CAROLYN OSIEK

Soteriology (Gk soteria), aspect of Christian theology that deals with salvation through Christ, redemption*, atonement*, and grace*, and indirectly with sin*, the Fall*, and eschatology*. See also SALVATION.

Soul, in the Bible and Christian tradition, was usually not defined as a spiritual substance chained in the prison of the body*, as many Christians view it and as it was viewed in some ancient Greek (Orphism) and Indian traditions that influenced Platonism* and Neoplatonism*. The HB uses the word nephesh, often translated "soul," which refers to the visible living creature and not to soul as distinct from body. In the NT, psyche, often translated "soul," means the life principle or even living thing; although it can indicate soul as opposed to body, it also indicates the moral self. Similarly, despite the Gnostic* interpretations, the opposition of flesh (sarx) and spirit (pneuma) in Paul is not a contrast of body and soul but a contrast of human selfishness and God's grace. Sarx, pneuma, and psyche each refer to the whole human being.

In Greek thought, a variety of views emerged. With Plato's attempt to account for rationality, soul was described as the incorporeal seat of reason* (nous), passion (thumos), and desire (epithumia). Platonism thought of the soul as immortal*, or undying, not only surviving the body but preexisting it (see Immortality). For Aristotle* (in his classic On the Soul [Gk Peri psyche; Lat De anima]), there is not a "soul" using a body, as a captain uses a ship; rather, the soul is the actuality or form of a living body, that which makes the body alive. Hence form and matter are principles of an individual living organism, not two separate substances (Aristotle is not a dualist).

The Christian tradition beginning with Irenaeus*, Origen*, Gregory* of Nyssa, and especially Nemesius* of Emesa introduced the distinctive notion of a human as a soul-body unit, although for Origen soul was a spiritual being that had become a soul. Augustine*, influenced by Neoplatonism, held that the soul is a spiritual substance that uses the body, yet later emphasized the unity of the human being. Aristotle's position was renewed by Thomas Aquinas* (13th c.); soul and body are principles of an individual living organism, not two separate substances. This complex but unitary account of soul, whether Augustinian or Thomist, was rejected in early modern times by Descartes*.

Attempting to offer a new proof of the immortality of soul (in opposition to Renaissance materialist accounts), Descartes ends up destroying the notion of a unified human being: in any human being, there are two substances, one spiritual (studied by philosophy), the other material (studied by the science of mechanics). Locke* uses the word "soul" but rejects the notion of a spiritual substance.

For Kant* the picture changes; proofs of the immortality of the soul lead to "paralogisms"; one cannot give a valid rational proof of the immortality of the soul, yet the word "soul" can be used as a moral postulate. In later modern philosophy, words such as "Ich," "Will," "Absolute Subject," and "Will-to-Power" replace "soul." Hegel rejects the notion of a substantial soul and replaces it with "Subject." In some modern approaches, "person*" replaces the word "soul." JEREMIAH M. HACKETT

South Africa. The presence of Christianity in South Africa dates back to 1501, when a small chapel was built in Mossel Bay (between present-day Cape Town and Port Elizabeth) by Portuguese Roman Catholics, possibly explorers (Bartolomeu Dias and Vasco da Gama) and traders. But there is no record of any church activity beyond the building of this chapel until the arrival of Dutch settlers under Jan Van Riebeeck (1652). The newly established Dutch Reformed Church was to receive its first minister to serve their religious needs in 1665.

Although the Synod of Dordrecht, Holland, had decided in 1618 that the "heathen" were not to be baptized, the Church experienced in 1661 the conversion* of the first Khoi ("Hot-tentot," in colonial parlance; the Khoi people together with the San people, so-called "Bushmen," were the earliest inhabitants of the Cape and Kgalagadi areas of South Africa). But the Dutch Reformed Church did not engage in missionary activity in the country for more than two centuries. Given the different stages in which various churches arrived and manifested themselves in South Africa, it is possible to categorize them as follows: the settler churches, the missionary churches, the African Instituted Churches, and the witnessing mission churches.

The Settler Churches. The earliest settler church in South Africa was the Dutch Reformed Church. Originally this church was intended to minister purely to the spiritual needs of the settlers. It is clear, however, that even so, it did not exclude the participation of the local people – hence the first native conversion referred to earlier. By 1829, however, some members of the Church began clamoring for segregated Communion* services for settlers and native Christians. Although the Church's initial response was to reject such appeals, it finally yielded to the pressure in 1857. This was the beginning of a segregated Dutch Reformed Church.

The Church broke into different settler churches, the first that of the Nederduitse Hervormde Kerk (1853). It was followed by the formation of the Gereformeerde Kerk (Reformed Church) (1859) and later by the Apostolic Faith Mission (1910). All these churches adopted segregationist policies, basing them on the Bible. The Gereformeerde Kerk, in addition, was deeply Calvinistic, following the teachings of Dutch theologian Abraham Kuyper*.

The Missionary Church. The Dutch Reformed Church officially began to engage in mission work in 1857, and this was a mission limited to the “coloured” people (i.e. African people of mixed race) in the Cape. The leading figure in this effort was Andrew Murray, Jr., son of a Scottish Presbyterian missionary, who had been invited by the British Cape authorities to minister to the Dutch Reformed Church in preference to a missionary of Dutch origin. The Dutch Reformed Church established its first “coloured church” in 1881. The other white reformed churches engaged in mission still later; the Gereformeerde Kerk ordained its first missionary in 1910, and the Nederduitse Hervormde Kerk commissioned its first missionary in 1916. But by the time the white reformed churches officially ventured into the mission field, their unofficial missionary work in South Africa had been going on for more than a century.

The first missionary pioneer to arrive in South Africa was the Moravian George Schmidt. He began mission work among the Khoi people in Genadendal, Cape, in 1737 but returned to Germany in 1744 with a sense of frustration and failure. The Dutch Reformed Church ministers and settlers were apparently suspicious of his motives. In 1792 the Genadendal mission station was reopened by his successors, and mission work gradually spread among the Khoi people.

The Moravians were followed in 1799 by London Missionary Society (LMS) missionary Johannes van der Kemp. After experiencing initial failure in working among the AmaXhosa people (1799–1800) in the Eastern Cape, he established a mission station for the Khoi people in Bethelsdorp, near Port Elizabeth. Van der Kemp integrated into the Khoi community and married a Khoi woman. Several LMS missionaries succeeded him, working in different areas of the country. They included Robert Moffat, who was later joined by David Livingstone* in Kuruman in 1841, and John Philip, who became Cape superintendent of the LMS in the years 1819–51 (see also Colenso, John William).

Protestant missions in general began to expand in the country after the British occupation of the Cape in 1806 and the coming of the British settlers in 1820. Lutherans and Roman Catholics were not allowed to establish churches in South Africa until 1778 and 1804, respectively. The Catholics were expelled by the British only two years later, but returned in 1852 in the form of the religious* order of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate (OMI); they did not settle successfully, however, until after the arrival of the Australian Order of Trappists (1882), who founded the Marianhill Mission and its institutions near Durban in 1884.

A trail of missionary societies and denominations followed the lead of the LMS and spread throughout the country. They included the Rhenish Mission Society (1829), representing the Lutheran, Reformed, and United Churches of Germany; the Paris Missionary Society (1829); the Berlin Mission (1834); the American Board of Commissioners (1834); and the Glasgow Missionary Society, which established itself in the Eastern Cape and later helped to found the well-known Lovedale Institute (1841–1950), which provided education on the basis of complete equality (although not without features of a segregated vocational model) and would eventually comprise a primary school, a high school, a technical school, a teacher training college, a theological college, and the first hospital to train African women as nurses, before being closed by the Bantu Education Act of 1953 (which enforced separation of races in all educational institutions). By 1860 various missionary societies were active in the Cape, Natal, Namibia*, Botswana*, and Lesotho*.

One of the significant presences in the Eastern Cape following the British settlers in 1820 was that of Methodist missionaries, including Rev. William Shaw (who founded a chain of mission stations from the Eastern Cape to Natal), John Ayliffe (credited with bringing the gospel to the Mfengu, one group among the Nguni people, Eastern Cape, often identified as part of the Xhosa), and J. W. Appleyard (who, with the help of African assistants, translated into Xhosa the NT, 1846, then the whole Bible, 1859). By 1827 Methodists had also established a presence in the Transkei. They established the Kilnerton Institute, the first African teachers' college in the Transvaal in 1883–4. The Presbyterians and the Anglicans followed the Methodists into the Eastern Cape mission fields.

Missionary strategy varied between the “civilizing” approach of converting natives to Western culture and the “indigenizing” approach, which sought to establish native leadership and to Christianize the African way of life. Consequently, it was not always the settlers alone who advocated separation between settler churches and mission churches; it was also the missionaries. Some scholars have observed that, whatever their shortcomings, missionaries are to be credited for their pioneering efforts in black education through the establishment of institutions such as Lovedale, Kilnerton, Marianhill, Healdtown, and St. Matthews.

African Instituted Churches. Missionaries in South Africa were agents not only of conversion* but also of transformation through education* and other forms of social* development. One of the common problems of earlier evangelization, however, was the missionaries' tendency to equate Christianity with Western civilization, thus not allowing the Christian message to be integrated into the culture of the people.

Some missionaries had a very low regard for the natives and almost seemed to doubt their humanity. This kind of attitude was prominent among members of the clergy, which created resentment and led some of the early African clergy to leave the missionary church. A variety of reasons were given for these secessions, including the clash of cultures* over religion, the missionaries' association of Christianity with Western culture, the discriminatory attitudes of some missionaries and of white Christians in general, white authoritarianism and domination, racial* discrimination and paternalism, and the denial of leadership and initiative to native African Christians. African leaders perceived that they could overcome these ills only by leaving the missionary churches and founding their own, where they would not only preach the gospel by word of mouth but also live it in practice.

By 1884, therefore, the missionary churches were to experience their first breakaway and the establishment of the first African* Instituted Church (AIC). Other AICs followed:

Founder	Date	From	Name of new church
Rev. Nehemiah Tile	1884	Methodist Church	Thembu National Church
	1889	Berlin Mission	Lutheran Bapedi Church
Mangena* Mokone	1892	Methodist Church	Ethiopian Church
James Dwane*	c1900	Methodist Church, then the Anglican Church	Order of Ethiopia
	1892	American Board of Mission	Zulu Congregational Church
Gardiner Mvuyana	1917	Congregational Church	African Congregational Church
P. J. Mzimba	1893	Free Church of Scotland	Presbyterian Church of Africa
Mdlelwa Hlongwane	1932	Methodist Church	Bantu Methodist Church

The AICs represent one aspect of the struggle of the Christian Church in South Africa, namely the struggle for freedom. After these early breakaways, there were to be other secessions, including those from among the AICs themselves, and initiatives that resulted in the formation of thousands of smaller churches as well as large, interprovincial and international churches, such as the Zion Christian Church, Amanazareth, St. John's Church, and a significant number of Pentecostal* and Charismatic* churches. Today the South African scene is replete with AICs and Pentecostal/Charismatic movements, which are increasing in number and many of which numerically rival the traditional “mission churches.”

The Witnessing Mission Churches. The racial and discriminatory problems that led to the original secessions from the mission churches and the establishment of the AICs were part and parcel of the Christian Church in South Africa from the very beginning. These discriminatory problems within the churches were a reflection of the larger society, in which segregation was practiced in most aspects of life. It is not surprising, therefore, that there was almost no reaction in the church to discriminatory legislation against the African people. The church's witness against segregatory practices thus began only in 1948, when the National Party won the country's national elections with the promise of fully implementing segregation through its policy of apartheid*.

Even though the churches had tried to struggle against apartheid since 1948, their own internal practices in matters of race were often contradictory. Yet the churches had seen the need to establish a Christian council (1936), which later became the South African Council of Churches (1968; including all the major mission churches but not the AICs), in order to address the social ills that even before 1948 bedeviled the country. The Council was responsible for organizing a number of conferences that challenged the government's policy of apartheid in various ways and the government's interference with church practices. They included the Rosettenville Conference (1949) and the Cottesloe Consultation (1960), both in Johannesburg. The resolutions of the Cottesloe Consultation were severely reprimanded by Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd, leading to a retraction by the participating Dutch Reformed churches. Those Dutch Reformed Church delegates who resisted were ostracized by their congregations, which created an opportunity for the establishment of the Christian Institute (1963) by one of the leaders, the Rev. Dr. Beyers Naude. The Christian Institute was later investigated by the government, subsequently declared an "affected organization" (i.e. an organization that could continue its operations but was proscribed from raising or receiving funds from sources outside the country), and finally became the only white-led organization to be banned along with 19 black organizations and newspapers in the aftermath of the 1976 student uprising.

In 1968 the South African Council of Churches was brought to prominence by its publication of a document entitled "A Message to the People of South Africa." Like the Cottesloe Consultation documents, the "Message" provoked the ire of Verwoerd's successor, John Vorster, by suggesting that the apartheid policy was in conflict with the Christian faith.

The incipient "radicalization" of the South African Council of Churches began with its first lay Methodist general secretary, John Rees, who was succeeded by then-Bishop Desmond Tutu as its first black general secretary in 1978. During Tutu's leadership, the Council increasingly became "provocative" enough to be investigated by a government commission, ostensibly with respect to the finances of the Council and its many social projects; Tutu's passport was withheld for a time. On the eve of the democratic national elections in South Africa, two last conferences were organized by the churches through the South African Council of Churches. One, in Rustenburg (1990), published a document known as the Rustenburg Declaration, envisaging a future society, church, and state. The second conference, in Cape Town, was organized in collaboration with the World* Council of Churches. The fact that it lacked the momentum of the first conference raised questions about the real strength and appeal of the mission churches in the country.

Since the dawn of democracy in 1994, there has been a certain degree of rapprochement between black and white segments of the missionary churches in South Africa. Although old attitudes have not completely died out, black people now have more say in the affairs of their churches, they are more assertive, and the number of church leaders has grown. Because of the new law of the land, all the churches have done away with their segregationist policies, at least in theory. Although black leadership is now firmly established in most missionary churches, the question remains open regarding the extent to which these leaders have full control in steering their congregations as members of the single body of Christ.

Statistics: Population (2000): 40.4 million (M). Christians, 33.6 M, 83% (members of African Instituted Churches and other independents, 19 M; Protestants, 12.4 M; Roman Catholics, 3.4 M; Anglicans, 2.6 M); African Religionists, 3.4 M; Hindus, 1 M; Muslims, 1 M; nonreligious, 1 M. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

MOKGETHI MOTLHABI

Southern Baptist Convention. With an estimated 16 million members in affiliated congregations in all 50 states, the Southern Baptist Convention (SBC) is the largest Protestant denomination in the USA. Southerners formed the SBC in 1845 at a meeting in Augusta, Georgia, when it became clear that the two primary Baptist mission societies, the Triennial Convention and the American Baptist Home Mission Society, would not appoint slaveholding missionaries (see Baptist Churches Cluster:

In North America). The SBC adopted the convention model, which put both home and foreign mission agencies under the auspices of one ongoing denominational entity.

Any Baptist Church in "friendly cooperation with the Convention" is considered a Southern Baptist Church. "Friendly cooperation" usually means financial support for SBC enterprises. Congregations are autonomous and usually aligned with their local associations and state conventions as well as the SBC. All such affiliations are voluntary, and the only SBC mechanism for disciplining congregations is to deny seats to messengers (delegates) at the annual meeting or to return funds sent to the denomination's agencies and institutions. Congregations are free to appoint and dismiss their pastors and dispense with their property as they wish.

From 1979 to 1995, the SBC experienced a tumultuous schism between "moderates," who had controlled the Convention's agencies and seminaries, and "conservatives," who claimed that moderate leaders were too liberal. The conservative battle cry was the "inerrancy* of Scripture," but a variety of other theological and cultural issues played a role in the split as well. The SBC controversy, as it was called, resulted in conservatives taking the reins of power in all SBC agencies and all six Southern Baptist seminaries. Moderates formed their own missionary agency, several seminaries, and a quasi-denomination called the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship. The vast majority of congregations, however, continue to support the SBC.

BARRY HANKINS

Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), an interdenominational organization formed by Martin Luther King*, Jr., and other church and civil* rights leaders at the Ebenezer Baptist Church, Atlanta, Georgia (1957), to expand the Montgomery Improvement Association that led the bus boycott in Montgomery (1955–56). King served as its first president until his death (1968). Designed to "serve as a channel through which local protest organizations in the South could coordinate their activities" and "to give the total struggle a sense of Christian and disciplined direction," the SCLC has been called "a church," "a faith operation," "the social action arm of the Black Church," "the Black Church writ large," and "the dynamic center of a cluster of organizations that made up the Civil* Rights Movement." Committed to nonviolent direct action and civil disobedience, the organization's first action (1957) was a prayer pilgrimage to Washington, D.C., led by King and supported by some 25,000. Afterward, the SCLC led mass marches and provided moral and financial support for sit-ins, freedom rides, and other protest activities aimed at eliminating segregation and achieving voting rights and economic justice in the US South. It figured prominently in mass protest movements in Albany, Georgia (1961–62), Birmingham, Alabama (1963), Washington, D.C. (1963), St. Augustine, Florida (1964), Selma, Alabama (1965), Chicago, Illinois (1966–67), and Memphis, Tennessee (1968), and spearheaded the Poor People's Campaign (1967–68). After King received the Nobel Peace Prize (1964), the organization paid more attention to global affairs, including the war in Vietnam, South African apartheid, and poverty and economic injustice in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. After King's death, the organization gradually declined in visibility and influence, despite the efforts of its other presidents, Ralph Abernathy, Joseph E. Lowery, Martin Luther King, III, Fred D. Shuttlesworth, and Charles Steele.

LEWIS V. BALDWIN

South India, Church of (CSI), formed in 1947 as the union of Anglican, Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregationalist denominations in South India. CSI (with c2.9 million members in 2000) was formed in response to the rise of Indian national consciousness, as its founding leaders declared: "The Church of South India desires, conserving all that is of spiritual value in its Indian heritage, to express under Indian conditions and in Indian forms, the spirit, the thought and the life of the church Universal." The Church pledges to be mindful of its missionary calling for the evangelization* of South India and other parts of the world. This was initially understood to be direct evangelization, but after the first synod it came to be seen in a broader framework.

CSI accepts the threefold* ministry but distinctively emphasizes that the primary focus and function of ministry should be pastoral, and not administrative or ritual, and thus uses the title "presbyter" rather than "priest." Similarly, although it incorporates non-episcopal churches, CSI accepts the historic episcopacy, but without accepting the doctrine of apostolic* succession, thus affirming that churches without episcopacy are true churches. A bishop is a chief pastor, feeding the flock of God, with the conviction that all members are called to participate in the ministry of building up the Church. Ordained and specialized ministries are envisioned from this perspective.

Just after the union, some churches, especially in urban areas, tried to maintain their earlier identities, particularly regarding worship. But actual union was soon aided by the uniformity of worship. The CSI liturgy carefully incorporates elements from the worship services of all traditions and includes more participation for the laity, free liturgical movements, and contemporary concerns in prayer. Furthermore, the bishops are agents of unity, because each diocese includes congregations from different traditions. However, another issue of disunity continues to plague the Church, namely the divisions of caste*, language, and region. See also INDIA. K. C. ABRAHAM

Spain. Few nations in Western Europe have so closely identified Roman Catholicism with the state than Spain. The Second Republic (1931–39) separated church and state for the first time in the nation's history. The defeat of the Republic and the dictatorship of General Francisco Franco restored the Church's official status through generous financial support and privileges, especially in the field of education. The country's small Protestant minority lost the religious liberty it had enjoyed under the Republic, until 1966, when the government, following the exhortations of the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65), passed the Law on Religious Liberty, which removed most restrictions on religious minorities. The emergence of democratic institutions following the death of Franco (1975) led to the introduction of full religious liberty in the Constitution of 1978. As a result, membership in the Protestant churches has increased, although a majority of the population identifies itself as Roman Catholic. The challenge to Catholicism has come primarily from secularizing* currents, which by the early 20th c. had led to the de-Christianization of certain social groups, especially industrial workers and the landless day laborers employed on the estates of Andalusia and Extremadura. The accelerated modernization of the economy and society occurring since 1960 following a West European model was accompanied by a significant decline in religious practice and the Church's influence over public moral standards.

Early History. Christianity was introduced among the diverse peoples inhabiting Roman Spain during the later 2nd and 3rd c. Although subject to periodic waves of persecution, especially during the reign of Emperor Diocletian* (284–305), the Christian population survived and grew during the 5th c. The disintegration of the Roman Empire and the incursion of Goth* Germanic tribes (5th c.), Arian Christians, led to the establishment of the Visigothic monarchy and a long period of tension with Latin Christianity (Roman Catholicism). The Spanish Church became an Arian Christian Church (415–587), which viewed itself as the "Catholic Church." The conversion (587) of King Reccared* from Arianism* to Latin Christianity (Roman Catholicism) initiated a period of closer cooperation between church and monarchy that produced a flourishing religious culture.

The stability of the Visigothic monarchy was compromised by chronic civil conflicts that left it exposed to the invasion (711) of a Muslim army of Arabs and Berbers. By 719, they had swept through the Iberian Peninsula and reached the Pyrenees. Of Visigothic Spain there remained only a few small Christian principalities in the northern mountains along the Cantabrian coast. The establishment of Islamic rule over most of the Iberian Peninsula was fundamental to the history of Christianity for centuries to come.

The struggle of the medieval Christian kingdoms to recover the lands under Muslim rule lasted until the conquest of the Moorish kingdom of Granada in 1492 by Ferdinand and Isabella. The conflict between the Islamic states of Iberia and its several Christian kingdoms was far from being a straightforward battle between two opposing religions. The fabled reconquista enshrined in Spanish national historiography took the form less of uninterrupted warfare than of episodic conflict between periods of political, economic, and cultural interchange between Islamic and Christian Spain, although from the 13th c. onward the most important Christian kingdoms, Castile and Aragon, became more aggressive toward Islam.

Toward Religious Uniformity. Christian and Islamic Spain each faced the problem of dealing with religious minorities. Following the triumph of Islam (7th c.), much of the Christian population converted to Islam*. A Christian minority and an institutional church survived in spite of episodic persecution. But, in general, Muslim rulers allowed their Christian and Jewish subjects to practice their religion subject to certain limitations. As Christian Spain expanded southward, the Muslim population was displaced either to North Africa or to the surviving Islamic territories in the south. Muslims remaining in the Peninsula following the triumph of Christian arms were forced to convert to Christianity, but the newly converted (*moriscos) continued to hold tenaciously to their old faith through the 16th c. Between 1609 and 1611, the entire morisco population was expelled (see Islam and Christianity Cluster). The survival of the Jewish population depended on the sufferance of rulers, aristocrats, and Christian society itself. Toward the end of the 14th c., popular riots, often encouraged by the clergy, were directed against the Jews in an increasingly hostile atmosphere that caused some Jews to convert to Christianity. The situation of converted Jews (conversos) improved dramatically with the removal of certain civil disabilities imposed on the Jews. Conversos came to occupy important positions in church and state. As the 14th c. progressed, hostility toward these “New Christians” increased among sectors of the clergy and the populace (see Judaism and Christianity Cluster).

The establishment of the Royal and Supreme Council of the Inquisition* by Ferdinand and Isabella (1478) was motivated in part by hostility toward the conversos. The Inquisition directed its energies, almost exclusively during its first three decades, against conversos accused of secretly observing their Jewish faith. The Inquisition went about its task implacably and ordered the execution during this period of more individuals, largely conversos, than at any other time in its 300-year history. The Inquisition’s authority extended only to baptized Christians. Unconverted Jews remained beyond its reach. In 1492 Ferdinand and Isabella ordered the expulsion of Jews from the Hispanic kingdoms.

16th-Century Revival. The religious uniformity achieved between 1492 and 1611 remained a characteristic of Spanish society until recent times. It is ironic that during the 16th c. the movement toward uniformity and intolerance corresponded to an era of ecclesiastical reform and spiritual revival. A sustained effort to improve the quality of bishops and clergy, begun by Queen Isabella*, intensified following the Council of Trent* (1545–63) with the creation of diocesan seminaries. Under the influence of Renaissance* biblical humanism, study of the Scriptures intensified through the work of eminent scholars gathered in the University of Alcalá (founded in 1508). The Spanish Church produced a series of extraordinary figures in Ignatius* Loyola (1491–1556), founder of the Jesuits*, and the great mystics Teresa* of Ávila (1510–82) and John* of the Cross (1542–91). During the 1520s, the works of Erasmus* of Rotterdam, emphasizing an interior faith rather than reliance on the external devotions associated with popular religion, attracted a wide readership among the educated. At the same time, religious life at the grass roots was manifested in a luxuriant array of pious devotions, shrines, and vows, often criticized by admirers of Erasmus. Scholars have shown that this world of popular religion, intensely local and intimately linked to the earthy concerns of peasants and town dwellers alike, contributed to the vitality of religious life in cities, towns, and villages throughout the monarchy. Moreover, the intensification of religious instruction following the Council of Trent inculcated a basic knowledge of the faith among the general population.

This surge in religious vitality subsided into a religion of routine, what one historian has called “a religion of habit.” From the mid-16th c. onward, the Inquisition stamped out any deviation from its conception of orthodoxy*, while the spirited debates of theologians and philosophers, such as Melchor Cano (1509–60), Domingo de Soto (1495–1560), Francisco de Vitoria (1492–1548), and Francisco Suarez* (1548–1617), gradually yielded to a narrow scholasticism*. The 18th c., under the Bourbons, witnessed a revival of sorts. Some bishops and priests embraced reforming ideas characteristic of “enlightened Catholicism” elsewhere in Roman Catholic Europe. Efforts were undertaken to improve clerical education, reestablish scholarly biblical studies, and moderate the excesses of popular* religion. But the Church and monarchy alike entered a period of crisis before the impact of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic intervention in Spain beginning in 1807.

The Crisis of the 19th Century. In 1808 the emperor Napoleon deposed the Bourbon dynasty and placed his brother on the Spanish throne. In 1810 opponents of the Napoleonic monarchy came together in Cadiz in the country’s first modern parliamentary assembly. It endowed the country with its first written constitution (1812) and imposed limits on the sovereign’s power. The liberal majority in Parliament abolished the Inquisition (January 1813) but refused any concession in the direction of religious liberty. Liberals also planned a thorough internal reform of the Church. Although they made little progress, they set a precedent imitated by later governments that believed the state held primary responsibility for carrying out ecclesiastical reform even in the realm of pastoral activity. The liberal cause triumphed definitively in 1834. In the following decade, the male religious orders were suppressed and their property sold for the benefit of the treasury; the tithe, bedrock of ecclesiastical finances for centuries, was abolished, while in periods when the more radical elements of liberalism ruled, bishops were exiled and the parish clergy harassed by the authorities. The endowments of the diocesan clergy were sold in 1841.

In 1851 a government of the Moderate Party agreed to a concordat* with the papacy that would govern civil–ecclesiastical relations until 1931. The government agreed to pay the salaries of the diocesan clergy, authorized a limited reintroduction of the male religious orders, and recognized Roman Catholicism as the religion of the state. After 1834 Protestants established a foothold in the country. They numbered 10,000 in 1860 but faced sporadic harassment by the authorities. The democratic 1869 Constitution permitted limited religious liberty, but the more conservative charter of 1876 allowed only the private practice of religion by dissenters.

No government in the history of the liberal constitutional monarchy (1834–1923) ever considered the separation of church and state. But the dissolution of the male religious* orders and the turbulent political conditions of the 1830s and early 1840s compromised the Church's pastoral activities. By 1840 only 11 of the country's bishops occupied their dioceses, while in regions affected by the civil war between the government and supporters of absolutism (Carlism), parish life suffered to the point that nearly half of the parishes in the Archdiocese of Tarragona lacked parochial clergy.

The Catholic Revival. After 1843 the Church experienced an episodic organizational and religious recovery. The career of Antonio Claret (1807–70), a distinctly modern religious propagandist (during the 1840s) before his appointment as archbishop of Santiago de Cuba (1851) and confessor to Queen Isabella II (1857), provides an example of the Church's ability to adapt its pastoral strategy to the individualist emphasis of liberal society. Claret undertook an ambitious campaign of popular missions and oversaw an extensive publishing program designed to reach the masses. In 1843 he published what would become the most widely published work in the history of Spanish devotional writing. It emphasized individual acts of piety and reflected the social values of the new society.

The Roman Catholic revival developed more fully during the Restoration (1874–1923), when a conservative constitutional monarchy sought an accommodation with the Church. The Catholic revival of the late 19th and early 20th c. had many sides. Catholic devotional associations devoted to the cults of the Sacred* Heart and the Virgin Mary* attracted thousands of members. Popular* piety was stimulated through the mass production of inexpensive statues, religious objects, and popular books and tracts. The old, intensely local world of devotions associated with shrines and vows survived, but yielded increasingly to a more highly organized piety, national in scope and individualist in emphasis, such as the cult of Our Lady of Lourdes*.

By the late 19th c., the influence of Pope Leo XIII's social* encyclical, Rerum Novarum (1891), moved the Church for the first time into the realm of social action with the appearance of workers' circles during the 1890s and, later, of Catholic trade unions and agricultural syndicates. The expansion of these organizations received the support of an influential figure in early-20th-c. Spanish Catholicism, Angel Herrera Oria (1886–1968). Educated as a lawyer, he became editor of the newspaper El Debate (1911) and soon established it as the country's leading journal of Catholic opinion. Herrera wished to use modern techniques of organization and propaganda to create a Catholic political party of the masses, an objective partially achieved in 1933 with the foundation of the CEDA party. Herrera also served as president of the governing committee of Catholic* Action (1933–35), which organized the laity under the hierarchy's direction in a variety of initiatives. Under the Restoration, the Church also significantly expanded its role in education*; 5,000 schools had come into existence by 1910. Clerical support for these initiatives was possible because of a massive increase in the membership of the religious orders authorized by successive Restoration governments.

The Catholic revival produced benefits for the Church. But it failed to halt the advance of formidable opposition among some liberals, intellectuals, and new radical groups, such as the socialists and anarchists, who saw the Church as a conservative bloc opposed to political and social progress. This struggle continued under the Second Republic, which attempted to create a thoroughly lay state. A majority of the clergy and committed Catholics supported the rising of the generals against the Republic in July 1936. At no time in its modern history did the Church suffer more than during the civil war (1936–39), when nearly 7,000 priests and religious were assassinated in Republican Spain and religious practice disappeared. Bishops, priests, and the faithful, with a few exceptions, saw Franco as the providential figure who would deliver Roman Catholicism and the Church from its enemies.

It fell to Cardinal Isidro Goma y Tomas (1869–1940), archbishop of Toledo, primate of Spain, and president of the Committee of Metropolitanans, to provide leadership during the war. Goma supported Franco and justified the rising against the Republic in his controversial Collective Letter (1937) to the Roman Catholic bishops of the world. But he was apprehensive about the totalitarian aspects of the regime, particularly its decision to abolish Catholic trade unions and teachers' associations in favor of a state syndicate system under the influence of the quasi-fascist Falange Party.

These concerns gradually diminished following the war's end as the regime bestowed numerous benefits on the Church. The alliance of the Church and the state, often known as "national Catholicism," endured for two decades, but began to weaken during the 1960s, especially as a result of the teachings of the Second Vatican* Council. The process through which the Church disengaged itself from the regime was long, difficult, and controversial. Vicente Enrique y Tarancon (1907–94), who became archbishop of Madrid and president of the Spanish Episcopal Conference in 1971, played a key role by steering the hierarchy through the political minefield of Franco's last years to acceptance of democratic change.

Statistics: Population (2005): 43.9 million (M). Roman Catholics, 34 M, 79.3%; Protestants, 0.4 M, 1%; Jews, 0.04 M, 0.1%; agnostics, atheists, 7 M, 16% (Muslims, c1 M, possibly more, not included). A 2005 survey shows that 47.1% of Catholics never attend Mass. (Source: Department of State, Religious Freedom Report, 2005.)

WILLIAM J. CALLAHAN

Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions. Spanish exploration of the Americas began with Columbus's now legendary arrival (1492) in Hispaniola (Dominican* Republic and Haiti*). Francisco Hernández de Córdoba (1516) and Juan de Grijalva (1517) led explorations of the Caribbean* coast of Central America and Mexico*. Hernán Cortés' unlikely 1521 victory in the Aztec capital, Tenochtitlán, with just several hundred soldiers, effectively completed the military conquest of Mexico. The Incan Empire in the Andes fell to the Spanish conqueror Francisco Pizarro (1532–36). A military expedition launched from Mexico brought the Philippines into the territory of New Spain (1565).

Although priests and friars arrived with each voyage from Spain and were present during every major military expedition, for the first two decades the Roman Catholic Church's presence in the New World remained negligible and focused primarily on ministry to colonists. Responsibility for Christianization fell to the conquistadors themselves and subsequently to the encomenderos, colonists to whom the Spanish crown granted communities of indigenous people in trust as a source of compulsory labor and tribute. Deliberate attempts at Christian conversion of the indigenous populations did not begin until the Spanish crown finally secured royal patronage (see Patronato, Padroado) from Rome, which effectively granted the Spanish monarchs administrative control over the Church in the New World. The crown designated the three mendicant* religious orders as the primary agents of evangelization. The 1524 arrival of 12 Franciscan missionaries in newly conquered Mexico City marked the symbolic beginning of Christian mission in the New World. Hernán Cortés personally welcomed them upon their arrival; the military subjugation of the people of Mexico* paved the way for their so-called spiritual conquest. The Dominican friar Bartolomé de las* Casas contested this method of evangelization, deploring "the destruction of the Indies" and arguing for more peaceful forms of persuasion.

Franciscans, Dominicans, and Augustinians arrived in New Spain in rapid succession; later the Jesuits came to Lima (1568). The first generations of friars believed they were building a religious utopia: an "Indian"–Christian millennial kingdom. Employing a panoply of methods, including extirpation, debate, catechesis, physical discipline, and exhortation, the friars labored to bring about a new faith for a New World. The key institutions of mission were the convento, monastery complex, the doctrina, rural parish church, and the forced settlements of indigenous people known as reducciones (reductions*).

According to the Laws of the Indies, once native people were fully Christianized, they were to be released to the care of secular clergy and thus "secularized." This turning over of the missions to diocesan governance began in the 17th c., and, except for the missions of Alta California (secularized in 1835), was largely completed in the 18th c. JENNIFER S. HUGHES

Spanish Literature and Christianity. Spanish literature is strongly informed by religious piety, controversies, and polemics. Despite a policy of militant Catholicism against the forces of Islam, Christians lived in relative harmony with Muslims and Jews during much of the Reconquest (718–1492). A high point was the scholarly activity and sharing of knowledge among the three faiths during the reign of Alfonso X (“the Wise”) of Castile and León (1252–84). The first Castilian poet whose identity is known, Gonzalo de Berceo, wrote Miracles of Our Lady and several hagiographical works (first half of the 13th c.). The earliest extant theatrical pieces drew from biblical and liturgical themes. The influential Cardinal Francisco Ximénez* de Cisneros (1436–1517) assembled scholars at the University of Alcalá de Henares to produce the original polyglot* Bible, called the Complutensian*. Among the most important writers of devotional material are Ignatius* of Loyola (1491–1556), founder of the Jesuit* order and author of Spiritual Exercises*; Luis de Granada (1504–88), author of The Book of Prayer and Meditation and Guide for Sinners; Luis de León (1527–91), poet and author of On the Names of Christ and The Perfect Wife, in prose; and Pedro Malón de Chaide (1530–89), author of The Conversion of the Magdalen. Popular and high art abound in Christian imagery and symbolism. Literature on sacred themes finds its greatest intensification in the mystic* tradition, which recounts the spiritual journey of the soul* to its union with God and which is best exemplified by the prose of Teresa* of Ávila (1515–82) and the poetry of John* of the Cross (1542–91).

The early modern period in Spain, the “Golden Age,” witnessed the political and religious unity established by Ferdinand and Isabella*. Those Muslims and Jews who did not convert to Catholicism were forced into exile, and Spanish society was divided into urban and rural sectors, the rich and the poor, and, based on blood purity, Old and New Christians. The presence of the Inquisition* is felt in the literature of the time, and censorship was a fact of life for writers. Picaresque narrative, which begins in the mid-16th c. with Lazarillo de Tormes, is an anti-idealistic genre that depicts the tensions produced by doubt and suspicion. Erasmian humanism, vitalized by its battle against Scholasticism*, attracted many adherents while dismaying others, including some inquisitors. The Protestant Reformation* initiated a new holy war. The Council of Trent* (1545–60) sought ways of using literature to promote Roman Catholicism, thus denouncing those works that had little or no didactic value. The canon from Toledo in the first part of Cervantes’s Don Quixote (1605) reflects this position in his condemnation of the romances of chivalry. Golden Age theater, notably the works of Tirso de Molina and Pedro Calderón de la Barca, both of whom were priests, frequently dramatizes theological issues. The most honored play of early modern Spain, Calderón’s Life Is a Dream (1635), builds on the metaphor of the title to explore the question of determinism versus free will*, among other topics. Religious drama includes the autos sacramentales, short allegorical plays originally associated with the Feast of Corpus* Christi; The Great Theater of the World, by Calderón, is a key example. The major baroque poets, including Luis de Góngora, Lope de Vega, and Francisco de Quevedo, wrote on spiritual as well as secular topics. Matters of religion and faith have been mainstays of Spanish literature and culture. Perhaps the most notable modern writer in this category was Miguel de Unamuno (1864–1936) – philosopher, novelist, essayist, playwright, poet, and academician – whose works include The Tragic Sense of Life and The Agony of Christianity.

EDWARD H. FRIEDMAN

SPCK, Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. Founded in 1698, the Society institutionalized the work already begun by Thomas Bray* (1656–1730) in the American colony of Maryland. Emphasizing education and publishing, it printed tracts and pamphlets, constructed schools, libraries, and church buildings, and supplied chaplains in England, North America, India, and other British colonies. It supported missions* through the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (SPG). In the spirit of 18th-c. ecumenism, the SPCK supported many German and Danish Lutheran missionaries in India, mostly students from Halle. The SPCK press, one of the oldest in Britain, continues to publish a variety of materials.

Spener, Philip Jacob (1635–1705), born an Alsatian, completed his studies for the Lutheran ministry at Strasbourg, where he earned a doctorate in the NT, and became the senior of the Lutheran clergy at Frankfurt am Main. His interest in authorizing laypersons to assist in parish renewal led him to institute private meetings of consecrated laypersons, the collegia pietatis, featuring discussion of the Sunday homily, prayer, and the devotional reading of Scripture and edifying literature.

In his Pia Desideria (1675), Spener outlined his case for reactivating Luther's* doctrine of the priesthood* of all believers by facilitating the ministry of the laity through these means. This seminal work of Lutheran Pietism* included an indictment of the "corrupt" conditions of European Christendom, including its stratified civil and spiritual classes, as well as those of the common people. It also included a catalog of proposals for correcting these conditions, such as deploying the Bible in preaching and teaching to effect spiritual regeneration, reforming schools to integrate spiritual and intellectual development, and acting charitably during doctrinal controversy. Spener held prominent Lutheran posts in Dresden and Berlin, where his literary record documents his importance as a Pietist theologian. See also PIETISM.

J. STEVE O'MALLEY

Spinoza, Baruch (1632–77), argued that God is substance underlying the attribute of thought; God is a necessarily existing substance, which corresponds to a descriptively exhaustive, explanatorily complete psychology. Nature is substance underlying the attribute of extension, which corresponds to a similar physics. Only substance and its modes (states) exist. The modes necessarily follow from substance, which is conceivable underlying an infinite number of attributes (fundamental properties), only two of which are accessible to us.

The structure of psychology and physics can be fully described using such metaphysical* terms as "substance," "attribute," "mode," and "cause." God is not creator, providence, or agent, has no chosen people, forgives no sins, and answers no prayers. For Judaism or Christianity, this is atheism*. Substance necessarily exists. Every truth is necessarily true. Falsehood is merely confusion. One is "free" only in the sense of one's properties not being caused by another or their being caused by states of oneself that are conceptually clear. The mind, under the attribute of thought, is the idea of the body, underlying the attribute of extension. There is no possibility of revelation* or resurrection*. That one might survive the death of one's body is logically impossible. Spinoza replaces Judaism by a philosophy that has no room for theology.

KEITH E. YANDELL

Spirit (in many languages, "breath" or "wind"), applying generically to any immaterial and intelligent beings, including God*, angels*, human souls*, and human attitudes; the animating principle of God (cf. Eccl 8:8, 12:7) and of human beings (their mind*, affection). Holy Spirit (the third person of the Trinity) is the divine Spirit that inspires and empowers believers to bear the fruit* of the Spirit (Gal 5:22–23) and provides believers with "gifts" (graces* or charisms*) to be used in the service of others (1 Cor 12:4–11). Yet people can also be inspired and empowered by evil spirits (usually plural, equivalent to demons*) that mislead believers. So throughout church history, spiritual* exercises emphasized the importance of testing and discerning (Rom 12:2; 1 Thess 5:21) the spirits. See also DEVIL, SATAN, DEMONS, AND DEMONIC POWER; HOLY SPIRIT CLUSTER; TRINITY IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY; TRINITY IN THE WESTERN TRADITION.

Spirit Baptism. See BAPTISM CLUSTER: IN THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Spiritism, beliefs and practices related to communication with the spirits of the dead. Generally, any movement that believes that spirit entities exist and that human beings can engage in spirit communication, usually through mediums. More specifically, a 19th-c. Western European movement (popular in France and England).

Spiritual Exercises, of Ignatius of Loyola.

Although spiritual exercises had existed since the desert fathers, Ignatius (early 16th c.) gave them a specific direction following his spiritual experience at Manresa (1522). Almost everything in Ignatius's Spiritual Exercises is found in earlier similar works, especially the Vita Christi of Ludolphe the Carthusian* and the Exercitatorio by the Abbot of Montserrat, Garcia of Cisneros, which Ignatius used at the time of his conversion.

The originality of Ignatius's Spiritual Exercises lies in its goal and pedagogy. As he wrote, "spiritual exercises are means to prepare and entice the soul to separate itself from disorderly desires and then to seek and find God's will for one's life." The election* (by God) for a state of life, or one's choice of one state of life, is at the heart of the four-week quest that, beyond conversion, leads retreatants in the contemplation* of life, of the Passion* of Christ, and of his resurrection*.

Pedagogically, Ignatius's spiritual exercises are a personal quest. The spiritual director and the retreatant submit themselves together to the Holy* Spirit and to spiritual discernment regarding the movements, consolations, and desolation that arise in the soul* of the retreatant so as to recognize among them those which are signs of the good spirit rather than of the evil spirit.

Having noticed that certain practices that had helped him were also helpful to others, Ignatius wrote Spiritual Exercises by progressively expanding upon his meditations on the Kingdom* of God and on the two standards (of Christ and Satan*). In Paris he directed the spiritual exercises of Francis Xavier, Peter Favre, and his other companions, founders with him of the Society of Jesus (1541). The Latin text of the Exercises (a translation from the Spanish original) was approved by the pope in 1548. From then on, the book was broadly diffused and used as much for personal spiritual exercises as for collective retreats, in monasteries and religious communities and among laypeople and clergy. Vincent Huby founded the first retreat center in Vannes (France; 1663). Spiritual Exercises was applied to the pedagogy of the Jesuit* “colleges” (high schools) in the famous Ordo Studiorum. Today there is a renewed emphasis on personally guided exercises and broader adaptations of Ignatius’s spiritual exercises in parish life and spiritual formation.

Contemporary culture’s emphasis on the autonomy* of the person, individual freedom*, and decision making, and on the emotional life of the individual, demonstrates the current relevance of Spiritual Exercises. CLAUDE FLIPO SJ

Spiritual Franciscans. See FRANCISCANS.

SPIRITUALITY CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Spirituality, Christian Forms of

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views
and Practices

Spirituality, Christian Forms of,
Denominational View: African Instituted
Churches

Spirituality, Christian Forms of,
Denominational View: Eastern Orthodox

Spirituality, Christian Forms of, Denominational View: Protestant

Spirituality, Christian Forms of,
Denominational View: Roman Catholic
Spirituality, Christian Forms of,
Denominational View: Roman Catholic
Mystical

Spirituality, Christian Forms of: In Africa
Spirituality, Christian Forms of: In Asia
Spirituality, Christian Forms of: In North America

Spirituality, Christian Forms of: In North America: African American

Spirituality, Christian Forms of: In the South Pacific and Australia

1) Introductory Entry

Spirituality, Christian Forms of. In contemporary usage, “spirituality” commonly refers to the human experience in daily life of that which is perceived to have ultimate meaning and value. The stress on immediacy and experience is sometimes used to distinguish “spirituality” from “religion,” with its more formalized doctrinal and institutional structures, but most people acknowledge that spirituality can be found both within and outside the boundaries of religious traditions. Spirituality is human engagement with reality at its most fundamental level, whether that reality is identified as divinity or the cosmos or the deepest dimensions of the self. Spirituality connects belief with practice, feeling with commitment, and the personal with the political. Thus spirituality may be understood as the human experience of – and response to – all that is perceived to be good, beautiful, and true (see Heteronomy; Mysticism, Mystics).

Since human beings live in groups with distinct cultures, it is possible to identify particular schools or traditions of spirituality that exhibit characteristic attitudes, values, and practices. Christianity as a whole is one such great tradition, but within it are many subtraditions associated with diverse historical periods, religiocultural groups, and sociopolitical contexts.

Christian forms of spirituality generally have many common features, such as acknowledgement of one supreme God* who created the universe as a positive good, devotion to Jesus* of Nazareth as God's agent of self-revelation, interpretation of the Bible* (both OT and NT) as a sacred text (see Scripture), participation in the church* as a community of believers in which God's Spirit* is actively present, practices of prayer* and worship both private and communal, and compassionate service to those in need. However, the various forms also display notable differences. No typology could ever encompass the wide range of Christian forms of spirituality, but it is possible to identify some significant points of tension:

Immanentist/Transcendentalist. Some Christian forms of spirituality emphasize God's involvement with humanity here and now (see Incarnation Cluster), with a focus on encountering God in the present world (immanentist*). Others stress the awesomeness of a God beyond human comprehension, who is to be sought in heaven* above or in a future age (transcendentalist*; see Eschatology Cluster).

Contemplative/Active. The biblical sisters Martha and Mary (Luke 11:38–42) have often been taken as indicative of two styles of spirituality: Martha with her hospitality and service represents the active life, while Mary, who sits attentively at the Lord's feet, has chosen the "better part" of the contemplative* life. Some forms of spirituality conclude that contemplation is to be valued over action, but others see them as complementary or alternating modes.

Apophatic/Cataphatic. Stressing the impossibility of knowing or saying anything definitive about God or one's experience of God, negative or apophatic* (imageless) forms of spirituality find God in the "luminous darkness" of paradox* and mystery*. Affirmative or cataphatic (imaginative) forms of spirituality acknowledge the limitations of all human language and symbols but nevertheless employ them in a positive fashion to engage the senses and the mind in the quest for God.

Corporate/Individual. In some forms of Christian spirituality, the primary human subject is the church (local congregation, denomination, national church, or mystical body). In others the communal dimension may be recognized, but in practice the focus is on the individual Christian living in solitude (e.g. the hermit* ideal) or as the recipient of spiritual gifts (e.g. Charismatics*).

Knowledge/Love. All forms of Christian spirituality affirm that God is to be both known and loved. However, some stress the primacy of the intellect and identify the vision of God as the goal of the spiritual journey, while others hold to the primacy of the affections ("heart" or "will") and point toward loving union as the proper end of the Christian life.

Against Culture/Of Culture. An influential typology has been drawn from H. Richard Niebuhr's Christ and Culture (1951). Niebuhr noted two relatively deficient types of spirituality in which the Christian life is either opposed to the surrounding culture* ("Christ against culture") or virtually identified with it ("Christ of culture"). Three mediating types see the Christian life as building on but transcending culture ("Christ above culture"), or in more-or-less creative tension with culture ("Christ and culture in paradox"), or engaged with culture in a way that changes it for the better ("Christ transforming culture") (see Culture Cluster: And Christianity). This typology can be used to analyze the attitude and practice of a particular form of spirituality toward various aspects of human culture, including politics and the state, the arts and sciences, and the particular identities of national or ethnic groups.

In each pair of contrasting emphases, the two positions should be understood not as opposites demanding a simple choice but as points of tension between which every form of Christian spirituality must find its way. Most forms will aim to respect both sides of each pair, negotiating some balance between the two. Moreover, all of these typologies can be only heuristic, inviting further study of Christian spirituality in its variety and ever-changing vitality.

ARTHUR HOLDER

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Spirituality, Christian Forms of, Denominational View: African Instituted Churches. Spirituality in African* Instituted Churches (AICs) is biblical and African traditional in texture and orientation (see African Religion Cluster). It is grounded in the sovereignty of God over life, holistic appropriation of the salvific mission of Christ, an intense experience of God through the Holy* Spirit, a search for holiness*, and a strong evangelistic* zeal. AICs are engaged in creating a synthesis of the apostolic *kerygma and authentic African insights derived from the vernacular Scriptures.

Spirituality is expressed and experienced through exuberant liturgies, symbolism, healing rituals, vestments, colors, prayers, song and dance, prophecy, glossolalia*, and fasting. The spirituality of AICs reflects a holistic worldview that links secular and sacred dimensions of life. The world is an arena for the contest between good and evil* forces. AIC spirituality seeks deliverance from evil, protection, and transformation of one's terrestrial condition.

Although AIC spirituality addresses pragmatic life concerns such as healing* illness, being successful in life, and overcoming satanic attacks, its overt spiritualization of evil, literalist interpretation of the Scriptures, and uncritical dependence on the powers of the charismatic prophet may be detrimental to personal salvation, healing, and individual spirituality.

PHILOMENA N. MWAURA

Spirituality, Christian Forms of, Denominational View: Eastern Orthodox. Eastern Orthodox spirituality is the result of the merger of five streams:

1. The incarnation* was viewed as the embodiment of the divine Logos* as Jesus of Nazareth, simultaneously fully human and fully divine. In Orthodox thought, materiality (the human nature of the God-man), while remaining integral and intact, does not remain simply what it was before the Incarnation. The humanity of Christ is "new humanity," not Adam's* old humanity, as Paul would say. Without mediation, Christ's very physicality is charged with divine power.

Patristic theologians emphasized that the Incarnation was a paradigm for the world. All human nature was caught up into the Logos in the Incarnation. "[The Logos] became what we are, in order that we might become what He is" (Athanasius*, De Incarnatione). According to this doctrine of deification (theosis*), what Christ was by nature, humans could become by grace*. This process of transfiguration* drives most Orthodox spiritual reflection.

2. The view that approaching God is an experience of purifying light was shared by many theologians and mystics. Gregory* of Nyssa, Evagrius*, Dionysius*, and others preferred the image of a deepening obscurity, wherein material conceptions and experiences were increasingly recognized as defectively partial. Both schools emphasized the Christian life as a path toward enlightenment.
3. Training and purifying the physical drives (pathemata) and mental obsessions (phantasmata) was stressed throughout the monastic* movement, so that a clearer sense of self merging with the risen Christ could be established. Such an ascetic* quest for the "true self" was closely related to ethical fidelity and devotion to prayer.
4. Opening the "eye of the heart" to see Christ by affective and intuitive paths, rather than through uncommitted intellectualist constructs, was emphasized by many, especially the Byzantine-Syrian fathers.
5. All of these intellectual and ascetic traditions are subordinated to specific forms of prayer and worship. Orthodoxy moves within a profoundly liturgical matrix: long services, as well as eucharistic* and other sacramental mysteries*. In addition, ancient "monologistic" prayer (the repetition of simple phrases or biblical verses) is used to quiet the mind and focus the heart; the best known is the "Jesus* Prayer": "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me." The long repetition of this slow invocation is often used in private prayer to illuminate and focus the central hope of Orthodox spirituality: looking constantly to the risen Christ to make his presence felt transfiguratively in the Church and in the life of society.

JOHN A. MCGUCKIN

Spirituality, Christian Forms of, Denominational View: Protestant. Historically, Protestant spirituality has been informed by a theology of grace* offered freely through Jesus Christ, devotion to Scripture*, and imitation* of Christ. Today, "spiritual formation" names traditional understandings of classical piety or devotional discipleship*. Among many contemporary developments, the globalization of Protestantism has been critical. Indeed, more Quakers* reside in Kenya* than in the rest of the world combined. Spiritually, this decentralization has enlivened horizons of worship and prayer, such as the Korean corporate practice of tongsung kido (praying aloud and in unison). Yet this shift, along with movements in Liberation* theology, has asked hard questions of a largely Eurocentric and North Americanized spirituality, one tied to the Enlightenment* and wealth, white privilege and power. Another key development relates to Vatican* II, which significantly furthered ecumenical dialogue between Roman Catholics and Protestants, enabling Protestants to drink from the contemplative wells of a Catholic monastic* and mystical* tradition. The Centering Prayer Movement, e.g., has been ecumenical in purpose and popularity. Another development is based on wide-ranging sociocultural factors. While mainline Protestants have witnessed a decline in numbers in Europe and North America, they have also witnessed innovation in women's roles in leadership as well as spiritual growth among laity. The "new monasticism" of Christian communities and solitaries is one such movement. Contemporary Protestant spiritual leaders have included Dietrich Bonhoeffer*, C. S. Lewis*, Howard Thurman*, Martin Luther King*, Jr., and Evelyn Underhill*.

STEPHANIE A. FORD

Spirituality, Christian Forms of, Denominational View: Roman Catholic. The sheer size of the Roman Catholic Church, its global and historical diversity, and its capacity to be catholic, i.e. to accommodate variety, means that, unlike Protestant churches, which tend to splinter when differences occur, Roman Catholicism makes room for diversity. While Catholics remain united in their central sacramental* practices and within the doctrinal perimeters of the Nicene* Creed, there are many spiritual schools and a large number of variant spiritual practices within the Catholic fold. In all of them, the Christic* pattern of death and resurrection – dying and rising – is foundational. They all share a sense that the human person cooperates with divine grace* through the practices of an intentional Christian life. A major strain of Catholic spirituality has strong roots in the ascetic*, monastic* tradition with its emphasis on silence and solitude punctuated by the rhythm of the liturgy* of the hours. Monastic-inspired practices of lectio divina (sacred reading), the daily Divine Office*, and contemplative* prayer have similarly shaped clerical and lay spirituality. Active religious communities are another influence, especially the Jesuits* with their spiritual* exercises of daily examination of conscience and imaginative meditation on Scripture. These exercises aid in the art of "finding God in all things" and aligning one's life with the mission of the Church in the world. An additional strain of Catholic spirituality emphasizes participative devotion*. The rosary*, stations* of the cross, novenas*, pilgrimages* to sacred sites, and veneration* of the saints* and the Virgin Mary* are widely practiced.

WENDY M. WRIGHT

Spirituality, Christian Forms of, Denominational View: Roman Catholic Mystical. The Western Roman Catholic mystical tradition is apophatic*, emphasizing contemplation of and union with God, who is always beyond what can be said about God. It can be traced back to the translations of the mystical theological treatises attributed to Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite. The first translation was given to the Frankish king Louis* the Pious by the Byzantine emperor Michael the Stammerer (827); subsequent translations were made by John* Scotus Eriugena (9th c.) and by Scholastics* (12th–13th c.). In essence the Dionysian corpus gave rise to apophaticism, or “negative theology,” which restated the simple theological position that anything that could be said or envisaged about God could not be God. Commentaries on Dionysius in the High Middle Ages abound, most notably those by great mystics such as Thomas Gallus, the anonymous author of The Cloud of Unknowing*, the Victorines, Beguines*, Thomas Aquinas*, and Meister Eckhart*. Declaring “God free me from God,” Meister Eckhart took the mystical tradition to its extremes and was consequently investigated by Church authorities. With the Reformation, interest in Dionysius waned in the non-Catholic West, although scholarship and commentary continued in the Catholic West, most notably with writers such as John* of the Cross, Miguel de Molinos* and Jean Pierre de Caussade.

PETER TYLER

Spirituality, Christian Forms of: In Africa. Spirituality in Africa is, as elsewhere, a lived experience of being connected, challenged, inspired, and embraced by God’s compassionate and gracious Holy* Spirit based on the saving work of Jesus Christ (Tapia). Weaving together the strands of doctrine, discipline, liturgy, and life illuminates the particular African understandings of spirituality, often identified with denominations.

Everywhere spirituality is inculturated*. Likewise, African Christianity includes a variety of indigenous forms of spirituality, associated with the three “mainline” forms of Christian spirituality: Roman Catholic, Coptic Orthodox, and Protestant.

Among Protestants and African Instituted Churches (AICs) there are different levels of inculturation: classical-mainline Protestantism maintains a largely Western form of spirituality; postclassical Protestantism and Pentecostalism embrace African conceptions of the Holy* Spirit and of deliverance from witchcraft*; Charismatic churches overtly spiritualize evil*; and AICs thoroughly structure spirituality in an African way. For example, Ethiopian AICs (Providence Industrial Mission, African Blackman’s Church) are usually politically shaped by the principle “Africa for Africans”; Zionist AICs (Bapostoli, Chalitchi cha Zioni) were started by prophet-healers using indigenous knowledge systems of sickness and healing* (cure, deliverance, exorcism*) and prophecy; and women’s embodied spirituality (Bishop Ayami, Mai Mpondeni, NyaJere) thoroughly incorporates an African view of the Holy* Spirit. See also AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES CLUSTER; CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER: IN AFRICA; PRESENT CLUSTER: DENOMINATIONAL VIEW: AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES.

FULATA MOYO

Spirituality, Christian Forms of: In Asia. Asia is rich with many religions and forms of spirituality. Christianity, a late-comer, has left its marks on the already crowded religious landscape and the fertile spiritual soil of Asia.

Christian spirituality has stood apart from other forms of religious spirituality, refusing to merge into the spiritual stream of Asia. By contrast, Buddhism, Daoism, and Confucianism, while maintaining their distinctiveness, blend into one another to create what is perceived as “Asian spirituality.” At the beginning of the 21st c., this situation was changing.

The roots of human spirituality found in the depth of the human heart, soul*, and spirit* make religions possible and necessary, and also call religions to task when they corrupt and abuse the human spirit. Beyond differences in external religious expressions, spirituality is the quest for the meaning of life and the power to live, the attainment of the serenity with which to face death*, and the longing for a life beyond life. Both a Zen story and a Christian story explain these points.

The Zen story is as follows: A samurai came to Hakuin, a Zen master, and asked: "Do heaven and hell really exist?" "Who are you?" inquired the master. "I am a samurai," the warrior replied. "You, a samurai?" exclaimed Hakuin. "You have the face of a beggar!" The samurai became so angry that he reached for his sword and drew it. Hakuin looked right at him and exclaimed, "That is hell!" Sheathing his sword, the samurai bowed with great humility and respect. "And this," Hakuin announced, "is heaven." A powerful spirituality welled out of the depths of the Zen master and touched the depths of the samurai to create heaven out of hell! (abbreviated from Kapleau, The Wheel of Death).

The Christian story is Jesus' proclamation of the Kingdom* of God to a crowd, as expressed in Luke's version (Luke 6:20–21; cf. Matt 5:3–10):

Blessed are you who are poor, for yours is the Kingdom of God.

Blessed are you who are hungry now, for you will be filled.

Blessed are you who weep now, for you will laugh.

This proclamation is an expression of Jesus' spirituality. Far from a luxury for the rich and powerful, Jesus' spirituality empowers the oppressed*, the poor*, and the distressed, and this is also so in Asia. This Christian spirituality can readily interact with the spiritualities of Asian people of different religions. Practice, according to Jesus, is the test of one's spirituality, whether one is Asian or not.

CHOAN-SENG (C. S.) SONG

Spirituality, Christian Forms of: In North America. The narrative of Christian spirituality in contemporary North America is complicated, for it is embedded in the story of early European discovery and conquest, as well as the "understories" of Native* American peoples and later immigrants. Nevertheless, certain themes become apparent. Ralph Waldo Emerson's* self-reliant "seeker" of early-19th-c. Transcendentalism* continues in the contemporary "New* Age" movement. The Emersonian-styled seeker has tended toward a hybrid Christian universalism with Eastern influences, searching for unity among sacred texts, meditative practices, and positivism*. At the opposite end have been fundamentalists* and Evangelicals*, who have sought to keep the message pure by endorsing scriptural inerrancy* and missionary conversion*. More recently, Black* Liberation and Feminist* forms of spirituality have challenged the white male hegemony, by furthering new images of God*, discipleship*, and community. With changing urban and rural scenes, phenomena like interdenominational megachurches* and, negatively, cultish aberrations like Jonestown have developed. The growing Latino/a population has brought a stronger family*-based spirituality, rich in symbol and ritual, as opposed to European American individualistic spiritual practice (see Feminist Theology Cluster: In North America: Latina; In North America: Mujerista). The Eastern Orthodox* Church has an increasing number of followers who long for traditional roots, while Roman Catholics have ministered within a creative spectrum. In the aftermath of 9/11, North American Christians face new interfaith concerns. Understanding Muslims in one's own society has become urgent. Notable contemporary figures include Thomas Merton*, Henri Nouwen, and Billy Graham.

STEPHANIE A. FORD

Spirituality, Christian Forms of: In North America: African American. The spirituality of African Americans is deeply rooted in and emerges from their historical experiences in the USA and their ancestral origins in Africa. The people of West and Central Africa – a people of deep religious faith and traditions, both indigenous and influenced by Christian and Muslim sources – were brought to the Americas in chains yet were able, in many ways, to retain and even strengthen their religious traditions, especially in Roman Catholic colonies. The result was a spirituality that fostered their survival as a people and a community of faith, by inculturating* European Christianity into “African retentions” (forms of Africanism). Theirs is a spirituality of struggle, survival, and liberation* embodied in a deep and abiding faith in and personal relationship with a God actively involved in their lives. This same God, who is black as they are, and his son, Jesus, also black, promised a salvation* that was both physical and spiritual. Jesus, they believe, suffered as they suffered but was not overcome as they have not been overcome. In Jesus they see the Divine living and acting within their own experience and empowering them to overcome obstacles of race*, class, and gender that persist in the USA and the African American community itself.

DIANA L. HAYES

Spirituality, Christian Forms of: In the South Pacific and Australia.

Indigenous peoples of the South Pacific and Australia possessed rich religions and mythologies explaining the origins of the universe and its sustenance. Generally Christian missionaries showed little appreciation of these, believing that indigenous people should be “civilized” and Christianized. The Spanish Benedictine monk Rosendo Salvado in Western Australia was a significant exception, who sought to discern how indigenous beliefs could serve as an introduction to the gospel. In an epoch-making statement in Alice Springs in 1986, Pope John* Paul II told Aborigines* that their beliefs were “your own way of touching the mystery* of God’s Spirit.” This affirmation typifies recent, more positive approaches to indigenous religious experience, especially regarding the sacredness of the land*. It reaches back to an older tradition attested to by the desert fathers, Bonaventure*, the English poet Thomas Traherne, Teilhard* de Chardin, and others: the world is a revelation of God (see Rom 1:20); Christian spirituality involves appreciating and caring for it.

Interest in the great classics of Christian spirituality is growing, thanks to reliable and readable translations, as well as to institutes such as the Centre for Christian Spirituality in Sydney. This resurgence of an older and more liberal approach to contemplative* prayer blends well with indigenous peoples’ appreciation of silence, contemplation*, and sense of mystery* in life.

Another type of spirituality is represented by the plethora of imported and adapted spirituality movements – Charismatic*, Focolari*, Cursillo, Marriage Encounter, Antioch, Alpha, and various other study and prayer groups both within denominations and within independent churches. Among the many imported and local initiatives that bring together spirituality and charitable works, the St. Vincent* de Paul Society is best known. Conversely many traditional Western devotional practices, imported earlier by the missionaries, are fading, including Catholic devotions such as the rosary* and benediction* of the sacrament.

The contemporary Liturgical* Movement, especially in the Anglican and Roman Catholic churches, involves various efforts at inculturation* by incorporating popular devotional practices such as folk hymns and music, the symbolic ritual entailing the solemn entry of the sacred Scriptures into the church, and the formal offering of gifts on celebratory occasions in many island communities. These efforts reflect a belated effort to respect cultures that have almost been lost. The pivotal role of Word and sacrament in the liturgy reinforces the belief that all Christian spirituality is centered on the Savior. And this encounter with the Lord involves service and witness, to “gossip the Gospel,” as Archbishop Runcie told Anglican laypeople in Australia. AUSTIN COOPER, OMI Spiritual Reformers, Spirituals, Spiritualists.

The mystical* tendency within Christianity, and specifically its claim to experience God without the mediation of Scripture*, sacraments*, or clergy*, was emphasized by some members of “the left wing” of the Reformation* (e.g. Caspar Schwenkfeld, Valentin Weigel, Sebastian Franck, Dirck Coornheert). It found its most lasting institutional form in the Society of Friends*, but it also became one aspect of Pietism*, the Moravian* tradition, and Methodism*. From the 16th c. onward, its advocates have championed religious toleration and human rights.

Spirituals, religious or sacred folksongs that grew out of the artistic genius of African American slaves* in the 19th c. Spirituals were a product of the combined influences of African musical forms, the characters and stories of the Bible, evangelical sermons, hymns of revivals* and camp* meetings, and the experiences of the enslaved in slave* quarters and “hush harbor” meetings. Spirituals, created and disseminated spontaneously or in the fashion of popular* Christianity, gave expression to an indestructible hope* for both freedom in this world (liberation*) and salvation* in the next. The personal God, the suffering of Jesus, faith*, love*, community, the experience of rebirth*, salvation, and reunion in the afterlife are among the major themes expressed, thus revealing the religious intent of spirituals. Images of “freedom,” “the chosen people,” “the Promised* Land,” “Canaan land,” and “Egyptian bondage” all captured the slaves’ longing for physical freedom. This dual focus, the “double meanings,” the vivid biblical imagery, the pervasive sense of identification with the children of Israel, and the dramatization of stories of the HB in explicating the unfolding history of the enslaved: all of these distinguished the spirituals of the slaves from those of their white counterparts. Affirming the interrelationship between this-worldly and otherworldly concerns, spirituals survived slavery and were repopularized (late 19th–early 20th c.) by the Fisk Jubilee Singers, Roland Hayes, James Weldon Johnson, Paul Robeson, and others, who shared them, often in a denatured form, with different cultures worldwide. Displaced by gospel* songs after the 1930s as the dominant body of African American sacred music, spirituals still figure prominently in the performative and celebrative character of African American ecclesiastical and liturgical life. See also GOSPEL MUSIC; MEDIA AND CHRISTIANITY; MEDIA AND CHRISTIAN WORSHIP; MEGACHURCHES REMAKING RELIGIOUS TRADITION IN NORTH AMERICA; PENTECOSTAL WORSHIP; PRAISE AND WORSHIP. LEWIS V. BALDWIN

Sports, Book of, a royal document that provided an alternative to the Sabbatarian* approach of the Puritans* in the Church of England*; it permitted archery and dancing on Sunday. Issued by James* I for Lancastershire (1617), then for all of England (1618), it was reissued by Charles* I (1633). It was ordered burned by the Puritan Parliament (1643).

Sri Lanka (Ceylon before 1972). A Christian community was first established by Christian merchants from Persia (c5th c.), according to trading documents whose authenticity was confirmed by the archeological discovery (early 20th c.) at the site of the ancient capital, Anuradhapura, of a “Nestorian cross” of the period (i.e. a cross of the Church* of the East, presently the symbol of the [Episcopal] Church of Ceylon).

Portuguese (1505–1668) brought the Roman Catholic Church, the first church to take root in Ceylon, with Franciscan* missionaries, followed by Jesuits* (including Francis Xavier*, c1544), Dominicans*, Augustinians*, and secular* clergy, who learned the language, translated books, and established parishes (Franciscans), schools (Jesuits), monasteries, and a seminary (Jesuits; 1605). When the Portuguese left (1658), strong Roman Catholic communities withstood persecutions (early 18th c.) during the Dutch occupation and negligence during the British period, remaining today the largest Christian Church in Sri Lanka.

During the Dutch colonization (1658–1796), the Dutch Reformed Church was established (emphasizing education*) with clergy from Holland and South India, and later with Ceylonese (lay and clergy) trained in local seminaries (in Jaffna since 1690; in Colombo since 1696). The Church set up the first printing presses in Ceylon, printing translations of the NT in Sinhala and Tamil, as well as Portuguese. Duplicating the Reformation/Counter Reformation conflict in Europe, the Dutch persecuted Catholics. Since the Dutch had exclusive control of the coast, Catholics moved to the center of the island (the Kandyan Kingdom), with Fr. Joseph Vaz (in the process of being canonized) as one of the rare priests. When the Dutch left (1796), the Dutch Reformed Church was not strong, and today its members are a very small minority.

The British colonization period (1796–1948) saw the arrival of the Church of England through the London Missionary Society (1806–18), followed and replaced by the Baptist (since 1812) and Wesleyan (since 1814) Missionary Societies, the Congregational American Board of Foreign Missions (since 1816), and the Church Missionary Society (Church of England), each mission working in distinct areas (following the principle of comity*). Eventually, the Ceylon churches united (as in India), forming the Jaffna Diocese of the Church of South* India (1947) and cooperating through the National Christian Council (NCC) of Ceylon. During this period, the first Ceylonese Roman Catholic bishop (1940) and the first Ceylonese Anglican bishop (1945) were ordained.

After Ceylon achieved independence (1948), the established "missionary" churches further developed. The Roman Catholic Church was organized in different dioceses, and the first Ceylonese cardinal (Thomas Cardinal Cooray) was named by Pope John* XXIII. The Church of England in Ceylon (Church of Ceylon) became two dioceses (1950). The Methodist Church in Ceylon became an independent conference (1964). Catholic* Action organized workers, peasants, and students, while the Student* Christian Movement was active. This period also saw the arrival of Pentecostal* churches and the Charismatic* Movement, which worked within existing churches.

Despite being a small minority (less than 7%), Christians are heavily involved in state affairs. They joined the struggle for independence and took part in the peace process. Along with Buddhists, Hindus, and Muslims, they are a significant force in the multireligious ethos.

Statistics: Population (2008): 21.3 million (M); Christians, 1.3 M 6.2% (Roman Catholics, 1 M; independents, 0.2 M; Protestants, 0.1 M); Buddhists, 69.1%; Muslims, 7.6%; Hindus, 7.1%; nonspecified, 10%. (Based on 2001 census.)

SYDNEY KNIGHT

Stalls, seats in the choirs* of cathedrals or large churches, elaborately carved and often covered with canopies.

Staniloae, Dumitru (1903–93), priest-theologian of the Romanian* Orthodox Church. Studied in Cernăuți, Athens (doctorate), as well as Germany and France (postdoctorate); wrote a book on Gregory* Palamas; taught in Sibiu, then Bucharest from 1949 to 1973, except for a period of six years, during which he lived in a prison camp.

Throughout the early years of the newly formed Romanian* state and the Communist rule, Staniloae sought as a journalist to interpret the times from an Orthodox perspective. He gained national stature and was known internationally as an articulate Orthodox voice in the ecumenical* movement with a good knowledge of Western theology.

Theologically, Staniloae represented the "neopatristic synthesis," which he explored much more thoroughly than Lossky* or Florovsky* through an extensive work of translation: an expanded Philokalia, with theological commentary, and translations of other fathers, especially Maximos the Confessor, with whom he had a particular affinity.

His mature theology is summed up in two works: Orthodox Dogmatic Theology, entitled in English The Experience of God, and Orthodox Spirituality. The traditional style of theological textbooks sometimes disguises their radical nature. Staniloae's theology, with its Palamite emphasis on a living experience of God, its profound sense of creation* as already grace*, through which we encounter Christ as revealed "in the cross," and his constant recourse to his patristic learning, does not fit well into traditional structures. Orthodox Spirituality reveals Staniloae's deep sympathy for the creative philosophical movements, associated with thinkers such as Blondel*, that he encountered in Paris. The later volumes of the Dogmatic Theology make creative use of liturgical sources, thus keeping his theology close to everyday Christian experience, and to the devout old ladies who, Staniloae used to claim, were his real mentors in theology.

ANDREW LOUTH

Stanton, Elizabeth Cady (1815–1902), US suffragist, abolitionist, freethinker, author, compiler of The Woman's Bible (1895, 1898); born in Johnstown, New York. Raised in the Presbyterian Church, as a young girl she befriended the local minister, Simon Hosack, who taught her Greek. According to her autobiography, Stanton tried but failed to undergo an experience of conversion to Evangelical* Christianity during the revivals* of the Second Great* Awakening. She contended that her true conversion* was to rationalism*. As a young woman, she was deeply influenced by the Unitarian* Theodore Parker and later by the writings of Auguste Comte on the religion of humanity. She ultimately became a lifelong advocate of free thought.

At the margins of liberal Christianity and increasingly investigating the 19th-c. "new" religions, Stanton nevertheless maintained a Protestant orientation. To her mind, Protestantism's most salient contribution was its emphasis on the primacy of individual conscience; she put great stock in individuals' ability to read and interpret biblical texts for themselves.

Stanton was particularly motivated by what she perceived to be the androcentric* nature of Christianity. Her mission throughout her 50-year reform career centered on liberating women from religious superstition*. She drew on the insights of 19th-c. higher biblical criticism and argued that its findings held the potential to alter the traditional interpretations of women's status in the Bible. For example, Stanton pointed to the multiple authorship of the books of the Pentateuch* to challenge the authority of biblical accounts rendering Eve* as the primary author of the Fall*. Biblical texts were not unassailable; they were created within historical contexts. The divine wisdom* found in the Bible had to be freed from the prejudices of its authors, translators, and historical circumstances. These beliefs led Stanton to organize, compile, and serve as the primary author of The Woman's Bible. This two-volume text attempted to offer readers an array of women's commentaries on biblical texts concerning women. Stanton had hoped to form a revising committee of women of diverse political and religious views to offer interpretations. But because of the controversial nature of the project, she was unable to lure conservative Evangelical women to join her. The book was lauded in some liberal circles but was routinely condemned by conservative clergy and mainstream reformers, including the National American Woman Suffrage Association, for which Stanton had served as president.

While Stanton and her Woman's Bible were considered highly controversial in the 19th c., both she and her "bible" emerged as an inspiration for second-wave feminists* in the 1970s. See also ANTHONY, SUSAN B.; BIBLE INTERPRETATION CLUSTER: WORLDWIDE: FEMINIST.

KATHI LYNN KERN

Star of Bethlehem (the) guided the wise men from the East to Jesus' birthplace in Bethlehem (Matt 2:1–12); the narrative alludes to the star prophecy in Num 24:17 (cf. Rev 22:16). Ignatius* of Antioch, Justin* Martyr, Clement*, and Tertullian* commented on the star. Two common interpretations exist. Origen* represents the natural view, calling the star "something of another order," a comet, heralding the fulfillment of messianic prophecy. John* Chrysostom epitomizes the miraculous view, according to which it is doubtful that a star could lead men to a particular physical place without divine direction. Ultimately, the star symbolizes new life and the hope* Christ brings from heaven*.

JEFFRY C. DAVIS

State Churches, churches officially recognized and supported by governments. Often bishops* and other ecclesiastical leaders are appointed or approved by the government. There are at least three types: (1) national churches (e.g. the Churches of England*, Scotland*, Denmark*, Sweden*); (2) universal churches (e.g. Roman Catholic Church) recognized through concordats* with individual governments; and (3) multiple churches supported by the state and its tax revenues (e.g. in Germany*, the Netherlands*). See also CULTURE CHRISTIANITY; FOLK CHURCHES IN THE NORDIC COUNTRIES.

States of the Church, portion of central Italy, stretching north and south from Rome to Ravenna, controlled by the pope from the 8th to the 19th c. See also DONATION OF CONSTANTINE.

Stational Liturgy (from Lat statio, "guard post"), worship conducted by the bishop of a city at changing locations, depending on saints' days or times of the year. The term eventually came to be used for processions from one site to another.

Stations of the Cross, a series of depictions of 14 stages of Christ's Passion*, from Pilate's house to the cross, arranged around the walls of a church, which faithful visit in sequence for prayer and meditation. This practice probably originated in Jerusalem (4th c.) and spread to Europe in the Middle Ages.

Status Confessionis (Lat "situation of confession"), doctrine developed by the Gnesio-Lutheran Flacius* in opposing the 1548 Augsburg Interim* of Charles V. It states that there is a need for "confession" (a denunciation) when the response to a given situation gives rise to an erroneous view of the gospel. The doctrine originally denounced the state's interference with the gospel; since then it has been used primarily to denounce the church's failures. Thus the Barmen* Declaration accused the German* Christians of betraying the source, extent, form, ministry, relation to the state, and purpose of Christian proclamation – a status confessionis. The 1967 Confession of the United Presbyterian Church in the USA declares that the church betrays its calling when it is associated with racism*, nationalism, enslaving poverty, or lack of compassion. The Lutheran World Federation (1977) and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (1982) declared apartheid* a status confessionis. During the 1980s and 1990s, there were calls to declare nuclear warfare and the gross differences of wealth and power in the world a status confessionis.

Stephanas, Paul's first convert in Corinth*, baptized by Paul himself; he later brought aid to Paul and was with him when he wrote to the church in Corinth (1 Cor 1:16, 16:15–17).

Stephen (d32–35), proto-martyr*; a “Hellenist*” (Acts 6:1–7) who angered many Jews by his address in Jerusalem about the Temple and the Law of Moses (Act 7:2–53). He was stoned without a formal trial; Saul, the future Paul* the Apostle, was involved (Acts 7:58–8:1). Relics* (dust) from his alleged tomb near Jerusalem (415) were brought to the West by Orosius; Augustine* publicized the miracles they had wrought. Melania* the Younger gained possession of the site; Empress Eudoxia built the shrine (439). The “new birth” of this first martyr is observed on December 26 in the West, December 27 in the East.

Stewardship, management of property* by a servant on behalf of the owner; a metaphor for fidelity to God’s call (Luke 12:42) and for administration of the gospel and the gifts of grace* (1 Cor 4:1; 1 Pet 4:10). In churches supported by voluntary gifts (especially since the late 19th c.; in the Economy and Christianity Cluster: see Economic Studies of Christianity and Studies of the History of Christianity in the United States), stewardship meant responsibility to God in the management of property and financial resources, since all wealth* belongs to God. Today one also refers to stewardship of natural resources.

Stigmata, marks like those on the crucified body of Christ that appear on the bodies of some devout persons, e.g. Francis* of Assisi.

Stoicism, Greek school of philosophy that grew out of Cynicism* but took more interest in issues of physics, logic, and ethics. Founded by Zeno (c300 BCE) and his pupil Cleanthes, it was set down in a classic way by Chrysippus (280–207 BCE). The emphasis was on natural* law in both the cosmos and human thought. This natural law was identified with the divine Logos* or cosmic reason. Stoic philosophical theology influenced by the Cynic Antisthenes (c445–365 BCE) assumed that the universal status of a reasoned theological explanation (grounded in Logos) was philosophically and religiously superior to common religious convictions – “so-called” knowledge about God, assertions without proof. Paul discusses the “real/so-called” distinction regarding the knowledge of God (1 Cor 8:1, 5), a distinction reminiscent of the Stoic differentiation between God and common convictions about the gods of the cosmos. Similarly, in ethics, natural law was the criterion against which custom and human law must be tested. According to the Stoics’ view of nature, events occur with inevitability, and freedom consists in willing whatever occurs. Stoic themes are found in Philo* and, beyond Paul*, in most early Christian thinkers.

Stole, narrow liturgical vestment worn by priests and ministers around the neck and hanging down in front, or by a deacon over the left shoulder.

Stone, Barton (1772–1844), preacher, editor, leader of a unity movement. Raised in Maryland and Virginia, Stone studied in North Carolina, was ordained by Presbyterians* in Kentucky (1798), and moved to Illinois (1834). Committed to Christian unity and social* justice*, Stone hosted the Cane Ridge camp* meeting with Methodists* (1801). Separated from Presbyterians over his refusal to preach predestination* (1803), Stone founded the Christian Church as a unity movement (1804), which became the Christian* Church (Disciples of Christ) after union with the followers of Alexander Campbell* (1832). As many others did, he supported both colonization (1826–34) and immediate abolition of slavery (1835). Disillusioned by politics and the US failure to end slavery*, Stone advised Christians to withdraw from civil government (1842). D. NEWELL WILLIAMS

Stowe, Harriet Beecher (1811–96), daughter of Lyman Beecher*, sister of Catharine Beecher*. A prolific writer of poems, travel books, biographies, and children’s books, she is best known for Uncle Tom’s Cabin (1852), a novel documenting the evils of slavery*, which was read widely in the USA and abroad and influenced public opinion in the years leading up to the Civil* War.

Strachan, John (1778–1867), born in Scotland, moved (1799) to Upper Canada* to teach boys to become British patriots and Christian gentlemen; ordained in the Church of England (1803). As a rector (1812) in York (Toronto), he displayed courageous conduct during two US invasions (1813). He was a member of the colony’s executive council (1817–36) and the colony’s legislative council (1820–41). He helped draft the colony’s Common School Act (1816), obtained a royal university charter in Toronto (King’s College, Trinity College), and fended off political reformers who sought to diminish the rights and privileges of the crown and the Church of England in the colony. As the founding bishop of the Anglican Diocese of York

(1839–67), he stood for Tory adherence to the High Church, even when it went out of fashion. See also CANADA. ROBERT CHOQUETTE

Strangers. See REFUGEES AS A THEOLOGICAL CONCEPT AND AN ETHICAL ISSUE.

Structural Evil, evil or oppression* that arises from social, economic, and political structures or from basic cultural assumptions; often viewed as a version of, or substitute for, original* sin. Inequalities of class, race*, gender, and sexual* orientation are types of evil* that are larger than, and prior to, the individual; they envelop the oppressor and the oppressed in a web of guilt and powerlessness, and require structural solutions. Concern about such a “kingdom of evil” was expressed by Kant*, Schleiermacher*, Ritschl*, and Rauschenbusch* and continues to be addressed by Liberation* theology.

Structural Studies of Christianity. See SEMIOTICS AND THE STUDY OF CHRISTIANITY.

Student Christian Movement, organization that grew out of YMCA* and YWCA* activities on college campuses in the USA and Great Britain, uniting Christians across (Protestant) denominational lines and promoting missions. More specifically, the British branch of this federation that gave rise to the influential SCM Press. See also WORLD STUDENT CHRISTIAN FEDERATION.

Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions grew out of a YMCA* conference (1886) with the slogan “the evangelization of the world in this generation” (1888). In the USA, its base was the YMCA and YWCA*; in Great Britain, the Student Volunteer Missionary Union was an arm of the Student* Christian Movement. Thousands of college-educated students became missionaries throughout the world on an interdenominational* basis, especially before World War I.

Studios Monastery, the monastery of St. John the Baptist in Constantinople, named for the senator on whose land it was built (late 5th c.). Following the practice of Acoemetae*, the Sleepless Monastery, its monks ceaselessly praised God. Because of their defense of the decrees of Chalcedon*, they were driven out by Miaphysite* patriarchs and emperors. The monastery was reorganized under Theodore* of Studios after 799 with a rule based on that of Basil*, which became widely used in monasteries of the Eastern Church. The monks of Studios were the foremost champions of icons* during the Iconoclastic* controversy.

Stylite, Stylitism. A stylite is a monk living alone on the top of a pillar. Stylitism as a practice (5th–10th c.) was modeled on Simeon* Stylites.

Suárez, Francisco (1548–1617), Spanish Jesuit, philosopher, theologian; prominent representative of the “Silver Age of Scholasticism*” (c1525–c1625), which sought to address the difficult questions arising from the colonization* and Christianization of the New World, humanism*, and the Reformation*. Born in Granada, starting at the age of 14 Suárez studied canon* law, then philosophy and theology in Salamanca; he joined the Jesuit* order in 1564. From 1571 he taught at several of the most distinguished academic centers of his time: Ávila, Segovia, Valladolid, Rome, Alcalá, Salamanca, and Coimbra. He subsequently served as a consultant on moral and canonical matters in Lisbon.

Suárez’s 28 large volumes on metaphysics*, theology, and law* discuss with extraordinary erudition the ancient Greek, patristic, Arabic, and Scholastic intellectual traditions on their own terms. Occasionally misunderstood as “eclectic,” his method leads to an original position that synthesizes elements from the Thomistic*, Scotistic (see Duns Scotus, John) and Ockhamistic* schools in a sophisticated way. The essential features of this synthesis and its role in the history of ideas are under debate and require further exploration.

Suárez’s most important philosophical contribution, a comprehensive exposition of “first philosophy,” the Disputationes Metaphysicae (1597; 20 editions), became a standard textbook, even in 17th-c. Protestant universities. Descartes*, Leibniz, Berkeley, Wolff, Schopenhauer, F. Brentano, and Heidegger* acknowledged their indebtedness to it.

Suárez’s theological contributions range from fundamental issues about the Trinity* to questions pertaining to spiritual life. His De Legibus (1612) was most influential in the field of law. With his doctrine on the law of peoples (ius gentium), Suárez (and De Vitoria) founded modern international law. His doctrine concerning the sovereignty of the people contributed to colonial emancipation following its reception by Hispano-American universities. In De Gratia (1619), he systematized Molina’s* ideas on grace* (as appropriate inducement, rather than as intrinsically efficacious) in the formula gratia congruens, which became canonical for the Jesuits.

ROLF DARGE

Subintroductae. See AGAPETAI.

Sublimus Dei, Pope Paul III's bull (1537) declaring that "the said Indians and all other people who may later be discovered by Christians, are by no means to be deprived of their liberty or the possession of their property, even though they be outside the faith of Jesus Christ; and that they may and should, freely and legitimately, enjoy their liberty and the possession of their property; nor should they be in any way enslaved." This reversed Pope Nicholas V's bull, Dum Diversas (1452), which encouraged the enslavement of "pagans." See also ENCOMENDEROS, ENCOMIENDA; LAS CASAS, BARTOLOMÉ DE; PATRONATO, PADROADO; REDUCTIONS; SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

Subordinationism, any view that the second person of the Trinity* is "less than" the Father. Logos* theology in the 2nd–3rd c. assumed that the Word is not eternal but uttered for the sake of creation* and providence, and thus less than the Father in order to interact with the created world. Arius* said that the Son was created out of nothing and thus was radically different from God. Subordinationism was justified by scriptural passages about divine Wisdom as "created" by God (Prov 8:22) and about Jesus as sent by the Father and doing the Father's will (John 5:19, 7:16, 8:42, 14:28). See also TRINITY IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY; TRINITY IN THE WESTERN TRADITION.

Subscription. In Protestantism, when ministers are ordained*, they are often expected to subscribe to (i.e. state their agreement with) the creeds* or confessions of their churches. Since the 16th c., this was debated (especially in the Church of Scotland and Church of England) on the grounds that confessions were subordinate to Scripture*, that all persons have the responsibility to interpret Scripture for themselves, and that "God alone is the Lord of the conscience." "Strict subscription" was commonly set aside by legitimating a broader interpretation of the confessions and insisting only on the "substance" or "essentials" of the faith.

Subsidiarity, Principle of, concerning political and economic relationships. First enunciated in Quadragesimo Anno (1931), the social* encyclical of Pope Pius* XI, it states (Para. 79) that what can be performed by local bodies should not be transferred to central authorities, whose role is to be an "aid," a subsidium, to local bodies, rather than destroy or absorb them. The central body nevertheless has the task of "directing, watching, stimulating, and restraining, as circumstances suggest or necessity demands" (Para. 80). Thus the principle of subsidiarity not only blocks interference but calls for intervention whenever local authorities do not carry out their tasks adequately. John* XXIII in Mater et Magistra (1961) and the Second Vatican* Council (in "The Church in the Modern World") reaffirmed it.

The principle entered European law in the Maastricht Treaty (1992, Article 3B): the European Community will intervene only if and insofar as the intended objectives can be better achieved by it rather than by the member states. See also DEMOCRACY AND CHRISTIANITY; SOCIAL ENCYCLICALS.

Succession (Gk diadoche), term used in reference to the three rulers who succeeded Alexander the Great; also used in reference to the heads of Greek philosophical schools and, in Judaism, to both high priests and leading rabbis. Among Christians, Gnostic* groups claimed succession from Paul or other apostles, and Hegesippus* drew up the first succession lists of bishops*. While it was not the sole basis of authority, succession was an important guarantee of continuity and legitimation. Many historians judge the lack of agreed-upon rules of succession to be a major cause of the crises of the Roman Empire. See also APOSTOLICITY AND APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.

Sudan. In the northern part of present-day Sudan, there were once three Christian kingdoms. Christianity was introduced as early as c350, flourished, and became the state religion in 580, following the pattern of the Byzantine Empire, from which the missionaries originated. These Nubian kingdoms were, from north to south along the Nile River, Nobatia (Nobatae; Miaphysite*), Makuria (Maqurrah; Miaphysite), and Alwa (Alodia; Chalcedonian*) (see History of Christianity Cluster: In Africa). Their rulers were priest-kings, vested with both ecclesiastical and secular powers. So intertwined were the church and the state that the two were nearly indistinguishable.

Christianity withstood the challenge of Islam until the 15th c. Initially, Islam did not come to the Christian Nubian kingdoms through invasion but through Arab nomads and itinerant teachers. Some of these intermarried with local people, settling to teach Islam and trade in the area. After gaining access to royal courts, they established good relations with the royals. Thus Islam spread in peaceful ways. But the Arabization and Islamization of Northern Sudan gained impetus with the Mamluk dynasty in Egypt (from 1250). Although Christianity survived for a time, the more militant Arab nomads from Egypt had freer access to the Nubian kingdoms. Once settled in the area, they established themselves quickly in the Nile Valley and adjacent plains. In 1504 Christianity as a state religion was replaced by the Islamic sultanate of Funj.

In the south, beyond the Nubian kingdoms, African* Religion dominated. A combination of fierce resistance by the local people, natural barriers (e.g. the vast swamps of the Sudd and associated diseases), and, later, colonial policies made it difficult for Christian missionaries to reach the south of present-day Sudan. Thus it was only in the early 20th c. that Christianity arrived in the south, mainly in urban centers. Much of rural Southern Sudan remained untouched by the gospel until the outbreak of the civil war (1983), when the church experienced persecution and growth.

Christianity has become the faith of the majority in Southern Sudan, as Islam is in the north. The largest church is the Roman Catholic Church, followed by the Anglican Church. Others are Presbyterian, Church of Christ, and African Inland. The Pentecostal and Charismatic* churches are the fastest growing in Sudan. The church has experienced persecution and oppression – including the expulsion of missionaries (as in 1964) and elimination of church leaders – inflicted by the Islamic authorities, for whom Christianity is a “foreign religion” in Sudan. The Sudan Council of Churches (SCC), which operates in Northern and Southern Sudan, and the New Sudan Council of Churches (established when the war between the north and south from 1983 to 2005 made it difficult for the SCC to serve the needs of people in the south) are widely representative; both councils include Catholics, Orthodox, and Protestants, and work cooperatively under incredibly difficult conditions to build a grass-roots movement for peace, as they have done in Darfur (in Western Sudan), a distinct site of conflict and genocide.

Statistics: Population (2000): 29.5 million (M). Christians, 4.9 M, 16.7% (Roman Catholics, 3.1 M; Anglicans, 2.3 M; Protestants, 0.8 M; Orthodox, 0.16 M; members of African Instituted Churches, 0.15 M); Muslims, 20.7 M, 70.3%; African Religionists, 3.4 M, 13%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

ISAIAH DAU

Suffering. Christianity accounts for the omnipresence of suffering through the myth* of creation* and the Fall* (Gen 1–3). A benevolent God created the world so that humanity could enjoy intimacy with the divine and harmonious relations with the world. Humanity fell from this paradise* and thus suffers alienation from the divine, disharmony, pain, and death. The incarnation* and Passion* of Christ reconcile the divine and human but do not alter the conditions of the Fall. The faithful can only look forward to an eschatological* existence without tears and death (Rev 21:4). The metaphor* of the Fall captures the paradox* of suffering as universal and yet alien to what humanity was intended to be.

Suffering as Punishment. For Augustine* and the Reformers*, suffering and death are punishment for the prideful disobedience that led to the Fall. God becomes incarnate in Christ, whose atoning death absorbs the guilt of humanity (see Atonement #2). Participation in the church makes available the means of salvation* through which those predestined for salvation will be delivered from suffering in heaven*.

Standard in Western churches, this narrative, which interprets suffering as penalty, appeals to the psychological need to find meaning in suffering. Cosmic principles of justice* are maintained by an omnipotent* God, who punishes wrongdoers, yet Christians can look forward to a condition in which suffering is ended. But when suffering is conflated with punishment, guilt exacerbates suffering. Imagining God* as an angry father/king can make the divine terrifying and distant rather than consoling. This interpretation supports the institutional power of the church, which alone controls the means of salvation* that free humanity from suffering.

Suffering as an Inevitable Aspect of the Created Order. This fundamentally different view of the causes and cures of suffering is found throughout Christian history. According to this interpretation, suffering is an inevitable aspect of the created order, which is under the power of evil forces (or is diseased), a situation worsened by human cruelty. Consequently, the cure of suffering, the manifestation of God’s love, is a manifestation of divine power. Christ's Passion reveals divine compassion* for suffering humanity and promises that God will overcome suffering and the powers of evil (or disease) that cause it (see Atonement #1).

Among those who held this view were the Gnostics*, who thought that the Savior freed the faithful from the deceptions and violence of the current order by awakening them to their divine identity. Medieval contemplatives (e.g. Beguines*) meditated on Christ's Passion so that their own suffering would be transformed into healing for humanity. Schleiermacher* argued that the stability of God consciousness enables Christians to endure suffering without despair or guilt. Without the same countercultural attitude, Eastern Orthodox* meditate on the Incarnation* as a renewal of human nature; through (sacramental) union with Christ, Christians' suffering becomes a healing presence for humanity (see Culture and Christianity Cluster: In Eastern Orthodoxy). Similarly, most Charismatic* churches and many African* Instituted Churches envision their ministries as forms of spiritual warfare against diverse evil powers that cause suffering. Both God and Christians alleviate suffering through compassion* and powerful interventions.

Suffering and Systemic Evil. The Holocaust* and late-20th-c. liberation* movements emphasized the social, political, and economic causes of suffering. Attention was turned to those who suffer from evils such as poverty*, patriarchy*, racism*, and anti-Semitism*. Justice* meant not punishment of sinners but humane social systems. The parable of the good Samaritan and Matt 25:31–46 emphasize Christianity's responsibility to mediate divine compassion to humanity by correcting injustices to alleviate suffering.

Christianity struggles to understand the anguish and ubiquity of suffering in light of the goodness of God (see Theodicy). The church has often been concerned more with its own power than with the pain of humanity. But the revelation of divine love* in Christ continues to bring healing and comfort to the afflicted.

WENDY FARLEY

Suffragan Bishop, traditionally a bishop who assists his metropolitan* by voting at a synod; now also an assistant bishop.

Sunday School Movement (the) originated in the late 18th c. in Great Britain and soon spread to the USA and other parts of the world. Sunday school and its basic structure and purpose have been incorporated into the patterns and norms of some Christian churches, significantly shaping their mission.

The Sunday School Movement was motivated by both biblical teaching and social circumstances. The Bible teaches the urgency of teaching both children and adults the beliefs and practices of faith*. In Torah the following commandment is given Mosaic authority: "These commandments that I give you today are to be upon your hearts. Impress them on your children. Talk about them when you sit at home and when you walk along the road, when you lie down and when you get up" (Deut 6:6–7). In the Gospels, Jesus is called rabbi (teacher); in Acts, the first generation of Christians met to study the teachings (didache); and in Matthew, Jesus commands the new community "to teach them everything I have commanded you" (Matt 28:19–20).

Robert Raikes (1735–1811), influential in the origin and development of Sunday school, was an Anglican layperson born in Gloucester, England. Committed to issues of social* justice* (especially penal reform), he was concerned about the plight of the poor children of his city and believed that Sunday school would improve their condition. He offered a program (from 1780) in Gloucester for working-class children and soon the Sunday School Movement was present in London.

With a similar motivation, a comparable program was begun in Accomack County, Virginia, by William Elliot (1785), and the "First Day School Society" was established in Philadelphia (1791). The movement, rooted in Evangelical Protestant denominations (Baptist, Congregationalist, Low Church Episcopalian, Methodist, Presbyterian), joined forces to found the American Sunday School Union. Conventions were held in Philadelphia (1832, 1833). The movement became an integral part of church life.

In the late 19th and 20th c., the movement increased in influence and adopted sophisticated educational strategies. Professional Christian educators with primary responsibility for Sunday schools became a part of the educational mission of the church and part of the staff of larger congregations. Seminary training for pastors included courses in Christian education. Currently, the Sunday School Movement for both children and adults is grounded in contemporary theology, current educational theory, teaching training, and excellent printed and electronic materials. DUNCAN S. FERGUSON

Sung Shang-Jie John (1901–44), a Chinese revivalist*, grew up in Fujian, China*, during Sun Yat-sen's revolution. Son of a Methodist pastor, Sung first assisted his father. After studying in the USA (1920–26; doctorate in chemistry; briefly a student at Union Theological Seminary), he served as a minister in Fujian (1927–1930), then traveled, preaching throughout North China with Andrew Gih's Bethel Worldwide Evangelistic Band (1931–33). Through wars and poverty, Sung also preached in Southeast Asian countries (the Philippines*, Indonesia*, Singapore*, Malaysia*) and Taiwan* (1934–40). Renowned for prophetic preaching, vision, and healing, Sung emphasized prayer, discipleship modeled on Christ's suffering on the cross, repentance*, sanctification*, evangelism*, and self-sufficiency of the Chinese Church.

MENGHUN GOH

Supernatural, that which is beyond the human realm or nature: God* and the grace* by which human beings are brought into communion with God.

Supersessionism, view according to which Christianity supersedes or replaces Judaism*, since Christ is the complete and final revelation that not only fulfilled but ended the purpose of the Law*. It stands in contrast to the affirmation of a continuity between Judaism and Christianity, an alternative position that is often linked with the conviction that Christ* presages other revelatory manifestations (including transforming manifestations of the Spirit*). See also ANTI-JEWISH, ANTI-JUDAISM; NEW COVENANT; TYPOLOGY; UNIQUENESS OF CHRIST.

Superstition, excessive or irrational fear of divine or demonic powers, resulting in over-scrupulous activities. Superstition has usually been considered less serious than either magic or heresy*, probably because it is more naive than purposeful. The difference between religion and superstition lies in the judgment of the beholder: beliefs and practices with which one disagrees are often labeled superstitions. In “traditionally Christian” countries, many folkways were considered superstitious in comparison with orthodoxy, but were usually tolerated as harmless “local customs” until reform movements (e.g. Renaissance*, Reformation*) called them into question and sought to abolish or transform them. The Enlightenment* rejected many aspects of Christianity and other religions as irrational superstitions; (scientific)* rationality renders religious views and practices irrelevant. Romanticism* and postmodernism* rehabilitated them as unconsciously carrying profound meaning for human life and questioning the Enlightenment's premises.

Supralapsarianism, view that God's predestination* of the elect was decided before God's foreknowledge of human sin*, thus “prior” to God's knowing and willing (cf. Infralapsarianism).

Supremacy, Acts of, two acts of the English Parliament. The first (1534) made Henry* VIII the “supreme head” of the Church of England; the second (1559) made Elizabeth* I the “supreme governor” of spiritual and temporal affairs.

Surplice, a loose vestment of white linen, with wide sleeves, worn over a cassock by priests, acolytes, and choristers.

Susanna, Book of, one of the additions to the book of Daniel*, exclusively preserved in Greek translations of the OT (in LXX*, after Dan 12, and in Theodotion*, before Dan 1). It tells the story of Susanna, a “religious and God-fearing woman,” who refused the advances of two “elders,” was accused by them of adultery, but was saved by Daniel, who cross-examined the two elders and discredited their testimony. This book is part of the Roman Catholic and Orthodox Bibles (as Dan 13), but not the Jewish Tanakh* (HB) and Protestant Bibles. See also BIBLE, CANON OF.

Swaziland, a homogeneous society ruled by an absolute monarch, where Christians coexist with practitioners of Swazi Traditional Religion (STR), which is thoroughly enmeshed in the Swazi culture and way of life. Despite constitutional provisions for the freedom of religion, public holidays are Christian holidays and the monarch participates in all significant Christian activities to reiterate his support of Christianity. Other religions (e.g. Baha'i*, Islam*) have few followers.

The story of Christianity in Swaziland began in 1836 when King Somhlolo, a stalwart of the STR, dreamed of strange people (whites) emerging from the sea, carrying umculu (a scroll) and indilinga (a coin). A voice cautioned the king that the nation should accept the scroll (the Bible) and reject the coin (money). After relating the dream, the king died. Subsequently, his successor, King Mswati I, sent emissaries to South Africa to invite Methodist missionaries to Swaziland. The enthusiastic welcome of the first missionaries (1844) opened doors for many others, including Nazarenes*, Anglicans*, Lutherans*, Roman Catholics, and Evangelicals*. As they preached the gospel, they made invaluable contributions to the welfare of the Swazi by building schools and hospitals.

Later, the Swazi realized that their culture had been repressed by European settlers (including missionaries) and that they had been robbed of their land through the Partition Proclamation of 1907. Consequently, some Swazi Christians seceded from mission churches to institute indigenous churches (African* Instituted Churches), including "Ethiopian churches," "Zionist churches," and the fast-growing "Ministries." These churches have lively charismatic* worship, view life as a daily spiritual struggle with demonic powers, originated with charismatic* prophets and healers, and emphasize healing*, revelations, visions by the Holy Spirit, and prophecies.

Most churches are affiliated with the Conference of Churches, the Council of Churches, or the League of Churches. The League, the umbrella organization of all the indigenous churches (except for "Ministries"), includes about 40% of the population.

Statistics: Population (2007): 1.1 million. Christians, 85% (members of African Instituted Churches, 45%; unaffiliated [Charismatics and others], 16%; Protestants, 15%; Roman Catholics, 5%; Anglicans, 4%); Swazi Traditional Religionists, 12%; others, 3%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001, and governmental statistics.)

SONENE NYAWO

Sweden. The developments of Christianity in Sweden and of the Swedish nation were closely connected. Following the church's establishment, originally influenced by both Denmark and England, Sweden became a church province (1164), with strong ties to Rome during the Middle Ages. Holy orders were established. Birgitta* (1303–73, now the patron saint of Europe) played a critical role in Sweden's relationship with Rome and in political issues.

Following the Reformation (de facto adopted in 1536; officially confirmed in 1593), the Church of Sweden kept many of the Catholic liturgical practices. However, Lutheran orthodoxy, with strongholds at the universities, unified the country by emphasizing church discipline in preaching. The Enlightenment* drastically changed the theological climate. Several scientists were also theologians, including the botanist Carl Linnaeus (1707–78) and Emanuel Swedenborg* (1688–1772).

Sweden resisted the revivalist* movements until 1860, when Baptists and Methodists gradually established small denominations alongside the Missionary Covenant Church, a Pietist* group within the Church of Sweden. In the early 20th c., the Pentecostal* Movement developed rapidly, publishing a daily newspaper and forming a political party. These conservative movements did not become major denominations, have significantly decreased in the past few generations, and do not have a clear voice in society.

Until 2000 the Church of Sweden was formally a state* church. Nowadays, in a state considered religiously neutral, it is still constitutionally a privileged church, rules its own affairs, and continues to be strongly dedicated to the ecumenical* movement.

The decline in Sunday service attendance might suggest that Sweden has become post-Christian. Yet Christianity provides the dominant view of life for many who describe themselves as "Christian in their own way" (see Culture Christianity). In line with this increasing privatization of religion, public rituals are limited to holidays, rites of passage, burial in graveyards as sacred space, and times of crisis. Yet these still tie the population to the churches. In addition, alternative spiritual (and Charismatic) practices have emerged.

The Bible and Luther's Small Catechism have had the greatest influence on Swedish culture. Theological education (in the universities), strong since the 15th c., has recently been broadened to include religious studies programs at decentralized higher education institutions and revivalist colleges. In public schools, Christianity is taught alongside other religions and ideologies. Christianity has influenced strong social movements, including the women's*, workers', and environmental movements (which are often integrated into church activities). Swedish Christians have a general acquaintance with other religions and ideologies, yet dialogue with members of other religions and their integration into society need improvement.

Statistics: Population (2000): 8.91 million (M). Christians, 7.56 M, 85% (members of Church of Sweden, 7.26 M; Orthodox, 0.12 M; Roman Catholics, 0.17 M); Muslims, 0.2 M, 2.3%; atheists and nonreligious, also within churches,

2.6 M, 29.4%. (Source: Church of Sweden and governmental statistics.)

CRISTINA GRENHOLM

Swedenborg, Emanuel (1688–1772), Swedish scientist and civil servant; founder of a new Christian church. Swedenborg's father was a prominent bishop, but he himself became fascinated by modern science and technology. He published the first scientific journal in Sweden* (1716–18) and was appointed assessor in the College of Mines. Starting from a Cartesian point of view, he presented a theory of the origin of inorganic nature (1734); during the next decade, he studied human anatomy and physiology, aiming at a unification of science and Christian theology. This attempt resulted in a religious crisis (1743–44), following which a divine call made him abandon all scientific activities. Instead, he wrote (in Latin) a number of books in which he interpreted biblical texts and reported on his meetings with angels and spirits. His idea was to restore Christianity to its original purity before Nicaea*, as made clear by the title of his last work, Vera Christiana Religio (True Christianity, 1771). Swedenborg never acted as a missionary but relied on the effect of his books for the establishment of a new church. The first Swedenborgian congregations were founded in England (in the 1780s). Today the Swedish 18th-c. visionary still has followers in many parts of the world.

INGE JONSSON

Switzerland was shaped as a country by Christianity, which arrived with the Romans (early 4th c.) and was substantially reinforced under Burgundian rule (6th c.). Dioceses were established with bishop sees in Augusta Raurica, Chur, Martigny, Geneva, Lausanne, and Constance. Monasteries*, centers of monastic* culture, were founded in, e.g., Saint-Maurice (Valais) (6th c.), Saint-Gall (under Irish influence, 7th c.), and Einsiedeln (934). Both popular* religious practices (cult of saints*, pilgrimages*) and mysticism* (notably, that of the 15th-c. politician and hermit Klaus von Flüe, sanctified in 1947) developed in late medieval times.

In the 16th c., Basel became a center of debates on church reform among humanists*, including Erasmus*. Zwingli* in Zurich and Farel* and Calvin* in Geneva were leaders of the Reformation* in Switzerland. After two religious wars (1529, 1531), as the momentum of the Protestant Reformation faltered, the First Helvetic* Confession (1536) became the first common creed of the German-speaking parts of the Swiss Confederation (Eidgenossenschaft), and the Second Helvetic* Confession (1566) drafted by Bullinger* was adopted by all Reformed* churches of German-speaking Switzerland (except Basel) and by the French, Scottish, Polish, and Hungarian Reformed churches. In addition, Calvinist and Zwinglian Protestantism established a common creed, the Consensus Tigurinus (1549), initiating a rapprochement between the Reformed confessions.

The Catholic* Renewal (from the late 16th c.) – promoted by Borromeo* (archbishop of Milan), Francesco Bonhomini (nuncio in Lucerne), Jesuits* (e.g. Petrus Canisius, Fribourg), and Capuchins* – revitalized clergy and religious institutions. Jesuit colleges (e.g. Lucerne, 1577; Fribourg, 1581; Solothurn, 1646) were founded.

In the 16th–17th c., the Swiss Confederation generated a model of religious coexistence, the principle of territoriality (cuius regio eius religio, “a region's government determines the faith of its population”) guaranteeing confessional homogeneity within regions. Yet two additional confessional wars took place (1656, 1712). In the 18th c., the Enlightenment* and Pietism* marked Protestantism (with Bern, Zurich, Saint-Gall, and Schaffhausen as centers). In Roman Catholicism, Enlightenment ideas centered on issues of pastoral and liturgical reform.

In the 19th c., religion was one of the most important forces in conceptualizing the Swiss nation. The percentage of Protestants (59.2–57.8%) and Roman Catholics (40.6–41.6%) remained stable. When Liberals were eager to subjugate the Catholic Church to state power (1830s), a civil war erupted (1847), leading to the foundation of the federal state (1848). Politicization of religion and confessionalization of politics continued in the Kulturkampf (1870s–1880s), intensified by anti-Jesuit articles in the federal Constitution of 1874, by the increasingly Ultramontane character of Catholicism, and by the social and political mobilization of Catholics. Starting in 1891, the Catholic Conservative party was continuously represented in the national government. The Catholic subculture (Altermatt) had its organizational heyday between 1900 and 1950. The centralization of Church authority (cf. the 1870 dogmatization of papal infallibility) was resisted by “liberal” Catholics who founded the Old* Catholic Church (also Christ Catholic Church), which remained a small minority church in Switzerland.

A Protestant revivalist movement (early 19th c.), in reaction to liberal theology, led to the establishment of Evangelical churches (centered in Basel and Geneva), in addition to the cantonal Landeskirchen and the Schweizerische reformierte Kirchenkonferenz. Revivalism* gave rise to a number of religious, welfare, and missionary societies (e.g. the Basel* Mission).

Since 1945, and especially since 1960, all churches have been affected by “deconfessionalization” – not so much a secularization* as a transformation of religion into a plurality of religious movements and civil* religion. Yet ideological solidarities (as seen, e.g., in the mainly Catholic Christian Democratic Party, supported by some Protestant and secular people) remain a factor of the Swiss party system.

Statistics: Population (2000): 7.4 million. Roman Catholic, 41.8%; Protestant, 35.3%; Orthodox, 1.8%; other Christians, 0.4%; Muslims, 4.3%; other religionists, 1%; nonreligious (and unspecified), 15.4%. (Based on 2000 census.)

URS ALTERMATT and FRANZISKA METZGER

Syllabus of Errors, collection of 80 theses that had already been condemned in earlier documents, issued as an appendix to the encyclical Quanta Cura by Pope Pius* IX (1864). There were 10 sections. The concluding condemned thesis reads as follows: “The Roman Pontiff can and ought to reconcile and adjust himself with progress, liberalism, and modern civilization.” Protestants reacted with alarm; moderate Roman Catholics tried to soften its interpretation; and the Ultramontanists* and other conservative Catholics considered it their charter. Since the Syllabus was in fact a classified index to previous statements, there is no agreement on the question of whether each thesis condemned in the Syllabus was “infallibly* false” or whether the Syllabus’s condemnations of errors should be interpreted in terms of the situations to which they had been addressed. For many, Vatican* II, and especially Gaudium et Spes (the pastoral constitution on the Roman Catholic Church in the modern world promulgated by Pope Paul* VI in 1965), are viewed as “an attempt to officially reconcile the Church with the [modern] world,” and thus as a “counter-syllabus” (as Cardinal Ratzinger [later Pope Benedict XVI] wrote, in variously interpreted words).

Symbolism, system of symbols representing the connections between individual, community, and ultimate* reality (“symbol” from Grk syn [together]-bole [a throw], “to throw together,” “to connect”). Christian symbolism begins in Scripture. “In the beginning was the Word.” Augustine* explains in On Christian Doctrine that symbols require interpretation (see Semiotics and the Study of Christianity). Outside of mysticism*, the divine is not immediately experienced. Rather, images such as icons* of Jesus* or Mary*, words such as “Father*” or “love*,” and actions such as genuflection before the altar or caring for the sick mediate believers’ experience of the divine. Believers use symbols to orient themselves in space and time, in nature and history, toward the good and God. Interpreting symbols is a way toward communion both with the Christian community and with Christ. The Christian symbolic order must be understood in the context of liturgy*, sacrament*, prayer*, architecture (see Hierotopy, the Creation of Christian Sacred Spaces), art*, and music* and in the context of Christians’ relation to non-Christians, e.g. apologetically or inquisitorially, as missionaries* or as crusaders*. The resulting rich variety of Christian symbolism reflects the diverse ways of life of Christians over the globe since Jesus preached. Christians, whether Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Protestant, or “independent,” whether viewed as heretical, heterodox, lapsed, or recovering, also use symbolism to mark conflicts between (and within) groups and individuals.

Critics of Christianity understand Christian symbols to have material rather than transcendent referents. By these accounts, God* is a “mere” (dead) metaphor*, a figure of speech, expressing nothing but the deluded believer’s best wishes or unspoken resentments. Sociology* interprets religious symbols as reflecting a social order in which God serves one side in social conflicts (see Ideology). Psychology* identifies symbolic orders within the unconscious, representing repressed desires, and so God becomes a fantasy of omniscience* and omnipotence*. These types of radical skepticism risk stripping religious symbols of all reference to the divine or ultimate reality, explaining them away as empty signs or symptoms. But such hermeneutics* of suspicion can also help save believers from bad faith or sentimental credulity.

Among believers, religious symbols presume a connection to ultimate reality. Symbolic systems may be rationally systematic and aesthetically coherent. They can also be transgressive; e.g. the cross as a symbol of Christ’s incarnation and crucifixion is, in Paul’s words, a “stumbling block” to systematic rationalism or utilitarian calculation. The cross reveals symbolically the believer’s dependence on God’s grace*. Just so, Christian symbols order a life of faith. See also APOPHATICISM; CONVICTION; METAPHOR; MYSTICISM, MYSTICS.

CHRISTIAN SHEPPARD

Symeon, the “New Theologian” (c949–1022); abbot of the monastery of St. Mamas in Constantinople. Reacting against the influences on monastic* life of liturgical formality, scholastic theology, and wealth, in his Chapters, Catecheses, Hymns, and Treatises, Symeon affirmed intense spiritual prayer* as the fundamental vocation of monks and affirmed the charismatic power of holy monks to forgive sins. An apophatic*, mystical* theologian, Symeon stressed the divine mercy, powerful love of the living Christ, and a second baptism* in the Holy* Spirit accessible through repentance*, prayer, and asceticism*, and experienced as light and fire transforming the entire body and leading to union with the Trinity. Symeon provides a link between patristic and orthodox spirituality* with modern Pentecostal* and Charismatic* themes.

KATHLEEN E. MCVEY

Synagogue (Gk “gathering together”), the Jewish gathering for worship and instruction, and thus also the place of gathering. The synagogue may have originated in the Diaspora*; it was part of Jewish life at the time of Jesus and the early Christians.

Synecletica of Palestine (6th c.?). Daughter of a Constantinopolitan aristocrat, she fled an arranged marriage to become a hermit* in the Palestinian desert, exemplifying a common typological and hagiographical theme in the early monastic literary tradition. But her story as narrated by Silas, a monk, appears to be plausible and, at least in part, historical. Synecletica stands firmly within the tradition of the widows* and virgins* in the first four centuries of Christianity: as a female ascetic*, she detached herself from the world and its values and strengthened her attachment to God through seclusion and the study of Scripture.

TIM VIVIAN

Syncretism (etymologically, “to act as the Creans,” a Hellenistic way [Plutarch’s] of referring to the inclusion of foreign gods in one’s own pantheon) is the complex phenomenon by which two religious systems enter into contact with each other without becoming a complete synthesis and without being merely juxtaposed. According to the accepted understanding, syncretism involves the formation of a religious system out of the dialectic interactions of two religious systems, often in a situation of colonialism*.

Marzal (2002) identifies three types of syncretism: when Christian rituals are given an indigenous meaning; when indigenous rituals are given a Christian meaning; and when Christian rituals are accepted but new meanings are added to their original meaning. In Christian theology and pastoral practices, syncretism has traditionally been viewed as an “impure” and inappropriate expression of the Christian faith. But these negative connotations have been set aside in contemporary theologies of inculturation*. It is helpful to distinguish the process of syncretism from “syncretistic religions” and popular syncretistic practices.

The process of religious syncretism is intrinsic to the history of religions; through their constant intersections, religions are not simply fused with, or identified, with each other; rather, religions reinterpret themselves in terms of each other. Syncretism is primarily a cultural process combining symbols*, myths*, rituals, and embodiments (songs, dances, healing rituals).

Syncretism viewed as a creative synthesis or as a stigmatized contamination is in fact an indigenous phenomenon that is a part of local actors’ discourses and practices as they struggle for symbolic legitimacy (André Mary). Symbols, rituals, and signifying structures follow a logic different from that of Western rationalism and dualism. Symbolism evolves through “bricolage” (Lévi-Strauss), a popular do-it-yourself transformation of available symbols and rituals, quite different from the rational production of theology.

In Roman Catholicism, syncretism is very common in the different popular and local forms of Catholicism around the world. For example, in Latin America syncretism is different in Central America, Andean regions, and Afro-American communities.

In the Eastern Orthodox* tradition and in the Anglican Communion, one finds religious phenomena with syncretistic features in popular or colonial local settings (e.g. Russian popular* religions; religions in the Caribbean Islands). In Evangelical traditions, especially in Charismatic*/ Pentecostal* movements (which often claim to reject syncretism), one finds many syncretistic expressions most explicit in local syncretistic churches, such as the African* Instituted Churches, or in many local Charismatic/Pentecostal Latin American churches (see Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster).

Syncretism, a phenomenon found throughout the history of Christianity, is alive today. New forms of religious syncretism in the Two-thirds World and in highly modern contexts (e.g. in the form of New* Age Christianity) constantly generate new hybrid features. See also INCULTURATION CLUSTER; POPULAR CHRISTIAN PRACTICES CLUSTER; RELIGIONS AND CHRISTIANITY.

CRISTIÁN G. PARKER

Synod. See COUNCIL, SYNOD.

Synodikon of Orthodoxy, liturgical declaration of the Eastern Orthodox* faith, initiated after the triumph* of Orthodoxy ending the Iconoclastic* controversy. Recited each year on the first Sunday of Lent*, it condemns heretical positions and their advocates (added to as new controversies arise).

Synod of Jerusalem (1672). Convened by Dositheos*, patriarch of Jerusalem, this synod addressed in the name of traditional Orthodoxy the "Calvinist" Confession of 1629 attributed to Cyril Lucaris*. Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople (1620–37), had responded to intense missionary efforts by the Roman Catholic Church by exploring Protestant–Orthodox rapprochement, including the endorsement of a modern Greek version of the NT. In the decrees of the Synod, Lucaris's authorship of the "Calvinist" Confession is refuted, and Orthodox doctrine is stated in the "Confession of Dositheos," which affirms real presence in the Eucharist*, the theology of icons*, the seven (rather than two) sacraments*, and the infallibility* of the Orthodox Church, and rejects predestination*, salvation* by faith* alone, as well as the *Filioque. Modern scholarship has been unable to resolve the question of Lucaris's beliefs, but it is clear that this synod and its decisions marked the beginning of an anti-Protestant tendency in modern Orthodoxy.

KATHLEEN E. MCVEY

Synoptic Gospels, the Gospels of Matthew*, Mark*, and Luke*, so called because they can be viewed side by side ("syn-optically") in a three-column book called a "synopsis" for easy comparison, and because they have much material in common and often present it in the same order. When the three Synoptic Gospels are compared with the very different Gospel of John*, their close similarities cannot be accidental or explained by oral tradition. There is a literary connection between them. The problem is: Which one was the source on which the others are based? Which other source(s) do they have in common? A few scholars claim that Matthew came first, and that Luke used Matthew, and Mark came third as an abbreviation of Matthew and Luke (the "Griesbach theory"). But most contemporary scholars are convinced that the "two-source theory" provides the most probable explanation: Mark was written first and was used as a source for both Matthew and Luke; in addition Matthew and Luke used a common source – a collection of Jesus' sayings, which scholars designated as the "Q* source", that can be reconstructed by gathering all the passages that Matthew and Luke have in common and that are not found in Mark. Moreover, Matthew and Luke have used independent sources. See also LUKE, GOSPEL OF; MARK, GOSPEL OF; MATTHEW, THE GOSPEL OF; Q, A COLLECTION OF SAYINGS ASCRIBED TO JESUS.

DANIEL PATTE

Syria. Because Syria is halfway between East and West, Syrian Christianity was greatly influenced by both Greek and Semitic cultures. Syria's proximity to Palestine placed it at the forefront of the Christian movement. Paul was converted near Damascus (Acts 9); Eusebius claims that Peter was the bishop of Antioch. It was in Antioch that the followers of Jesus were first called "Christians*" (Acts 11:26) and that Ignatius* of Antioch (early 2nd c.) gave instructions concerning church administration, theology, and spirituality.

The school of Antioch* (from the 4th c.) began to formulate its own theology, following a literal and historical interpretation of the Bible and concentrating on the human aspect of Jesus, while the school of Alexandria followed allegorical exegesis and highlighted the divine aspect of Jesus. The two approaches led to conflicting Christologies*, Nestorianism* and Miaphysitism*, both subsequently condemned at the Council of Ephesus* (431) and the Council of Chalcedon* (451). The early 6th c. witnessed the rise and fall of Miaphysitism (rejected as Monophysitism*), followed by the imposition of the Chalcedonian doctrine, both through imperial interference. Two communities rose up: the Melkite* ("follower of the emperor") and the Syriac* Orthodox (later given the polemical nickname "Jacobite," after the 6th-c. Miaphysite* bishop Jacob* Baradai).

With obscure roots in the 2nd and 3rd c., an ascetic* movement marked by extremism was in evidence as early as the 4th c. A monasticism* that incorporated (and moderated) this extremism, along with Greek monastic models, emerged (late 4th c.) and has played essential roles at the ecclesiastical and community levels to this day. Stylitism*, introduced by Simeon* Stylites (386–459) near Aleppo, was practiced for several centuries in Syria and beyond. Ascetics were not secluded and involved themselves in the social and religious life of the church. Women among them actively participated in the public and individual lives of the Christian communities.

During the first centuries of Islam* (see Islam and Christianity Cluster: In the Middle East), Christians remained publicly prominent despite sporadic persecutions and forced conversions. They worked as administrators, translators, educators, and builders. As a sign of assimilation into Arabic society, Christian Arabic literature began to emerge with the work of Theodore Abu Qurra (8th c.); the Arabic translation of the Melkite liturgy was initiated as early as the 12th c.

During the Ottoman period (1516–1918), church hierarchies were integrated into the Empire's *millet system. Increasing contact with Christian Europe gave rise to Catholic branches of both Melkite and Syriac Orthodox churches, and the old and new churches became entangled in political relations between the Ottoman Empire and European states. Educated Syrian Christians launched a 19th-c. Arabic literary nahda ("renaissance") to forge a new, cross-confessional Arab national identity in the context of the modern state. These identities and their political implications remain significant to this day.

Statistics: Population (2000): 16.1 million (M). Christians, 1.3 M, 8% (various Orthodox, 0.8 M; various Roman Catholics, 0.32 M; independents, 0.1 M); Muslims (mostly Sunnis), 14.4 M, 89%; nonreligious, 0.47 M, 3%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

AMIR HARRAK

Syriac Catholic Church. In communion with Rome, the Syriac Catholic Church shares its basic theology with the Roman Catholic Church. Yet it also shares a linguistic, spiritual, and liturgical heritage with the Syriac* Orthodox Church, from which it emerged (18th c.).

The Syriac Catholic Church, like other Syriac churches, considers abstract theology irrelevant if it is not lived by the faithful. Thus its ancient and magnificent liturgy invites the phrase "living theology." The history* of salvation, from the annunciation* of the angel to Mary through every step in the life of Jesus to his ascension* to heaven, where he is seated at the right side of the Father, is solemnly celebrated in cyclical feasts, festivals, and commemorations throughout the year. The liturgical cycle culminates in the cornerstone of faith, the resurrection* of Jesus. The Holy Trinity is confessed in agreement with the Nicene* Creed, and the Son of God is called Lord and Savior, the greatest of all titles given to him. The "Mother of God" (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster: Theotokos) plays a major role in the history of salvation*, and thus is venerated in the liturgy and in numerous churches and shrines dedicated to her. Under the influence of the Syriac Church, Muslims revere Mariam Ana, Turkish for "Mother Mary," and some, especially in Iraq*, participate in the liturgy of the Assumption* (August 15).

Christian theological beliefs are conveyed to the faithful in the Church's rich liturgy in Syriac, which has been partially translated into Arabic for those who no longer understand Syriac. The liturgy consists of assigned readings from the Bible, recited commentaries (sedro, "orders"), and poetic hymns and melodies, which are lyrical, didactic, and always chanted. Most of these poems, written by Ephrem* the Syrian (306–73), contain theological information and warn the faithful of heresies*. Other poems were written by Jacob* of Sarug (451–521) and Balai (mid-5th c.). Additional liturgical elements derive from the ancient liturgies of Jerusalem and Antioch.

The faithful hold the liturgy in esteem and celebrate it publicly and collectively. Although the clergy presides over the liturgical prayers, the lay community is typically represented by large choirs of subdeacons, readers, psalmists, and nonordained participants of all ages. The entire liturgy, including the reading of the gospel, is sung, and the religious music follows the same conventions as Syrian secular music. Incense, musical instruments (cymbals and flabella), abstract art, and monumental Syriac inscriptions inside the church invite all participants to pray while learning theology.

AMIR HARRAK

Syriac Christianity, History of. See HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN THE MIDDLE EAST: SYRIAC CHRISTIANITY.

Syriac Orthodox Church, Universal. See ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL CLUSTER: SYRIAC ORTHODOX CHURCH, UNIVERSAL.

T

Tabernacle, temporary dwelling. In ancient Israel, the “Tent of Meeting” (Exod 25–31, 35–40), the place of communication between the Deity and Moses, the visible sign of the Deity’s presence among the people of Israel, the shrine that houses the Ark of the Covenant erected at Shiloh, then at Gibeon, before its placement inside the Temple* of Solomon. In Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and Anglican churches, an ornamented receptacle for the consecrated bread (host) and wine. Among Baptist and Charismatic churches, especially in Latin America, “Tabernacle” is often part of the name of a congregation.

Taché, Alexandre (1823–94). Born in Quebec into a Roman Catholic family, studied for the priesthood, joined (1844) the Missionary Oblates* of Mary Immaculate newly arrived from France. Taché undertook a 2,300-kilometer canoe journey to Red River (Canada’s Northwest, 1845), a wild territory. The young missionary became bishop (1853) of the Diocese of Saint-Boniface (today’s provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and the Yukon and Northwest Territories), organizing the arrival of Oblate missionaries, recruiting religious brothers and sisters, founding missions, schools, colleges, hospitals, and services for the poor, and playing a key role in political events in Canada’s Northwest. See also CANADA.

ROBERT CHOQUETTE

Taiwan. During occupations by the Dutch (1624–61) and Spanish (1626–42), Dutch Reformed and Spanish Roman Catholics came to the island; they left when the colonists were expelled by Chinese forces (1662). English Presbyterians (1865) and Spanish Dominicans (1859) established the current Presbyterian and Catholic churches in Taiwan. With the defeat of the Kuomintang (Chinese Nationalist Party) by the Communist Party in China (1949), refugees coming to Taiwan with the Nationalist government of China introduced other Christian denominations.

The Presbyterian Church in Taiwan, the main and oldest Protestant Church, illustrates the development of Christianity on the island.

1. During the “receiving period” (1865–1950), Taiwan was a “mission land”; the church was governed by Western missionary societies and related to Taiwanese people mainly through pastoral care and material provision.
2. The formative period (1951–70) formally began when the two synods of the Presbyterian Church in Taiwan formed the General Assembly (1951), officially bypassing the missionary societies (from Britain in the south; from Canada in the north) that governed the synods. Yet the Taiwanese Church had already assumed full responsibility for its mission, especially among indigenous (non-Chinese) people, since 1942, when foreign missionaries were expelled by the Japanese military government. By 1970 all 10 mountain peoples were heavily Presbyterian.
3. The social witness awakening period (1971–85) started with a “statement on our national fate” issued by the Presbyterian Church in response to martial law (1971, when the UN seat of the Republic of China [Taiwan] was given to the People’s Republic of China), which was followed by other social witness declarations, including one on human* rights, especially those of indigenous (non-Chinese) people. These statements advocating political self-determination extended the Church’s mission programs to include social witness and concerns, while calling attention to Taiwan’s internal and international problems.
4. The confessing faith period (since 1985) began with the first contextual confession of faith issued by the Presbyterian Church in Taiwan as a theological reflection on the relation of mission to social and political struggles (see Mission Cluster).

This contextualization of the Christian faith has not been fully shared either by those churches that emerged after 1949 (with different historical experiences) or by the independent churches that have arisen since the late 20th c. (whose members include “tribal people”). Most of the “mission churches” share the theological traditions of Western mainstream churches. Yet as social witness lost its momentum after the democratization of society (1990s), the Charismatic* Movement gained strength in many local churches.

Despite political and theological tensions, many denominations participate in the Taiwanese National Council of Churches (including the Roman Catholic Church), although many denominations keep their distance for theological and ideological reasons.

Statistics: Population (2001): 22.4 million (M). Christians, 0.57 M, 2.6% [or 1.4 M, 6.3%] (independents, 0.01 M [or 0.4 M]; Protestants (mostly Presbyterians), 0.37 M [or 0.4 M]; Roman Catholics 0.18 M [or 0.3 M]; Daoists, 0.8 M [or 2.2 M]; Buddhists, 0.2 M [or 4.7 M]; Muslims, 0.07 M [or 0.9 M]; Chinese folk religionists, the rest of the population, a majority. (Sources: Primary statistics: Department of Statistics, MOI, Taiwan, 2003 [focused on official membership in churches and religion]. Statistics in brackets: World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

HUANG PO HO

Taizé Community, founded (1940) by Roger Schutz (1915–2005) in Taizé, France. Here Protestant and Roman Catholic brothers (more than 100 brothers from many nations, as well as members of the Orthodox* Church on a semipermanent basis) endeavor daily to realize peace and reconciliation*.

Born in Switzerland, Roger, the son of a Protestant pastor, was particularly influenced by his maternal grandmother, who harbored refugees during World War I and who, while remaining faithful to her Protestant origins, attended Mass* and received Communion in the Roman Catholic Church, thus effecting inner reconciliation. Convinced of the need for a form of traditional monasticism* in which Protestants could participate, Roger began (1940) a life of gospel simplicity in Taizé, centered on thrice daily prayer, the Beatitudes, and the injunction “Be one . . . that the world may believe” (John 17:21). In 1949 the first seven brothers took their monastic vows.

In the vanguard of the ecumenical movement, Brother Roger established close relations with several popes, notably John* XXIII, who invited him to the Second Vatican* Council. When the Council’s ecumenical promise remained unfulfilled, Roger put increasing trust in his grandmother’s way of inner reconciliation.

Seeking to be close to the poor*, he took in Jewish refugees (1940s), then German prisoners of war, and subsequently others in need. Since the 1970s, small fraternities of brothers have shared the lives of the poor in different parts of the world.

For Roger and the Taizé community, God remains a mystery*, but what they grasp of the gospel must be tangibly expressed. The church is the presence of the resurrected Christ in the lives of humans, creating a communion, both hidden and visible. Reconciliation meant bringing together the separated members of this invisible and visible suffering body.

Taizé is a parable* of communion. Young people of all denominations flock there and to meetings held on every continent. John* Paul II described Taizé as a spiritual spring from which people may drink. They are then encouraged to become the “leaven of communion” in their own church communities. Taizé songs, in the tradition of the prayer* of repetition, sung in various languages to simple music and repeated until they lead to silence, are used in worship worldwide.

KATHRYN SPINK

Tall Brothers, four Egyptian monks who defended Origenism* against Theophilus* of Alexandria and were sheltered by John* Chrysostom of Constantinople.

Tamar (Gen 38). The story of Tamar is a good example of how the intensely patrilineal framework at times demands from its female characters an unexpected agency. The rather intricate narrative involving levirate marriage vindicates Tamar’s unorthodox and risky plot to steal from Judah what the law demands he give her – a child. Tamar is credited with having been Boaz’s ancestress, as well as David’s* (Ruth 4:12, 18–22), and the Gospel of Matthew* even includes her in Jesus’ genealogy.

NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Tamar (2 Sam 13). Within the walls of David’s house, Tamar is raped by her half-brother, Amnon. Initially lovesick for her, he despises her after the rape, and her most prominent characteristic from then on becomes shame. Tamar’s full brother, Absalom, avenges the rape by killing Amnon, but by then Tamar has been eclipsed in the narrative by the development of Absalom’s character. Compare the rape of Dinah in Gen 34, which also features brotherly revenge and a passive father.

NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Tanakh, Jewish abbreviation that refers to the Jewish Scriptures, formed from the initial letters of its three parts: Torah (Law), Nebiim (Prophets), and Ketubim (Writings). Tanakh forms the part of Christian Scriptures called the Old* Testament.

Tanzania. Christians comprise the largest religious faith community (c44% of Tanzania's population), followed by Muslims (c34%), African* Religionists (c20%), and members of smaller faith groups (mainly Eastern religions). Because of its large membership and its history, Christianity has considerable influence on the legal, social, and political structures and attitudes of Tanzanian society.

Economic, political, and religious factors contributed to the introduction of Christianity in Tanzania. When the Portuguese merchant Vasco da Gama arrived (1499) in Zanzibar (the island that, in 1964, joined Tanganyika to form the United Republic of Tanzania), he brought with him Portuguese Roman Catholic priests who tried to introduce Christianity. But because Zanzibar was predominantly Muslim, they failed. Moreover, trade, not conversion, was the primary aim of the Portuguese.

The mid-19th c. saw the direct introduction of Christianity into Tanzania. Protestant missionaries Johann L. Krapf* (1844) and later Johann Rebmann* (1847), under the aegis of the British Church Missionary Society, arrived in the Mombasa region, and Krapf visited Zanzibar (1844). Subsequently, Krapf became the first (1844–46) to translate the NT into Kiswahili – the lingua franca of Tanzania, which originated in the 13th c. through contact between coastal peoples and Arab traders and has since incorporated many new words from ethnic groups, English, and the world of science and technology. Krapf returned to Europe (1853), but Rebmann later visited the Kilimanjaro area in Northern Tanzania. Refused permission by the local authorities to travel farther inland, he returned north to the region of the Giriama (Mombasa) and concentrated on writing.

Roman Catholic missionaries soon followed. Holy Ghost Fathers settled in Zanzibar (1863) and Bagamoyo (1868). White* Fathers went to work around Lake Tanganyika and Lake Victoria (1878). Benedictine monks established missions in Dar es Salaam (1887) and moved southward to Peramiho and Ndanda, toward the Ruvuma River.

German and British imperial ambitions (late 19th–early 20th c.) constituted another factor in the development of Christianity in Tanzania. The Berlin* Conference (1884–85) conceded Tanganyika (now mainland Tanzania) to Germany as part of German East Africa. After Germany's defeat during World War I, the League of Nations transferred Tanganyika to British administration (1918). There is a historical link between Christianity and colonialism in Tanzania. Colonial administrations facilitated missionary work, granting missionaries (especially German and later British missionaries) freedom of movement and teaching, and helping them with moral and material support. Missionaries in turn collaborated with colonialists in pacifying often rebellious populations by their religious teaching. This made it difficult for many Tanzanians to distinguish between colonial and missionary intentions, often considering them one.

Later in the 20th c., there was a proliferation of African* Instituted Churches (AICs) and movements throughout the country, but especially in the regions around lakes Victoria, Tanganyika, and Nyasa. Most AICs are Christian communities that have features of African* Religion, and in some these are predominant.

Nondenominational Pentecostal* or Charismatic* assemblies are also increasing, mostly in urban centers. They attract many followers, mainly from the mainline churches. Most Pentecostal/Charismatic groups seem to be transitory, holding occasional large, open-air prayer sessions for faith healing* and then moving on to a new locale, because their goal is to bring about a revival* in existing churches rather than to establish new churches. Among those that have become institutionalized, many are inspired and aided by foreign groups, although they often have local leadership.

AICs have always used indigenous symbols* in their teaching and worship. However, inculturation* as a deliberate process of expressing Christianity in African religious language and content is new in the mainstream churches and is often resisted by older generations of leaders and laity who prefer earlier missionary models of the church.

After independence (mainland, 1961; Zanzibar, 1963), church leadership gradually became indigenous. The politics of African socialism, or Ujamaa (a moral and ethical system derived from African cultural and humanist values aimed at bringing about justice* and equality), was suspected by Christian leaders of being Marxist. Yet Tanzania's founding father, Julius K. Nyerere, forced the churches to include economic self-reliance in their pastoral policies, resulting in an emphasis (in Roman Catholicism) on Small Christian Communities.

Mainline Christian churches provide social services. From the beginning, missionaries built education* and health* facilities at or near places of worship. Some churches currently own and run several universities. Among the medical facilities most important are the Lutheran Kilimanjaro Christian Medical Centre (Moshi) and the Catholic Bugando referral hospital (Mwanza). Attached to both are medical university colleges.

Many AICs are “dissident” groups, separated from the mainline churches or from one another, often because of disputes involving leadership or doctrine. Others are original creations, claiming to be based on direct divine inspiration or intervention. Some are very small, while others are large. Most are Bible based and interpret Scripture* “literally*” (in a fundamentalist* way, according to their critics) or (more descriptively) “contextually”: they read the Bible in the context of local African cultures, circumstances, and experiences. Thus in contrast to the mission churches, they are in the forefront of inculturation*. All Christian churches in Tanzania accept the authority of the Bible, although they interpret it differently and their teachings differ. In Roman Catholicism, the authority to interpret the Bible and to teach is concentrated in the bishops. Protestantism and AICs allow individuals to interpret the Bible in ways that help their faith (see Bible Interpretation Cluster: In Africa).

Since the 1980s, because of the worldwide growth of fundamentalism*, relations between Christians and Muslims in Tanzania’s urban centers have been tense, where previously there was harmony. There is a growing perception among Muslims that Tanzanian administrations since independence have defended Christian religious interests at the expense of Muslims’ religious, political, and social rights (see Islam and Christianity Cluster: In Africa).

Politically, the Christian churches have suspected the Ujamaa socialist ideology, whose proponents have governed Tanzania since 1967, of being atheistic and communist. Christianity has thus unwittingly contributed to the failure of Ujamaa and facilitated the process of globalization (which Ujamaa resisted) even as it has decried some of its effects.

Occasionally, Christian church leaders gather to pray together or Christians and Muslims meet for discussions, but serious ecumenical* and interreligious dialogue*, contact, and practical cooperation among them are minimal. Mainstream churches do not as yet acknowledge AICs as “full churches,” because they lack the material resources, recognized leadership, and theological education that their counterparts enjoy and provide.

Inculturation and ecumenism are two important theological and pastoral issues for Christianity in Tanzania: How can Christian unity be achieved and peace maintained between religions? How can Christianity in Tanzania become truly Tanzanian in character and identity? Corruption and HIV/AIDS are serious ethical issues. AIDS kills numerous people in Tanzania. It raises the question of prophylactics: Is the use of condoms moral in certain circumstances? Roman Catholicism, for example, completely rules it out. Efforts to eliminate corruption, so detrimental to justice* and human* rights but so endemic in Tanzanian society, have so far not succeeded.

Statistics: Population (2002): 35 million (rural, 76.9%; urban, 23.1%). Census by religious affiliation is not permitted in Tanzania. Estimates (2000): Christians, 44% (Roman Catholics, 24%; Protestants, 16%; Anglicans, 6%; members of African Instituted Churches, 2%; doubly affiliated, 4%); Muslims, 35%; African Religionists, 20%; others, 1%. (Estimate based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001, and local churches’ reports.)

LAURENTI MAGESA

Taoism and Christianity. See DAOISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

Targum (Heb “translation”). Rabbinic translation of the HB into Aramaic originated in synagogue services where the biblical texts were first read in Hebrew and then, as a prelude to the homily, translated, clarified, and explained for the congregations in Aramaic – the vernacular in the ancient Near East from the postexilic period (Ezra*) to the early Middle Ages. Such translations were recorded and exist for almost all the books of the HB. They are an important source of early Jewish interpretations of the Bible, often comparable to Midrash*.

Tatian (2nd c.), Christian Apologist*. Born in Syria, he studied Greek rhetoric and philosophy, was a student of Justin* Martyr in Rome, and returned to Syria (c170). He was the founder of the ascetic* movement of the Encratites*, as well as the author of an apology that fiercely attacked Greek culture* and noted the achievements of the Syrian region. He also compiled the Diatessaron, a harmony of the four Gospels, long used in the Syrian Church.

Tauler, Johannes (c1300–61), German Dominican mystic*. He was influenced by Eckhart* and the Neoplatonism* of the followers of Albertus* Magnus in the Rhineland. When Strasbourg was under interdict, he went to Basel (1338–39), where he was associated with the Friends of God, a movement in the tradition of Eckhart. A noted preacher, his sermons were so widely circulated that many spurious works were attributed to him. He had a major influence on German spirituality, Protestant as well as Roman Catholic, and on Spanish writers through a Latin translation of his sermons.

Tausen, Hans (1494–1561), prominent theologian of the Danish Reformation, Lutheran bishop of Ribe (1541). Initially belonging to the order of St. John, he completed studies of theology at the universities of Rostock, Copenhagen, Leuven, and Wittenberg (1516–24). Highly influenced by the new Lutheran theology, he was known as a skilled preacher and later became one of the first Lutheran ministers in Denmark (1526). As a minister, royal chaplain, and professor, he argued fiercely against the Roman Catholic Church, publishing extensively on the Lutheran* faith, especially regarding pastoral matters. He was ordained bishop of Ribe by Johannes Bugenhagen.

CARSTEN SELCH JENSEN

Teaching Authority. See AUTHORITY IN/OF THE CHURCH.

Teaching as Christian Practice. See EDUCATIONAL PRACTICES AS CHRISTIAN SERVICE CLUSTER; THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION CLUSTER.

Technology and Christianity. From philosophy – including the work of Heidegger*, who pointed out that the matter of technology is not merely technological – to sociology, since the early 20th c. no field of inquiry has been broached without some reference to the so-called technological revolution and its impact on life, including the origin and goal of life.

Technology's relation to religion* has been largely ignored, but there have been notable exceptions. Long ago Emerson* dared to speak of a concordance between the machine and Transcendentalism*. The mid-20th c. cardinal Daniélou defiantly stated that nothing was more biblical than technology. Indeed, technology has contributed to many a religious paradigm and calls for a new type of religiosity. Envisioning the church* in a technological civilization demands that we ponder technology.

Role of Technology in Cultural Revolutions. While no one ever spoke of a “natural” civilization, today we commonly speak of a “technological” civilization, regardless of whether it is hailed or decried. In the past, cultural* revolutions were triggered by religion*. The technological revolution seems to have overtaken that role and overshadows many aspects, ethical or spiritual, of our heritage, cultural as well as religious. Who am I when someone else's heart beats in me?

Human Fragility. The Bible affirms the original goodness of creation*. Whether that goodness is extended to nature is a moot question. “Natural human” is by and large consonant with “sinful* human.” Technology does not make us less sinful, and never was meant to. Yet technology does make us more aware of either the fragility of nature or the ambiguities of human nature, as Hans Jonas poignantly pointed out and as Karl Jaspers* also said, though less obsessively.

Technology: Religious Phenomenon or Religiously Neutral? Technology is a method – “the totality of methods rationally arrived at and having absolute efficiency... in every field of human activity” (Ellul). Somewhat ominously this definition rests on the distinction between “efficiency” and “efficacy,” technical efficiency replacing the efficacy of grace* proclaimed by Christianity. But this distinction is questionable. A proper understanding of technology and its assessment require concepts quite different from those of the very science* that in part brought it about (Prigogine and Stengers). Technology expands the human capacity for expressing the inexpressible (see Apophaticism) and for self-expression as well, yet without assigning any particular end, much less helping the human being to be human. An ensemble of means, technology can offer only means. Not unlike nature, technology is neutral, as Tillich* wisely, though not consistently, admits (while Heidegger refrains from saying it and Ellul strongly denies it).

Humanization of What Is Foreign to the Human. Technology is a tool, though not a mere tool. It is a machine, but not merely a machine. It is a system in quest of an instrument for its own eventual implementation. It exposes us to further choices between life and death*, imposing neither. A tool extends the human being. A machine, although it estranges the human being from what it means to be human, also calls for the overcoming of this estrangement if only because it does not necessarily alienate from humanness. Technology neither dehumanizes society nor depersonalizes human beings. It humanizes that which is still foreign to the human. Rather than growing wings or a shell, human beings build airplanes or houses.

In humanizing that which is alien to being human, technology is also a tool to humanize the human being. When lips move to form words, there may be a shift from tool to cybernetics and artificial intelligence (as when an oral command is recognized by a phone or a computer) – from tool to techne (way of life, mode of being) as the technique through which the human being can become human, can be that which the human is not yet, and can humanize that which is not yet humanized. Then, indeed, nothing is more biblical than technology.

Centuries ago Aristotle* was already defining the hand as an instrument of instruments. The human being – body* and soul*, flesh and spirit – is itself the instrument of technology, shaped by and shaping technology. In triggering cultural revolutions, technology has contributed to many a religious paradigm. Technological civilization does not mark the end of religion but calls for a new type of religiosity. See also DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY; SECULARISM AND SECULARIZATION.

GABRIEL VAHANIAN

Te Deum, Latin hymn praising God the Father and Christ the King of Glory, sometimes called the Ambrosian Hymn, now the chief hymn of rejoicing and thanksgiving in the Roman Catholic Church.

Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre (1881–1955), Jesuit*, priest, scientist (geology, paleontology, anthropology), theologian, philosopher, spiritual writer, futurist. His writings were collected in 10 scientific volumes, 13 philosophical/religious volumes, and 15 volumes of letters.

Born in central France, Teilhard entered the Jesuit order in 1899. Anticlerical laws forced the Jesuits and other religious to leave France (1901). The papal condemnation of Modernism* (rejecting “the subjecting of everything to the laws of evolution*” and the new biblical* criticism) set the tone for Roman Catholic theology during the whole of Teilhard’s life. Teilhard was ordained a Roman Catholic priest in England (1911). His studies in geology and human fossils with Marcellin Boule in Paris were interrupted by service in World War I, during which he developed his basic religious ideas.

After completing his doctorate, he went to China (1923), where he and another Jesuit were the first to find traces of prehistoric humans. He was the geologist for the group that found the Peking Man fossils; he spoke at many international conferences and worked on other scientific projects until he left China (1946). He visited South Africa (1951, 1953) and did much to bring world opinion to recognize that the human race originated in Africa, not Asia. Because of the originality of his religious ideas, Church authorities did not allow Teilhard to publish his theological writings (his scientific works were not restricted). Following his death (New York City, 1955), friends arranged for the publication of his religious/philosophical works. These quickly gave him a large popular following.

Teilhard saw that the radical changes in cosmology (e.g. evolution*, relativity, the age and size of the universe) that occurred in his lifetime called for a new theology. He was very much a scientist and personally devout. He told of two stars that once pulled him in opposite directions: one was the world of matter known through science, the other was the Christian God known through revelation*. With his scientific understanding of evolution, he demonstrated that matter rose through the levels of life into the human sphere, where matter became spirit. His theological study of the Pauline letters (especially Colossians* and Ephesians*) showed him that Christ* is the one in whom all things hold together. Ephesians speaks of Christ descending into the lower parts of the earth so that, rising from there, he might fill all things (Col 1:17; Eph 4:9–10). Because of such passages, Teilhard would speak of the cosmic body of Christ. Thus for him, the two stars converged with Christ, uniting and filling all things much as the human soul* unites with and fills the human body.

Teilhard saw evolution as the process by which the world is becoming a suitable body for the divine Soul. Our ordinary human actions can lead to building the infrastructure of the body of Christ. Developing these ideas while active in World War I, he was also aware of the failure, suffering*, and death that are part of life and evolution. He followed Jean-Pierre de Caussade, SJ, who saw all things (weal and woe) coming to us from the “Hand of God,” and was also influenced by Henri Bergson*, John Henry Newman*, Maurice Blondel*, and Edouard Le Roy.

Roman Catholic authorities had difficulties with his claims that the story of Adam* and Eve* is a parable* of the human condition and not a historical event, and that humans did not descend from a single couple – both points now fairly common in Roman Catholic theology. Some Catholic critics considered his thought pantheistic*; others were concerned about the minimal place he accorded to sin* and redemption*. Yet all recognized his personal devotion. His statements calling for the development of the secular* world did much to reorient Catholic thought.

Many have noted his influence at the Second Vatican* Council, especially in the document “The Church and the Modern World.” John* Paul II and Cardinal Ratzinger (now Benedict XVI) quoted him with approval. Several Liberation* theologians appealed to him. In the 1960s–1970s, he was much discussed in popular culture. U Thant, then secretary general of the UN, sponsored several UN conferences on his thought. His ideas on globalization* and politics were picked up by Marshall McLuhan, Kenneth Boulding, Michel Camdessus, and Sargent Shriver.

In The Phenomenon of Man (or The Human Phenomenon), Teilhard reflects on the stages of evolution to show that many souls* increasingly become (more like) one soul, and thus the world is increasingly animated by a single Soul; the Epilogue suggests that this Soul is Christ. In The Divine Milieu, a spiritual guide for such a world, he presents both a spirituality of growth and one of diminishment or death. In his most popular essay, “The Mass* on the World” (collected in The Heart of Matter), Teilhard proposes that the bread* symbolizes growth and the wine* symbolizes diminishment; when these are consecrated, they lead to a recognition that each moment in our life is a moment of Communion*. See also KINGDOM OF GOD, CONCEPT OF, CLUSTER: IN THE EASTERN ORTHODOX TRADITION: KINGDOM AND WILDERNESS; SCIENCE AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.

THOMAS M. KING, SJ

Teleology, Teleological Argument. Aristotle* is the classic exponent of the view that all things, physical and biological, act for an “end” (Gk telos). His general principle was that each kind of thing acts when “form” (natural or mental) gives rise to the appropriate inclinations and actions. Thomas Aquinas* made the “teleological argument” the fifth and final argument for God’s existence: if all things act for an end, they must have their source in some intellect that acts purposively and is implicitly the end toward which all things move. The classic Aristotelian–Thomist argument emphasizes “internal teleology,” which is also emphasized by Process* theology. During the 18th c., there were many “arguments from design,” emphasizing an “external teleology,” focusing on interrelationships – the adaptation of things to each other and their environment. Teleology is also an important, though frequently overlooked, component of covenant*, election*, vocation*, justification*, predestination*, and salvation*.

Televangelism and Western Culture. Evangelicals* in the USA developed “TV evangelism” during the 1950s–1980s. Using commercial and religious TV channels, satellites, cable, and local broadcast stations, they further distributed programs in Europe, Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

Televangelism’s success in the USA required Evangelicals to adapt their presentations to existing TV genres. While other Christian traditions feared secular cooptation – such as Christian fare that was mere entertainment, self-help teaching, or disguised political propaganda – Evangelicals tried everything from religious soap operas and talk shows to musical extravaganzas and evangelistic worship services (see Media and Christian Worship) patterned after 18th- to 19th-c. revivals*.

Nevertheless, these programs converted relatively few viewers while attracting overwhelmingly Evangelical audiences. They also came under fire from other Christian groups and from non-religious viewers, who claimed that TV evangelists were self-promoting hucksters and right-wing ideologues. Some of the most popular televangelists formed political movements; M. G. “Pat” Robertson ran unsuccessfully as a Republican for president of the USA. Even after a series of major sexual and financial scandals involving televangelists, many Evangelicals remained hopeful about using TV to convert the world.

As Evangelical TV ministries exported their programming to other countries, indigenous groups and national governments complained that the shows had a stronger US flavor than a Christian one. Canada and some European governments banned religious broadcasting, but the privatization of formerly publicly owned broadcast systems in many parts of the Western world opened up opportunities for foreign Evangelicals to purchase airtime. Latin American broadcasters, in particular, welcomed North American program revenues, which eventually contributed to the Protestantization and perhaps the politicization of parts of Central and South America.

Televangelism is a distinctly US form of mass evangelism that adapts Christianity to popular culture (see Popular Christian Practices Cluster), seems to be more successful religiously where Western culture is predominant, and regularly comes under fire for moral and political if not theological abuse of Christianity. See also MEDIA AND CHRISTIANITY.

QUENTIN J. SCHULTZE

Temperance Movement (1784–1933), organized efforts to moderate or eliminate the consumption of alcoholic beverages. Such attempts have existed sporadically in history but became widespread in North America and the UK in the 19th–early 20th c. The start of the modern movement is associated with Dr. Benjamin Rush’s study (1784) that linked excessive use of alcohol with health problems, and with the Second Great* Awakening (early 1800s). Numerous organizations were founded to promote the cause, including the American Temperance Society (1826), the Order of Good Templars (1851), the Woman’s Christian Temperance Union (1874), and the Anti-Saloon League (1895). Some temperance advocates favored moderation; others promoted total abstinence. Strategies varied, ranging from an emphasis on moral suasion in the early years, to research and education, and finally to governmental prohibition and enforcement. The movement crested with the Eighteenth Amendment (1920) to the U.S. Constitution, which outlawed the manufacture, transport, and sale of alcoholic beverages, and ended with the Twenty-first Amendment (1933), which repealed the earlier prohibition.

By the 1840s and 1850s, increasing emphasis was placed on political and legislative action, making it more difficult for women to participate without the right to vote. In the “Woman’s Crusade” of 1873–74, women marched into saloons to pray and exhort owners to stop selling alcohol. From this point on, women claimed a dominant role in the Temperance Movement and increasingly associated temperance reform with woman suffrage. The movement was especially popular among Protestant Evangelicals*, who regarded intemperance as a matter of personal sin*, a barrier to the development of a Christian nation and to the success of the Kingdom* of God on earth. Advocates of temperance were frequently ridiculed as self-righteous, hypocritical, and ideologically naive. Women who participated in these efforts were accused of inappropriate or “unwomanly” behavior beyond their proper sphere. Temperance leaders, especially Frances Willard*, countered that the work was appropriate to woman’s role as moral guardian of the home and family*. Greatly influenced by the leadership of Willard, Susan B. Anthony*, and Carry A. Nation, the movement was catalytic in enlarging white, middle-class women’s public involvement in US society.

The achievements of the Temperance Movement demonstrate the potential for social and legislative change as a result of concerted grassroots efforts. Although it clashed with the values of some social, religious, and ethnic communities, the movement raised international awareness about the causes, effects, prevention, and treatment of alcoholism. See also ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS (AA).

WENDY J. DEICHMANN EDWARDS

Temple, an enclosed space dedicated to the worship of a deity and containing holy objects for such worship. In the ancient Near East and the Greco-Roman world, nearly all religions had temples for sacrificial worship. Israel’s worship in the wilderness took place at the “Tent of Meeting” (or Tabernacle*), until the Temple was built in Jerusalem on Mount Zion* by Solomon*; under Josiah* it became the only place of sacrifice. It was destroyed by the Babylonians (586 BCE), rebuilt under the Persians (from 520 BCE), and then built on a grander scale under Herod (the “Second Temple,” c20 BCE).

As the dwelling place of God on earth, the Temple made God accessible (1 Kgs 8:27–53). At the center of Solomon’s empire, the Temple had an important religious symbolic role as the place where heaven and earth converge and from which God controls the universe (as Psalms of the Temple and Zion celebrate). The sacredness of the Temple, which was centered on the Holy of Holies, the altar*, sacrifice*, and the priesthood, conveyed the sense of divine nearness and was associated with both physical and moral purity. The Temple also had a political function, giving legitimacy to the monarchy and its rule, and an economic function. With its treasuries, it was a kind of national bank that held, besides precious cultic objects, the tributes of people conquered and taxes; as a sacred space off-limits to most people, it offered the best security. Thus the destruction of the Temple was also the loss of political and economic autonomy; the reconstructions (c520, c20 BCE) were efforts to reverse this loss in the contexts of Persian and Roman rule as well as to reestablish the religious symbolism.

While Jesus and the earliest Christians continued to worship in the Temple, there was an undercurrent of criticism of the “Temple made with hands” (Mark 14:58; Heb 9:11, 24). Parallel themes are found in the Qumran* community’s view that the holy community was itself the true Temple (also Eph 2:21–22) and in the suggestion of Philo* and the Hellenists* in the early church that the Tent of Meeting was an image of the heavenly “pattern” seen by Moses (Acts 7:44; cf. Exod 25:9, 40). For several centuries, all Christian groups avoided the language of altars and priests*; subsequently, these terms gained a new Christian meaning. Similarly, these groups spoke of the building used for worship as the “house of the church,” only occasionally speaking of it as a temple.

Curiously, the term “temple” came to be used in French, Italian, Hungarian, and Brazilian Portuguese for Protestants’ houses of worship, while “church” was used for Roman Catholic buildings. It seems that Protestants used it on the grounds that God can be worshipped anywhere “in spirit and in truth” (John 4:23) or that the true temple is the community of the faithful. See also HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

EUGENE TESELLE and
DANIEL PATTE

Temptation (from Heb, Gk, and Lat words for “testing” or “trying”). Usually understood as “enticement to sin*,” temptation can also call one to prove one’s resistance to sin. God is often said to test persons’ fidelity; Satan* has the function of testing, then of accusing. But it is improper to test God (Deut 6:16; cf. Matt 4:7 = Luke 4:12). Adam*, who was tested and failed (Gen 3), is contrasted with Christ, who was tested in the wilderness (Mark 1:13, par.), in Gethsemane* (Mark 14:32–42, par.), and on the cross* (Matt 27:40–44; cf. Matt 4:3) but did not yield. In common Christian terminology, “temptation” usually leads to a negative result; “testing” (e.g. testing of martyrs*) to a positive result.

Ten Commandments, Decalogue (Gk), also referred to as the Ten Words (Jewish usage). The central commandments of the Torah*, revealed to Moses* on Mount Sinai (Exod 20:1–17; Deut 5:6–21). In Exodus the listing includes the neighbor’s wife among the neighbor’s property; thus the “second table” of obligations to human beings includes six commandments and the “first table” of obligations to God includes four. This listing was followed by the Calvinist tradition and is the most common today. The version in Deuteronomy, adopted by Augustine, the Roman Catholic Church, and Luther, distinguishes between the neighbor’s wife and the neighbor’s property; thus the “second table” includes seven commandments, and the “first table” three.

Frequent references to individual commandments confirm the centrality of this fluid moral code in Jesus’ preaching according to the Gospels. Jesus’ readiness to reinterpret precepts like the Sabbath empowered subsequent Christian modifications, emphasizing love* as the supreme expression of human morality in faith*-motivated ethics (Paul) and catechetical instruction. Pliny* observed (c100 CE) a baptismal oath that called on believers not to commit theft, robbery, adultery, or perjury or betray trust, thus reiterating the Decalogue’s last five commandments.

To graft the Decalogue onto the life of Christians, theologians synthesized, allegorized, and rephrased the commandments in terms of Jesus’ sayings. Thus for Irenaeus*, the essence of Christian life is living not according to the verbosity of the Law* but rather according to the brevity of faith that teaches love of God and neighbors. For Clement* of Alexandria, the Ten Words symbolized Jesus; honoring father meant honoring God; adultery meant abandoning the true knowledge of Christianity. Origen* associated the 10 plagues of Egypt with the Ten Commandments since the law of Law, like the plagues, reproves and corrects the world. Thus the Decalogue emerged as an ongoing revelation* of moral concerns affecting one’s relations with God and other Christians. HAGITH SIVAN

Terce, Sext, None, third, sixth, and ninth hours, respectively, as distinct parts of the Divine* Office, observed in the early church, especially in the monastic* movement.

Teresa of Ávila (1515–82), monastic* reformer, mystic*, theologian, doctor of the Roman Catholic Church. One of history’s most beloved mystics, Teresa of Ávila’s life spanned the Golden Age of Spain* and the intensity of the Roman Catholic Counter* Reformation period. Author of numerous books, including the classic mystical text The Interior Castle, Teresa was a creative force to be reckoned with in an era that was not entirely hospitable to spirituality.

Born in Ávila to a merchant class family of conversos (her grandfather Juan Sanchez was prosecuted in Toledo as a “judaizer”), Teresa received an education at the Augustinian convent of Santa María de la Gracia. She joined the Carmelite* order (1535) but left the Convent of the Incarnation several times because of illness. On her sickbed, she began to read spiritual classics and engage in prayer more deeply. She experienced a spiritual conversion (c1554) and sought a structure that would support her desire for contemplative* prayer, a discipline that would, in turn, support the apostolic life of the Church. Teresa initiated the reform of the Discalced* Carmelites by founding the Convent of San José (1562), which exemplified the cloistered life of women recognized by the decrees of the Council of Trent* (promulgated in Spain in 1564). She wrote The Book of Her Life (1562, 1565), an account of her prayer practice, and The Way of Perfection (1565, 1568) to encourage women in their practice of contemplative prayer. She consulted numerous spiritual directors, including Francis Borgia (1555), Peter of Alcántara (1560), and John* of Ávila (1568), all of whom encouraged her to pursue her way of prayer.

Teresa recruited John* of the Cross to join the Discalced reform (1568); he began a male wing of the order and eventually became the spiritual director of the Carmelite nuns at the Incarnation. As John nurtured the spiritual growth of these nuns, Teresa began placing them in Discalced convents she founded throughout Spain. Thus the two of them accomplished a major spiritual renewal in Spain, a revivification of the medieval mystical tradition despite deep contemporary suspicion of mental prayer. Inquisitional review of The Book of Her Life, which had been circulating quietly in manuscript form, resulted in its confiscation by the Spanish Inquisition* (1575); it was never returned to Teresa. However, subsequent investigation by the Spanish Inquisition of the charge of alumbradismo (“illumism,” or false mysticism) (1575–76) and her exoneration led Teresa to believe that she had an experiential wisdom to share with others, especially women who lacked a theological vocabulary to defend the authenticity of their experiences of God. Immediately afterward, she wrote a definitive description of the mystical life, The Interior Castle (1577), widely recognized as a unique subjective account of mystical union but also increasingly appreciated as a theological work in its own right.

Teresa oversaw the foundation of 17 Discalced Carmelite convents before her death; colorful accounts of this massive endeavor, as well as insights into her shrewd administrative capacity, are contained in her Book of the Foundations and her prolific correspondence. Her works were collected and edited by Luis de Leon, published (1588), and became an influential source of spiritual wisdom, leading to her canonization (1622) and declaration as the “Doctor of Prayer” (1970), one of three female doctors of the Roman Catholic Church. In an age preoccupied with a catechetical approach to Christianity, Teresa invited her contemporaries to enter into the reality of God through prayer and thereby to experience theological truth. Because she was so deeply committed to the sacramental* life of the Church and a strict monastic life of prayer, she was able to speak authoritatively from her own experience, literally opening up her inner life as a guidebook for other spiritual seekers (see Prayer of the Heart). The frankness and familiarity of her writing style, which reflects a committed mystical discipline, make her a timeless spiritual teacher. But her writings also convey deep theological insights – insights into the Incarnation*, the hypostatic union, and the inner life of the Trinity* – all of which she makes real by speaking with an intimate knowledge of God. The authority of her experience rings true even today; she is a consummate teacher of the Christian mystical tradition.

GILLIAN T. W. AHLGREN

Teresa of Calcutta (1910–97), founder of the Roman Catholic congregation of the Missionaries of Charity (MC); “Mother” of the poor*; acclaimed a living saint*; Nobel Peace Prize laureate (1979); beatified 2003. Born Agnes Gonxha Bojaxhiu in Skopje, Macedonia, of Albanian parents; Loreto sister and teacher in India (1928–48). Called to serve God among the poorest of the poor (1946), she successively founded the MC Sisters in Calcutta (1951), the MC Brothers (1967), MC contemplative branches (1976, 1978), MC Fathers (1984), Lay MCs (1984), and the ecumenical Association of Co-workers (1969).

Her congregation, founded in the wake of the atrocities of the partition of India, is characterized by rigorous poverty and discipline. Her Roman Catholicism reflected her Eastern Bloc origins, and she welcomed Vatican* II’s renewal of the Church but not individual laxity. Contact with the materially rich West led her to see spiritual poverty as more problematic than physical deprivation, and she used her growing international influence and attention in the media not only to intercede for peace* but also to uphold family* life and voice conservative objections shared with Pope John Paul II to abortion*, the ordination* of women, and feminism*.

She took literally Matt 25:35–40. Christ “thirsted” in the broken bodies of the poor and simultaneously offered himself as spiritual sustenance in the Eucharist so that this thirst might be satiated. Because in tending to the dying, leprous, or abandoned she was touching Christ, love* was of primary importance. Like Thérèse* of Lisieux, she advocated doing small things with great love. With Francis* of Assisi, she sought to be a channel of God’s peace.

Her mission, despite her orthodoxy, reflected supreme tolerance and respect for God’s presence in every human. The worldwide response to her mission showed faith* to be at its most articulate in action. Revealed only after her death, her inner life was nonetheless marked by a sense of separation from God and an increasing longing for God’s love. Through this “darkness,” she was led to deeper union with God, participating in Jesus’ thirst, his longing for love, and sharing the desolation of the poor. Posthumously she offered hope for the doubtful.

KATHRYN SPINK

Tertiary. See THIRD ORDER AND TERTIARY.

Tertullian, Quintus Septimius Florens (c150/60–c225/30), African theologian. The son of a centurion and raised as a pagan, he was well educated, and some have identified him with the Tertullian known in Roman law. After becoming a Christian (before 197), he wrote apologetic works, including Ad nationes (To the nations) and Apologeticum, and was one of the first to write a polemic adversus Judaeos (against the Jews). He was probably the author of The Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas*, and he may have been involved in the translation of Irenaeus* into Latin and of the Old* Latin version of the Bible from the Septuagint*. His Prescription against Heretics follows Irenaeus* in arguing that the apostolic churches alone have the right to interpret Scripture*. In several works, he attacked Marcion*, the Gnostics*, and others whose work he regarded as heresies*. His work Against Praxeas shaped the doctrine of the Trinity* in the West, arguing against modalism* and using the language of “one substance” and “three persons.” Several writings on the Christian mode of life urge separation from pagan society, and his position became more rigorous after he joined the Montanist* Movement. His Latin style is vigorous, complex, and rhetorically effective, although he is often unfair to his opponents. He became the “father of Latin theology,” admired by Cyprian* and influential among later theologians even when they took different positions; something of his temperament may be reflected in the Donatists* and in the North African doctrine of original* sin.

EUGENE TESELLE

Testament, formal declaration of what a person wishes to be done after his or her death or departure on a long journey (e.g. Paul’s address to the Ephesian elders in Acts 20). While the NT term diatheke can mean both “testament” and “covenant,” the former sense is unilateral, the latter mutual; thus in discussing predestination*, theologians in the Reformed* tradition sometimes differentiated between a unilateral testament and a mutual covenant. In NT texts, diatheke is usually understood as “covenant” (“my blood of the covenant,” Mark 14:24 = Matt. 26:28; “the new covenant in my blood,” Luke 22:20; cf. 1 Cor 11:25; 2 Cor 3:6). Thus Old and New “Testaments” refer to the old and new “covenants” (although Calvin*, Barth*, and possibly Augustine* envision one covenant in two dispensations or testaments). Yet Jesus’ parting words (e.g. John 14–17; Acts 1:7–8) are sometimes called his testament. The Deutero-Pauline Pastoral* Epistles have the character of a testament, laying down “Paul’s” expectations for doctrine, church order, and morality in epistles that represented him as being in danger of death (2 Tim 4:16–18); the same can be said of the letters of Ignatius*, which he wrote while on his way to trial and death in Rome. The testament of Francis* of Assisi, written shortly before his death, reaffirmed his original ideal of poverty and gave support to the Spirituals* as against the Conventual Franciscans* in coming decades. See also COVENANT.

Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, OT pseudepigraphon that presents the patriarchs of the tribes of Israel delivering their last words on their deathbeds. Moral lessons are drawn from history, and the “future” (from the perspective of the patriarchs) is predicted, including the salvific work of a messiah, i.e. Jesus Christ. In their present form, the Testaments are Christian; a Jewish pre-Christian stage has been surmised but is difficult to prove. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA.

JOHANNES TROMP

Tetragrammaton, four-letter Hebrew name of God* (YHWH), pronounced “Yahweh.” Some time after the Exile, the divine name ceased to be pronounced; its four consonants continued to be written, but the term Adonai (my Lord) was substituted in reading. The Massoretes* added the vowel points for Adonai under the consonants YHWH. During the Reformation, Calvin* and others, taking these literally, inaccurately pronounced the divine name “Jehovah.” Today, given that any pronunciation of the divine name is offensive to Jews, most Christian Bibles translate the tetragrammaton “the Lord,” often in full capital letters, instead of using “Yahweh,” and scholarly literature uses “YHWH” without translation. See also GOD, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF: NAMES FOR GOD IN THE BIBLE AND CHURCH TRADITIONS; YHWH.

Teutonic Knights. The Hospital of St. Mary of the Teutons, commonly known as the Teutonic Knights, is a military*-religious order originally founded as a field hospital during the Third Crusade* (1189–92). It was soon converted to a military order that served God by defending Christians and Christian territory in battle, while still operating hospices for the care of the sick, its central activity today.

From the 1230s, the Teutonic Knights sought new opportunities to defend Latin Christians on the frontiers against the non-Christian peoples of Eastern Europe, by conquering and converting the peoples of Prussia, Livonia (Latvia* and Estonia*), and Lithuania*. In 1309 they moved their headquarters to Prussia. After their great defeat at Tannenberg/Grunwald (1410) by the forces of Poland*-Lithuania, the Knights’ territorial power dwindled. They continued to engage in military activity while serving the German emperors, initially against the Ottoman Turks and later against the Christian enemies of Germany and Austria.

As a military*-religious order, the Teutonic Knights believed that they served God by fighting the enemies of Christendom and if necessary dying in that service. The members of the order originally included knights, other warriors and servants, priests, and sisters; today there are only priests and sisters. Since the medieval period, the sisters have usually lived in separate communities and are involved in the care of the sick.

The Teutonic Knights’ involvement in the Christianization and Westernization of the Baltic region of Europe (they never entered Russia) is highly controversial; it was undertaken at a great cost of human lives and local culture. See also MILITARY ORDERS.

HELEN J. NICHOLSON

Thaddaeus the Apostle. One of the 12 apostles (Mark 3:18; Matt. 10:3), often identified with “Jude*” (literally “Judas of James*,” i.e. either the son or brother of James) mentioned in the comparable list in Luke 6:16 and Acts 1:13 (where Thaddaeus is not mentioned). See also TWELVE APOSTLES.

Thaddeus (Addai* in Syriac) was, according to Syrian* and Armenian* traditions, one of the 70 apostles (Luke 10:1, 17); as a disciple of the apostle Thomas*, Thaddeus served as a missionary in Edessa*.

Thailand. Christianity is a minority religion (together with Islam, in the south) in this Buddhist country with the motto “To be a Thai is to be a Buddhist.” This motto makes Thai Christian identity somewhat problematic and shapes the church’s understanding of its presence and mission.

Christianity was introduced in Thailand by two Dominican* missionaries, Friar Jeronimo da Cruz and Sabastião da Canto (who arrived in 1567, in the capital of the kingdom, Ayudhaya), followed by Franciscan* and Jesuit* missionaries. Royal support (especially from King Narai, mid-17th c.) enabled the missionaries to make progress, gaining converts and building hospitals and a seminary. During the reign of the subsequent king, the Roman Catholic Church suffered periods of repression. Yet during the reign of King Rama I of the Chakri (Bangkok) dynasty (late 18th c.), the Catholic mission was renewed, following the same pattern: evangelization*, education*, and health* care. Catholic mission expanded in Northern Thailand (early 19th c.) and remains influential there today. The number of Roman Catholics has grown to approximately 300,000 members (in 2000).

The efforts of Protestant missionaries initially failed (mid-19th c.) owing to resistance from the king and a lack of responsiveness by Thais, as well as illness and death among the missionaries, and language and cultural barriers. Jesse Caswell and Dan Beach Bradley established their mission in Bangkok and the north. Bradley’s son-in-law, Daniel McGilvary, established a Presbyterian mission in the north. Protestant mission focused on evangelism and education; Edna Cole and Sarah Bradley started modern schools for Thai girls. During the 20th c., Protestant Christians grew in number, developing partnerships among Presbyterians, Baptists, Lutherans, and Disciples of Christ, and founding the Church of Christ in Thailand (1934), an ecumenical body that facilitates the work of mainline Protestant denominations. In the early 21st c., although influenced by Presbyterian missionaries, the Church of Christ in Thailand was under Thai leadership; although male dominated, the Church increasingly recognizes women's participation. Its members (c100,000) include, in addition to traditional lowland Thais, "hill people" (e.g. Lahu people), who comprise about half of its total membership.

The Evangelical Fellowship of Thailand, another church organization representing Evangelical* and Pentecostal* groups, has gained popularity among Thai Christians and became an important part of Thai Christianity. It emphasizes a literal* interpretation of the Bible, proselytizing, prayers, strict moral codes, and a separation of church and state politics.

Through the centuries, Christian churches have made important contributions to Thai society. Church-related schools, universities, seminaries, hospitals, and other community outreach organizations continue to serve their existing communities and beyond. Yet the Christians' minority status and their lack of active engagement and collaboration with other religions – namely Buddhism* and Islam* – prevent the churches from providing solutions to major social issues facing Thai society, i.e. sex tourism, AIDS, poverty, and political turmoil.

Statistics: Population (2000): 61.4 million (M). Christians 1.4 M; 2.2% (independents, 0.79 M; Protestants, 0.3 M; Roman Catholics, 0.25 M); Buddhists, 52.4 M, 85.3%; Muslims, 4.2 M, 6.8%; native religionists, 1.8 M, 3%; nonreligious, 1.3 M, 2.1%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

NANTAWAN BOONPRASAT LEWIS

Thecla, legendary Christian virgin, known only through the "Acts of Paul and Thecla" (a part of the Acts of Paul, c180). Converted by Paul*, she was condemned to death but miraculously escaped and baptized herself. According to tradition, she was martyred in Seleucia in Asia Minor, where a large basilica was built over her supposed tomb (4th c.). Macrina*, one of the Cappadocians*, was secretly named Thecla and took her as a model in setting up a monastic community. See also APOCRYPHA CLUS-TER: APOCRYPHAL ACTS OF APOSTLES; VIRGIN MARTYR TRADITION.

Theism, belief in a transcendent and personal God (as contrasted with atheism*, pantheism*, and deism*).

Theocracy, a form of government in which God directly rules and God's revealed laws become the law of the realm, often administered by priests, prophets, or teachers. The term was coined by Josephus* to characterize the government of Israel before the institution of kingship. In 1 Sam 8:4–22, the establishment of kingship was regarded as an abandonment of theocracy, which was restored after the Exile, when Judah was governed directly by priests, although they were subordinate to the Persian rulers. Islam* is theocratic in character, especially where shari'a is made the law of the state. Theocracy has also been seen in the claims of medieval popes like Gregory* VII and Boniface* VIII, the restriction of government to the saints by Wyclif* and Hus*, the Geneva* of Calvin*, the Münster of Thomas Münzer and Jan van Leyden, the New England of the Puritans*, and the English Commonwealth under Cromwell*. It is explicit in the Scottish Covenanters*, especially the Cameronians* and Reformed Presbyterians, and in the Mormon* state of Deseret. Theocratic norms have been enunciated by contemporary groups such as the Unification* Church, the Moral Majority (in the USA), and (Protestant) Christian Reconstructionists.

Theodicy. First coined by the rationalist Leibniz* (1710), the word "theodicy" juxtaposes the Greek words for God and justice*. Leibniz attempted to answer a question long asked (e.g. by Plato*): how can God be just if God is omnipotent* and totally good and yet allows humankind, whom God has created in God's image, to suffer? Leibniz answered: all things considered, the present world is the best of all possible worlds – a vague position widely attacked, notably by Voltaire. More generally, "theodicy" refers to the way any religion deals with suffering (as proposed by the sociologist Max Weber*).

Suffering in the Christian tradition has always been closely associated with sin* and evil. Evil can be seen to be an interpretation of suffering, an empirical phenomenon. For theologians theodicy raises many issues regarding creation*, heaven* and hell*, the Fall*, free will*, redemption*, and atonement*.

The problem that Job* faced in the OT was similar to that of Leibniz. Job had to square God's transcendence with his own extreme suffering. His answer (like Leibniz's) was vague: things have to be accepted as they are. Paul's* position was similar (Rom 11:33–35); he fell back on the mystery* of God's will, which humans cannot understand. Origen* explained all misfortunes as the result of free choices by created spirits and regarded misfortunes as pedagogical, as means by which God leads them back to their primal communion with God. Augustine* placed emphasis on the Fall*; evil is like the shadows that emphasize the harmony of the whole. Thomas Aquinas*, like Tillich*, pointed to the intrinsic limitations in a spatiotemporal world. Because God acts in a consistent way, something that is "logically possible" will be "circumstantially impossible."

When considered from theological perspectives less influenced by Plato and his heirs, theodicy changes. Process* theology abandons conventional notions of omnipotence and emphasizes God's goodness, luring the world toward greater complexity, intensity, and harmony. Following Irenaeus*, Hick's approach is evolutionary and eschatological*, visualizing the world and its sufferings as a backdrop for soul making. Bonhoeffer* found comfort in the thought that God shares human suffering and rejection. Liberation* theology emphasizes God's identification with the oppressed*. As in the Psalms, God has a preferential* option for the poor. Nonphilosophically minded Christians who bypass the enigma set by theodicy and deal with their sufferings by relating them to those of the crucified Christ often implicitly adopt one of the previously mentioned answers. See also EVIL, THE PROBLEM OF; GOD, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER; SUFFERING.

EUGENE TESELLE and

WILLIAM S. F. PICKERING

Theodora (c500–48), wife of Justinian*. An actress and dancing girl, she married Justinian (523) and on his accession was crowned joint ruler (527). His equal in political acumen, she ended the Nika sedition (532) by encouraging Belisarius to kill 30,000 rioters. She sympathized with the Miaphysites*, following a different policy than Justinian, possibly with his collusion; she also encouraged him to compromise with the Miaphysites, especially during the Three* Chapters controversy.

Theodora the Iconodule (c810–62), empress (842–55). Born in Paphlagonia with an iconodule* background, she married the emperor Theophilus, who was strongly Iconoclastic*. After his death, she became regent for their son (842–67); with this authority, she replaced the Iconoclast patriarch*, restored icons*, and on February 19–20, 843, after an all-night vigil*, a procession entered Hagia* Sophia for a formal restoration of the icons. In commemoration of this event, the Orthodox* Church celebrates the Festival of Orthodoxy on the first Sunday in Lent*. After a conflict with her son and her brother, she was banished to a convent, her property was seized, and all honors were rescinded.

Theodore of Mopsuestia (c350–428), Antiochene* exegete and theologian, a major figure in the Church* of the East, which called him "the Commentator." With his friend John* Chrysostom, he studied in the monastery school in Antioch and adopted its method of literal* interpretation of the Bible (e.g. viewing Song* of Songs as a marriage poem; opposing a messianic interpretation of the Psalms). His Christology*, like that of Nestorius*, affirmed a union of human and divine wills that developed progressively, until Jesus' exaltation. In his view humans have a permanent capability for sinlessness, through Christ and the Spirit; wrong decisions cannot alter human nature. Because his view of sin* was similar to the Pelagian* view held by Julian* of Eclanum, Theodore protected him after his condemnation (418). This stance helped reinforce an alliance between Rome and the opponents of Nestorius at the Council of Ephesus* (431), although he was not condemned until the next century (see Three Chapters).

Theodore of Studios, or Theodore Studite (759–826), monastic reformer. A monk and abbot, he was banished after opposing the adulterous marriage of Emperor Constantine VI (796), but after the overthrow of the emperor, he was recalled by Irene* (797). He and his followers took over the nearly empty old monastery of Studios*. He reformed it according to the Rule of Basil*, making the monastic life within it the model for later Eastern monasticism*. When Leo V renewed the Iconoclastic* policies of the preceding century, Theodore became his most vocal opponent and was exiled again (809); even after the policies were relaxed, he refused out of conscience to return to Constantinople.

Theodore of Tarsus (c602–90), archbishop of Canterbury. Born in Tarsus, he studied in Antioch and Constantinople, traveled to Edessa, and entered a monastery in Rome. He participated in the Monothelite controversy along with Maximus* the Confessor and was involved in the Lateran* Council (649) that defied the emperor. Appointed archbishop of Canterbury (668), he held several synods of the English Church. His surviving writings include commentaries in the Greek tradition. His work and his attitude toward learning prepared the way for Bede* and Alcuin*.

Theodoret of Cyrrhus (c393–c460), Syrian theologian. Friend of Nestorius* and a monk in Apamea, he was made bishop of Cyrrhus against his will (423). He defended Nestorius and attacked Cyril's* position; he drafted the Formulary* of Reunion (433), agreed to by both parties. Deposed by the Second Council of Ephesus* (449), he was reinstated by the Council of Chalcedon* (451) after reluctantly anathematizing Nestorius. His commentaries on Scripture exemplify the Antiochene* approach; his Church History continues that of Eusebius* (up to 428); other writings are valuable sources about popular Christianity in Syria*. During the Three* Chapters controversy, his views were condemned.

Theodosian Code. Issued by Theodosius II (438), it systematizes the many laws promulgated since Constantine, arranging them by topics (Book 16 deals with religious matters). It continued to be used in the West even after being superseded by the Code of Justinian*.

Theodosius (c346–95), emperor of the East (379–95) and the West (392–95). After the Arian* emperor Valens was killed by the Arian Goths* (378), Gratian chose Theodosius to rule the East, where he persuaded the Goths to settle in a designated area. Baptized (380), he issued the decree Cunctos populos enforcing the Nicene* position on the Trinity*. In the West, there were usurpations by Maximus (383–88) and by Arbogast, with Eugenius as figurehead emperor (392–94), who continued Constantine's tradition of religious toleration. In 394 Theodosius's armies met those of Maximus in Aquileia. The battle was staged by Theodosius as a contest against paganism. Theodosius was the victor, pagan morale collapsed, and Theodosius and his sons issued new decrees outlawing pagan worship.

Theodotion (late 2nd c.), translator of a Greek version of the OT and Apocrypha, included in Origen's* Hexapla*.

Theodotus the Cobbler (2nd c.). A leather merchant from Byzantium, he was condemned in Rome by Victor (189–98) for teaching that Jesus was a man who became the Christ by being anointed with the Holy Spirit at his baptism. See also CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER: IN WESTERN CHURCH HISTORY.

THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Theological Education: Concepts of Theological Education: Its Practice in the Roman Catholic Tradition: Contemporary Challenges in the Western World

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Theological Education in Africa: Issues It Faces

Theological Education in Asia

Theological Education in Latin America

Theological Education in North America

Theological Education in the Orthodox World of Eastern Europe

Theological Education in Western Europe: Germany

Theological Education in Western Europe: Nonconformity in England

1) Introductory Entries

Theological Education: Concepts of.

Theological education in the broadest sense is the education of people in religious faith. The term is most often used by Christians to describe both a pattern of study that prepares clergy and other religious professionals and the institutions in which such studies take place. The pattern of study that dominates today has deep roots in catechesis*, the instruction of early Christian converts before baptism*. The pattern took form in medieval universities and has evolved into a four-fold framework including biblical studies, theology, history of the church, and practical studies. Over the centuries, these areas of study have incorporated a wide variety of modern intellectual developments, including historical, literary, and social scientific methods of inquiry and contemporary philosophical approaches. Numerous subspecialties have developed within the segments, including ethics*, religious education, women's* studies, ethnic studies, liturgy*, preaching*, pastoral* care, social and cultural analysis, and administration and leadership.

With some slight variations in nomenclature, the fourfold framework and its subdivisions pervade theological education in all Christian traditions. Programs vary, however, by their guiding goals and purposes. They also vary in format in different cultural contexts.

Programs can be divided into three major types by purpose or goal: religious formation, philosophical and historical reasoning, and ministerial practice.

1. The pattern of religious-formation-focused theological education is most highly developed in Roman Catholic theological schools but is also dominant in some Protestant ones. The aim is to shape candidates for the priesthood or ministry intellectually, spiritually, pastorally, and as human beings. The theological school does this according to the Program of Priestly Formation of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, by creating "a formational community responding to a call to continuing conversion of mind and heart." Religious practices are significant features of the overall educational process. The spirit of this kind of theological education is the ancient Greek paideia, which, according to David Kelsey in Between Athens and Berlin: The Theological Education Debate, sought to cultivate the excellence of the soul "in knowledge of the 'Good' itself" and which requires "inward and religious transformation."
2. Rationally focused theological education seeks to cultivate theological habits of mind. This kind of education emphasizes critical thinking, analysis, and reasoned reflection. It involves the kind of inquiry that is, according to David Kelsey, "critical in that it begins by requiring justification of all alleged authorities or bases of truth." Critical and rational approaches result in a theological wisdom that depends not on the unquestioned appropriation of religious authority but on a reasoned religious understanding. Education in a number of Protestant institutions falls into this category.

3. Practice-focused theological education, another common pattern in Protestant seminaries, emphasizes the professional dimensions of educating clergy and other church leaders. Because much of the work of religious professionals involves skilled activities, the educational strategies of this type focus on obtaining the knowledge base to develop the requisite skills. The study of religious texts and traditions is oriented to their utility in the leadership of communities of faith. The goal is graduates who are effective preachers and worship leaders, teachers and administrators, counselors and group leaders, and congregational and public leaders.

Few theological schools reflect a "pure" version of these three kinds of educational practice; most include elements of all three. Almost always, however, a single goal dominates not only the curriculum but also the ethos of a particular school. Although all three patterns involve, for the most part, the study of the same subject areas, topics are approached in different ways toward different educational ends.

The format of theological schooling and the structure of the institutions in which it is carried out tend to follow dominant educational patterns in the cultures in which the institutions are located.

1. In Western Europe, North America, and much of North Asia, theological education is organized in programs leading to a degree at the college level or higher. These programs may be offered in a Bible college, a church-related college, a public university with an affiliated faculty of theology, or theological seminary. In Western Europe the majority of degree-based theological education is at the bachelor's degree level (following a slightly longer "high school" program), while in the USA and Canada, the majority of theological schools offer graduate, professional degrees, although the training of religious leaders in undergraduate Bible colleges is not uncommon. Theological education also takes place in thousands of nondegree pastoral training institutes offering both basic and continuing training for religious leaders.

2. In Africa, much of Latin America, and South Asia, theological education is typically offered in seminaries, training institutes, Bible colleges, and some denominationally funded colleges that may or may not offer degrees. These range from the secondary level to the college level; a few offer graduate-level programs.
3. Regardless of the level of education at which theological education is offered, it tends to encompass a similar range of subjects. Many theological schools are operated by or closely affiliated with denominations, churches, or religious movements, although some are religiously independent. Some are closely associated with a university or other higher education institution; others are free-standing.

See also EDUCATIONAL PRACTICES AS CHRISTIAN SERVICE CLUSTER.

DANIEL O. ALESHIRE and
BARBARA G. WHEELER

Theological Education: Its Practice in the Roman Catholic Tradition: Contemporary Challenges in the Western World. Before the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65), most Roman Catholic theological education took place in seminaries and was intended to prepare future priests for their pastoral ministries. There were some exceptions. A few schools – including the Gregorian University, Rome; the University of Tübingen; the Institut

Catholique, Paris; and the Catholic University of America – offered graduate degrees in theology open to laymen, but primarily to priests who wished to teach in seminaries. St. Mary's School of Theology (1943–63) in South Bend, Indiana, and Regina Mundi (1954–2006) in Rome also offered graduate degrees to women, lay as well as religious, who wished to teach theology in colleges and convents.

After the Council, Catholic theological education developed not only in seminaries but also in colleges and universities. Vatican II's Decree on Priestly Formation (1965) laid out general directions for the revision of theological education, calling for more focus on the study of Scripture (the "heart of theology"), dialogue with modern patterns of philosophy and science, and serious study of Protestant and Jewish thought that had influenced the modern world. The Decree and subsequent directives from Rome put into motion a revision of the seminary curriculum that continued into the 21st c.

The primary locus of post-conciliar theological education shifted toward the Catholic colleges and universities. Major doctoral programs in theology emerged at some of the universities (e.g. Marquette, Fordham, Notre Dame, Boston College, St. Louis). Theology in the universities differed from seminary theology in its aim, methods, and audience. University theology aimed to prepare college and university theological researchers and teachers; was much more focused than seminary theology on engaging in dialogue with the other disciplines in the universities and colleges; and was offered to laymen and laywomen (the vast majority by the mid-1970s), as well as clergy and women religious.

PATRICK W. CAREY

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Theological Education in Africa: Issues It Faces. The long-term sustainability of Christian churches depends greatly on the effectiveness of pastoral (and lay leader) training. The problem faced by theological education in tropical Africa is apparent as soon as one notes that most pastoral training has been conducted by missionaries, the majority of whom know little or nothing about the inner dynamics of the African cultural and religious heritage. This situation persists because of the high cost of residential pastoral formation and the lack of contextualization* of the training curriculum. To cut costs, African bishops and churches invite foreign missionary instructors to conduct training in their pastoral institutes. As long as the syllabi of African theological colleges and seminaries are imported from elsewhere, pastoral training will continue to be out of tune with the cultural and religious dynamics of African societies among whom the trainees are expected to work after graduation.

Urgent transformation of the curriculum in theological education in tropical Africa is needed. Curriculum development is a professional undertaking, which must begin from the context of the learners and proceed to discern the texts that can provide relevant knowledge, skills, and experience appropriate for each context (Jesus' pedagogy is exemplary in this regard). Two issues that confront African Christianity in the early 21st c. ought to be taken seriously in any effective African curriculum of theological education. How can we prepare African pastors, priests, and lay leaders without contributing to their alienation from their culture? How can we prepare them to cope with the present split between Christian identity and practice that characterizes African Christianity?

1. Cultural Identity. Inevitably, every Christian mission agency from outside Africa has introduced into the continent the cultural and religious values of the home country of that agency. This cultural flooding of tropical Africa with North Atlantic culture is particularly marked as a result of schooling and indoctrination. The curricula in schools, colleges, seminaries, and universities have been overloaded with cultural values from Europe and North America at the expense of the African cultural and religious heritage. Christian instruction and the use of foreign languages as the medium of instruction have reinforced this alienation of African students from their culture. How can one envision a theological education that would be academically sound and yet avoid this shortcoming?

2. Doctrinal Identity and Daily Practice among African Christians. There is nothing specifically African in the doctrines recited by African branches of various denominations, e.g. Anglican, Roman Catholic, Lutheran, Moravian, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Congregationalist, Mennonite, and Quaker. Yet in practice African Christians in these denominations remain rooted in their respective African cultural traditions. For them Christianity remains largely a Sunday affair, with little or no direct impact on the political, economic, ethical, or aesthetic norms of the wider society. This inconsistency between doctrinal identity and actual life conduct among African Christians brings into question the significance of the rapid numerical increase in church membership in tropical Africa, which has no direct impact on the actual life of people in a continent burdened with civil strife, administrative inefficiency, and economic failure. Apparently many Africans turn to the church for refuge, hoping that through the church they might survive the collapse of social institutions (which fail to serve them) and the postcolonial political crises in predominantly "Christian" countries (e.g. in Angola*; Burundi*; Congo*, Democratic Republic [DRC]; Congo*, Republic [Congo-Brazzaville]; Ghana*; Kenya*; Mozambique*; Nigeria*; Rwanda*; South Africa; Zimbabwe*).

This lack of social engagement of African Christians reflects the fact that in most instances the Christianity that has been introduced to the continent is a religion aimed at securing eternal life* for believers after their death (see Salvation). What believers do now is insurance for the life to come, leading to an abdication of social responsibility with regard to political and economic affairs. Most priests, pastors, and lay leaders fail to provide any relevant guidance for their life as Christians during social and political crises. Instead, churches are often the focal points for fomenting social strife. African churches, especially those that are extensions of foreign denominations, remain largely detached from the daily social concerns of the nations to which their members belong. This is a problem with the training and continuing education of priests, pastors, and lay leaders.

3. Toward a Theological Education with Contextual Relevance. The dissonance between theological education training and contextual relevance leads to a pastoral workforce that cannot deliver relevant contextual service to the congregations in both rural and urban areas in tropical Africa. An African theological education curriculum that addresses these issues must be an African ecumenical undertaking (overcoming the denominational splits brought by the missions) that rethinks its relationship with a North Atlantic Christianity with reverse problems.

Whereas tropical Africa has numerous churches without enough adequately trained theologians, churches in the North Atlantic countries have an excess of trained theologians without enough Christians to serve. How could these theologians help support and train African theologians ready to address the above-mentioned needs in African theological education? The question will not be easily answered, because cultural presuppositions and power relations (including those between rich North Atlantic churches and pauperized tropical African churches) tend to overshadow any chances of unanimity in matters of doctrine, institutional structure, pastoral care, and conceptual clarity. But an Africanization of theological education in Africa is necessary and urgent in view of the strong demographic shift of Christianity from the North Atlantic to tropical Africa.

JESSE NDWIGA KANYUA MUGAMBI

Theological Education in Asia. The question of theological education in Asia did not arise until the advent of indigenous church movements and the development of a spirit of national independence. During the previous centuries, missionaries taught the different Western models they had learned when trained in the Western theological centers; the Roman Catholic seminaries followed the scholastic theological tradition; the Protestant seminaries reproduced their inherited Reformation tradition.

With the advent of indigenous churches in independent nations, there were pioneering attempts to impart theological education that would reflect the spirit, ethos, and thought patterns of Asian peoples and their civilizations. The movement of Contextual* theology called for a theological education sensitive to the social* and political* conditions of Asia. Consequently, in many centers of theological education, analysis of the society and exposure to the realities of poverty* and suffering* became an integral part of the training. The method of theological learning shifted from the concept of "banking" to that of critical study and reflection aimed at transformation. This has led to appropriating within theological education the sapiential Asian tradition, emphasizing the aspect of experience and deemphasizing theology as a system of thought. This approach received fresh impetus from the Asian ecumenical* movement and interchurch theological linkages in trying to meet the new challenges posed by the postcolonial Asian situation. Since the 1960s, the number of seminaries and Bible schools has greatly increased all over Asia. At the same time, efforts were made to group them, bringing them under some general umbrella, such as the Association of Theological Education in South East Asia, formed in 1981. It has a membership of 92 theological schools in 14 different countries and supervises the theological education of about 9,000 students. In India many Protestant and Orthodox centers of theological education are members of the Senate of Serampore College, which also became an affiliating institution.

Four new developments in the field of theological education in Asia can be identified: (1) Theological education is being extended to laymen and laywomen. (2) There is a remarkable growth in the quality of theological education. Thus many schools are now offering degrees not only at the bachelor's and master's levels but also at the doctoral level. (3) An emerging trend is the training of theology teachers in Asia, instead of Europe and the USA, and the use of Asian resources (including about 200 Asian theological journals) for doing theology and theological education. (4) More and more highly qualified women are theological educators and have begun to contribute to the reshaping of traditional theological education.

At the institutional level, theological education has acquired a new dimension with the establishment of Christian studies departments or chairs in some of the state or public universities. The secular and interreligious context in which Christian history and theology are studied and researched has led to a reconsideration of the method of theological education as a process of continuous dialogue* with the larger realities of society, including the plurality of religions and cultures, in an interdisciplinary manner. Two examples of institutions that are headed in this new direction are the Chung Chi College of Chinese University of Hong Kong and the Department of Christian Studies, University of Madras, India, which pursue interdisciplinary and dialogical approaches in theological education. FELIX WILFRED Theological Education in Latin America. Theological education came to Latin America as an essential component of the European and North American missionary movements, first Roman Catholic and later Protestant, but often failed to adapt to the realities and opportunities of the New World.

Guatemala is a microcosm of these realities. Roman Catholic seminaries have offered a classical formation for the priesthood, but after 450 years the Catholic Church is still largely dependent on imported clergy. Similarly, Protestant seminaries and Bible institutes as residential institutions for the training of pastors and evangelists (for c70 years) demonstrate the inadequacy of the traditional understanding of ministry as a profession of highly schooled, ordained, and salaried clergy, which relatively few local churches can support.

A notable alternative (incorporating Ivan Illich's radical critique of education as schooling and Paulo Freire's insight into education as liberation in Pedagogy of the Oppressed) has been the development since the 1960s of decentralized Protestant and Pentecostal training programs (first in Guatemala). This approach offers widespread access to and training for diverse ministries (lay and ordained, men and women, mestizo and indigenous [Mayan], old and young, poor and non-poor) and the possibility of incorporating in much greater numbers indigenous leaders, whatever their geographic, cultural, economic, or educational location, into both social and ecclesial ministries.

The Central American Center for Pastoral Studies in Guatemala, e.g., offers theological and pastoral courses each year to some 300 Protestant, Pentecostal, and Catholic students at two academic levels. It also offers a women's pastoral program of holistic training to confront the challenges of daily life, to contribute to the development of the participants' families and churches and communities, to eradicate violence, and to promote justice and equality, through basic courses, workshops, and celebrations that reach out each year to 3,000 women in Central America.

ROSS KINSLER

Theological Education in North America. Christian theological education in North America is conducted primarily in the c250 seminaries, divinity schools, and schools of theology that offer graduate-level professional education for clergy and other religious professionals. The primary degree for Christian clergy is the master of divinity (M.Div.), a three-year, post-college program that includes the study of religious texts, theological ideas, historical traditions, social issues, and professional skills. Attention is also given to personal and spiritual formation. Other programs, including various master's and doctoral degrees, are offered by some schools. Professors in North American seminaries are highly trained and generally hold a Ph.D. in a theological subject. Most theological schools are financed by a combination of gifts, grants from denominations, and endowment, but students bear a substantial portion of the cost of theological training; some borrow heavily to pay for their education. Theological schools in North America are generally respected by churches, although they sometimes become embroiled in theological conflicts in their denominations.

Other training for Christian ministers, lay and ordained, is offered at the undergraduate level in Bible colleges and denominationally related or Christian colleges, and at the non-degree level in urban ministry training programs and institutes.

DANIEL O. ALESHIRE and
BARBARA G. WHEELER

Theological Education in the Orthodox World of Eastern Europe. Schools of higher theological education were sparse for centuries in the Orthodox world, the result in large part of Ottoman rule. Nevertheless, before the 19th c. well-known theological institutions existed, especially in the Romanian* countries, Ukraine*, and later Russia*. Highly educated scholars in theology played important roles in the Eastern Orthodox Church (as hierarchs, professors) and in their nations (as state ministers). These theological scholars ensured not only the preservation of the Orthodox culture in difficult times, but also achieved major accomplishments, such as the translation of the Bible into different languages. During that period, the candidates for priesthood were trained mostly in monastery* schools, where they learned the basics of the Orthodox doctrine and the practice of Church music and worship.

During the 19th c., modern theological schools, both Church-based seminaries and university-based theological schools, were founded in each Orthodox country. The primary goal of these theological institutions and of their generally highly educated faculty was to train future clergy and schoolteachers. Their pioneering scholars produced an important corpus of theological literature and included the "Slavophile" Alexei Khomiakov and the "Westernizer" Vladimir Soloviev*. But this trend was dramatically interrupted by the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia (1917) and later by the imposition of Communist regimes in other Orthodox countries. The positive consequence was the foundation by Russian emigrants of important theological schools in the West: St. Sergius Institute in Paris (1925), St. Tikhon's Seminary in South Canaan, Pennsylvania (1937), and St. Vladimir's Seminary in Crestwood, New York (1938). Among the great theologians who taught in these schools were Vladimir Lossky* and Georges Florovsky*, as well as Sergei Bulgakov*, Nicolas Afanasiev, Paul Evdokimov, Elisabeth Behr-Sigel, Alexander Schmemmann (emphasizing a liturgical renewal within Orthodoxy), and patristic scholar John Meyendorff. These seminaries and their scholars played a unique role in making Orthodoxy and Orthodox theology known in the Western world. They also had a significant influence on the renewed development of theological education in Eastern Europe after 1989.

During the 20th c in Eastern Europe, theological education continued. Greece was part of the free world, and its theological schools flourished after World War II. Theological education continued to exist in the Communist countries as well, even though most theological schools were closed and the regime imposed drastic reductions in the number of students. The remaining theological schools continued to train future clergy and to do theological research, with scholars such as Dumitru Staniloae* (in Romania).

After the fall of Communism, many new theological schools, both seminaries and university-based theological schools (theological faculties), were founded. In Romania, e.g., whereas before 1989 there were 5 seminaries and 2 theological university institutes, in 2008 there were 45 seminaries and 15 university-based theological schools. Russia had seen a similarly large increase in the number of its theological schools and the students being trained for the priesthood. Generally speaking, there is no shortage of vocations for the priesthood in the Orthodox churches. See also BIBLE INTERPRETATION CLUSTER: IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

VASILE MIHOC

Theological Education in Western Europe: Germany. Theological education in German is university based. For medieval priests, university study was an exception. The Reformers, however, made university attendance obligatory for all future pastors. After the Council of Trent*, the Roman Catholic Church intensified the training of priests, although university training of priests has been required only since the *Kulturkampf (1871–87). After two main ecclesiastical examinations (following guidelines from Rome as implemented by the German Bishops’ Conference in consultation with the theological faculties of state universities), the diploma in Catholic theology is awarded. For all but two semesters, students preparing for the priesthood live in seminaries, where they also receive practical pastoral training. In addition, theological education serves as preparation for ordination as a deacon or priest.

Protestant ministerial studies take place at state faculties or church colleges. Upon the completion of these studies, students receive a diploma or take the first ecclesiastical examination. The subsequent vicariate offers experience in pastoral practice and, with intermittent attendance at preaching seminars, leads to the second ecclesiastical examination, which precedes ordination and appointment. The faculties draw up plans of study and examination in consultation with the churches. Protestant pastors, as a rule, are married. The free churches train their officials entirely in their own educational institutions.

The content of the training of priests and pastors is a matter of ongoing discussion at Protestant and Catholic theological faculty conferences. The future of the Christian churches depends in large measure on the quality of the training of their priests and pastors.

INGE MAGER

Theological Education in Western Europe: Nonconformity in England. See NONCONFORMITY AND THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION.

THEOLOGIES

See ANCESTOR VENERATION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; ANTHROPOLOGY CLUSTER; APOCALYPTICISM CLUSTER; BAPTISM CLUSTER; CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER; CHURCH, CONCEPTS AND LIFE, CLUSTER; DEATH, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER; ESCHATOLOGY CLUSTER; ETHICS AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; EUCHARIST CLUSTER; FAMILY, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER; GOD, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER; GOSPEL AND CULTURE CLUSTER; GRACE OF GOD CLUSTER; HOLY SPIRIT CLUSTER; HUMAN RIGHTS CLUSTER; INCARNATION CLUSTER; INCULTURATION CLUSTER; JESUS, IMAGES OF, CLUSTER; JUSTICE, CHRISTIAN THEOLOGICAL VIEWS AND PRACTICES, CLUSTER; JUSTIFICATION, THEOLOGICAL VIEWS AND PRACTICES, CLUSTER; KINGDOM OF GOD, THE CONCEPT OF, CLUSTER; LAND, THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES AND PRAXIS, CLUSTER; MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF, CLUSTER; MILLENNIALISM CLUSTER; MISSION CLUSTER; POVERTY CLUSTER; RACISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; SEXUALITY, ISSUES OF, CLUSTER.

Theology as Human Practice. See CONTEXTUAL THEOLOGIES.

THEOLOGY AS HUMAN UNDERTAKING CLUSTER

Theology as Human Undertaking: African Women Theologians Doing Theology by Making Connections

Theology as Human Undertaking: North Atlantic Theologians Doing Theology: A Dialogue between Text and Context

See also AESTHETICS AND THEOLOGY; ARTS AND THEOLOGY; CULTURE CLUSTER; CULTURE AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY; ECOLOGY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; ECOFEMINIST THEOLOGY; ECOLOGY AND

CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: ECOTHEOLOGY; ESOTERIC THEOLOGY; FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY; LABOR, THEOLOGIES OF; LAITY CLUSTER: THEOLOGY OF; LIBERAL THEOLOGY; LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER; MEDIATING THEOLOGY; MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY; NATURAL THEOLOGY; NEW HAVEN THEOLOGY; PASTORAL THEOLOGY; POLITICAL THEOLOGY; POSITIVE THEOLOGY, POSITIVE LAW, POSITIVISM; RATIONALISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY IN EASTERN ORTHODOX CHURCHES; SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY IN WESTERN CHURCHES

Theology as Human Undertaking: African Women Theologians Doing Theology by Making Connections.

A way of doing theology, essential in Africa, especially for African women, is to tell stories, and in particular one's story and the story of a community. The story of the Circle* of Concerned African Women Theologians ("the Circle") began, like all circles, with a single point, which then disappeared. A solitary person does not make a community; a circle is about community. So when one lone woman went into the theological field and found herself alone among men, she had no choice but to seek other sisters to join her so that together they might brave the challenges of being a woman theologian in one's own faith community. For African women theologians, doing theology is a matter of making connections. The story has been told by others; this is an attempt to get behind the story to what doing theology as African women theologians entails.

Working with the World* Council of Churches and meeting people from all walks of life was a privilege that opened my eyes to the need for Africans to work out their own salvation (a view reflecting the nationalism and Pan-Africanism of Kwam Nkruma of Ghana). We could not forget we were African women and Christians who are blessed to be a blessing to others.

My move to Nigeria following my marriage expanded my view of African women's lives and the need to have religion play a positive role in women's development – not subordinating them under patriarchy*, but enabling them to distinguishing humanizing cultural norms from norms that are obstacles to women's flourishing. An immersion in interreligious living in Africa (as a teacher) reinforced my acceptance of religious pluralism as an African reality.

As members of the Ecumenical* Association of Third World Theologians (EATWOT), a few African women and I began to envision the Circle as enabling African women to craft theologies that would be liberative for African women. A community of women was needed to pursue this line of study. Akan wisdom says, "Dua Kor gye Mframa a obu" – "A single tree standing against a storm will fall." This storm imagery speaks of inclusivity, participation, and community. It motivates us to initiate a multireligious Circle that embodies a dialogical lifestyle, which brings with it the challenge of defining who is a theologian and the challenges related to religious pluralism*, linguistic pluralism, racism*, and our Africanness.

Who Is a Theologian? The Circle envisioned a community of women theologians that research, write, and publish liberative theological literature to empower women and challenge the patriarchal and androcentric* practices of society and especially of faith-based organizations. For us, theologians are women whose praxis is anchored in religion, be they researchers and writers trained in seminaries and universities or women who communicate their experiences through drama, storytelling, and other media. The tension between these two types of women theologians remains a challenge but it does not split the community. The Circle enjoys unity in diversity with respect for member's charisma and skills.

Religious Pluralism. The Circle is a multireligious community of women sharing the empowering aspects of their faith. Doing theology as African women calls for religious pluralism. But can members representing the various strands of Christianity present in Africa, Muslims (see Islam and Christianity Cluster: In Africa), and practitioners of African* Religion worship together? Open joint devotional exercises, conducted with respect for each woman's pieties, are welcomed by many as enriching, but they scandalize others.

Language. For our Pan-African community, language was a first challenge. Different accents in our uses of colonial languages, and the French–English divide on ways of reasoning out issues, had to be overcome, although until recently most of our publications have been in English. Besides using a local African language (e.g. Swahili), it was also important that our meetings be accessible to a large local audience. Doing theology as African women calls for cross-linguistic, and thus cross-cultural, dialogue.

Racism. Apartheid in South Africa was a challenge for the nationals, who at first attempted two Circles along racial* lines. Should African culture be viewed as including the cultures of the white and colored women of South* Africa? The rest of us very openly said, "Women, black, colored, or white, are welcome," and soon discovered that our women's experiences in different churches are not dissimilar – and a multiracial Circle emerged in Cape Town.

Our Africanness. The challenge before the Circle was to devise cultural hermeneutics* at once critical and affirming, so as to uphold our Africanness, including our religious and cultural heritage. We needed a language that would not allow the West to continue its calumnies of Africa but that would allow us to explore, expose, and work for the transformation of what prevents women in African cultures from experiencing the fullness of life. In the process, we had to challenge partners, such as Western women theologians, to shed their racist and patronizing approaches to African women's issues. We are not "objects" of their academic pursuit or collaborators in the projects they designed. Indeed, many Western women friends of the Circle have joined us in our quest for mutual respect and a liberative interdependence, respecting the uniqueness of our quest in the context of the global women's movements.

The rhetoric of working with and not for people, and of opening doors for participation in decision making is agreed upon by all the women associated with the Circle. Yet an Akan proverb says, "It is one person who hunts down an elephant to feed the whole village." Indeed, active participation by women theologians involves overcoming many obstacles: difficult communication; low financial income; non-supportive or antagonistic spouses; responsibilities for the care of young children and old people; objections of church leaders to women doing their own thinking; and publishing houses and foundations who presume to determine what constitutes African women's issues. Yet all women of the Circle are initiators and growers.

This collectively lived story has taught us the necessity of staying open to change. To be of service to real life, we need to be relevant to changing contexts. Flexibility is a strength, not a weakness. From a vision of an elite group of academic theologians, we became a broadly based group of women doing theology. The sharply defined objectives of African women doing theology are a prism through which new social, cultural, and religious issues can be viewed, e.g. women's health arising from research into cultural practices that has metamorphosed into a full-blown focus on HIV and AIDS.

We have also learned that, in an interdependent world, reciprocity is not just offering the other exactly what the other offers you or complementing what the other has. Reciprocity is what is done in a way that honors, respects, and enhances the humanity of the other. The question "What is in it for me?" is a real one. When the community flourishes, we as individuals will flourish; but to achieve this community enhancement, we must insist that our individuality and humanity and gifts be accepted and respected, as we in turn accept those of others.

MERCY AMBA ODUYOYE

Theology as Human Undertaking: North Atlantic Theologians Doing Theology: A Dialogue between Text and Context. Theology, whatever else may be said of it, is an undertaking of human beings. Theologians hope to be “inspired” by revelatory truth transcending their grasp, but by the same token they may not claim for their own work ultimate veracity. As finite (and sinful*) creatures, theologians “see through a glass darkly” (1Cor 13:12), and the lens through which they look at reality is shaped by concrete factors in their own personal and societal situations. They contemplate the meaning of the Christian faith as persons who live at particular moments in history and specific geopolitical situations and who bring to this vocation assumptions, values, and concerns they have acquired as persons of those times and places.

This does not mean that theological work is determined solely by the circumstances in which it is undertaken; for it is of the essence of this calling in its authentic expressions that it implies a highly critical dimension. That is, far from merely reflecting the context in which it occurs and that it wishes to address, theology understood in the Christian mode intends to engage its context from a perspective that it does not derive directly from the context as such. That perspective it gains from what it may call “the gospel*” or “the Christian message” or kerygma, as this “good news” is transmitted to the faithful (transmitted “from faith to faith,” as Paul says; Rom 1:17) through the Scriptures*, traditions*, and present witness of the Christian community under the impact of the divine Spirit.

Theology is thus an ongoing dialogue between “text” and “context.” The “text” (which includes but is not exhausted by the scriptural text) constitutes the revelatory source of the theologian’s witness and illumines his or her discernment of the “context”; the context, in turn, conditions the theologian’s reception or “reading” of the text and determines the emphases and general disposition of his or her articulation of the faith*.

While this dialectic (text/context) has always been covertly present in Christian theology, it is only within the past few decades that it has become conspicuous and (for many Christian thinkers) intentional. Partly as a consequence of post-Enlightenment* historical consciousness and partly as a result of the movement of Christianity beyond its traditional Eurocentric base, the contextual character of all theological-ethical reflection has been seen to be decisive in a new way. A faith that intends to engage its “world” cannot and must not be everywhere and at all times the same, for our “worlds” are diverse. Times differ: what perceptive theologians (e.g. Karl Barth*) had to say after World War II was significantly different from their messages before the war. But places also differ: what is “gospel” for the possessing peoples of the earth is not necessarily gospel for the dispossessed! Too often in the past, what was advanced as eternal and unchanging Christian truth served to obscure the vested interests of the powerful who proclaimed it and to perpetuate the status quo of the less powerful who heard it.

This recognition of the fact that contexts play a decisive role in theological work has meant a new openness on the part of thoughtful Christians everywhere to the development of theologies emerging quite explicitly out of a variety of sociocultural contexts, especially contexts (whether geographic or identity based) that heretofore have seemed content to be guided by theological trends emanating from the old Euro-American flagship of Christendom. An observer of “theological Existenz” today would have to speak not about Christian “theology” but about Christian theologies. In a real sense, “theology” has become an abstract term. What actually exists are various theologies, accounts of the meaning and direction of Christian faith and life emanating from the spiritual crises and yearnings of identifiable groups within the global church.

Serious Christians ought to welcome this development, for it is a consequence of the realization that the Christian message can be “good news” only if it is appropriated by human beings in their always-specific times and places. Theological “absolutes” have always implied the imposition on others of the alleged truths of the most dominant groups in Christendom. At the same time, the obvious danger of the rampant proliferation of theologies that are answerable to no core of meaning or authority* means that all Christians are obliged today to wrestle the more seriously with “the text” and – perhaps even more important – to pursue a vital ecumenical* discourse that ensures the dialogue of differing theologies with one another.

DOUGLAS JOHN HALL

Theopaschitism, the view that Christ, as divine, suffered and was crucified, and thus that God suffered on the cross. It arose from the Miaphysite* emphasis that the Incarnation* brought a real and permanent union between human and divine (“one incarnate nature of the divine Word”). Against Theopaschitism the Second Council of Constantinople* (553) affirmed that Christ was “crucified in the flesh,” but his divinity was free of suffering.

Theophany (Gk “appearance of God”). The OT speaks of God appearing to the patriarchs and matriarchs (e.g. Abraham and Sarah, Gen 17–18; Hagar, Gen 16:7), Moses (e.g. Exod 19), and the people of Israel (e.g. Ps 48) in visible form. Such passages were interpreted in the early church as temporary manifestations of the Logos*, which later becomes incarnate*. For the Eastern Orthodox* Church, the Feast of Theophany celebrating the divine manifestation in Jesus’ baptism corresponds to the Epiphany* in Western churches. See also REVELATION.

Theophilus (Gk “loved by God”), addressee of the Gospel of Luke* (Luke 1:3) and the Acts* of the Apostles (Acts 1:1).

Theophilus of Alexandria (d412), patriarch of Alexandria (385–412). He took an active role in suppressing paganism, encouraging the destruction of the Serapeum (391). In the controversy over anthropomorphism*, he opposed the Origenist* position that God does not have human form. When the Tall* Brothers found refuge with John* Chrysostom, Theophilus used his influence to have him deposed at the Synod of the Oak*. His nephew Cyril* succeeded him and was similarly effective in asserting the power of Alexandria against Constantinople.

Theophilus of Antioch (late 2nd c.). His sole surviving work is the apology addressed to Autolycus, arguing for creation through the Logos*. He first stated the view (soon adopted by Irenaeus* and later by Augustine*) that Adam* and Eve* were created with the capacity for either mortality or immortality, depending on their response to God’s command.

Theosis, Deification, “participation in the divine nature” (2 Pet 1:4), through immediate relationship to God, making the knower like the known. Irenaeus* wrote, “The glory of God is humanity fully alive; the life of human beings is the vision of God” (Adv. haer. 4.20.7). Athanasius* wrote, “God became human that human might become God.” “Theosis” refers to the transforming effect of grace* (having a God-like life) emphasized by Greek patristic writers, Eastern Orthodox* theology, and the Oxford* Movement. What Christ was by nature through the Incarnation* humans can become by grace*, when they are thoroughly united in body and soul with the will and energies of God. See also ETHICS AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

B. MARK SIETSEMA

Theosophy (Gk “wisdom about divine things”). The term, found in Greek magical papyri (verbal formulas used to compel deities to perform certain actions), was adopted by the Neoplatonists* and their Christian followers. It was also applied to speculations like those of Boehme* about the generation of all things from God.

Theotokos (Gk God-bearer), the title given to Mary in the Eastern Orthodox* (Chalcedonian) and Oriental Orthodox* (non-Chalcedonian) churches since the christological* controversies of the 5th c. over the Incarnation*. See also MARY, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER: THEOTOKOS.

Therapeutae, Jewish monastic community near Alexandria, possibly a branch of the Essenes*, reported by Philo* in De vita contemplativa (1st c. CE). Eusebius* thought that Philo must have been describing the early Christian Church in Egypt*. In fact the community is an indication that monasticism* had pre-Christian roots.

Thérèse of Lisieux (1873–97), Carmelite* nun, spiritual author, canonized (1925). The youngest of nine children of a prosperous family in Normandy. Thérèse had a happy early childhood until her mother’s death (1877), which initiated for her a period of weariness and religious obsession, a “winter of trial.” The family moved to Lisieux (1881). As a student in the Benedictine Abbey school, Thérèse was seriously ill (1883); she was healed and believed her cure was miraculous. On Christmas 1886, she experienced “conversion.” Henceforth, she had an intense interest in the apostolate, desiring to suffer for God, and planned to enter the Carmelite convent in Lisieux, where her two older sisters were already nuns. Because she was too young, Thérèse and her father made a pilgrimage to Rome, where she was presented to Leo XIII, who assured her she would enter the convent if it was God's will. She did (1888), with the name Thérèse de l'Enfant Jésus et de la Sainte Face. Intensely faithful to the rule of the order, she concentrated on her prayer life. Appointed mistress of novices (1893), she articulated her "Little Way," "feeling and acting under the discipline of virtue as a child feels and acts by nature" (Pius XI). She became ill with tuberculosis (1896), and in her last months, realizing she had a mission to teach others her "Little Way," she asked her sister to collect and edit her writings: History of a Soul, which became an immediate success. YVES KRUMENACKER

Thessalonians, 1 and 2 Epistles to. 1 Thessalonians, Paul's* first extant letter (c50), encourages an assembly (ekklesia, church) confronted with believers' deaths (4:13–18) and persecutions by other Thessalonians (2:14–16). Subsequently, 2 Thessalonians (uncertain date; written by Paul or a successor) reaffirms the teaching of the first letter and challenges enthusiastic apocalypticism*, which engenders community alarm (2:1–2) and social disorder (3:6–12).

In Thessalonica, the capital of the Roman province of Macedonia where most Thessalonians cultivated the beneficence of Roman patrons, Paul's gospel about a commitment to an exclusive patron (God) met with "great opposition" (2:2–12). After leaving Thessalonica, a painful separation for Paul, and after Timothy's visit (2:17–3:5), Paul exhorts the Thessalonians to maintain exclusive commitment to their new "patron," despite opposition (2:14–16) and death (4:13).

Their negative experiences are redefined in light of apocalyptic* traditions of resistance; the present time is a counterconventional eschatological* era; believers await the Parousia*; benefits (including resurrection*, 1 Thess 4:13–17, 5:9–10) accrue to believers, not from local and Roman imperial cults, but from exclusive devotion to God, their new patron (1 Thess 1:9–10; 5:3). An ethic of solidarity, shared values, and moral transformation (1 Thess 4:1–8; 4:18; 5:11, 12–22) – including independence from conventional, pro-Roman networks of power (1 Thess 4:9–12) – connect believers to an international countercultural network of ekklesiai (1 Thess 1:7, 2:14, 4:10).

2 Thessalonians presupposes the earlier opposition and affirms the interpretation of the assembly's persecution in the light of apocalyptic traditions (1:5–10), but counters alarmist and enthusiastic interpretations that could mitigate the effectiveness of Paul's earlier teachings (2:1–12, 3:6–15).

Augustine*, Thomas Aquinas*, and Calvin* drew from 1 Thessalonians ideas about the Parousia, the resurrection of believers, and the immortality of the soul*. Darby* and conservative Christians based beliefs in Millennialism* and in a "rapture" on 1 Thess 4:17. References in 2 Thess 2:3–4 to a "man of sin" (2:3–4, 6–10) led to speculation about the "Antichrist" from Irenaeus* to Ambrosiaster*, Jerome*, John* Chrysostom, Theodore* of Mopsuestia, Augustine, and medieval, Reformation*, and modern leaders. ABRAHAM SMITH

Third Orders and Tertiary. Religious organizations affiliated with one of the mendicant* orders. The first order is for men under vows, the second for women under vows; the third order, which grew out of the Lay* Piety Movement, was for laypeople living in the world, usually with distinctive dress. The Beguines* survived the condemnations at the Council of Vienne* (1312) by becoming Third Order Dominicans* or Franciscans*. Today the Dominican and Franciscan sisters who are not cloistered but engage in service and education are either third order regulars* (under vows) or secular tertiaries (not under vows).

Thirty-nine Articles of Religion. During Elizabeth I's reign, an edited form of the Forty*-two became Thirty-eight in 1562, by omitting the last four Articles (dealing largely with Anabaptist and Millennialist* "heresies*"). Though adopted by the Convocations*, these had not yet been approved by the queen when the pope excommunicated her (1570). She then authorized the Articles, and a new Article 29 ("Of the Wicked which eat not the Body of Christ in the use of the Lord's Supper") was added, reinforcing the "receptionist*" doctrine of the sacraments*. This collection became the Thirty-nine Articles of 1571.

The Articles were taken as an authoritative confession of faith (see Creeds, Symbols, and Confessions of Faith) and a measure of orthodoxy* in the Elizabethan and Stuart reigns. Subscription to them was required by the Canons* of 1604. The relevant canons were revised in 1865, although the form of subscription to the Articles remained rigorous. In England the new Declaration of Assent (1975) relocated the Articles as a historic “witness” to the faith of the Church of England, rather than as expressing the personal faith of the individuals. The Articles had meanwhile gone to the far ends of the earth and had been incorporated with differing requirements of assent into the constitutions of many Anglican provinces. See also ANGLICANISM CLUSTER.

BISHOP COLIN O. BUCHANAN

Thirty Years’ War (1618–48), a destructive war that involved most of the European powers. In many ways a confrontation between Protestants and Roman Catholics, it was directed chiefly against the Hapsburgs in Germany*, Austria*, the Netherlands*, and Spain*, and Catholic France* was allied with Protestant powers. It began with a rebellion in Bohemia, but the attempt to replace a Catholic by a Protestant ruler was crushed (James I of England refused to aid his son-in-law); Protestantism was extirpated in Bohemia, and the Palatinate was invaded by French and German forces (1622–23). Denmark* then entered the conflict and was defeated. When the emperor (of the Holy* Roman Empire) decreed a return to the religious situation before the Peace of Augsburg* (1555), Protestantism was threatened, and Sweden* intervened, securing Northern Germany (1630–32). Although a peace that satisfied most German princes was agreed upon (1635), France renewed the war in order to weaken the Hapsburgs; fighting spread to most of Europe, and much of Germany was devastated. Peace negotiations over a period of eight years finally led to the Peace of Westphalia* (1648), which had a lasting impact on European diplomacy, strengthening the territorial state and reducing the role of religion in international affairs.

Thomas, disciple and apostle, mentioned in all four Gospels; also called Didymus (John 11:16, 20:24, 21:2), which, like Thomas, means “Twin.” He is depicted as doubting and then confessing (John 20:24–29), a feature that also appears in apocryphal accounts of the bodily assumption of Mary (De Obitu S. Dominae, De Transitu Virginis). Tradition linked him with Edessa, Parthia, and India, where the church claims him as its founder. At his legendary place of martyrdom in Mylapur (India), there is a stone cross (6th–8th c.).

Thomas, Acts of. This Apocryphal* Acts is the only one preserved in its entirety. Although its original text, probably in Syriac, has been lost, a Greek translation and a Syriac rewriting for Orthodox service remain.

This work most likely originated from several legend narratives but seeks to present a unified work focused on one character, Thomas*, Jesus’ twin brother, his life, ministry, and martyrdom. It was probably written in the 3rd c. CE in eastern Syria, perhaps in Edessa, the location of Egeria*’s (Pilgrimage, 17.1, 19.2) visit to Thomas’s tomb a century later. The Acts of Thomas was appreciated by the Manichaeans* and despised by Orthodox Christians. The Manichaean Psalter* of the early 4th c. CE is the earliest reference to the Acts of Thomas. Soon after, Christian adversaries of the Apocryphal Acts of Apostles, figures such as Epiphanius* of Salamis, Augustine* of Hippo, Philastrius of Brescia, and Turribius of Astorga, mention and condemn the book.

The work is composed of three main parts. Acts 1–2 present as an introduction the legend of the apostle, who was sold as a slave to a merchant and eventually became an architect for the king Gundaphor of India*. Acts 3–8 unfurl two parallel series of miracles, and finally Acts 9–14 tell the story of the apostle’s martyrdom.

The Acts of Thomas depicts an ascetic* form of Christianity present in eastern Syria. It contains important liturgical material that contributes to an understanding of the baptismal rite in that part of the ancient world. Other typical expressions of early Syriac* Christianity are demonstrated in the text’s “Hymn to the Bride” and the “Hymn of the Pearl.” FRANÇOIS BOVON

Thomas, Gospel of, one of the Coptic Gospels (the second treatise in the second codex of Nag* Hammadi), divided by modern scholars into 114 “sayings of Jesus.” There are a few dialogical elements but virtually no narrative framing. Its composition is attributed to the apostle “Didymus Judas Thomas,” i.e. “Judas the twin” (brother of Jesus; see Mark 6:3).

The Coptic text, discovered in 1945, is a translation produced in Egypt (c300). Some patristic writers mention and quote a Gospel of Thomas. The papyri Logia Iesou in Greek (published 1897) are fragments of the Gospel of Thomas: POxy 654 corresponds to Thomas 1–7; POxy 1 (from c200) to Thomas 26–60, 77b, 31–33; and POxy 655 to Thomas 24, 36–39. The Greek version reflects an older stage of the tradition-history. According to cautious scholars, an early form of the Gospel of Thomas was written in Syria c120–140; some scholars argue for a much earlier date, c50–70.

The Gospel of Thomas includes sapiential, prophetic, and “I”-sayings of Jesus; metaphors* and parables*; beatitudes*; cries of lamentation; proverbs; words of law; and community ordinances. Roughly 50% of the sayings have parallels in the Synoptic* Gospels but also in John (cf. Thomas 77 and John 8:12; 1:3) and Paul (cf. Thomas 17 and 1 Cor 2:9). The question of dependence is controversial and has to be decided on a case-by-case basis. Sometimes Thomas adopts typical features of one of the Synoptic Gospels, thus indicating that the writer is familiar with them. But there are also independent sayings (including some parables [cf. Thomas 97–98]), as well as sayings with an unmistakable Gnostic* flavor (cf. 28, 50).

These traditions are often cast in a provocatively enigmatic style (Thomas 7). The reader, privy to esoteric knowledge, is meant to detect the hidden meaning of these sayings and thus find true (spiritual) life (1). Thomas is clearly established as the real leader of the apostles (13). The role of the individual believer is emphasized, while that of the community is diminished (cf. POxy 1, 23–27 and Matt 18:29). Ritual praxis is viewed with skepticism (Thomas 6, 104).

Sayings about the inner presence of the Kingdom* of God in Thomas 3 and 113 frame the Gospel of Thomas and form a recurrent theme. The much-discussed saying 114 about “making Mary* [Magdalene] male” intends to reestablish a primordial unity (22) that includes resurrection* and salvation*. The Gospel of Thomas clearly propagates an alternative vision of Christian life; thus its later Coptic form was most likely preserved among monastic* circles in Egypt.

HANS-JOSEF KLAUCK

Thomas, Infancy Gospel of, late-2nd-c. narrative with episodes from the life of Jesus between the ages of 5 and 12 (often called paidika in manuscripts). The work exists in three different Greek recensions and in translations (some with additional material, such as the Slavonic version). The attribution to the apostle Thomas* is probably an interpolation.

The Infancy Gospel of Thomas quotes the nucleus from which the whole work grew: the story about the 12-year-old Jesus in the Temple (Luke 2:41–52). New material fills the gap from Jesus’ birth. The NT supplies expressions and personal names, patterns of speech, and narrative motifs. Some stories imitate the accounts of healing and raising of the dead in the canonical Gospels and Acts. The repeated emphasis on the efficacy of Jesus’ words and a repetition of motifs (e.g. Jesus outdoing a total of three teachers in disputations) structure the loosely connected individual scenes. The vivid style is sometimes interrupted by Jesus’ profound words (e.g. his “trinitarian” exegesis of the letter “A”). These tales of an “arrogant divine child” (Cullmann’s phrase) meet certain cultural expectations. Biographies in antiquity tended to see their heroes’ future deeds presaged in their youth. Thus the boy Jesus is shown as a great wonderworker and superior teacher: God is already recognized in the child. See also APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

HANS-JOSEF KLAUCK

Thomas, Madathilparampil Mammen (M. M.) (1916–96), a layperson from Kerala, India, along with Paul Devanandan and D. T. Niles*, was seminal in shaping the ecumenical* movement and the theological conversation in South Asia. A self-educated theologian, Thomas shaped global theology by paying close attention to the interplay of theology and his local context of India*.

Thomas, a contextual* theologian, believed Jesus Christ was the hermeneutical* key to helping Christians understand and relate to the issues of their world. The two critical interrelated issues of India and elsewhere in Thomas’s time were nation building and religious pluralism*. In such a context, it was important for Christians to bring their unique vision into conversation with persons of other faiths in order to create a vision of the nations that was for the betterment of all.

Thomas articulated his vision through the ecumenical movement. He was a strong influence in the World Student Christian Federation (as secretary and later vice chairman, 1947–53). He contributed to the formation of the Department of Church and Society of the World* Council of Churches and was a member of it (1961–68); and he was the moderator of the Council’s Central Committee (1968–75).

DAMAYANTHI M. A. NILES

Thomas Aquinas. See AQUINAS, THOMAS.

Thomas Christians, members of a Christian community in Kerala, on the Malabar coast in Southwest India*. They claim to have been founded by the apostle Thomas*. See also MALABAR CHRISTIANS.

Thomas à Kempis, Thomas Hemerken (c1380–1471), spiritual writer. Born in Kempen and educated at Deventer by the Brethren* of the Common Life, he joined the Augustinian* canons (1399) and was ordained a priest (c1409). He was well known both as a copyist and as an author; The Imitation of Christ*, which bears his name, may be based on writings by Geert Groote*, edited and translated into Latin by Thomas.

Thomas Mass, a Holy Communion service celebrated on Sunday evenings in Helsinki (where it originated in 1988), throughout Finland*, other parts of Scandinavia*, and Germany*. It is at once a service for doubters and unaffiliated people, a form of evangelization*, and sacramental* worship centered on a festal eucharistic celebration. The liturgy incorporates old liturgical traditions, the spirit of ecumenism, an emphasis on lay activity, and contemporary popular music. With this variety of spiritual traditions, Thomas Mass addresses the needs of very different people. It is an urban form of worship in an atmosphere of pluralism* and religious uncertainty.

HEIKKI KOTILA

Thomism. Thomas Aquinas completed his second three-year appointment at the University of Paris in 1272, returned to Naples to teach Scripture to junior Dominican* friars, but died in March 1274. Thomism, the theological movement based on his work and expanding it, slowly emerged.

Soon after his death, his secretary, Reginald of Piperno, “completed” the Summa Theologiae on which he was working, by incorporating much earlier material. Perhaps surprisingly, Aquinas left no “disciples,” no “school.” On the contrary, as early as 1270, proscription by the bishop of Paris of 13 problematic theses allegedly taught in the arts faculty cast an unfavorable light on the use of Aristotle* that Aquinas more than anyone was responsible for introducing into theological discourse. In 1277 more extensive lists of supposedly Aristotelian positions were proscribed, in Paris but also at Oxford, with the authority of the archbishop of Canterbury, himself a Dominican friar.

By 1286, however, the Dominicans* seem to have felt obliged to defend their confrere in an atmosphere of misgivings and suspicions about his ideas. The Franciscans* in particular contended that certain Aristotelian ideas undermined the legacy of theological orthodoxy inherited especially from Augustine*. Their worries revolved round Aquinas’s claim that, since the doctrine of creation* has to do with the world’s total dependence on God, the world might have existed from eternity and yet be created; Aquinas’s insistence on the role of the senses in the acquisition of knowledge (ruling out direct divine illumination); and his characterization of the soul* as the one and only substantial form of the body (hylomorphism, against the traditional conception of the plurality of forms in the human person, e.g. corporeal, vegetative, intellectual). A handful of theologians began to defend Aquinas’s doctrine of the superiority of reason* over will*. They reacted against the dominant Franciscan doctrine of the self-determination of the will* (voluntarism) in John Duns* Scotus and then William* Ockham. This reaction eventually settled down into an identifiably “Thomistic” philosophical anthropology* and, by extension, an anti-voluntaristic doctrine of God*.

In Italy, by the mid-15th c., a humanistic Christian moral theology, clearly indebted to Aquinas’s integration of Aristotle’s Ethics, was being developed by Dominicans (Antoninus of Florence, 1379–1459). In Germany the Neoplatonist* elements in Aquinas were incorporated into the apophatic* theology of Meister Eckhart* (d1328). By 1409 the Dominican John Capreolus (1380–1444) had inaugurated the first comprehensive presentation of Thomist theology. The Summa Theologiae became the standard textbook for professors of theology, especially in universities where Dominicans taught. A school of Northern Italian Thomists, again mostly Dominicans, contributed significantly to the development of 16th-c. Renaissance humanism.

Erasmus* disparaged Aquinas’s theology on the grounds that it was composed at a time when theologians were generally ignorant of Greek and Hebrew. On the other hand, Thomas de Vio Cajetan, an Italian Dominican, composed an exposition of the Summa Theologiae, which would be included at the foot of each page in the critical edition commissioned by Pope Leo* XIII (late 19th c.). During the deliberations of the Council of Trent*, Aquinas’s theology was treated as a benchmark, especially with regard to the distinction between nature* and grace*; the doctrine of justification*; the conception of the human person as a true secondary cause, with no room for alleged competition between human and divine freedom; the sacraments* as instrumental causes that effect what they signify ex opere operato (and thus are not dependent on human will); the doctrine of transubstantiation* at the eucharistic consecration (neither annihilation of the bread and wine nor merely symbolic presence of Christ's body and blood); the doctrine of eternal life as consisting in seeing God face to face; and much else. While it is not true that the Summa Theologiae was placed side by side with the Bible on the altar at the Council of Trent, nevertheless in 1567, Pope Pius V, himself a Dominican, ranked Aquinas among the four major doctors of the church, which gave theology "according to the mind of Saint Thomas," secundum mentem Sancti Thomae, quasi-official status in the Roman Catholic Church. In the 17th c., especially on the Spanish peninsula, Thomists composed commentaries on Aquinas's treatment of the gifts of the Holy* Spirit, while others elaborated on Aquinas's positions on natural justice* to allow for properly humane and Christian treatment of the indigenous peoples whom Europeans found in Central and Latin America. In the mid-19th c., in response to what was perceived to be an abandonment of respect for reason, Aquinas's arguments for the existence of God and his conception of the natural moral law gave rise to a widely taught natural* theology and natural law ethics, which, for better or worse, began to dissipate in the second half of the 20th c., freeing Aquinas (as many would think) from the burden of being studied through any form of Thomism. See also AQUINAS, THOMAS. FERGUS KERR

Thomson, James (1788–1854), British colporteur who distributed the Bible in Mexico*, where he arrived in 1827 from Argentina*; he was sponsored by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

MARÍA ALICIA PUENTE LUTTEROTH and ELIZABETH JUDD

Thou. See I–THOU RELATION.

Three Chapters ("three headings") include (1) Theodore* of Mopsuestia's writings, (2) Theodoret's* writings against Cyril, and (3) Ibas's* letter to Maris. These pro-Chalcedonian writings were at the center of a 6th-c. attempt to find middle ground in the controversy between "Diphysites"* (Chalcedonians), who affirmed two natures in Christ, and "Miaphysites," who, following Cyril*, affirmed one nature. Ibas and Theodoret had been condemned at the Second Council of Ephesus* (449) but vindicated at Chalcedon (451); Justinian* moved closer to Cyril's language, while claiming to remain faithful to Chalcedon. Justinian condemned the Three Chapters (544), as did the Second Council of Constantinople* (551). Pope Vigilius*, under pressure, twice affirmed these condemnations (547, 553). Large portions of the Western* Church in Africa, Spain, and Northern Italy broke communion with Rome and Constantinople, buttressing their argument with Latin translations of many crucial sections of the Three Chapters, influencing later Western thought about the person of Christ. See also FACUNDUS OF HERMIANE.

Threefold Office of the Church. See POLITY.

Three-Self Principle and Patriotic Movement in China. The three goals of self-government, self-support, and self-propagation were initially implemented through the development of independent Chinese churches in the late 19th c. The "three-self principle" was officially endorsed by the General Conference of Chinese Protestant Churches in Shanghai (1922) and the National Christian Council of China (1922). After the establishment of the People's Republic of China, the "Three-Self Patriotic Movement" was founded (1950) to assure the government of the churches' patriotism and became a governmental agency functioning as a tool for governmental supervision of the churches. To avoid this supervision, many house churches do not register with it. See also CHINA; CHINESE CONTEMPORARY INDEPENDENT AND HOUSE CHURCHES.

Thurman, Howard (1900–81), was born in Daytona Beach, Florida, reared in a nurturing home, attended the Black Church, and was spiritually enlivened by the beauty of nature. A graduate of Morehouse College and recipient of a Ph.D. from Boston University, Thurman was professor of theology and dean of Rankin Chapel at Howard University (1932–44). He gained world recognition as the dean of Marsh Chapel at Boston University (1953–65). Thurman did not fit easily into any academic specialization. He cultivated a spirituality that many regarded as an "activistic" mysticism*. Fundamental to his Christian spirituality was the concept of encounter. The human–divine relation is always an encounter mediated by personality, a direct subject-to-subject relation. The principle of personality is universal. As cofounder of the Church for the Fellowship of All People, Thurman embodied this principle in his commitment to race* relations, ecumenism*, and inter-religious reconciliation*. Among his enduring works are Jesus and the Disinherited (1949), The Creative Encounter (1954), The Luminous Darkness (1965), The Search for Common Ground (1971), and For the Inward Journey (1984).

VICTOR ANDERSON

Tiara, originally a Persian raised headdress or Phrygian cap, adopted by the pope (8th c.); three crowns were successively added (14th c.).

Tikhon, Patriarch (Vasily Ivanovich Bellavin, 1865–1925), monk, priest, bishop, patriarch (1917) of the Russian Orthodox Church. Tikhon's election as patriarch was the pinnacle of an illustrious career in the Russian Church. He was the first to hold the patriarchy since it had been disbanded by Peter I in 1700. Tikhon, however, presided over the Church during a period of great upheaval – the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution. He was imprisoned and constantly harassed for alleged anti-Soviet activity until his death. He was canonized as a saint in 1989.

ROY R. ROBSON

Tillich, Paul (1886–1965), theologian, born and educated in Germany, ordained Lutheran minister (1912), chaplain during World War I. He taught in Germany (1918–33) until dismissed because he opposed the Nazi regime, then at Union Theological Seminary (New York), Harvard University, and the University of Chicago (1933–65).

"A man on the boundary" was Tillich's definition of himself – on the boundary between essence and existence, church and world, memory and hope*, transcendence and immanence, or "Catholic substance" and "Protestant* principle." One of the most prolific theologians of his time, he invented a new way of doing theology: by "outsourcing" it (a term he did not use). He talked about religion* and culture*, each outsourcing itself in the other: as the ultimate concern, religion is the substance of culture and culture gives form to religion. The realm to which both religion and culture belong is the symbol*, each of its two parts outsourcing itself in the other. No outsourcing, no symbol – and no ultimate concern. There is no way, either, of correlating symbol and that which is symbolized, no method by which to test theology and its relevance – as Tillich made plain by writing Systematic Theology (3 vols., 1951–63), which was organized around this correlation.

In a century whose every field of inquiry underwent a radical mutation, Tillich spearheaded the long overdue scrubbing of theological language. Combining antiquity and modernity, myth* and technology*, secularization* and the death* of God, Tillich's method of correlation sharpened the focus of his quest for a new religious paradigm fit for a world characterized by the porosity of religious and cultural traditions.

On the boundary, Tillich was torn between his Lutheran heritage and the still predominantly Calvinistic* orientation of his US refuge. Torn between Catholic substance and Protestant principle (Protestant Era, 1948), the aesthetic* and the ethical* (Morality and Beyond, 1963), being and speaking, he was both irresistibly beckoned by one prong and fascinated by the other. The traditional coupling of religion (sacred) and culture (profane) is subverted by the iconoclastic* dialectic of the holy* and the not-yet-holy, i.e. of the religious and the secular* (Theology of Culture, 1959). Whatever might be the language in which one dwells, Tillich switched the symbol of this language from its traditional housing in (sacred) music to (secular) architecture: there is no church in the New Jerusalem (On Art and Architecture, 1987). The universalism proclaimed by today's world religion, East or West, is henceforth subject to what is common to them all – not the religious, but the secular (Christianity and the Encounter of the World Religions, 1963).

This inference shows that the method of correlation is so construed that the symbolic demythologization*, or ethical desacralization, or metaphysical deconstruction hanging on one prong affects the other, theology. Theology, obligated to "the eternal truth of its foundation," must speak to "the temporal [secular] situation in which its truth is received." Having no language of its own, theology is apologetic* more than kerygmatic*; it deals no less with penultimate concerns than with the ultimate concern to which they point. Holding that human beings ask questions to which they have no answer, Tillich also holds that being has primacy over speaking. The ultimate concern – faith* (Dynamics of Faith, 1957) – is not properly framed unless the substance of the answer is independent, though the form itself is not, nor need be, independent of the question. The Unconditioned (God) has no condition other than a human condition.

A figure of that condition is Jesus as the Christ. "Christ" is an eschatological* designation, and Tillich never forgets that the quest of the Kingdom* need result neither in "religious devaluation of nature" nor in "naturalistic devaluation of religion." No "enemy of salvation," nature partakes of history, even of salvation* and its symbolics, although Tillich admits he thought of calling for a moratorium on the idea of salvation. Instead, nature being involved in human fall, Tillich's substitute for a sacrificial* Christology is sketched in his scheme of a nature-friendly Christology of which salvation* is and remains the matrix. Through the Incarnation*, God participates in what is estranged from God, yet God remains God.

God* is "being-itself." This only nonsymbolic statement means that, although the fundamental symbol of our ultimate concern is God, God is not merely a symbol, nor is God the only symbol. God is not this or that kind of highest being, but the ground of being and no less personal for not being a particular person. Beyond the contrast of essential and existential being, God is the power of being, i.e. of the "at-onement*" of the divine and the human. God's quest, which is essential to human beings in quest of being human, becomes historical in Jesus as the Christ. The human on the boundary is the New Being in Christ, the being for whom the boundary is what, always, lies ahead.

GABRIEL VAHANIAN

Time. Events occur and then perish; future events are awaited, occur, and perish. All that is "real" is the fleeting present. Yet past events can continue to have an influence through their effects, or through the memory of those who have participated, or through writings that recount them. Future events can influence the present through hope* or fear. Augustine* (Confessions, 11th book) notes both the transitoriness of events and the "presence" of the past through memory, the "presence" of the future through anticipation. He knows that the passage of time can be measured by the movement of the heavenly bodies or by clocks (primitive as they were in his day compared with the mechanical clocks of the late Middle Ages or digital clocks). What chiefly interests Augustine, however, is our awareness of time through memory and anticipation; he calls it a "distention" or stretching of the mind, the persistence of consciousness through many fleeting moments. In addition to this subjective awareness of time, however, there is also the pathos of time: not only do we know that events are constantly passing, but we have specific regrets about, or fond memories of, the past and fears, sometimes vague and sometimes precise, about the future. In Greek, chronos, measured time, was differentiated from kairos, the time of temptation, opportunity, or fulfillment.

All peoples have tried to impose order on the passage of time through the repetition of ceremonies during the cycles of the day, the year*, or the seven-day week, so that new events will not be totally unexpected but can be interpreted, perhaps even ritually influenced, by what is familiar from the past. Ancient Israel not only looked to decisive events in the past (especially the Exodus* and Sinai*) but anticipated future events, e.g. "the day of the Lord" (Amos 5:18–20), "the year of God's favor" (Isa 61:2), and eventually a definitive judgment* and fulfillment (see Eschatology Cluster). When there is hope for life and fulfillment after death – often called "eternal life" – this is understood to be an overcoming of the hazards of temporality, an enjoyment of God without fear of loss, without vulnerability.

The early Christian message added an "already" to this "not yet," avowing that the time of fulfillment had already come, that "now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor 6:2), the time of the "new* creation" (Isa 43:19, 65:17; 2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15), that one's response to Christ would affect one's entire destiny (see Justification, Theological Views and Practice, Cluster). While the early church thought of itself as still living in the "old age" and anticipating the "age to come," increasingly it thought of itself as living in the time of fulfillment and eventually began dating events "before" and "after" Christ (Dionysius* Exiguus, c470–c544, invented the anno Domini era).

In the Bible, there is an awareness not only that God does not change as the world changes (Ps 90:2; Isa 40:6–8), but that God's purposes extend from the past into the future (since God is the everlasting God; Gen 21:33; Isa 40:28) and are sovereign over the events in the world.

As lord over time, God brings into transitory time the divine promise of salvation*, redemption*, righteousness*, and covenant* (Isa 40:8; 45:17; 51:6, 8; 55:3), which transcends time. Christ's eucharistic* presence (however understood) is associated with both past and future: the present moment is constituted by both the memory and the anticipation of the church.

Then how should one understand eternity*? What does it mean to say that God is "eternal"? Originally it seems to have meant that God is everlasting, without beginning or end. Increasingly, it came to mean that God is timeless, atemporal, beholding all moments of time in a single eternal "now." Boethius* gave the classic definition of eternity as "the total, simultaneous, and perfect possession of an unlimited life."

Modern theologians have tended to move away from this notion on the grounds that it makes God's purposes static rather than living; God's experience, they suggest, may be temporal, but without the vulnerabilities of finite beings. Yet with Kierkegaard*, they often emphasize the Christian paradox* that the infinite God has become a finite human. Latin American Liberation* theologians go further in their affirmation of the Incarnation* as God assuming both temporality and vulnerability. Process* theology has affirmed the positive aspects of seeing God as related to, and thus affected by, events in the world rather than aloof from them.

Theologians from non-European cultures (including Native* American theologians) have noted that under the influence of Western European cultures, Christian theologies give a central role to temporality and history*, leading to a clash (rather than an inculturated* dialogue*) with cultures that give a central role to spatiality.

EUGENE TESELLE

Timor-Leste. The Portuguese colonized the island of Timor in the mid-16th c. After a military clash, Portugal surrendered West Timor to the Dutch (1859). The Portuguese ruled East Timor ("Timor-Leste") until 1975 (except from 1942 to 1945, the period of Japanese occupation). Most East Timorese were not forced to convert to Christianity and held onto their traditional animist beliefs. Local leaders, however, were encouraged to embrace Roman Catholicism and sent their children to Catholic schools. By 1974 only 30% of the population had joined the Roman Catholic Church.

The invasion of East Timor by the Indonesian army (1975) enhanced the role of the Catholic Church; it provided moral support, general assistance, and a communication network for suffering East Timorese, as well as sanctuaries for those who escaped from the repression. Furthermore, the Indonesian rulers brought with them the pancasila, the five state principles (see Indonesia) to which every Indonesian was supposed to adhere. Since the first of these principles is "belief in one God," and since the traditional Timorese beliefs were not considered part of an official religion, many East Timorese adopted the Catholic faith.

Pope John* Paul II's visit to East Timor in October 1989 was a major boost for the Church and gave East Timorese a sense of identity. By 1996 the number of Catholics had increased significantly to around 80% of the population.

The Catholic Church and its spiritual leader, Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, SDB, gained more influence among the people after the 1999 referendum. The overwhelming vote for independence from Indonesia led not to an easy transition but to a traumatic struggle that included a terror campaign by pro-Indonesian militias. After a brief period under the UN transitional administration in East Timor, East Timor gained its independence (2002) as the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste, or Republika Demokratika Timor Lorosa'e (in the Tetun language).

However, the result of the referendum left deep divisions within families, within communities, and within (and between) churches in a nation plagued by continuing unrest and violence. Nevertheless, the Catholic Church, along with the minority Igrejas Protestantes de Timor Lorosa'e (East Timor Protestant Churches) and Pentecostal churches, remains central to the life of the community.

Statistics: Population (2008 estimate): between 0.8 and 1.1 million; Christians, 99% (Roman Catholics, 98%; Protestants, 1%); Muslims, 1%. (Source: World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001; updated with 2005 census and The CIA World Factbook, 2008.)

DAUD SOESILO

Timothy, Paul's companion, assistant, emissary (1 Cor 4:17; Rom 16:21; Phil 2:19–23). Because he is called Paul's "child in the Lord" (1 Cor 4:17), he was probably converted by Paul. In order not to offend the Jews, he was circumcised (Acts 16:1–3). The epistles to Timothy represent him as a guardian of the apostolic tradition against heresy* and immorality.

Timothy, 1 and 2 Epistles to. See PASTORAL EPISTLES, 1 AND 2 TIMOTHY AND TITUS.

Timothy II Aelurus (d477), theologian; 26th patriarch of Alexandria (457–77, though mostly in exile). He was labeled "the great" by Zacharias Rhetor, but "Aelurus" (implying "weasel") by his opponents because of his austere, lean physique. He supported the doctrinal position of Dioscorus (d454) during the Chalcedonian controversies. By standing up against Rome, he began a new era in the history of the church and of the politics of the Middle East. Timothy vigorously rebutted the Tome* of Leo and refuted the Definition of the Council of Chalcedon*. Opposed to Chalcedon because it was "Nestorian*," he equally opposed Eutychianism*, which he considered a mirror image of Nestorianism. For him (as is evident in his Syriac letters) a simple assertion of a real and true incarnation* by the truly divine Word of God was sufficient. Divinity and flesh had but one immutable nature in the person of Christ. See also MIAPHYSITE; ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL, CLUSTER: COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH. RIFAAT EBIED

Tithe, in ancient Israel, one-tenth of all grain and fruit, herds and flocks, due to God for the support of the priests and Levites, as well as the poor (Lev 27:30–32; Deut 14:22–30). For convenience the tithe could be given as money. The early church was supported by voluntary gifts, but from the 4th c. the tithe steadily became the normal expectation for the support of the church ministries. Originally voluntary, during the Middle Ages in Europe it became a land tax (beginning between the late 6th and late 8th c. in France, Spain, Italy, Germany, and Anglo-Saxon England). At first, the tithe was paid in agricultural produce and livestock for use by the parishes and stored in tithe barns near church buildings for the benefit of the church ministries. It was divided among the local churches (to meet, among other things, the needs of clergy and monasteries), the poor, and the bishops. After the Reformation, in several European countries (e.g. Germany, Scandinavia, Switzerland), the state began collecting the tithe for the (state-)church as a "church tax," before being progressively abolished (from the late 18th c. to the mid-20th c.). In the USA, with its total separation of church and state, after the Civil War the "tithe" as a voluntary gift of 10% of one's income was claimed to be a divine command by church leaders. See also ECONOMY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: ECONOMIC STUDIES OF THE HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE UNITED STATES.

Titus, companion of Paul, born of Gentile parents (Gal 2:3); a member of the delegation from Antioch accompanying Paul and Barnabas* to the meeting in Jerusalem even though he was not circumcised (Gal 2:1–5); Paul's emissary to Corinth (2 Cor 8:16–24). In the Epistle to Titus*, he is portrayed as supervising Cretan* churches and giving instructions to bishops* and male and female presbyters*.

Titus, Epistle to. See PASTORAL EPISTLES, 1 AND 2 TIMOTHY AND TITUS.

Tobit, an apocryphal* (or deuterocanonical*) Greek book, is a tale of two main characters, a pious Jew, Tobit, and a pious Jewess, Sarah, in Nineveh, capital of the Assyrian Empire, one of the places to which Jews were exiled (late 8th–7th c. BCE). Scholars agree that this tale is fictitious, as historical inaccuracies show. Tobit among the exiles observed fervently the Law of Moses, yet in return suffered blindness. Sarah married seven times, but each of her husbands died before the consummation of the marriage, killed by the demon Asmodeus. Both Tobit and Sarah prayed for death. God heard their respective prayers, delivered them from their pain, and restored their faith and dignity through the act of Tobias, son of Tobit (who married Sarah), with the help of the angel Raphael disguised as Azarias. The fact that there is no suspense in the storytelling – the resolution of the crisis is revealed in early chapters (3:16–17, 6:6–8) – increases the opportunity for irony. Because this is the story of ordinary people (rather than heroic figures such as Daniel*, Esther*, or Judith*), some scholars considered it a romance weaving together biblical themes (especially from Job, Genesis, Jonah, Amos) and variants of secular folktales such as "The Grateful Dead" (Tobit buries the dead), "The Bride of the Monster" (Sarah is a "Dangerous Bride," another name for this folktale), and "Ahiqar" (the story of an Aramaic wise man).

Tobit was probably written during the 3rd or 2nd c. BCE in either Hebrew or Aramaic (fragments were found in Cave 4 of Qumran*); the book is best known in three Greek recensions. The edifying moral and pious Jewish teachings are clear throughout the book.

PHILIP CHIA PHIN YIN

Togo. Togo was occupied by the Germans from 1884 to 1920. German Togoland was partitioned between the British and the French (1920–60); after independence, the British portion became part of Ghana*, while the French portion became the Togolese Republic, or Togo.

Christians (42.6%) have the largest religious presence in the south, although there are many African Religionists (38%); Muslims (19%) exercise the dominant religious influence in the north. African* Instituted Churches (3%) and Charismatics* are quite visible.

In 1886 Fr. Jerry Moran and his companions in the Society of African Missions built a medical mission in Atakpame. After Fr. Moran's sudden death, they were replaced by German Divine Word missionaries (in Lomé, 1890), who developed an education* system and built the twin-towered Gothic cathedral that still dominates the skyline in Lomé. During the French occupation, vocations to sisterhood were high (first Togolese congregation, Soeurs de Notre Dame de l'Église, founded in 1952). When Togo became independent (1960), the first president, Sylvanus Olympio, was Roman Catholic, as were two-thirds of parliamentarians under his successors. In 1965 the majority of bishops in Togo were native born. A Benedictine monastery was established at Dzogbegan (1967), where it is also serve as a cultural center.

Although the Methodist Church of Togo was the first Protestant Church founded in Togo (mid-1800s), the Evangelical Presbyterian Church (Église Évangélique Presbytérienne du Togo), established by the Bremen Missionary Society (late 1800s) and later supported by the Paris Missionary Society (since 1922), is much larger and has focused on evangelizing North Togo and administering schools and catechists' training. The Assemblies of God also have a large following.

The Roman Catholic Church and the (Protestant) Christian Council of Togo (since 1983) played a role in the social transformation of Togo by initiating social and rural projects, educating local elites, building hospitals and dispensaries, and sponsoring active women organizations. The major challenge remains the lack of democracy and the cooperation of some church leaders with corrupt political structures.

Statistics: Population (2000): 4.6 million (M). Christians, 1.98 M, 42.6% (Roman Catholics, 1.1 M; Protestants, 0.5 M; members of African Instituted Churches, 0.14 M); African Religionists, 1.7 M, 38%; Muslims, 0.9 M, 19%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

VALENTIN DEDJI

Toleration is a political term referring to a particular governmental attitude: allowing the presence of what is not officially approved, rather than persecuting or eradicating it. The term was used in the Act of Toleration (1689), by which Dissenters* in England were allowed to worship under certain conditions, and Locke* defended it in his Letters on Toleration (1689–92). Toleration is weaker and more begrudging than religious liberty* (see Church and State Relations Cluster), being granted on pragmatic grounds (usually to avoid public disorder), while religious liberty is a matter of principle.

Two milestones in toleration were the Peace of Augsburg* (1555) in Germany and, more decisively, the Peace of Westphalia* (1648), which allowed princes to adhere to either the Roman Catholic or the Protestant faith. The Edict of Nantes* (1598) granted certain privileges to French Protestants, although the official religion was Catholicism. Religious toleration could be granted when a ruler of one faith inherited a region that was of another faith (e.g. the Hohenzollerns in Prussia). It was also granted to diplomats or traders in a territory with another official religion (e.g. Catholics and Protestants in Turkish territory or Protestants in Latin American countries where Catholicism remained the only approved religion).

Tolstoy, Leo Nikolayevich (1828–1910), influential Russian writer, religious thinker, moral philosopher, social reformer, pacifist. He was particularly noted for his masterpieces of realistic fiction, War and Peace and Anna Karenina, although he thought that his novel Resurrection better expressed his religious ideas.

Following his conversion (c1878), this rich landlord reexamined Christian theology (A Critique of Dogmatic Theology, 1880–83) and described his spiritual development in Confession and What I Believe In, emphasizing that one should find one's own way to God and live according to Christ's teaching, instead of blindly performing church rituals. In 1901 the Russian Synod denounced Tolstoy's teaching as anti-Christian because he denied Christ's* divine nature, the doctrine of the Trinity*, and the virginity of the Mother of God (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster: Theotokos), and rejected all the sacraments*. For him, true Christianity is based on the Gospels, which he translated, having taught himself Greek (A Harmony and Translation of the Four Gospels, 1880–91).

Tolstoy preached nonresistance to evil, love* for one's enemy, peace*, meekness*, repentance*, forgiveness*, chastity*, charity*, and asceticism*. He felt that Christ's moral teaching was incompatible with wars*, law courts, aristocratic luxury and idleness, adultery, and a state supported by brutal force. In his Diaries, he confessed his sins* and analyzed their origin, looking for moral improvement. Inspired by Rousseau and Thoreau, he contrasted nature and civilization, was a vegetarian, and tried to adopt a peasant's lifestyle – wearing simple clothes, working the land, and making shoes. Opposed to private property, he resisted accepting money for his books.

As a religious and social reformer, Tolstoy was renowned among peasants for his generosity, had many followers in Russia, particularly among anarchists and pacifists, and strongly influenced Mahatma Gandhi's nonviolent* resistance.

ELENA VOLKOVA

Tomb of Jesus. In the Gospels, Jesus' tomb is notable for what is not there, i.e. Jesus himself. All four Gospels use the tomb as a backdrop for Jesus' resurrection*. Because preparation for burial was women's work in 1st-c. Palestine, the Gospels tell of female followers finding the tomb empty and being the first to confront Jesus' resurrection. While scholars and Christians generally content themselves with the literary tomb, there have been searches for the archaeological remains of the burial, on the one hand, and denials that Jesus was ever properly buried, on the other.

NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Tome of Leo, letter sent by Pope Leo to Flavian of Constantinople (449), which argued against Eutyches'* position. Ignored by the Second Council of Ephesus* (449), it was officially recognized by the Council of Chalcedon* (451) as one important source of its doctrinal statement that Christ is "one person in two natures."

Tongues, or Glossolalia, shorthand referring to "speaking in tongues" under the inspiration of the Holy* Spirit (1 Cor 14), emphasized in the Pentecostal* and Charismatic* movements. One of the gifts* of the Spirit.

Tonsure, haircut with religious significance, in which all or part (top or front half) of the head is shaved; commonplace by the 4th-5th c. in the monastic* movement and later extended to the priesthood (6th-7th c.). The early practice ("tonsure of St. Paul") was to shave the entire head; the Roman practice ("tonsure of St. Peter") was to shave the top of the head, leaving a ring or crown of hair; the Celtic practice ("tonsure of St. John") was to shave the front half of the head.

Torah (Heb "instruction"), term used in Judaism to designate (1) the first part of Tanakh* (the Pentateuch*; a mixture of foundational narrative and Law*), (2) the entirety of the HB (though Tanakh is the preferred term); or (3) "Oral Torah," the halakhah* ("the way to walk"), the authoritative tradition* derived from, and going beyond, the HB. The halakhah, which envisioned how to carry out the covenantal* vocation* in particular contexts, remained oral for centuries before being written in Mishnah, then Talmud. In the LXX and NT, the Gk nomos, "law," is usually the translation of "Torah." One should not overlook the fact that, in the NT, nomos has the diversified connotations of Torah (rather than the narrow sense of "law"). See also LAW.

Tractarian Movement. See OXFORD MOVEMENT.

Trading. See ALTERNATIVE TRADING.

Traditionalism, 19th-c. school of thought, associated with Lamennais*, that opposed individualistic rationalism* and looked to the collective tradition* of the human race, manifested most accurately in the Roman Catholic Church. It was condemned at the First Vatican* Council (1870).

TRADITION CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Tradition

2) A Sampling of Views and Practices

Tradition in the NT and the Early Church
Tradition and the Reformation's Scripture Principle

Tradition: A Roman Catholic Post-Vatican II Perspective

1) Introductory Entry

Tradition (Lat traditio; Gk paradosis), literally, "something delivered or handed down," is a verbal noun referring both to what is handed down (the tradition-content) and how it is handed over (the tradition-process). Tradition played an important role in the NT and early church, even though in the history of the church its relation to Scripture* was debated, especially in the controversy between the Reformation's* "Scripture* principle" (sola scriptura, "by Scripture* alone") and the Roman Catholic Church's emphasis on tradition (at the Councils of Trent* and Vatican* II). See also BIBLE INTERPRETATION CLUSTER: IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

2) A Sampling of Views and Practices

Tradition in the NT and the Early Church. When the Synoptic* Gospels were written during the second Christian generation, the church already possessed a normative standard called "tradition" (tradition-content), which Paul said he "received" from the Lord and "delivered" (paradidomi) to his readers, who in turn received it (tradition-process; 1 Cor 11:2, 23; 15:3; 2 Thess 2:15). Paul zealously followed the "traditions of [his] fathers" (Gal 1.4), in which he had been trained. While preserving the essential Jewish principle of "tradition" (associated with the concept of "Oral Torah*"), he made it the vehicle of the gospel*, wherein Jesus Christ became both its content and the principle of its origin (authority). For example, Paul argued that believers are freed from slavery to sin* as a result of "wholeheartedly obey[ing] the form [or pattern] of teaching to which [they] were entrusted" (or "delivered," Rom 6:17). The paradosis (tradition-content and tradition-process) of Jesus functioned as a dialectic between a pattern of belief and a pattern of conduct that identified believers as disciples of Christ.

The church's "tradition" in the NT, which, along with Scripture, provided a point of unity for the churches, included kerygmatic (or proclaimed), ecclesial, and ethical traditions, even though such subdivisions were not self-consciously present during the church's growth.

Kerygmatic Tradition is foundational; it summarizes the Christian message focused on Christ's death and resurrection. The tradition-process is exemplified in 1 Cor 15:1–3, where Paul reminds the Corinthians of the gospel, which he had received and "delivered" to them (15:3) through preaching, which they received and "in which [they] stand" firmly (15:1). The content of this "kerygmatic tradition" is Christ's death and resurrection "in accordance with the Scriptures" (15:3–4) and a list of resurrection appearances (15:5–7). This content – later called "the faith," or "rule*" (of faith; regula fidei*), or "the tradition" – is presented and explained by 1st- and 2nd-c. authors concerned with precisely defining or defending the Christian position.

Ecclesial or Liturgical Tradition is exemplified by Paul's admonitions about the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:17–34). Before citing Jesus' words, he states, "I received from the Lord that which I also delivered to you" (11:23), implying that while the ultimate authority for the tradition is the Lord, the words of this institution had become the common property of the believing church (his formulation suggests a previous liturgical usage).

Ethical Tradition is also exemplified by Paul's frequent use of the language of tradition for corporate and personal Christian practices, e.g. when he proposes that his ministry is a model for the life of believers, who by imitating Paul and the Lord become in turn a model (type) for others (1 Thess 1:5–7; 1 Cor 4:16; 11:1; Eph 4:20–21; Phil 2:5; 4:9). Similarly, Col 2:6 states, "Just as you have received (paralambano) Christ Jesus as Lord, continue to live in him," rather than following "human traditions" (2:8; see also 2 Thess 3:6). The writer of 1 Clement* used a similar tactic, exhorting schismatics to give up futile concerns concerning rivalry over leadership and "turn to the glorious and holy rule of our tradition" (7.2). This "ethical tradition" is also exemplified by the "two ways" tradition of the Didache* (late 1st–early 2nd c.).

In the next three centuries, the course of defining the church's tradition became increasingly more complex because of the need for increased theological precision about God as Trinity*, Christology* (the divinity and humanity of Christ), and liturgical* procedures. Baptismal formulas became qualified, though not replaced, by the rule(s)* of faith (as found in Irenaeus*, Tertullian*, and Origen*), by catechetical statements (e.g. in the Apostolic* Tradition or Cyril* of Jerusalem), and later by conciliar and non-conciliar creeds* (such as the Nicene* Creed and the Apostles* Creed, respectively). DANIEL H. WILLIAMS

Tradition and the Reformation's Scripture Principle. The 16th-c. Reformers* valued the tradition expressed in patristic literature, especially Augustine, as a means of interpreting Scripture* and of developing a truly biblical theology; this is what Reformers such as Luther* and Melancthon* were doing in following Augustine's injunction to "seek [God's] will in the holy scriptures" (On Christian Teaching III. 1). Their point was not to make Scripture autonomous, liberated from its ecclesiastical shackles, in a Gnostic*-like fashion. Rather, Scripture was supposed to be free in order to stand in judgment of all traditions and practices.

The assertion that the Reformers rejected the concept of tradition and the authority of the fathers and councils in their bid for "Scripture alone" (see Scripture Principle) is a misconstrual of the 16th-c. conflict as one of Scripture vs. tradition. Scripture could not be properly understood apart from the foundational tradition of the church, even when certain institutions of the church were being opposed. The Reformation was concerned to reclaim the ancient tradition – the "catholic" Tradition – against distortions of that Tradition in the Roman Catholicism of the time; this was ultimately a conflict of Tradition versus traditions. See also AUTHORITY IN/OF THE CHURCH.

DANIEL H. WILLIAMS

Tradition: A Roman Catholic Post-Vatican II Perspective. After an opening chapter on divine revelation*, the Second Vatican* Council's 1965 Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum, §2) treats tradition, understood both as the process of "handing on" (tradition as process) and as the living heritage that is handed on (tradition as content). Through the Holy* Spirit, the invisible bearer of tradition, the whole visible Church*, and not simply its authoritative leaders, has been empowered to transmit its memory*, experience, and expression of the foundational self-revelation of God that was completed with Christ and the NT community. Thus tradition involves the present "Church in her doctrine, life and worship" handing on to every generation "all that she is, all that she believes" (Dei Verbum, §8).

Tradition both as process and as content was challenged by the Reformation's* principle of "Scripture* alone" (sola scrip- tura). In reaction the Council of Trent* in its fourth session (1546) taught that "the gospel" (here roughly equivalent to revelation) is "the source of all saving truth and rule of conduct" and is "contained" not only in "the written books" but also in "the unwritten traditions which have come down to us." Even though the Council spoke of only one source, its language about the gospel being "contained" in "written books" and "unwritten traditions" led many Roman Catholics to develop the "two-source theory," according to which some revealed truths were contained in tradition and not in Scripture.

In effect Vatican II and Dei Verbum ruled out this theory by interpreting revelation as primarily the living self-communication of God (§1) rather than as a body of revealed propositions contained in the Bible* or other sources. Moreover, in highlighting the process of tradition (singular) rather than individual traditions (or particular teachings and practices), Dei Verbum (§9) insists that tradition and Scripture are united in their origin (revelation*), function (clarifying and actualizing revelation), and goal (the final, face-to-face revelation of God). Hence they may not be treated as two separate sources.

Two other Vatican II documents (on ecumenism* and the Eastern* churches) express the way Tradition (uppercase), or the patrimony as a whole, is passed on through particular traditions (lowercase). While the inspired* Scriptures (as the Word of God) have a unique power to reform particular traditions, the Tradition of the whole Church is the essential setting for understanding divine revelation and appropriating the message of the Bible. GERALD O'COLLINS, SJ Traditio-Redditio Symboli, the teaching of the Apostles Creed (traditio) and its recital (redditio) before the bishop, one of the last stages before baptism* in the early church.

Traducianism, theory that the soul*, like the body*, is generated by the parents, championed by Tertullian*, Apollinaris, and Gregory* of Nyssa; for Augustine*, this is the view which is the most compatible with original* sin. The alternatives, preexistence* and creatianism*

(each soul is created by God), are not as compatible with original sin. Traducianism is widely held in the Eastern Orthodox* Church and among Lutherans*. See also SOUL.

Transcendent, that which is “beyond”: God’s utter difference from the world; also the ability of human thought to rise reflectively above its immediate circumstances.

Transcendentalism, a New England religious movement that challenged conventional ideas of revelation*, the church*, and religious authority*. Among its key figures were Ralph Waldo Emerson*, Henry David Thoreau, Margaret Fuller, and Theodore Parker. Transcendentalism emerged in the 1830s from the liberal wing of the New England Congregational churches, Unitarianism*, which had displaced Calvinism with a conception of religion as the cultivation of a “likeness to God” (as William Ellery Channing said). Best remembered now as a literary movement, Transcendentalism also challenged what Emerson called “historical Christianity” and was shaped by concerns for social* justice*, such as Fuller’s advocacy of women’s* rights, Thoreau’s concern for nature (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster) and advocacy of civil disobedience (see Conscientious Objection), and the anti-slavery preaching of Parker (see Slavery and Christianity Cluster). The Transcendentalists emphasized personal spiritual experience and ethical judgment over church, tradition*, or scriptural* authority. It was one of the earliest examples of the convergence of religious reform with artistic innovation and progressive political reform in the USA.

DAVID M. ROBINSON

Transcendentals, in Scholasticism* those concepts that apply to all entities (e.g. being, one, truth, good).

Transept, transverse arms of a cross-shaped church (usually called “north” and “south” transepts because of the orientation* of the church).

Transfiguration. The story of Jesus’ transfiguration (metamorphosis) in Mark 9:1–8 is set in the context of death and rejection (8:31–38) and of suffering and humble service (9:9–37). The narrative is based on a midrashic* retelling of the Sinai epiphany* (Exod 19–20, 34). The cloud (the divine Shekinah, Exod 24:16), the presence of Moses (radiant in glory; see Exod 24:16–18, 34:35; 2 Cor 3:12–18), and the three chosen to go up the mountain (Exod 24:9; Mark 9:2) allude to Sinai. Following Bultmann* several scholars have approached this narrative of Jesus’ glorification as a misplaced “resurrection* narrative.” While significant, this approach risks reducing to a one-dimensional notion the multidimensional notion of Jesus’ glorification that includes the Resurrection*, Ascension*, Transfiguration, and Exaltation (Phil 2:9). Mark has clearly edited the story he received in depicting Peter as obtuse and uncomprehending (Peter is less so in Matthew* and the other Gospels). This might be Mark’s attempt to scale down Peter’s pretensions to claim global authority* over the Jesus movement after the Lord’s heavenly exaltation. Just as Moses had been exalted, and his authority was passed on to Aaron and those who ascended with him, so the exalted Jesus, the New Moses, intended his authority to be continued on earth by Cephas/Peter, James, and John (the Jerusalem “pillars”; Gal 2:9), whom he left behind. As a response to this claim, Mark underscores that the true glory of Jesus is his humble service (Mark 10:45). The divine voice that commands the apostles not to judge on the basis of appearances but to “listen” (Mark 9:8) explicitly refers them to Jesus’ teaching on abnegation, which Peter does not accept, leading to Jesus’ rebuke (Mark 8:31–33).

Long after these early power struggles, another feature of the story became prominent. The early fathers recognized that the story also reflects Jewish traditions of angelic metamorphosis (Moses and Elijah* were believed to have been lifted into heavenly glory when their earthly lives ended). From this perspective, Byzantine spirituality viewed the Transfiguration as the uncovering of the “natural” state of Jesus, as the God-man, which he normally obscured but allowed the apostles and later saints to glimpse in a uniquely graced mystical* perception. Developing this theme, patristic and Byzantine writers presented the Transfiguration as an overall symbol* of redemption* – when all natural life would be caught up into a graced deification* (theosis*) because of the risen Lord’s glory radiating through the new world of his kingdom*.

JOHN A. MCGUCKIN

Translation of the Bible. See BIBLE TRANSLATIONS CLUSTER.

Transubstantiation, the conversion of bread* and wine* into the Body and Blood of Christ in the Eucharist*, declared a dogma of the Roman Catholic Church at the Fourth Lateran* Council (1215).

Tree of Life. Adam* and Eve* are evicted from Eden after eating the fruit of the tree of knowledge to prevent them from eating the fruit of the tree of life and thus from attaining immortality (Gen 3:22). The image of the tree of life recurs as a symbol* of wisdom* in the Hebrew Scriptures; in Revelation* it symbolizes the eternal, perfect life in the New Jerusalem. Medieval Christian theologians connected the cross* (of death) with the tree of life, using the latter image to express the life-giving power of Jesus' death. Sometimes envisioned as an inverted tree, with its roots in God, the tree of life also symbolizes Jesus' power to form a bridge from the human (earth/soil/roots) to divine (heaven/sky/branches) realm.

NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Trent, Council of, convoked by three popes (Paul III, Julius III, Pius IV), met in 25 sessions over three periods (1545–48, 1551–52, 1562–63), mostly in Trent, an Italian city on the frontier of the Holy* Roman Empire. It had three aims: the eradication of the religious schism caused by the Protestant Reformation*; the reform of the Roman Catholic Church and the restoration of peace in Christendom; and the reclamation of the holy sites in Palestine for Christians. Its work was divided into "doctrine" and "reform," the former to delineate the boundaries between orthodoxy* and heresy*, the latter to address the abuses within the Catholic Church. For the papacy, the first aim was crucial, and it privileged discussion of doctrine over that of reform, leaving the question of the reform of the head of the Church to the Roman Curia* itself.

The first two periods of the Council focused on the Protestant heresy in Germany, while the third concentrated on the new Calvinist heresy in France. In spite of the attendance of German Protestants at the Council during the second period, which was forced by the temporary military defeat of Protestant princes by the Catholic emperor Charles V, the divisions of Christendom were sealed by the proclamations on doctrine that affirmed the Catholic interpretations of the sacraments*, the authority of the Vulgate* Bible, and the supremacy of the pope*, and by the condemnations of key Protestant doctrines, such as "justification* by faith alone." Other important doctrinal work included tightening the requirements for marriage* in order to avoid the problems caused by union between young people without parental consent. In the area of reform, the Council passed decrees that touched on all aspects of clerical life: the strengthening of episcopal authority (see Bishop) over chapters* and colleges; restrictions on appeals to Rome; regular episcopal visitations of dioceses; reform of all religious* orders, including the enforcement of strict closure for female convents; the stipulation that seminaries be established in every diocese; and the definition of the bishop's duty to reside in his diocese. Subjected both to the tugging demands of the papal court and the bishops and to the political considerations of the Holy Roman Empire, Spain*, and France, the decrees of the Council were not universally accepted. Rejected by Protestants, the Council was criticized in some Catholic areas, notably Venice and France, while its authority won quick acceptance in Spain, Portugal*, Italy*, and the Spanish Low Countries. It remained definitive for the Roman Catholic Church until the Vatican* councils of the 19th and 20th c. See also CATHOLIC RENEWAL. RONNIE PO-CHIA HSIA

Trial of Jesus. Jesus' trial before Pilate has drawn historians' attention since the beginning of biblical scholarship, for what transpired there seems to define the relationship of Jesus to the Roman Empire and, by extension, to prescribe the relationship of Christianity to politics* and power. Indisputable historical facts about the trial are, however, few and hard won. Ultimately what we know best according to historical criteria is the result of the trial – that Jesus was sentenced to be crucified. Accounts of Pilate's* interrogation of Jesus in the canonical Gospels vary, and since in every version Jesus' followers have fled, our story of the trial seems to be based on no eyewitness reports. The fact that all the canonical Gospels report Jewish crowds calling for Jesus' death has lent support to anti-Semitic* interpretations in scholarship and in the church, making the Jews collectively responsible and mysteriously exonerating the very Romans who, according to the Gospels themselves, ordered and performed the execution. See also BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION CLUSTER. NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Tribalism and Christianity. From an anthropological perspective, tribalism refers to both traditions and identity politics of "tribes" – defined in the broad sense of cultural, socioeconomic, and ethnic entities. These cultural and political dimensions of tribalism converge when contemporary "tribes" strive for identity and recognition for their ways of life within dominant and larger political entities. Conversely, the larger political entities marginalize* segments of society by designating them as “tribes” or “tribal,” in a colonialist* manner. The impact of Christianity on the emerging identity and political aspirations of “tribes” and on their struggles for preserving their cultural traditions has been both positive and negative. The Christian missionary enterprise has diluted tribal traditions, sometimes to the point of extinction, but has also provided a global platform for political aspirations through identification with Christian denominations associated with North Atlantic cultures. Missionaries were widespread in the 19th c., and most indigenous people throughout Asia were under the influence of Christianity by the early 20th c. There was an uneasy relationship between missionaries and colonial administrations, which were interested in conversion* only so long as it favored their administrative policies. The evolutionism* of the 19th c. (social Darwinism*) fueled missionary zeal by its apparent relegation of many indigenous societies to the bottom of the scale of progress and the presumption that all societies would eventually attain the highest stage of monotheism*.

Proponents of the anthropological concept of cultural relativism were critical of the missionary zeal to convert, and more broadly, the gendered and postcolonial critique (launched in the last half of the 20th c.) took particular aim at the replacement of values, such as sharing, cooperation, liberal sexual norms, and the high position of women in indigenous societies, by Christian or Western values, such as patriarchy*, private property*, and puritanical* views. In particular, Christianity had problematic relationships with matrilineal norms, communal living, polygamy*, and lack of control of women’s sexuality.

Conversely, anthropological fieldworkers often found that the conversion* process translated Christian views and practices into native values and meaning systems, as it had done in the Hellenistic world and later in Europe (see Inculturation Cluster: Of Christianity in the Greco-Roman World). Thus the Ten Commandments meant something specific to the Papuans (Engas, Medlpas, Chimbus) of Papua* New Guinea, who emphasized kinship relations and the sexual purity of women. The Modekngei religion of the Palauans of Micronesia preached that their local god was reincarnated as Jesus Christ. The local practices were not always given up, and sometimes traditional elements were hidden from sight and practiced in secret or adapted to fit in with the new religion. The acceptance of Christianity by indigenous people in the early mission period was often rooted in their traditional religion. They assumed that the gods of the missionaries were more powerful than their own and could give them all that they had given to the colonialists. In many traditional religions, there was a supreme and benevolent god figure that could easily be translated into the God of the Christians.

The egalitarian and humanistic values propagated by Christianity were often analogous to those held by indigenous peoples. However, traditional views of the environment (often seen as positive in modern times) were transformed by missionaries into views of nature as passive and inanimate. Thus some environmental activists have called for a return to pre-Christian values in order to maintain a sustainable relationship with the environment. Judeo-Christian theology makes a clear distinction between humanity and nature, giving a privileged position to humanity that has led to an exploitative attitude toward nature by Europeans and North Americans. Such distinctions between humanity and nature often do not exist in traditional societies, where nature is seen as both animate and in close kinship to humans. Feminists have also likened the exploitation of nature to the exploitation of women, pointing out that both are a feature of patriarchal religions such as Christianity. The conversion process is blamed both for the emergence of patriarchy in indigenous societies and for the loss of respect for nature (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster: Ecofeminist Theology).

At the political level, Christianity often encourages indigenous people to push for their own agenda as a unified body. Consequently, fragmented indigenous communities are often united under the umbrella of Christianity, which has frequently provided the needed transition to modernity. The emergence of a unified Naga identity in Northeastern India is a case in point. The experience of ethnic communities within largely Western and Christian nations like the USA and Mexico is again different from that of “original dwellers of the land” (Adivasis*) in non-Christian nations like India* and Myanmar*. In the latter cases, being Christian gives indigenous people a higher status in society where they would otherwise be relegated to the bottom. Thus in the caste* society of India, converted Adivasis enjoy a higher social standing than those who have not been converted and have been able to push for greater recognition within the larger state. The stigma associated with “tribal customs” that are considered savage continues to exist, and only “converted tribes” are recognized as modern.

Although the term “tribalism” has universal connotations, the experience of various ethnic communities in different parts of the world is not uniform. The colonial as well as the missionary impact has taken multifarious forms owing, e.g., to the particular Christian denomination that has taken a lead in proselytism*. However, the missionaries’ interest in imparting formal education* and making preliterate indigenous people literate has been universal. In middle India, missionaries devised a script for the local language of the Santals and wrote books on the traditional culture of the people. Many ethnic communities have become completely assimilated into the global culture through this Western education. In some places, local languages have been favored and in some cases the language of the dominant group, like English, has been imparted. The retention or rejection of local customs often parallels the treatment of the native language.

Exposure to the value systems of dominant cultures created aspirations in colonized peoples that included the desire for modern occupations and Western or urban lifestyles, and in many cases fanned indigenous sentiments of self-assertion, calling for a distinct identity. Christianity was one of the vehicles that linked ethnic communities to the larger world and created in them needs based on Western lifestyles. In the process, some of the old practices were condemned as backward and embarrassing. In most parts of the world, Christianity was equated with modernity and development, specifically as based on a Eurocentric model.

More recently, the changes brought about by two or more generations of Western education and exposure to the world through the adoption of dominant languages like English have created a backlash: in a search for their roots and identity, ethnic communities are going back to their traditions and in some cases even rejecting Christianity or modifying it to conform to their own idiom.

The political sentiments of “tribalism” were a major force in global politics in the early 21st c. Christianity played a dual role in helping to create identity consciousness as well as a non-Christian ethnic identity fostered by this very consciousness. Criticism of a Western model of development and Western ways of life has been politically connected to issues of global racism*, which have forced Christianity to project itself as a global and not a Western religion, adapting to local customs and values. In the last analysis, one can say that tribalism has had an effect on the nature of Christianity.

SUBHADRA MITRA CHANNA

Trinidad and Tobago. Together, these islands have formed the Independent Republic of Trinidad and Tobago since 1962. Africans (40.8%) and East Indians (from India, 40.7%) constitute the majority of its unusual population.

Roman Catholic mission, first established by Dominicans in 1513 during Spanish rule and then by Belgian Benedictines* and Jesuits*, became the Archdiocese of Port of Spain (1850). In the late 20th c., the Roman Catholic Church succeeded in creating a native clergy, which is exceptional for the Caribbean Islands; this success was due to the dynamic presence of the Catholic seminary at Mount St. Benedict. The Charismatic* Movement now plays an important role in the Catholic Church, making a solid contribution to the liturgical renewal and religious music.

Under British rule (from 1797), the centrality of the Roman Catholic Church did not change. The Anglican Church was at first a class church of the English plutocracy. The competition of Nonconformist* missionaries effected a change; thus before and after emancipation (1834), many Africans became members of the Anglican Church. Moravians (from 1783), Methodists* (from 1795), Baptists, Disciples of Christ, and Presbyterians, all influenced by the Evangelical Movement, helped to Christianize the African population, while the Presbyterians established a church among East Indian workers. Inculturation* and syncretism* played a role in this process and gave birth to African-Christian groups like the Shango in Trinidad, where the African element is predominant. The Pentecostal* and Charismatic* churches are very influential, especially among the poor. But the most impressive characteristic of Trinidad is the peaceful coexistence of Hindus*, Muslims (see Islam and Christianity Cluster), and Christians.

Statistics: Population (2000): 1.3 million (M). Christians, 0.8 M, 64% (Roman Catholics, 0.4 M; Protestants, 0.18 M; Anglicans, 0.15 M; independents, 0.04 M); Hindus, 0.3 M, 22%; Muslims, 0.09 M, 7%; native religionists, 0.02 M, 1.9%; nonreligious, 0.03 M, 2.2%. (Source: A. Lampe, ed., Christianity in the Caribbean, Kingston 2001.)

ARMANDO LAMPE

Trinity in Eastern Orthodoxy. The doctrine of the Trinity in Eastern Orthodoxy* is rooted in the apostolic affirmation of Jesus as the Messiah*. Early Christian thought, however, was defined in part by a debate over the person of Christ. There was general agreement among early Christians that Jesus as the Christ was divine, but there was debate over the degree of his divinity, i.e. whether Jesus as the Christ was of the same divinity as God the Father.

This debate came to a head in the 4th c. when Athanasius* of Alexandria asserted the full divinity of the Logos* against Arius* and against various forms of Arianism* that claimed the less than full divinity of the Logos. Notwithstanding the diversity, what unified Arian-like thought was the assertion that the full divinity of the Logos threatens monotheism* and leads to polytheism*. Athanasius, however, affirmed the full divinity of the Logos on the basis of the axiom that the created cannot save the created; only the uncreated can save the created. Humans ultimately need salvation* from death* and corruption, and only the union of the divine and human in Christ (see Incarnation Cluster: In the Orthodox Tradition) can accomplish this salvation. Athanasius' logic has two particularly significant implications: (1) God as Trinity rests on what Christians affirm about the divinity of Christ. Insofar as God as Trinity is the coexistence of the full divinity of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, an affirmation about Jesus that involves less than full divinity cannot lead to an understanding of God as Trinity. Trinity is thus more than a way of understanding God's relation to the world (cf. Modalism). (2) The basis for affirming the full divinity of the Son for Athanasius is the creation's need for divine-human communion. The doctrine of the Trinity is then not simply the affirmation of God as one and three, but the conceptualization of God as free to relate to the world so as to allow for a communion between God and the world through the Logos by the Holy Spirit. Athanasius was not disputing monotheism*, but asserting the need to think of a monotheism that can conceptualize a communion between God and the world; anything less, for Athanasius, would leave no hope* for the world.

The Cappadocians*, Basil* the Great, Gregory* the Theologian, and Gregory* of Nyssa were instrumental in providing the language for expressing the sameness and particularity of God's being as Trinity. *Ousia, "essence," expresses what is the same in the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, while *hypostasis signifies that which is particular and irreducible in the Father, Son and, Holy Spirit. The 9th c. saw the emergence of the debate between Eastern and Western Christians over the *Filioque, which is the statement inserted in the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed in the West that the Son proceeds from the Father "and the Son." The classic defense against the Filioque in the East is given by Photius* the Great (820–91), who argues that if the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, there is no way of distinguishing the Son from the Father.

After the fall of Constantinople (1453), the Orthodox tradition did not witness any discernible creative thinking about the Trinity until the sophiology (theological reflection on wisdom*) of 19th- and early-20th-c. Russia. Vladimir Sergeevich Soloviev* (1853–1900) is considered the father of Russian sophiology, but among the followers of Soloviev, Sergei Nikolaevich Bulgakov* (1871–1944) advanced the most developed and coherent theology of the Trinity. There are two central concepts in Russian sophiology: the humanity of God (bogochelovechestvo) and Sophia. The Incarnation reveals the humanity of God, which means that God exists as eternally free to create what is not God, i.e. the world. Although Russian sophiology does not affirm a creation eternally existing with God, insofar as God is the one who is always free to create, God's essence is such that God is eternally relating to creation. The essence of God understood in this way is what sophiologists identify as Sophia. Hypostasis for Bulgakov means much more than identifying what is particular in God; the relations between the persons of the Trinity are best understood in terms of kenosis's* movement of self-giving and self-receiving that has the capacity to overflow and reflect itself in the creation of the world.

Vladimir Lossky* (1903–58), a Russian émigré theologian, faulted Russian sophiology and the trinitarian theology of Bulgakov for attempting to provide a philosophical justification for that which lies beyond philosophical reasoning. For Lossky, God as Trinity is a revealed "fact" of revelation*, the adequate expression of which requires an antinomic approach to theology, i.e. the nonopposition of opposites. Ousia and hypostasis in their deconceptualized form are adequate categories for expressing the Trinity because they convey the simultaneity of the sameness and particularity in God without leaning too heavily to one side. An apophatic* and antinomic approach to theology is necessary, for Lossky, so that theology can guide one to true knowledge of God made possible by the Incarnation, which is mystical* union with God. Lossky also developed a trinitarian theology of personhood in terms of uniqueness and freedom that would become influential in contemporary Orthodox theology.

John Zizioulas (b1931) was indirectly influenced by Lossky's theology of personhood via the thought of his contemporary, Christos Yannaras. Zizioulas also developed a theology of trinitarian personhood in terms of uniqueness and freedom, which is decisively non-apophatic and emphasizes more the category of relation: a person is constituted as a free and unique being in relations of loving communion. This understanding of person is grounded in Zizioulas's understanding of the experience of the divine through incorporation into the hypostasis of Christ in the Eucharist*. According to Zizioulas, it was the experience of divine-human communion in the Eucharist that formed the basis for the Christian affirmation of the full divinity of Christ and thus the Trinity. This divine-human communion in Christ in the Eucharist reveals an ontology that is distinct from those prevalent in ancient Greek philosophies and that the Cappadocians attempted to express by uniting the categories of hypostasis and prosopon. This "ontological revolution" is such that, for the first time in the history of Western philosophy, being is identified with otherness, communion, particularity, freedom, and uniqueness. Insofar as the Eucharist is an event of divine-human communion that frees creation from the tragedy of death and corruption, it reveals God's life to be such that God is free from the necessity of nature, since God gives what God is. God's life as Trinity is constituted in freedom, which is the meaning of the patristic assertion of the monarchy of the Father. Zizioulas's trinitarian understanding of person as a free and unique being in relations of loving communion is evident in other aspects of this theology, including his theology of ministry, his ecclesiology*, and his theology of the environment.

ARISTOTLE PAPANIKOLAOU

Trinity Sunday, Sunday after Pentecost*, observed since the middle ages; popularized by its association with Thomas Becket's* consecration on that Sunday (1162).

Trinity in the Western Tradition (Lat Trinitas; Gk Trias). The doctrine of the Trinity affirms that God is three, reflecting the Christian experience of God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Historically, the chief point of controversy was in what sense God is also one and thus "triune."

The NT speaks of God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (Matt 28:20) or as God, Christ, and Holy Spirit (2 Cor 13:14; cf. 1 Cor 8:6; Gal 1:3; Phil 1:2; 1 Thess 1:2). Passages in the HB seem to imply some kind of plurality, differentiating, e.g., between God and God's Wisdom (Prov 8:22–31; Wis 7:22–8:1), Word (Isa 55:11), and God's Spirit (Gen 1:2; Exod 31:3; Num 11:25; Deut 34:9; 1 Sam 10:6, 19:23; Isa 42:1). Some NT passages seem to imply that the Son, or Word, is inferior to the Father (Prov 8:22; Mark 13:32, 17:18; 1 Cor 15:28; John 14:28); others imply equality (John 5:26, 10:30, 14:9–11; 17:3, 10).

The Trinity and Hellenistic Culture. The development of the doctrine of the Trinity between the 2nd and 4th c. cannot be isolated from philosophical speculation, especially in Middle Platonism*, and from Near Eastern religions and Gnosticism*. The 2nd-c. Apologists*, relating this biblical tradition with Hellenistic culture, thought of God as uttering the Word as the instrument of creation (see Logos), in a position that was both derivative and subordinate (see Subordinationism). Other patristic writers, to avoid a plurality that seemed to imply polytheism*, asserted that "Father," "Son," and "Spirit" are names for different modes of activity by one and the same God, first in creation, then in redemption, then in sanctification (see Modalism; Monarchians).

This suggests to some that the doctrine of the Trinity is nothing more than a part of a more general cultural trend, limited to its time and place. To the patristic writers, however, the reflections of the philosophers were proof that the truth* could be glimpsed, at least to some degree, outside the sphere of Christian revelation*, which then brought it to perfect formulation. Philosophical speculation could help to interpret the Bible, in two distinct ways. Cosmologically, the theory of a second and often a third divine principle seemed to resolve the question of how an unchanging God could be related to a changing world. Epistemologically, the divine Word could be viewed as the source of human knowledge of abstract intelligibles, for very few in the ancient world thought of these as coming solely from abstraction by the individual human mind.

Arius's Subordinationism and the Nicene Response. The ambiguities of the inherited doctrine were exhibited when Arius* asserted that the Father, being ungenerated, is alone God, in the proper sense; the only begotten Son is the "God" and creator of everything else, but was himself "created out of nothing" by the Father's will and is thus "unlike" the Father in essence. Against Arius, the Council of Nicaea* in 325 decreed that the Son is *homoousios with (of the same essence as) the Father. The Council, however, did not explain how the Father and the Son are distinct, and in fact it anathematized those who said that the Son was in any way different from the Father.

Four Understandings of the Father-Son Relation. Many in the East were convinced that their doctrinal tradition did not require the stark alternative of either the Nicene or the Arian positions. Starting with the Council of Antioch* (341), the Eastern bishops, without denying the Nicene doctrine, produced other creeds that seemed more satisfactory to them. Eventually four distinct positions developed concerning the relation of the Son to the Father, and these took explicit form in the 350s: the Homoousians*, or Nicenes, asserted "of the same essence"; the Homoiousians*, or "Semi-Arians," "of similar essence"; the Homoians*, or moderate Arians, "similar"; and the Anomoians*, "dissimilar," the extreme Arian position.

Arianism in its more moderate Homoian form gained approval after Constantius became sole emperor in 353, with a series of councils culminating in the Council of Constantinople* in 360. In protest against these developments, a new movement coalesced in the East, that of the Homoiousians*, or "Semi-Arians," who kept the Eastern emphasis on threeness but were willing to say that the three were "like in essence."

The death of Constantius (361) and the rise of Emperor Julian* the Apostate, who removed all doctrinal sanctions, made a resolution possible. At the Council of Alexandria in 362, presided over by Athanasius*, the Nicene party made peace with the Semi-Arians; thus the "orthodox" doctrine of the Trinity owes something to both traditions. The Council of Constantinople* in 381 likewise reached a compromise between the Nicenes and the Pneumatomachians*, stating that the Holy Spirit is "honored together with the Father" but not using the term homoousios.

Monotheism and Monarchy. The unification of the Mediterranean world by the Roman Empire was accompanied by a growth of monotheism: one ruler on earth suggested one ruler in heaven, too. In this sense, the official adoption of Christianity during the 4th c., begun under Constantine* (ruled 306–37) and completed under Theodosius* (ruled 379–95), can be seen as the completion of a process long in the making. While political and religious unity has its advantages, it is often accompanied by intolerance and repression, and in this respect monotheism is vulnerable to criticism. While Constantius and the Arians identified God with the Father alone, the Nicene doctrine of three equally divine persons* supported a more social and perhaps even more democratic view of the state; perhaps it even undermined totalitarianism, as E. Peterson, H. Berkhof, C. Cochrane, and G. H. Williams argued independently during the Hitler era. In a more psychological vein, the Arians' subordinationist theory that the Son is "less than" the Father, perhaps even the product of the Father's will, seems to have a resonance with the arbitrary role of the father in Roman society. The Nicene doctrine that the Father and the Son are of the same essence might be interpreted as a more benign relation between the generations, with the offspring possessing the same attributes as the parent.

The Definitive Role of the Cappadocians. A more definitive understanding of the Trinity came not from councils but from the work of individual theologians, termed "doctors of the church." The Cappadocians* differentiated between ousia (essence) and hypostasis (particular substance, reality, person), applying the former to the unity, the latter to the threeness in God. The crucial insight of the Cappadocians is that the words "Father" and "Son" are used not because God is sexual or the Son grows like a human embryo, but solely because these are relational terms (one is a parent only by having an offspring, and vice versa). Thus they emphasize the relational terms "unbegotten," "begotten," and "proceeding," which alone differentiate the three persons*. The persons are distinct "modes of subsistence or relation" (Amphilochius* of Iconium) of the one divine essence, which is identical in all three persons and is fully present in each.

Augustine's "Psychological" Doctrine of the Trinity. In keeping with this insight, Augustine* understood the Trinity in terms of an analogy with the human mind, which, while remaining one, relates to itself in three ways: memory (immediate self-awareness), understanding (explicit self-concept), and will (self-love or self-affirmation). What is said "relatively" refers to the three persons; what is said “simply” or “directly” refers to the divine essence. While the East thought of the Father as the “source of the entire deity,” the West emphasized relation, according to which the Father is Father by begetting the Son.

Two Interpretations of the Holy Spirit. After the doctrine of the Trinity had been resolved on these terms, a new dispute emerged: Does the Holy* Spirit proceed from the Father alone or also from the Son? The East held to the former, the West to the latter, asserting that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son (Lat *Filioque). The Filioque was a major point of controversy between East and West during the tensions of the 800s and after the schism of 1054, and it remains so today. Recently this issue has been raised in a more symbolic way. For some Feminist* and Liberation* theologians, the Western view implies that the Spirit is “tied to” or “controlled” by the Word and thus by the church and its offices. If, on the other hand, the Spirit comes directly from the Father, this seems to suggest that the Spirit is “free,” not bound by earthly means and ministries, more readily authorizing a role for women* and the poor*.

Is the Trinity Biblical? The Reformation, with its demand that doctrine be based on Scripture, posed a new set of questions. The mainstream Reformers retained the classic doctrine, affirming that the teachers of the early church were reliable interpreters of Scripture. Others, however, were convinced that the doctrine of the Trinity was not taught in Scripture but that God is one (Socinianism*, Unitarianism*); still others, who emphasized inward experience, speculated in new ways about the immediate presence of the Word and the Spirit in each human being.

Can the Trinity Be Proved? While most patristic and medieval thinkers regarded the doctrine of the Trinity to be at least partially demonstrable by reason, the position of the Thomists*, Scotists*, and Nominalists* was that it is a mystery* of faith, disclosed by revelation* alone. Thus during the Enlightenment*, the doctrine came into question among those who emphasized what could be known about God through reason. Schleiermacher* affirmed the Trinity but only in a modalist way, arguing that Christian experience involves absolute dependence on God in three modes: the unactualized potentialities of human life, redemption through Christ, and the community of the church.

Reaffirming and Reconceptualizing the Trinity. It was unusual, then, when Hegel* made the Christian doctrines of Trinity and incarnation the basis of an entire speculative system. In his interpretation, the Trinity unfolds through the world process, reaching completion in art, religion, and the pure concepts of philosophy; incarnation is the implicit presence of concepts in sensory experience, resurrection, their becoming explicit. Hegel influenced many modern theologians in taking a more dynamic view of the Trinity as developing through the process of creation and redemption. While these motifs are most evident among German theologians, they also influenced Process* theology.

The “Social” Understanding of the Trinity. Traditionally the three divine persons were viewed as mutually indwelling, and this seems to reinforce the intuition that mutuality is better and more fulfilling than solitariness. Beyond this rather obvious point, serious questions arise. Does God become “more complete,” more “actualized,” as a result of the trinitarian relations? Plotinus* and Porphyry* in the ancient world, and Hegel in the modern, responded positively to this suggestion. But most Christian thinkers denied it. For them the Trinity is like the overflowing of an already perfect divinity, first in the Father (the “source of the entire deity”), then through mutual relatedness in the Son and the Spirit.

The Trinity and Gender. Traditional language includes the terms “Father” and “Son.” Feminists point out that this privileges men as being more like God than are women, even perhaps to the exclusion of women. They note other, more emotive overtones of the traditional language: women who have been abused by their fathers may have difficulty calling God “Father,” and the language of “Son,” when accompanied by views of the atonement as a satisfaction of the wrath of the Father (see Atonement #2), can look like “divine child abuse.”

In the doctrinal tradition, God has rarely been thought of as in any sense gendered. Many theologians, therefore, are willing to substitute inclusive terms like “Parent” and “Offspring” for gendered terms, following the precedent of several 2nd-c. texts that address Christ as God’s “child” (Gk pais). There are others, however, who insist on keeping the inspired and authoritative language of the Bible and the creeds, understanding the terms “Father” and “Son” to be metaphorical, without gendered connotations.

The question of gendered language becomes most intense – pastorally, liturgically, and canonically – in the ritual of baptism*. In all churches that claim to be part of the universal church, baptism is “in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.” Some ministers and priests, to avoid gendered language, have substituted the words “Creator, Redeemer, and Sustainer.” These terms, however, apply to divine activity in relation to the world and thus imply a modalist* understanding of the Trinity, inappropriate to any baptism whose motive is to act with and for the universal church. Use of the terms “Parent” and “Offspring” would seem to overcome this difficulty. The NT formula “God, Christ, and Spirit” is also free of modalist overtones.

EUGENE TESELLE

Trisagion (“three times holy”), hymn based on the seraphim’s praise of God (Isa 6:3); it became the focus of controversy when the so-called theopaschite* supplement added that one of the Trinity was “crucified for us.” Eventually it was agreed that this notion should be qualified by the phrase “in the flesh,” maintaining the difference between Christ’s human and divine natures.

Tritheism. This scarcely Christian designation derives from opponents of the doctrine of three substances in the Trinity*, who view this doctrine as an implicit affirmation of three Gods. Tritheists maintain that the divine unity is not an objective reality, but purely intellectual. Tritheism came into existence c557 through the activity of a certain John, a Syrian of the Syriac Orthodox Church (polemically nicknamed “Jacobite”) and a native of Apamea (named differently by contemporary and later authors, including Bar* Hebraeus). Drawing its inspiration from a philosophical system that it applies to the Trinity, tritheism is a rationalistic approach that seeks to explain the Divine by concepts and principles derived from the created order. See also NOMINALISM.

RIFAAT EBIED

Troeltsch, Ernst (1865–1923), was one of the leading representatives of German liberal* theology. After studying at Erlangen, he moved to Göttingen, where, under the influence of Albrecht Ritschl*, he became a member of the so-called history* of religion school (Religionsgeschichtliche Schule). After a brief spell at Bonn, he became professor of systematic theology at Heidelberg (1895). In 1915, having “outgrown” the theological faculty, he moved to the Berlin Philosophy Faculty.

Troeltsch’s work is often unsystematic and touches on many different disciplines, from ethics to intellectual history. Accepting the inevitability of the Enlightenment* with its liberation of the individual, Troeltsch sought to root such freedom in something higher. His main project was to work out the implications of modernity for any practical expression of Christianity. To this end, he sought to liberate theology from its dependence on what he called the “dogmatic” or supernatural method and pioneered an alternative “historical” method, which he outlined in his 1901 book, The Absoluteness of Christianity. Unlike many of his contemporaries, including Wilhelm Herrmann, he did not believe that theology and religion could have their own special methods. At Heidelberg his interests expanded into historical studies of Christian social teaching, and in dialogue with the sociologist Max Weber*, with whom he shared a house, he analyzed Christian social formation in his large-scale work, The Social Teaching of Christian Churches and Groups (Die Soziallehren, 1912). He saw this book as providing the basis for a reconstruction of Christian ethics compatible with the modern world.

He spent much of World War I trying to understand Germany’s role in relation to the other powers and was also engaged in the philosophical analysis of history, which led to his unfinished work, Der Historismus und seine Probleme, in which he sought to forge a unified worldview from what he called the “melting pot of historicism.” After the war, he campaigned for the establishment of democracy in Germany, playing an active part in Weimar politics. His posthumously published lectures, intended for delivery in Britain in 1923, present a view of history in which there are only “relative victories.”

While he has often been dubbed a “Culture Protestant” (see Culture Christianity) Troeltsch always maintained a critical distance from his society. Nevertheless, his call for a unified vision of religion and society, his acceptance of the Enlightenment, his espousal of relativism, and his interdisciplinary method made him one of the least favored theologians of the so-called dialectical theologians of the 1920s. See also HISTORIOGRAPHY OF EARLY CHRISTIANITY AS DEVELOPED IN THE 19TH AND 20TH CENTURIES; HISTORY, CONCEPTS OF; HISTORY OF RELIGION SCHOOL; RELIGION AND CHRISTIANITY; SOCIOLOGICAL STUDIES OF CHRISTIANITY.

MARK D. CHAPMAN

Truce of God (Lat treuga), bishops' declaration limiting personal feuds, insisting on the protection of innocent bystanders and their possessions. It forbade warfare on Sundays and during Advent* and Lent*. The Crusades*, ironically, were carried out under the auspices of the peace and truce of God.

Trullan Synod. See QUINISEXT COUNCIL (OR TRULLAN SYNOD).

Truth. The most common meaning of truth is "saying what is." There can be numerous contexts. "Telling the truth" may mean that one's words agree with one's experiences, valuations, intentions, or promises. In the OT, truth is faithfulness or reliability on the part of those who make promises and those who trust them (see Faith). Shakespeare* urged, "To thine own self be true." A "true statement" is one that agrees with the actual state of affairs, and one can verify or falsify the statement by examining the evidence. Art is "true to life," although not always by stating facts, for fiction can be more effective in evoking the texture of human life. A carpenter "trues up a board" by making it fit a plan drawn on paper or in the imagination; similarly, traditional theology speaks of the world as being "true to" the ideas* in God's mind. Truth can also "spring forth": God's truth is expressed in and understood through the things that are made (Rom 1:20, 23); God's Word* is truth in the sense of revelation* (John 8:32, 14:6, 16:13, 18:37–38). In the doctrine of the Trinity*, the Word is often understood to be God's self-expression and self-knowledge. Heidegger*, exploiting the Greek word aletheia (that which does not escape notice, is not hidden), speaks of being as disclosing itself, at least to those who are not distracted and forgetful. In the case of human beings, however, truth is not merely given; it is also a task to be carried out, self-critically, and it may not be achieved.

If truth involves "agreement" or "relationship" of many kinds, this comes close to the so-called correspondence theory of truth. That theory has often been criticized, usually on limited grounds. It is not as simple as a "picturing" theory of truth, for the sentences we utter are not isomorphic with the things we talk about; they are different from and far more complex than pictures. It does not deny that our statements are "constructed" by human language; culture and thought are deeply influenced, as postmodernists point out, by our participation in communities of discourse (see Hermeneutics; Hermeneutics of Suspicion; Postmodernism and Theology; Semiotics and the Study of Christianity).

Even in the best of cases, our access to the world is patched together from subject and predicate terms, and we gain access to reality through an act of judgment, the conviction or conclusion that we have now said our best about the subject matter. Much that goes by the name of truth is conventional belief or scientific hypothesis, "confirmed" by our experiences or not yet "falsified," and we have the privilege of saying what would count for or against those statements.

Religious belief is quite different from natural science in that, if it is verifiable at all, it is so by its comprehensiveness in giving meaning to our entire range of experience or indicating a way of life that is fulfilling. See also SCIENCE AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY. EUGENE TESELLE

Truth, Sojourner. See SOJOURNER TRUTH.

Truth and Reconciliation Commissions are official, temporary bodies set up to investigate and report on a pattern of past human* rights violations. Truth commissions can provide official acknowledgment of abuses that may have long been denied or hidden from view. Truth commissions typically take testimony from thousands of victims, investigate key events, and sometimes hold public hearings for select cases.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South* Africa was the most well known. Under the leadership of Archbishop Desmond Tutu, it projected a strong emphasis on reconciliation and often suggested a religious, and explicitly Christian, foundation. Religious leaders, both Christian and Muslim, have been appointed to serve on other truth commissions, as in Argentina*, Ghana*, Liberia*, Peru*, and Sierra Leone. Their discourse has sometimes imparted a religious tone to a commission's public profile. This has given rise to a perception that truth commissions are generally religious in nature. However, most of the more than 30 truth commissions that have existed to date have been largely or entirely secular, strongly focused on their core task: clear fact-finding and the making of recommendations for policy or institutional reforms so that human rights are protected in the future. See also RECONCILIATION AS A CHRISTIAN PRACTICE. PRISCILLA HAYNER near Cambridge (eastern shore of Maryland), 1 of 11 children of Harriet and Benjamin Ross. At 25 she ran away, escaping through the Underground Railroad to the North. Tubman's escape was inspired and sustained by a deep theological conviction that the institution of slavery* denied her the dignity warranted by her humanness. Tubman concluded, "I had reasoned it out in my mind, there was one or two things I had a right to – freedom or death. If I could not have the one, I would have the other, but no man would take me alive. I would fight for my freedom as long as my breath lasted, and when the time came for me to go, the Lord would let them take me." After carefully reflecting on the condition she shared with her enslaved cohorts, Tubman became convinced that slavery stood outside the will of God. As a response to this conviction, she seized her own freedom by escaping from the South and then returned repeatedly, leading more than 300 enslaved people to the metaphoric "promised land." See also SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN NORTH AMERICA. MONYA A. STUBBS

Tubman, Harriet (1820–1913), was born into the chattel slave system of the USA in Bucktown

Turkey. In the modern secular state of Turkey, Christians form a tiny minority (0.6%) of a mostly Muslim diversified population that includes Nursis, Nakshibendis, Bektashis, Alevi, as well as secularists and Islamists. Turkey's Christian history goes back to the first centuries of Christianity, symbolized by cities such as Antakya (Antioch*), Urfa (Edessa*), and Istanbul (Constantinople*). Turkey comprises large portions of the former homelands of Armenian*, Greek Orthodox*, Syriac* Orthodox, and Assyrian (Church* of the East) Christians. These communities still constitute the majority of the Christian population, alongside small communities of Roman Catholics, Protestants, and Evangelicals.

Christianity experienced a strong decline during and after World War I, when political, military, and ethnic factors caused the murder, expulsion, and flight of a large part of the Christian population (see Armenian Genocide). This remains a sensitive issue, and it is often difficult for members of the Armenian and Syriac Orthodox communities to refer to this aspect of Turkey's history in public. Although interest in Turkey's Christian past is growing, and freedom of religion is officially a basic aspect of Turkey's secular outlook, strong Turkish-ethnic consciousness and the connection between religion and ethnicities that are not Turkish complicate the efforts of Armenian, Greek, and Syrian Orthodox communities to educate their members and clergy about their own cultural contexts. Turkey's rapprochement with the European Union has encouraged significant legal and practical changes. Conversion* to Christianity by those with Muslim backgrounds commonly meets with disapproval. Open evangelistic activities by Evangelicals and Pentecostals/Charismatics and the establishment of new churches are distrusted and face substantial legal obstacles. Despite such hindrances, ethnic Turkish churches, including the local Roman Catholic Church, have experienced some modest growth, whereas the membership of older churches continues to shrink as a result of emigration.

Statistics: Population (2000): 66.6 million. Muslims, 97.2%; atheists and nonreligious, 2.1%; Christians, 0.6% (Orthodox, 0.3%, most belonging to the Armenian* Apostolic Church; Protestants, 0.1%; Roman Catholics, 0.1%; independents, 0.1%.) (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

HELEEN MURRE-VAN DEN BERG

Turner, Nat (1800–31), Baptist preacher, slave revolutionary, subject of The Confessions of Nat Turner (1831). Born into slavery* in Southampton County, Virginia, he taught himself to read and write, and was respected by fellow slaves as a man of unusual intelligence and one whose future would be linked to a special destiny for his people. Given to dreams and visions, and known as "the Prophet," Turner led the most famous slave revolt in the antebellum South in August 1831, a bloody uprising that resulted in the deaths of some 60 slave owners. He was inspired by African traditions and a radical reading of the NT, especially as it related to the life of Jesus Christ. Turner was hanged in 1831 but became an inspiration to generations of black Christian and Islamic nationalists, from Henry H. Garnet to Malcolm X. LEWIS V. BALDWIN

Twelve Apostles, a particular group of disciples* to whom the resurrected Christ appeared (1 Cor 15:5). According to the Gospels, Jesus chose among the disciples* 12 apostles*, sending them (Gk apostoloi, "sent") in mission (Mark 3:16–19; Matt 10:1–4; Luke 6:13–16; also John 6:67–71): Simon Peter*; James* and John, sons of Zebedee; Andrew; Philip; Bartholomew; Matthew; Thomas*; James, son of Alphaeus; Thaddaeus* (replaced by Judas, son of James, in Luke); Simon the Cananaean (or the Zealot); and Judas Iscariot the Betrayer. These slight variations regarding Thaddaeus and Simon (there could have been 13 or 14 close companions of Jesus) and, after Judas Iscariot's betrayal (when there were only 11 apostles left), the quest for a replacement (Matthias; Acts 1:13–26) show that the number 12 is symbolic, possibly reflecting the number of tribes of Israel, itself a symbolic number.

DANIEL PATTE

Two Kingdoms, Two Realms. The twofold Reign of God in Lutheran doctrine expresses the notion that that God acts through both the Word and the sword, i.e. through love and persuasion in the church, through force in civil government. Both have the task, each in its own way, of opposing the kingdom of Satan*, the outward and inward reign of evil* in the world. Luther's doctrine had varied influence. Used during the Hitler era to attack the Barmen* Declaration, it anticipates the modern separation of church* and state. Conservatives and "realists" cite it in their criticism that Christian principles are too closely identified with political causes or that Christian "sentimentalism" overlooks the need for coercion in the political life of the earthly city.

Two Swords, medieval interpretation of Peter's statement (Luke 22:38) "Here are two swords." First articulated by Peter* Damiani, it was popularized by Bernard* of Clairvaux: both the spiritual and the temporal swords are in the hands of Peter (and thus the pope*), but he gives the temporal sword to the secular* arm and has the authority to say how it will be used.

Tyconius (d c400), Donatist* layman, excommunicated by the Donatist Church because of his belief that the true church is universal and contains a mixture of good and bad. His Book of Rules for the interpretation of Scripture* influenced Augustine*, especially in its finding of continuities between the OT and the NT and its emphasis on tensions within history. A commentary on Revelation, now lost, was used by several writers in the early Middle Ages.

Tyndale, William (c1494–1536), the scholar to whom is attributed the first Bible in English translation (1526–34) fully based on the original languages and the first to take advantage of a new medium, the printing press. Tyndale's translation was superseded by the Geneva* Bible (1560) and the King James Version (1611). Tyndale drew primarily on the NT of Erasmus (1516, Greek) and Luther* (1522, German). Although it was not acceptable in England to print Scripture in English during this period, Tyndale rendered the text brilliantly and in a style of English that excited and inspired readers; he illustrated it with woodcuts to further engage the reader and illuminate the texts. In 1535 Tyndale was arrested, jailed in a castle outside Brussels, tried for heresy*, and burned at the stake. See also BIBLE TRANSLATIONS CLUSTER: ENGLISH TRANSLATIONS.

Typology, a method of interpreting Scripture* in which it is assumed that events, institutions, and persons in the OT ("type") foreshadow events, institutions, and persons in the NT, and/or such features of both the OT and the NT foreshadow events, institutions, and persons in the time of the interpreter. Then believers discern God's interventions in their present context (see Faith #5). Allegory*, by contrast, looks for the spiritual meaning of these events. See also SEMIOTICS AND THE STUDY OF CHRISTIANITY; SYMBOLISM.

Typos, the decree of the emperor Constans (647/48), superseding the Ecthesis of Heraclius. It forbade all discussion of the issues that arose during the Monothelite controversy, limiting doctrine to that of the first five ecumenical* councils. Pope Martin I refused to sign it, a refusal that led to his deposition.

Tyrrell, George (1861–1909), Jesuit* priest, spiritual director, apologist, major figure in the Roman Catholic Modernism* Movement (1890–1907). His writings, including Lex Credendi (1906), Lex Orandi (1907), Through Scylla and Charybdis (1907), and Christianity at the Crossroads (1909), were courageous efforts to reconcile the Roman Catholic Church's traditional teaching both with the needs of the spiritual life and with modern scientific and historical research. With like-minded Catholic scholars, Tyrrell was a sharp critic of the reigning Roman Catholic scholastic* theology. From 1899 many of his works were prohibited; he was expelled from the Jesuit order and was refused a Catholic burial.

JAMES C. LIVINGSTON

U

Ubertino da Casale (1259–c1330), leader of the Spiritual Franciscans*. Although he studied for nine years in Paris, he took a negative view of such intellectual pursuits. His activity was centered in Italy, where he was influenced by John of Parma and Peter John Olivi*. He twice defended the Spirituals' view of poverty* at the papal court in Avignon (1310, 1322) but later had to flee (1325). He was admired by Dante* and later by the Fraticelli*.

Ubiquity, Lutheran doctrine that Christ's human nature acquires the divine attribute of omnipresence* and thus is literally received in the Eucharist*.

Uganda. Christianity in Uganda has been dominated by Anglicanism and Roman Catholicism. Until 1986 other Christian denominations and African* Instituted Churches had a limited presence. Uganda is the only African country that virtually became a Christian nation in the 19th c., before colonial rule by the British.

Late 19th Century. Ethnic, autonomous monarchies and chiefdoms made up the region of present-day Uganda. Buganda, the biggest kingdom, was the stage on which Christianity had its first impact. Kabaka (King) Mutesa I was open to outside influences; he first converted to Islam* (the first foreign religion in the territory), then expressed interest in Christianity when he met the British explorer Henry Stanley. Impressed by Mutesa, Stanley wrote to the London Daily Telegraph (1875) appealing to missionaries to evangelize the country. Anglicans of the Church Missionary Society arrived (1877), followed by the Roman Catholic French White* Fathers (1879). Both groups settled around the king's palace, attracting the youth. Mutesa played off British, French, and Arab interests, using them as political pawns to prevent any of them from gaining control over his territory. His erratic son, Mwanga, who succeeded him, quickly turned against the Christians, killing hundreds – including the Anglican missionary Bishop Hannington, who had just arrived, and Joseph Mukasa, a leading Catholic, who protested against the killing at the court. Mwanga massacred many Muslims as well. Fifteen Anglicans and 22

Catholics are officially recognized as the Uganda martyrs. The Catholics were canonized as saints by Pope Paul VI (1964).

1894–1914. The killing of Christians and Muslims was later followed by religious wars among all groups. Uganda became a British protectorate (1894) as a result of the collaboration of notable chiefs and the arrival of the Imperial British East African Company, led by Captain Lugard, who fought alongside the Anglicans during the religious wars, thus ensuring British control over Uganda. The Anglican mission became a dominant force, while Catholics and Muslims lost their political significance.

This period of turmoil was followed by the spread of Christianity throughout Uganda. Ugandan Anglican and Catholic evangelists were instrumental in the process, disseminating the gospel to all parts of Uganda and beyond, often ahead of the European evangelists that they had originally accompanied, because European missionaries had to flee for their lives on several occasions. Prominent among these pioneer missionaries were the Anglican Apolo Kivebulaya (the first missionary to the pygmies of Eastern Congo) and the Catholic Yohana Kitagana (an apostle in Southwest Uganda).

1914–50. This rapid growth of Christianity continued between the two world wars. Being a Christian was synonymous with being literate; Christians were known as the “readers” (abasomi), because they had been taught to read and write. The translation of the Bible into local languages became an important part of mission (see Bible Translations Cluster: Present-Day Translations in Africa). Anglican and Catholic missionaries opened schools and hospitals, sometimes in fierce competition with each other. It was not until 1950 that the British administration set up its own schools and health services. The Anglican “Mothers' Union” promoted the active participation of women in the Anglican Church. Catholics founded local congregations of women religious who worked tirelessly for the promotion of women.

Both Anglicans and Catholics opened seminaries to train local clergy. The first Ugandan Catholic priest of modern times, Victor Mukasa, was ordained in 1913 and the first bishop, Joseph Kiwanuka, was named in 1939. Similarly Bishop Tucker College was opened to educate Anglican clergy. A revival movement of the Balokole (the Saved), which was started by Ugandan Anglicans in Rwanda*, spread through Uganda and put new life into the rather dry spirituality of the time. Malaki Musjjakawa founded (1914) the Malakite Church, a revivalist church that rejected Western medicine and was soon banned by the British administration. Being Anglican or Catholic was so important for one's identity that African Instituted Churches did not thrive in Uganda. In 1929 Spartas Rueben Mukasa broke away from the Anglican Church to form an African Orthodox Church, later affiliated with the Greek Patriarchate.

1950–65. Christianity continued to play a major role in politics; the two main parties were the Democratic Party (mainly Roman Catholic) and the Uganda People's Congress (mainly Anglican). Tension between these parties were reflected in the churches as Uganda achieved independence (1962) under the premiership of Milton Obote.

After 1966. Obote abolished monarchies and political parties, then turned to Marxism. The advent of Idi Amin Dada, who ousted Obote with British help (1971), was disastrous to Christianity: there were years of persecution, missionaries were deported, clergy and prominent Christian politicians were killed, and Uganda was proclaimed an Islamic state (although Muslims were only 5% of the population). During this difficult period, individuals who spoke out, such as the Anglican Archbishop Janan Luwum, were brutally murdered. There was more unity between Catholics and Anglicans. Instability continued after Amin until 1986, when Yoweri Museveni came to power (1986), although his regime faced resistance organized by the Christian "Lord's Resistance Army," followers of Alice Lakwena's Holy Spirit Movement in the north (a war that has been going on for more than 20 years). Since 1986 new, especially Charismatic*, churches, have proliferated as a result of both local initiatives and the arrival of evangelical missionaries, especially from North America. Many of these churches preach personal salvation* and a prosperity* gospel. Muslims have tended to decline in number, as adherents of African* Traditional Religion have also diminished. Women's leadership has always been a key feature of Christianity in Uganda. The Anglican Church has ordained women priests since 1980. The Roman Catholic Church has a great number of dynamic and well-trained women* religious, a major force in education and social work. However, patriarchal structures are still in place in most churches.

Sexual ethics have dominated the political and theological debate in recent years. In the face of HIV/AIDS, an urgent issue in the 1980s and 1990s, churches have responded in different ways. Pentecostal and Charismatic churches have offered faith healing* sessions. Some churches have discouraged the use of condoms. Yet the main churches have supported the government's openness to the problem; as a result, Uganda is seen internationally as a success story in the fight against AIDS.

Ritual practices in most of the churches include charismatic and exuberant worship that is an occasion for socializing and building a sense of community. Music and drama play an important part. Traditional instruments together with Western ones provide lively accompaniment. Pilgrimages to shrines of the martyrs are important among Catholics and Anglicans, while the Charismatic churches often hold healing sessions with all-night vigils and the celebration of baptism* (by immersion).

Important theological issues include inculturation*, liberation*, reconciliation*, social* justice, human* rights, and economic development. Most churches have been involved in social* and economic development projects. Individual Christians have defended human rights, although church leaders have sometimes been slow to denounce abuses. Mainline churches have founded universities to promote the Christian ethos. Uganda's turbulent history has been characterized by ethnic tensions in all parts of the country. Church leaders occasionally perpetuate divisions and conflicts, even as they work for reconciliation.

Statistics: Population (2000): 22 million (M). Christians, 19.3 M, 89% (Roman Catholics, 9.2 M; Anglicans, 8.6 M; members of African Instituted Churches, 0.8 M; Protestants, 0.6 M); Muslims, 1.1 M, 5%; African Religionists, 1 M, 4.4%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

ROBERT KAGGWA

Ukraine. Ukraine, whose cultural identity was forged under the influence of Christianity, has been a meeting place of Western and Eastern Christian traditions, which has led both to historic clashes and to growing pluralism. Many Ukrainians integrate symbols, customs, and fragments of historical memory from both traditions, even while the formal institutions of Eastern Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism, along with several later movements, serve as conflicting centers of ethnic, cultural, and political mobilization.

Starting in the 9th c., Christianity began to influence the nobles and military elite of the Kievan Rus state (mid-9th–mid-13th c.). The first Christian bishop was sent to Kiev (Kyiv) from Constantinople* in 866 or 867. Despite the dominance of non-Christian religions, by the mid-10th c. there was already a Christian community in Kiev led by Byzantine priests. Princess Olga* was the first ruler of Kievan Rus to convert to Christianity (955 or 957). Her grandson Prince Volodymyr (Vladimir*) the Great accepted Christianity in its Byzantine form and established it as the state religion (988).

Situated at the convergence of two great trade routes, the Varangian (Viking) Road (from north to south) and the Silk Road (from east to west), Kiev developed into a formidable Christian state. The coming of the Mongol hordes (13th c.) interrupted the life of both state and church. The metropolitan see was moved from ruined Kiev to Vladymyr-Suzdal' (1299). The princes in Western Ukraine obtained Constantinople's authorization to create their own metropolitanate for a time (1303–47).

In the late 14th c., Ukraine was partitioned between Poland* and Lithuania*, with the Tatar Golden Horde ruling parts of the southern steppes. Partition caused the division of the Kiev Metropolitanate into the Ruthenian Church (with Polish links) and Muscovite Church (with Lithuanian ties), and two distinctive patterns of Eastern Orthodox religious culture developed.

Throughout the 15th and early 16th c., Polish and Lithuanian rulers introduced legislation that favored Roman Catholics to the detriment of Orthodox clergy and believers. The Orthodox Church was challenged by Western political and intellectual superiority and by deepening inner crises.

Toward the end of the 16th c., the search for a solution led Orthodox bishops toward union with the Holy* See. The Council of Brest*-Litovsk (1596) established a church united with Rome, known as the Uniate* or Greek Catholic Church. Yet some hierarchs and members of the Kiev Metropolitanate were dissatisfied with the Roman vision of unity and insisted on maintaining canonical dependence on the Patriarchate of Constantinople. They successfully demanded a parallel hierarchy (1620) and official recognition by the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth (1632). The confessional division of the Kiev Church into Eastern Orthodox and Eastern Catholic churches led to bitter polemics between supporters and opponents of the Union of Brest that have continued to the present.

The war of liberation from Poland led by the Cossack hetman (commander) Bohdan Kmelnytskyi (Chmielnitsky; 1648–54) improved the position of the Orthodox Church and seriously endangered the Uniates. The war for the protection of the “native Orthodox faith” and the “Cossack Church,” carried out under these religious slogans in opposition to Roman Catholic expansion, became an important feature of the Ukrainian national myth. During this war, practically the whole of Ukraine fell under Cossack control. Yet a lack of resources led Khmelnytskyi to sign the Pereyaslav Treaty (1654), swearing loyalty to the Moscow czar in exchange for protection from the Poles. In 1667 Ukraine was partitioned along the Dnipro (Dnieper) River, with the western side under Polish control and the eastern side an autonomous hetman state under Russian protection.

In 1686 the Kiev Metropolitanate was transferred from the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Constantinople to that of Moscow. Educated, Westernized Ukrainians had an immense influence on Russian Orthodoxy and the early Russian Empire. The first president of the Holy* Synod (1700) was the Ukrainian Stefan Yavorsky (1658–1722); the Ukrainian Teofan Procopovich (1681–1736) was one of the main ideologues of Peter's religious “enlightenment.” About 70% of the upper-level hierarchs were from Ukraine or Belarus in the first half of the 18th c. Ukrainian clerics created an image of the Rus past that transcended political boundaries. Through their compilations of varied and often contradictory opinions from Ukrainian, Polish, and Russian writings, they were able to link Ukraine and Moscow through religion, dynasty, land, and ethnicity.

In the 19th c., Russian policy eroded the organizational and architectural uniqueness and, more broadly, the general character of Ukrainian religious culture. Paradoxically, however, the Ukrainian Orthodox Church was neither completely absorbed into the Russian Church nor set against it as an alien body.

When the Western Ukraine, after the partitions of Poland (1772, 1793, 1795), was annexed by the Hapsburg Empire, the Greek Catholic Church flourished under relatively liberal Austrian rule. The civil authorities encouraged the formation of an ecclesiastical administrative structure for the Greek Catholics. The educational reforms of the Hapsburg rulers Maria-Teresa and Joseph II gave Ukrainian youth access to education in their native language. Greek Catholics were given legal status equal to that of adherents of the Latin Rite, and their spiritual leaders were given at least minimal material subsistence. This led to the close integration of the Greek Catholic Church with the national political structure and social life, and the active participation of the clergy in the Ukrainian national movement.

In 1860 the Evangelical* Movement spread through Southern Ukraine. Baptist doctrine was welcome among educated workers and peasants with high moral standards who disliked the formalism of the established Church. Ukrainian Baptists*, Evangelicals, and later Pentecostals* saw Evangelicalism not as a "foreign" doctrine brought from the West but as an autochthonous spiritual phenomenon, the natural result of God-seeking activity among the common people.

The collapse of the czarist government (1917) led to the formation of a Ukrainian government and temporary independence that occurred simultaneously with the movement for independence of the Orthodox Church in Ukraine. The Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church was formed in 1921 but lacked recognition by the Orthodox community. Soviet authorities perceived in this church and the various Evangelical groups a counterbalance to the Russian Orthodox Church, and thus provided them with limited and short-lived support. In 1929 the Soviet regime unleashed war against all churches and denominations. Mass arrest of the hierarchy and clergy culminated in the liquidation of the churches in the 1930s.

Forced agricultural collectivization and the 1932–33 "Famine Genocide" were followed by religious persecution, the demolition of sacred buildings, and repression of the clergy. By the beginning of World War II, only 3% of the pre-revolutionary parishes in Ukraine remained open to the public.

World War II brought a dramatic Christian revival and a "concordat*" between Stalin and the Russian Orthodox Church. This did not mean the cessation of mass persecution of Christians in Ukraine. In early 1945, the Greek Catholic Church was accused of supporting Nazi and Ukrainian partisans; its metropolitan, Yosyf Slipyi, and all prominent priests were arrested and sentenced to long prison terms. In March 1945, this church was forcibly united with the Russian Orthodox Church and officially liquidated, after which it maintained only a clandestine existence.

In the years of Khrushchev's antireligious campaign (1953–64), almost half of all Orthodox churches in Ukraine were closed, including the well-known Cave Monastery in Kiev (1961). During the next 20 years, however, Christianity in Ukraine was viewed by the thinking public as an alternative system of values that was able to withstand the official ideology*, whose untenability became more and more obvious. Noticing the increase in adult baptisms, the obsession of the intelligentsia with religious literature, the growing popularity of religious broadcasts from foreign radio stations, and the outspoken neglect of atheistic propaganda, Communist Party officials expressed anxiety over anti-Communist trends. Secret reports submitted by Party officials revealed that in 1985, the first year of Gorbachev's reforms, 26% of newborns in Ukraine were baptized, contrary to official statements about "the country of mass atheism." Nearly 3% consecrated their marriages in a church, and more than 40% were buried with the church's assistance.

Beginning in mid-1988, the Kremlin's "new way of thinking" finally affected church-state relations. During Gorbachev's first years in power, legal and secret restrictions on religious practices were somewhat relaxed; by 1989 all religious prisoners and deportees, including a number of Uniate priests and defenders of religious freedom, were allowed to return home. From 1988 to 1991, there was a mass opening of formerly closed churches, monasteries, and ecclesiastical schools. The number of religious communities increased an average of 30% every year during that period. At the same time, the fall of Communism revived old controversies and pent-up conflicts. Beginning in 1989, hundreds of Russian Orthodox parishes (mostly in Western Ukraine) declared themselves to belong to the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church. Challenged by this church, the Ukrainian exarchate of the Russian Orthodox Church asked the Moscow Patriarchate to transform it into a semiautonomous Ukrainian Orthodox Church and later (1991) to grant it autocephalous* status. The Moscow Patriarchate refused to do so, suspending the head of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, Metropolitan Philaret, who managed to organize (1992) the Ukrainian Orthodox Church of the Kiev

Patriarchate. Consequently, three Orthodox churches were constituted in Ukraine: the Ukrainian Orthodox Church (more than two-thirds of all Orthodox parishes), the Ukrainian Orthodox Church of the Kiev Patriarchate (one-fourth of all Orthodox parishes), and the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church (7% of all Orthodox parishes). The Ecumenical Patriarchate and other Orthodox churches now recognize only the Ukrainian Orthodox Church under the Moscow jurisdiction and reject the other two as "heretical schismatics."

All Ukrainian Orthodox churches recognize the canons of the seven ecumenical* councils as normative for doctrine, canon* law, and church life. They share the common Eastern Orthodox liturgical practices, sacraments, holy days, and fasts. The conflict among these churches is rooted in their differing attitudes toward the Moscow Patriarchate. While some Orthodox believers reject the latter's authority and regard subordination to Moscow as offensive, others accept it. The post-1991 evolution of Ukrainian Orthodoxy vividly mirrors its ambivalent nature as both contributing to the creation of Russian imperial identity and guarding "native Ukrainian" identity. More generally, the split within the Orthodox Church in Ukraine is an accurate reflection of the political and cultural contradictions in Ukrainian society and the conflicting patterns of historical memory.

The legalization of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church after more than 40 years of prohibition and humiliation has also created an explosive nexus of contradiction. The very existence of this church, with 3.5 million adherents, was doubted by the Orthodox hierarchy, while its years in the catacombs have sparked feelings of triumph and even a desire for revenge from the Greek Catholic side. As a result, a severe struggle between Orthodox and Greek Catholic factions arose in Western Ukraine over which church would gain the loyalty of believers and achieve the dominant position in the parceling of church buildings and property. This struggle, accompanied by physical frays between adherents of the conflicting churches (early 1990s), was far from being fully resolved in the early 2000s.

Roman Catholics (Latin* Rite), having made tremendous gains since Soviet times (from about 100 communities in 1985 to 870 in 2006), have a distinctly ethnic character. Two-thirds of them are centered in the regions where most Ukrainian Poles live; a number of Hungarians and Slovaks also have traditionally belonged to Roman Catholic communities. By the beginning of the 21st c., Ukraine had become the country with the largest Baptist, Pentecostal, and Charismatic communities in Central and Eastern Europe. Their evolution after the fall of Communism has further increased religious diversity and given rise to attempts by these groups to gain a more noticeable place on the religious map of the country.

Orthodox hierarchs sharply criticize the activity of the Roman Catholic Church in Ukraine, accusing it of proselytism* and expansionism toward the east. Even though the Catholic community in Ukraine (Latin and Eastern Rites together) is the largest of those in the countries of the former Soviet Union, the Orthodox hierarchs under the Moscow Patriarchate tried to block both the visit of Pope John* Paul II to Ukraine (2001) and the move of the administrative center of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church from the western city of Lviv to the Ukrainian capital of Kiev (2005). At the same time, both the Orthodox and Greek Catholic churches demonstrate a hostile attitude toward foreign Evangelical missions and new religious movements. Halting or eliminating these rivals became one of the chief goals of the churches' leadership. Their hierarchs appeal constantly to the public, to local authorities, and to the Ukrainian government for protection against foreign missionaries and so-called cults* and sects*.

The fact of religious pluralism, with multiple centers of religious power, prevents any one of these centers from repressing its rivals. Each addresses its own sector of public opinion and its own circles among the political elite. This balance of power prevents the establishment of a religious institution that can dominate others and be identified with the Ukrainian nation.

Almost all Christian churches deny ordination to women, insisting on alternative ways for them to exercise leadership (as parish deans, Sunday school teachers, members of seminary faculties, theological lecturers, church hospital executives, cantors). The issue of additional leadership roles for women is still contested despite the work of theologians and women's organizations.

Christian leaders are one in claiming a greater presence in various social spheres, first of all in schools and in the military, where social service might be accompanied by apostolic service. There is a growing unity among Christian activists in criticizing the moral situation in Ukraine, especially abortion* and youth crime. Sometimes secular circles interpret these criticisms as a campaign for clerical domination of the society.

Ukrainian Christians are searching for an appropriate theological response to the challenges of the post-Communist situation. Will the churches support the anomalies of this situation, remaining silent about social stratification, corruption, and official irresponsibility? What is the role of Ukrainian Christians in East-West Christian reconciliation? How can one harmonize the individual's right to hold any belief, change his or her religion or belief, and manifest that religion, with the collective right to defend one's traditional religious identity? How can the Christian motifs in the Ukrainian tradition be developed while avoiding chauvinism and aggressive nationalist feelings?

The "Orange Revolution" (2004) powerfully challenged Ukrainian Christians by raising questions about the churches' participation in politics (during political clashes, Christians were on different sides of the barricades) and about the admissible forms of defending truth and justice* and resisting evil.

Statistics: Population (2001): 48.4 million (M). Christians (2000), 39.3 M, 81.2% (Orthodox, 34 M; Catholics, 4.3 M [Roman Catholics, 0.8 M; Greek Catholics, 3.5 M]; Protestants, 1.M); Muslims, 0.9 M; Jews, 0.1 M; nonreligious, 7.5 M. (Source: Plokhly and Sysyn, Religion and Nation in Modern Ukraine, 2003).

VICTOR YELENSKY

Ulfila (c311–83), "apostle to the Goths*." Born of Cappadocian parents captured by the Goths, he spent some time in Constantinople, converted to Christianity, and was ordained (341) by the city's Arian* bishop. Returning to the Goths, he translated the liturgy and most of the Bible (except for the warlike Books of Kings) into their language, using an alphabet of his own devising. He was present at the Homoian* Council of Constantinople* (360). The Goths championed this moderate form of Arianism* for several centuries, partly to maintain their cohesion through contrast with the Latin-speaking Catholics.

Ultramontanism (Lat ultra, "beyond," montanes, "the mountains," i.e. the Alps). This term designates a 19th-c. movement within the Roman Catholic Church supporting the centralization of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in Rome, the pope, and the papal administration (the Curia). It stood in opposition to nationally oriented movements such as Gallicanism* in France and was characterized by a clear opposition to liberalism (as in Pius* IX's Syllabus* of Errors, 1864). It reached its zenith with the promulgation of the doctrine of papal infallibility* at the First Vatican* Council (1870) (opposed by Old* Catholics in German-speaking Europe).

PETER C. ERB

Unam Sanctam ("One Holy [Church]"), bull* issued by Boniface* VIII (1302) during the quarrel with Philip the Fair of France, establishing the high point of papal claims: that there is no salvation* outside the Roman Catholic Church, that the pope has supreme authority in the Church, and that the two* swords remain within the authority of the pope.

Unction, anointing* at baptism* and confirmation*, and especially the anointing of the sick (a sacrament* for Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and Anglican churches).

Underhill, Evelyn (1875–1941), independent lay scholar, religious writer, spiritual guide, retreat director. Underhill published 39 books and more than 150 articles. Mysticism: A Study in the Nature and Development of Man's Spiritual Consciousness (1911) became a classic, interpreting mysticism* for ordinary people. Although baptized and confirmed in the Church of England, Underhill was nonpracticing. She was attracted to Roman Catholicism, but the condemnation of Roman Catholic Modernism* discouraged her. In 1920 she returned to the Church of England. She credited Friedrich von* Hügel, her spiritual director (1921–25), with leading her from a disembodied mysticism to a more integrated spirituality.

ELLEN M. LEONARD, CSJ

Uniate Churches, common designation (but a name that neither these churches nor the Roman Catholic Church use) for churches that separated from Eastern or Oriental Orthodox churches (which in most instances still exist independently), retaining their traditional language, liturgy, and canon* law but acknowledging the primacy of the pope*. They are thus in union with Rome (hence the term "Uniate") and are properly known as Eastern Catholic or Greek Catholic churches.

The first such unions were with the Maronite* Church (1182) and the Armenians* of Cilicia (1198). The Council of Florence* approved unions with the Greek* Orthodox and Armenian* churches (1439), as well as with the Syriac* Orthodox (polemically nicknamed "Jacobites*"), Copts*, and Ethiopians* (1442). The largest union was with the Ukrainian* Orthodox Church in the Polish realm, concluded in the Treaty of Brest*-Litovsk (1596). After much of this territory became part of the Russian Empire, Czar Nicholas I required the Uniate churches to return to the Russian* Orthodox Church (1828–38); the Uniate Church (often called Ruthenian) continued in territories ruled by the Hungarian, Austrian, and Ottoman empires, as well as among emigrants in the USA and other countries. Stalin compelled the remaining Uniates in Poland and Ukraine to become part of the Russian Orthodox Church (1946). In 1989 Uniate churches once again became legal throughout the former Soviet Union and now compete with two Russian Orthodox churches.

Unification Church. The Unification Church is the familiar name given Rev. Sun Myung Moon's first organization, the Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity, founded (1954) as a Christian ecumenical organization and replaced (1996) by the Family Federation for World Peace and Unification, a multi-faith association.

Sun Myung Moon was born in 1920 in Pyongyang (now North Korea) to a traditional Confucian* family that converted to Christianity in 1930. Moon reports that the risen Lord Jesus Christ appeared to him on Easter Sunday morning, 1935, on a Korean mountainside and called him to take up Jesus' original mission to establish the Kingdom* of God on earth. Moon spent nine years seeking the divine truth necessary to fulfill this mission, studying the Bible, and the natural and spiritual worlds, and presenting each discovery to God for confirmation or rejection. This became the "Divine Principle," the primary study text for Unificationists, which teaches the principles of creation*, the origin of evil* (human "fall*"), and the principles and providence* of restoration (salvation* history) hidden in the Bible, as well as in Christian and world history. Moon's sermons fill more than 230 major volumes.

Reverend and Mrs. Moon are known to Unificationists as "true parents" and "the king and queen of peace." The designation "true parents" means that they fulfilled their respective responsibilities to embody God's life, love, and lineage and now stand as original human ancestors*, true parents who "bless" couples that form "blessed families." These families inherit and transmit God's life, love, and lineage, expanding to become the foundation of the Kingdom of God on earth and in heaven, the original purpose of creation and the destiny of all human beings.

Marriage blessing and the "Divine Principle" teaching inform all Unification activity. The foundational piety for Unificationists is to realize a godly nature by living with a parental and sacrificial heart for the sake of others.

FRANK KAUFMANN

Union, Mystical. The NT speaks of believers being united with each other in the same Spirit (1 Cor 12:4–11). But "mystical" union is something more, as perhaps implied in Paul's rapture to the "third heaven" (2 Cor 12:2). Mystical union shares similarities with the Platonist* tradition, which argued that true happiness is found only in the immediate contemplation of God (see Beatific Vision). 2 Peter 1:4 speaks of being "participants in the divine nature," and deification (theosis*) was a frequent theme in patristic* thought, such as that of Irenaeus*, Origen*, and the Cappadocians*. Contrasted with deification, which focuses on the change within humans arising from love and knowledge of God, mystical union is the means by which such love and knowledge are imparted. See also HETERONOMY; MYSTICISM, MYSTICS.

Uniqueness of Christ. This phrase affirms that Jesus Christ is the only savior* of all humankind. "There is salvation* in no one else" (as Peter says in Acts 4:12). A related affirmation is that this salvation of all is mediated by the church*; "There is no salvation outside the church," Boniface* VIII said in the bull* Unam Sanctam* (1302). From this perspective, although individuals may be saved in spite of their adherence to other religions, they are always saved by Christ and are related in some mysterious way to the church.

Historically, Christ's universal salvific outreach was explained in two ways. The Greek tradition (and the Eastern Orthodox Church) said that the Word* becoming incarnate* united itself with the whole of humanity, which continuously participates in his saving paschal mystery*; As Athanasius* said, "God became human that human might become God" (see Atonement #1; Theosis, Deification). The Latin tradition (and the Western Roman Catholic and Protestant churches) held that Jesus suffered and died for every one; he once and for all took on himself the sins* of the world and redeemed humanity (see Atonement #2). Salvation* happens independently of humans, although they have to appropriate it by explicit or implicit faith* in Christ. Those who have only implicit faith can be considered “anonymous* Christians” (Karl Rahner*).

In the postcolonial* period, the world is no longer monolithic. There has been a reassertion of other world religions, and they have become factors of social and political identity. Hinduism*, Buddhism*, and Islam* claim to offer unique ways to attain humankind’s ultimate goal. After World War II and the Holocaust*, some Christians are less confident that their religion is the only way. Europe has become increasingly secular* and religion privatized. With Christians’ growing appreciation of other religions, people are said to be saved not only in spite of their religions, but in and through them. This may be justified a priori: if God wishes to reach out to people, God has to do so in bodily, human, and social ways, namely through religions*. The a posteriori argument is based on the “fruits* of the Spirit” found in the believers of other religions. John* Paul II’s encyclical, “The Mission of the Redeemer” (1990) affirms that the Spirit of God is present and active in all the world’s cultures* and religions. Christ is unique, but Christianity is not (see Mission Cluster: Theologies of, and Western and Asian Churches).

Such an appreciation of other religions raises questions regarding the uniqueness of Christ as Savior. Some simply deny it, saying that all religions are salvific and each religion has its savior. Others argue from a Kantian* philosophical perspective. The Ultimate Reality is unknowable. Religions are limited and unsuccessful human efforts, influenced by the local cultural context, to reach out to this Ultimate (see Inculturation Cluster). At this level, all religions are similar, formally equal. Most believers find such pluralism unpalatable. Religions lose their specific identity, and no religion is taken seriously. By contrast, many think that their own religion is perfect, while other religions, although they contain some truth and goodness, will find their fulfillment in it. In that case, they do not take other religions seriously.

Others raise different issues. Religions* do not save; only God does. Religions only facilitate divine-human encounter, which is salvific. This is true also of the church. God may save even nonreligious people if they love God in others, especially the poor and the needy (Matt 25:31–46). So religions can be transcended. Divine-human encounter is mediated by the Word* and the Holy* Spirit (emphasized in the Charismatic* Movement and the Eastern Orthodox churches). In this encounter, we have to respect the freedom* of God who calls and the freedom of the humans who respond. This twofold freedom gives rise to a pluralism of encounters.

Christian theologians in contexts marked by religious pluralism (such as India*) emphasize that God’s salvific will and action are unique and universal. They also point out that since the Christian God is trinitarian*, the Word and the Spirit participate in the salvific act of God. Embracing the whole universe and the totality of cosmic and human history, God manifests God-self through many sages and prophets. At the appropriate time, God enters history bodily, the Word becoming incarnate* in Jesus. In Jesus the “last times” have started when God gathers all things to God-self (Eph 1:3–10) so that God will be “all in all” (1 Cor 15:28). Recognizing Jesus as Savior, believers also experience him as divine. These theologians emphasize, however, that one should not think that Jesus replaces other divine manifestations; Jesus works with and coordinates them. The true enemies are not other religions, but Satan* and Mammon*. Thus for these theologians, it is appropriate for Christians to believe that Jesus Christ plays a central, indispensable, and historic role in this plan; but they should not assume that Jesus’ role is an exclusive one. He is the real symbol* and servant* of the salvific action of God in the world. The church is also the symbol and servant of this mystery. It is God’s mystery that is unique and universal. Christ as the Word participates in it, but this divine mystery is also manifested in other ways than through Jesus. These theologians affirm that the salvific mystery is one, that Christians know it in Jesus and experience it as Christic. Yet other believers may experience this mystery and give it other names.

MICHAEL AMALADOSS, SJ

Unitarianism. The beginnings of Unitarianism are often traced to Arius* (d336), who taught that Christ, the only begotten Son, the “God” and creator of everything else, was himself “created out of nothing” by the Father’s will. Arius’s followers were outvoted at the Council of Nicaea (325), when Arius’s view of Christ was declared a heresy* and the Nicene Creed was affirmed.

The organized beginnings of Unitarianism date from the Renaissance* to the establishment of congregations after the Reformation. Erasmus* had shown that the doctrine of the Trinity* did not appear in the oldest NT manuscripts. Italian reformers began to question the Trinity and had to flee the Inquisition*. Some organization of anti-trinitarians took place in Switzerland* and, primarily after the Reformation, in Poland* and Transylvania. In Poland the Socinians, followers of Faustus Socinus*, rejected Arius's view that Jesus was divine and preexistent, believing instead that Jesus was a human being with a special mission.

The word "Unitarian" was first used in Transylvania and in 1638 became the commonly accepted name for the anti-trinitarians when the Diet of Dees affirmed a new creed, instructing Unitarians to worship Christ, but not as God. After the suppression of the Socinian Movement in Poland (1658–60), its views were imported to the Netherlands and then to England, where scattered liberals preached and wrote, leading to the establishment of the first official (mostly Socinian) Unitarian congregation in London (1774) by Theophilus Lindsay, a disaffected Anglican.

Joseph Priestley and other English Socinians brought their views to North America, but most US Unitarians initially were Arian and preferred to be called "liberal Christians." Mainstream Unitarianism developed out of Congregational and Puritan churches in Massachusetts, by those who rejected the Puritan doctrines concerning original sin and predestination. This liberal group further defined itself after the Great* Awakening by opposing revival* tactics and advocating a reasoned educational approach to faith*; it formed the American Unitarian Association (1825) with William Ellery Channing as its leader.

Unitarianism drifted away from its Christian center under the influence of Ralph Waldo Emerson* and the Transcendentalists*. The centrality of biblical revelation* and miracles* was rejected in favor of natural* religion and human experience. Unitarianism became an ethical faith that was quick to affirm science* while emphasizing Jesus' ethical teachings rather than a revealed mission of salvation*. When the Unitarians consolidated with the Universalists (1961), the Christian emphasis was further diminished in favor of a pluralistic* approach to faith.

MARK W. HARRIS

Unitas Fratrum. See BOHEMIAN BRETHREN; MORAVIAN CHURCH.

United Church of Christ in the Philippines (UCCP) was a union (1948) of three churches: the United Evangelical Church of the Philippines, the Evangelical Church in the Philippines, and the Philippine Methodist Church (separated since 1933 from the Methodist Episcopal Church). The United Church of Christ arose from five faith heritages: Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Church of Christ (Disciples), Philippine Methodist, and the Evangelical United Brethren.

The coordinated effort to bring Filipinos to the Protestant faith began (1898) with US missionaries and was pursued through the Evangelical Union (1901) and agreements on (1) territorial division among the different missions (see Comity Principle), (2) a common name for newly organized churches, (3) a plan to produce one national church, and (4) cooperation in schools, press, newspapers, and other media*. The goal was to bring about "a spirit of comity, unity and cooperation that will eliminate competition and effect harmony for the common task."

The United Church of Manila was formed (1924) to "demonstrate the possibility and practicability of Filipino church union." Its membership came from the United Brethren, Congregationalists, and Baptists. Next, the United Evangelical Church in the Philippine Islands gathered together (1929) Presbyterians, Congregationalists, United Brethren, and the United Church of Manila. During World War II, the Japanese army pressured Protestants to unite into the broader Evangelical Church of the Philippines (1942), which also included the Church of Christ (Disciples), Iglesia Evangelica Unida de Cristo, Iglesia Evangelica Cristiana Independiente, the Salvation* Army, a segment of the Philippine Methodist Church, congregations of Iglesia Metodista en las Islas Filipinas, Iglesia Evangelica National, and more than 20 smaller churches. After the Philippines gained its political independence from the USA (1946), the United Church of Christ was founded (1948).

The United Church of Christ in the Philippines is at the forefront in addressing social* and political* issues. For example, it issued the Statement of Social Concern (1960) "as a guide for Christian thinking and action in meeting the present problems of Philippine society." This statement signaled the shift toward a posture of critical engagement. In response to martial law (1972), the United Church of Christ expressed concern (1974) and later called (1978) for the "immediate dismantling of the machinery of Martial Law in the country."

In 2006 the United Church of Christ in the Philippines, with nearly 1 million members in 1699 parishes and 181 house fellowships led by 743 ordained clergy (including women), is divided into 6 jurisdictions, headed by bishops, and 45 conferences, headed by conference ministers. The General Assembly, the highest policy-making body, meets quadrennially. The National Council, the ad interim body, meets annually.

REUEL NORMAN MARIGZA

United Church of Christ (UCC) (in the United States) is part of a worldwide movement toward united and uniting churches in 20th-c. Protestant Christianity. It was formed in 1957 as a union of the Evangelical and Reformed Church and most of the members of the Congregational Christian Churches, themselves complex unions of other traditions.

The Evangelical and Reformed Church (since 1934) was itself a union of the Reformed Church in the U.S. (during the colonial period, the German Reformed Church) and the Evangelical Synod of North America (founded in the early 19th c. by German immigrants to the Midwest arriving with a united church tradition; see Prussian Union) with a group of Hungarian Reformed churches.

The Congregational Christian Churches (since 1932) united the Congregational churches (including numerous ethnic minority congregations, especially the black Congregational churches in the South related to the work of the American Missionary Association) with the General Convention of Christian Churches and the Afro-Christian Convention (both originating in the early national period) and smaller congregationally organized bodies.

The United Church of Christ is a Protestant denomination claiming the Bible as its basic authority (see Scripture) and celebrating two sacraments, baptism* and the Lord's* Supper. Because of its ecumenical vocation and spirit as a united and uniting church, the United Church of Christ claims a complex diversity of theological and doctrinal traditions rather than a single theological stance or position. Nonetheless, it is broadly in the Reformed* tradition of the Protestant Reformation and theologically liberal.

The United Church of Christ's ecumenical* impetus arose from the ecumenical idealism of early-20th-c. mainline Protestantism. More specifically the ecumenism of the United Church of Christ was grounded in the ideal of Christian unity espoused by the Congregational Christian Churches and in the Evangelical Synod's practical experience (Lutheran and Reformed union) that led them to advocate unity as a vehicle for social* justice* and unity – a point expressed by their important theologians, especially Reinhold and Richard Niebuhr*. Similarly, the 19th-c. Mercersburg* Movement in the German Reformed Church (with Philip Schaff and John Nevin) influenced the ecumenical movement.

Ecumenical commitments create tensions in the United Church of Christ between a broad liberal emphasis on inclusivity – embracing ethnic and racial minorities, women, gays and lesbians, and the new theological issues they raise for Christianity – and a more conservative sense of responsibility to the common Christian commitment to ancient ecumenical creeds and traditional practices of faith and life. People in the United Church of Christ seek to keep a balance between assuming a liberal position on social and theological issues – being open to ideas from many sources – and remaining decisively Christian in commitment.

The United Church of Christ has addressed a constellation of social issues related to racial justice, equal rights for women, the acceptance of people of minority sexual orientations, and concerns about war, urban violence, environmental degradation, economic justice, and the general well-being of people in the world. The 1.2 million members (2007) do not all agree on these issues; local and regional/national interpretations and commitments often are in tension. In addition, the cultural diversity of the church has increased significantly since the 1960s, bringing with it changes in the denominational culture and in the understanding of the nature and purpose of the church.

The United Church of Christ is not marked by a specific theological confession, pattern of worship, or unique organizational structure. It is characterized by a commitment to human community, especially in Christian congregations, in order to express more fully the churches' oneness in Christ and make a more effective common witness to Jesus Christ.

RANDI JONES WALKER

United Kingdom. Christianity in the UK exists in the face of increasingly pervasive secularism* and pluralism*. It is characterized by enormous internal diversity and by residual ties between church, state, and national identity. While in the past the religious histories of the component nations of the UK – England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland (until 1921) / Northern Ireland (since 1921) – have shown marked divergences, at the turn of the millennium UK-wide trends were becoming more apparent.

First Millennium. There is evidence of a Christian presence in Britain in the later Roman Empire, but it almost completely disappeared in the early Anglo-Saxon period. However, Christianity survived in the western regions and in Ireland*, where it had been established by Patrick* (5th c.). Its reintroduction to Britain in the late 6th and 7th c. was the work of both (Celtic*) monks from Ireland, led by Columba* (521–97), and missionaries from Rome, competing traditions that have had an enduring legacy. The conversion of England was commemorated in Bede's* Ecclesiastical History (731). Christianity was maintained in the face of pagan invasions from Scandinavia during the reign (871–99) of Alfred the Great. In succeeding centuries, the medieval church came to enjoy enormous power and wealth, to which the surviving great cathedrals and abbeys bear enduring testimony. Among its greatest figures were the philosopher Anselm*, archbishop of Canterbury (1093–1109), and Thomas Becket*, archbishop of Canterbury (1162–70), whose defiance of King Henry II led to his dramatic murder in his own cathedral (1170).

Reformation. During the later Middle Ages, the church encountered significant criticism, notably from John Wyclif* (c1330–84), but the immediate catalyst for the English Reformation was the marital and dynastic problems facing King Henry* VIII, who defied the pope by divorcing Queen Catherine of Aragon (1533) and marrying Anne Boleyn. Henry subsequently dissolved the monasteries*, but it was only during the short reign (1547–53) of his son, Edward VI, that the government sought to impose a distinctively Protestant religious settlement. Mary* I (reigned 1553–58) attempted to restore Roman Catholicism, but Elizabeth* I (reigned 1558–1603) stabilized the Church of England as a moderate religious compromise, adopting a Protestant theology and ritual but retaining a hierarchy of bishops (see Anglicanism Cluster). Meanwhile the Scottish Reformation followed a more radical Calvinist course, from which the Church of Scotland* emerged with a Presbyterian* organization. In England more radical Protestants dissented* from the Anglican settlement and challenged it effectively during the period of the civil war and subsequent interregnum (1640–60). When Anglican order was restored in 1662, ministers who refused to comply were expelled from the Church, leading to the development of Baptist, Congregational, and Presbyterian denominations* in England. The Society of Friends* (Quakers) led by George Fox* (1624–91) also emerged (mid-17th c.). From the late 16th c. to the early 18th c., Roman Catholics were seen as a significant political threat. Hence they suffered legal disabilities and became a small minority of the population, except in Ireland*.

18th Century. This period saw a cooling of earlier conflicts, but the emergence from the 1730s of a new dynamic force: the Evangelical revival* led by John Wesley* (1703–91), George Whitefield* (1714–70), and, in Wales, Howell Harris (1714–73). Evangelicals established the Methodist* Movement and also had a profound influence on other Protestant denominations, including the Church of England, with their conversion zeal and intense biblicism.

19th Century. Until late 18th c., British Christianity was dominated by the state churches, Anglican in England and Wales, and Presbyterian in Scotland. The (Anglican) Church of Ireland was always relatively weak in the face of the numerical dominance of Roman Catholicism over much of the island and of the strength of Presbyterianism in Northeast Ulster. With industrialization, however, Nonconformists* (including Baptists, Congregationalists, numerous groups of Methodists, and the Salvation* Army in the last quarter of the century) gathered momentum, coming to rival Anglicans in number in England and substantially exceeding them in Wales. The Church of Scotland split in 1843 (see Disruption of 1843). Roman Catholics, strengthened by immigration from Ireland, were also an increasingly substantial minority, especially in Northwest England and Western Scotland. Meanwhile, from the 1830s, the Oxford* Movement asserted a Catholic understanding of Anglicanism. While some of its adherents, led by John Henry Newman* (1801–90), eventually converted to Roman Catholicism, others remained in the Church of England in uneasy coexistence with both Evangelical and liberal wings. Such growing pluralism within Christianity led to adjustments in the relationships between church* and state, with many of the educational, fiscal, and legal privileges of the Church of England gradually reduced and disestablishment of the Church of Ireland (1870) and the Church in Wales (1921). Nevertheless, the Church of England retained a privileged constitutional status. Overall the Victorian Era (1837–1901) was characterized by a high degree of public Christian religiosity, determined evangelism, and substantial but by no means universal churchgoing.

20th Century to 1960. By the outbreak of World War I (1914), Christian observance in Britain was on a plateau or even beginning to decline, and the war itself had a significant disruptive impact on conventional patterns of worship and belief. It was also the backdrop of the division of Ireland (1921), with the predominantly Roman Catholic south forming a separate state. Six counties in the north remained in the UK, forming the Protestant-dominated province of Northern Ireland with an alienated and oppressed Roman Catholic minority. The interwar period saw mixed trends for the Christian churches. The Church of England suffered internal tensions arising from Modernist* theology and from conflicts between Protestant and Catholic interpretations of Anglican identity that reached a climax in parliamentary rejection of a proposed revised Book of Common* Prayer (1928). Disestablishment initially gave a new lease on life to the Church in Wales, and reunion among Methodists (1932) and Scottish Presbyterians (1929) was seen as heralding a new confidence in witness, but such promise was not sustained. Roman Catholics grew in strength, but the Nonconformist (or Free) churches lost vision and momentum. World War II was followed by a period of stability and even recovery in Christian influence during the austerity of the 1940s and 1950s.

After 1960. From the 1960s onward, there was a serious and sustained decline in active Christian observance, a trend that has been dubbed “the death of Christian Britain.” All denominations were affected, although Roman Catholicism was initially relatively resilient, and in Northern Ireland decline occurred later and was less pronounced than in other parts of the UK. The causes of this recession in Christian practice are much debated, but important factors include changing sexual mores, shifting attitudes among women (who made up a large share of earlier 20th-c. congregations), weakening links between the churches and community and national identities, competing leisure activities, and the secularization of Sunday, which became for the majority of the population a day for shopping and sport rather than for churchgoing. The reduction in the number of active Christians also has to be seen in the context of the growth during the same period of other world faiths, especially Islam, Hinduism, and Sikhism, mainly through immigration but partly through the conversion of British people. It should be noted, however, that the presence of religions other than Christianity was greater in England than in the smaller nations of the UK and remained tiny in Northern Ireland.

Statistics. The raw figures can be misleading. Only very superficially did Christianity still look dominant in 2000. It is true that, in the 2001 census, 72% of the population of England and Wales and 86% of the population of Northern Ireland identified themselves as Christian. In Scotland 65% of the population identified their “current religion” as Christianity, and 73% saw it as their “religion of upbringing.” But many of these are “culture* Christians” (see Secularism and Secularization). In 2000 only 12% of the population of the UK were church members and church attendance amounted to only 7.9% of the population of Great Britain. If allowance is made for occasional and erratic attendance, a rather larger proportion may be judged to have some degree of church connection, but it is clear that the great majority of self-identified Christians do not practice their faith in any active way.

The denominational makeup of the dwindling community of active Christians was also changing. Sunday attendance for the Church of England fell from 1,370,000 (1980) to 960,000 (2000) and 850,000 (2006); and for the Roman Catholic Church, it fell from 2,064,000 (1980) to 1,394,000 (2000) and 860,000 (2006). However, from 1980 to 2000, the number of Baptists and Pentecostals declined only slightly – respectively, from 286,000 to 280,000 and from 221,000 to 216,000. Meanwhile the movement of new, independent* house* and community churches grew substantially, from 75,000 people attending in 1980 to 248,000 in 2000. Overall, therefore, there was an especially steep decline in liberal and Catholic forms of Christianity, while more conservative Protestant, Charismatic*, and Pentecostal* churches held their own or even grew. Indeed, within the Church of England, numerical strength shifted toward the Evangelical and Charismatic parishes. A further underlying factor has been the relatively high percentage of Afro*-Caribbean Christians who are practicing their faith – a fact that hides the sharp decline in Christian practice in the rest of the population (see Afro-Caribbean Christianity in the United Kingdom).

Worship. The later 20th c. saw substantial innovation in forms of worship. Change was driven partly by the aspiration to address decline by greater cultural responsiveness, but it also stemmed from the influence of the Charismatic* Movement, which, claiming direct inspiration from the Holy* Spirit, stimulated churches to seek greater spontaneity and less structure in worship. In the Roman Catholic Church, the traditional Latin Mass was entirely abandoned in favor of liturgies in English. In the Church of England, although the 17th-c. Book of Common* Prayer retained official status, it was superseded in practice in the majority of parishes by more contemporary liturgies collected in the Alternative Service Book (1980) and Common Worship (2000). The Church of Scotland Book* of Common Order has been similarly subject to ongoing revision.

Leadership and Ministry. In past centuries, Britain gave the Christian world leaders such as Boniface*, Wyclif, Cranmer*, Bunyan*, Wesley, Wilberforce*, Livingstone*, and Newman*. Although in recent generations, British Christianity has not produced any such seminal figures, there have been numerous distinguished and courageous endeavors to respond effectively to the challenges of a predominantly secular society. The most radical such attempt was made by John Robinson, the Anglican bishop of Woolwich, in his book Honest to God (1963), in which he argued that a traditional image of God* needed to be discarded in the modern world. Leaders such as Robert Runcie, archbishop of Canterbury (1980–91), were more cautious but pursued a strategy of constructive engagement with wider cultural and social forces and endeavored to maintain and extend unity within the Christian community. Similarly, Basil Hume, cardinal archbishop of Westminster (1976–99), ensured the continuing implementation in England of the reforms of the Second Vatican Council and held in check the more conservative and authoritarian tendencies in the Roman Catholic Church. Both men, however, presided over a continuing serious decline in service attendance in their respective churches, which they seemed powerless to control, let alone reverse.

Influential conservative voices have included Martyn Lloyd-Jones, minister of Westminster Chapel, London (1943–68); John Stott, central to the resurgence of Evangelicalism in the Church of England after World War II; and David Watson, who played a key role in promoting the Charismatic renewal (1960s and 1970s). The leaders of new independent churches in Britain include Bryn Jones of Covenant Ministries and Terry Virgo of New Frontiers, while in Northern Ireland, Ian Paisley's Free Presbyterian Church became a dynamic neoconservative force. International visitors have also played a significant role, notably Billy Graham, whose rallies have been seen as a significant factor in maintaining Christian strength in the 1950s. Graham returned to Britain in the 1980s, and other influential visitors in the more recent past include Pope John* Paul II (1982), the Argentinean evangelist Luis Palau, and John Wimber, whose California-based Vineyard Churches have established a presence in the UK.

Historically, the clergy of the Church of England and the Church of Scotland were an integral part of the social order, although varying enormously in wealth and influence. They were normally graduates of the ancient English or Scottish universities. Ministerial formation in the mainstream churches remains predominantly academic. In Scotland prospective ministers continue to be educated at the universities, and although in England ordinands attend separate theological colleges, they, too, often take university degrees.

The most significant trend during recent decades has been the gradual opening up of ordained ministry to women. From the 7th-c. abbess Hilda of Whitby to 19th-c. Methodist and Salvation* Army preachers, and in Quakerism throughout its history, women have exercised significant informal leadership roles in British Christianity. However, the first recorded formal ordination of a woman was that of the Congregationalist Constance Coltman (1917). Other Protestant denominations followed suit only in the second half of the 20th c.: the Church of Scotland in 1968 and the Methodists in 1974. The Church of England did not begin to ordain women as deacons until 1987 and as priests until 1994, but now women make up a rapidly increasing proportion of the clergy. Although significant opposition and objection remain, women are moving into senior positions as archdeacons and cathedral deans, and the Church of England is currently considering consecrating them as bishops (see Women's Christian Practices and Theologies Cluster: In Western Europe: United Kingdom).

Christianity and Society. In past centuries, Christianity had a profoundly formative role in British social development. During the 20th c., its impact became more limited and ambivalent, but it remained significant, notably through the numerous schools controlled by the Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church. In the late 20th c., the tide of legislative change moved against “traditional” Christian morality and customs with, e.g., the legalization of abortion and homosexual practice (1960s) and of Sunday shopping in large stores (1990s). While associated with conservative personal morality, Christianity also showed a socially radical tendency, not only in the socialism of the veteran Methodist preacher Donald Soper (1903–98), but also in the Church of England report “Faith in the City” (1985), which was perceived as an attack on the policies of the government of Margaret Thatcher.

The 2001 census indicated that Christianity remains an acknowledged strand in the identity of the majority of British people, and its role in national identity is symbolized by the public religiosity of the monarchy and the state. In Northern Ireland, despite the peace process, sectarian religious identities remain deeply entrenched and potentially divisive. Elsewhere in the UK, the growth of religious pluralism has led to experimentation with multi-faith and secular forms of public religion and made the maintenance of historic Christian claims to unquestioned ascendancy increasingly contentious. See also ANGLICANISM CLUSTER; EVANGELICALS/EVANGELICALISM CLUSTER: IN THE UNITED KINGDOM; METHODISM CLUSTER: IN THE UNITED KINGDOM; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: UNITED KINGDOM; SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF; SCOTLAND, FREE CHURCH OF.

Statistics: England and Wales: Population (2001): 52 million (M). Christians, 37.4 M, 72%; Muslims, 1.5 M, 3%; Hindus, 0.55 M, 1.06%; Sikhs, 0.33 M, 0.63%; Jews, 0.26 M, 0.5%; others, 0.15 M (0.3%); nonreligious, 7.7 M, 15%; religion not stated, 4 M.

Scotland: Population (2001): 5.1 M. Members of Church of Scotland, 2.1 M, 42%; Roman Catholics, 0.8 M, 16%; other Christians, 0.34 M, 7%; Muslims, 0.04 M, 0.8%; others, 0.05 M, 1%; nonreligious, 1.4 M, 28%; religion not stated, 0.28 M.

Northern Ireland: Population (2001): 1.7 M; Roman Catholics, 0.68 M, 40%; members of Presbyterian Church in Ireland, 0.34 M, 21%; members of Church of Ireland, 0.26 M, 15%; other Christians, 0.16 M, 10%; others, 0.005 M, 0.3%; nonreligious or religion not stated, 0.24 M, 14%. (Based on 2001 census.)

JOHN WOLFFE

United States. Christianity in the USA is characterized by both unifying religious impulses and perpetual religious diversity, by both a blurring of the boundaries between the sacred and the secular and a clear distinction between church* and state.

The USA is widely regarded as a highly religious nation. Most US citizens profess to believe in God; presidential speeches and political ceremonies often proclaim national commitments in religious terms, portraying the USA as a nation with religious roots in the past and a righteous mission for the future – “one nation, under God,” with a mandate to spread democracy* and justice* throughout the world. Yet religion exerts its great influence in the USA in a variety of ways through a vast diversity of communities and traditions, by no means limited to Christianity. Even before the arrival of Christian explorers and missionaries, Native Americans engaged in a multiplicity of religious practices in disparate communities. Religious diversity, therefore, is not a modern phenomenon but a perennial component.

Alongside religious diversity, a central religious “unity” developed that powerfully influenced American society. Mainstream Protestantism shaped the contours of this religious “center,” beginning with the large number of British – mostly Protestant – immigrants who populated 13 colonies and founded a new nation. Much of the story of Christianity in the USA, therefore, concerns the interactions between “the one and the many”: the Protestant mainstream repeatedly encountered religious diversity, beginning with Native* American traditions and continuing through interactions with other Christian traditions (Spanish and French Catholicism, and later Russian Orthodoxy), the religions of African* American slaves, mounting waves of Jewish and Catholic immigrants in the 19th c., and the explosion of Asian and Latin American immigration in the 20th and 21st c.

16th and 17th Centuries: Exploration and Colonization. When Christians first arrived in America, they encountered religions practiced by a variety of peoples, including Huron, Iroquois, Narragansett, Cherokee, Pueblo, Sioux, and Aleut. Despite the so-called European “conquest,” the religious systems of native peoples were not annihilated. Native Americans who converted to Christianity rarely abandoned their indigenous beliefs. More often, they incorporated their beliefs and practices into European Christianity to create new religious systems. It was less a Christian conquest than an exchange between Christianity and indigenous American religions (see Native American Traditions and Christianity).

If “conquest” does not describe the reality, it does describe the attitudes of many European explorers toward indigenous peoples, their cultures, and religions. Europeans believed that Christianity was an essential component of “civilized” European culture and that converting the “Indians” to Christianity was essential to replacing “savage” cultures with civilized societies.

Moreover, while explorers interacted with Native Americans, they also competed among themselves. For Spanish*, French*, and British* explorers, America was a prize to be won, a bountiful land rich with opportunity for profit, colonization, and Christianization; they therefore competed to implant the “right” kind of Christianity. Much like the crusaders* before him, and the Portuguese* in Africa and the Indian Ocean, Christopher Columbus in 1492 conducted his explorations on behalf of his nation and his religion, seeking territory for Spain and converts for Spanish Catholicism. Roman Catholic nations, Spain and France, preceded England’s Protestant settlements.

Spanish and French Catholic Exploration and Mission. Spanish explorers moved quickly to claim the New World for Spain and the pope. In the early 16th c., Ponce de León and Vázquez de Allón named and explored Florida while conquistadores such as Hernán Cortés moved into Mexico, overpowering native populations with little regard for indigenous souls or cultures. The agendas of Spanish conquest and Roman Catholic conversion often clashed, with missionaries such as Dominican* Bartholomé de las* Casas insisting that indigenous people were human beings who deserved humane treatment. Las Casas and other missionaries were heard in Rome, resulting in Pope Paul III’s papal bull, Sublimus Dei (1537), which decreed that European explorers and missionaries should seek to convert Native Americans while respecting their humanity, freedom, and property. But the inhumane treatment continued (see Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions).

Tensions between conquest and mission also had an impact on French explorations of territories that are now part of Eastern Canada and the Midwestern USA. Unlike most Spanish missionaries, however, French Jesuits* such as Jean de Brébeuf achieved some success because they ignored the idea that Native Americans needed to adopt European culture to become Christian. In his work with the Hurons, Brébeuf lived among them, learned their language, ate their food, and incorporated Christianity into their culture. Brébeuf’s immersion in Huron society eventually cost him his life; he was captured, tortured, and killed by the Hurons’ enemies, the Iroquois, who nevertheless admired his courage. Brébeuf’s missionary activity demonstrated a zeal for the gospel and a sensitivity to native cultures that earned the respect of Europeans and Native Americans alike.

While Spanish and French Catholics staked the first claims to what became the USA and Canada, their efforts were soon eclipsed by England’s Protestant colonization, which indelibly marked the religious nature of North America (see Mission Cluster: In North America: Mission as Emigration-Colonization).

British Protestant Exploration and Mission: The Puritans. British migration to the New World reflected the tumultuous impact of religious reform in the homeland. Unlike Spain and France, England’s church shifted from Roman Catholicism to Protestantism* in the 16th c., but the British people widely disagreed over how Protestant their church should be – whether it could retain many of the rites and traditions of its past or whether it should reject all remnants of Roman Catholicism. Henry* VIII’s motivations for seizing control of the English Church from Rome were personal: the pope’s refusal of his divorce from Catherine of Aragon. Thus, while rejecting papal authority, Henry retained much Catholic doctrine and liturgy. His heirs did not exercise a steady influence on the English Church. Edward VI endorsed a Protestant church; Mary* Tudor (“bloody Mary”) violently returned the church to Catholicism, executing Protestant sympathizers; Elizabeth* I erected a moderately Protestant church that avoided liturgical extremes on either side. But her policies dissatisfied radical Protestants, who were often called Puritans* because they wanted to “purify” the church of any Catholic remnants and reform the liturgy according to strictly biblical precepts. When Elizabeth’s successors, James* I and Charles, moved the English Church toward Catholicism and adopted anti-Puritan policies, Puritans looked beyond England, hoping to locate a place where they could practice their faith without the interference of the crown. This quest led some to Holland and many more to America (see Puritans, Puritanism).

The estimated 20,000 Puritans who migrated to America during the years 1620–40 created a “New England” society modeled on a particular religious vision. All Puritans agreed that the English Church was corrupt, although they disagreed on the extent of the corruption. More radical Puritans separated themselves from the Anglican* Church because they believed it was corrupt beyond the possibility of reform. Among “Separatist” Puritans were the founders of Plymouth* Colony led by William Bradford and remembered as “Pilgrims” in US popular history. The majority of Puritans, however, populated the Massachusetts Bay Colony, centered in Boston. These Puritans were not Separatists; they believed that the Anglican Church was corrupt but could be reformed with a return to the Bible and a rejection of “popish” liturgical practices. In New England, Puritans created a church without the “errors” imposed by Catholic tradition. Puritans used a simple worship style shorn of the liturgical trappings of Anglicanism, displaced the Eucharist from the center of worship and replaced it with the sermon, and preached in a “plain style” that focused on scriptural exposition rather than the Anglican penchant for quotations from church fathers and ornate arrangements.

The Puritan devotion to the Bible above all authorities (see Scripture) led to an emphasis on education*. Convinced that everyone needed to be able to read and understand God’s Word, Puritans required that all children be taught to read and founded Harvard College early in the settlement process (1636). To the Puritans, the Bible was a book of covenants* between God and humanity, beginning with Adam* and continuing with Abraham* and, finally, Christ. Puritans constructed their society around covenants; salvation* was based on a covenant of grace; the church was organized through a covenant, as were the family and the commonwealth itself. In each covenant, people were bound by its terms, just as God agreed to honor the peoples’ faithfulness to the covenants and to punish their violations. When the Massachusetts Bay Colony experienced struggles – in the form of wars with Native Americans, drought, dissent, and witchcraft* – Puritans viewed these crises as signs that God was punishing them for unfaithfulness to the covenant. In response, preachers called for the people to “return” (repent and return to the true faith) and to renew their commitments to God. These sermons, now called “jeremiads,” communicated the divine commission that Puritans believed guided their society.

This Puritan vision of a divinely commissioned society influenced later Protestant zeal to create a Christian America and contributed to the persistent idea that the USA was a special nation, chosen by God for a righteous purpose in the world (see Civil Religion).

Despite their efforts to create a uniform movement for church reform and godly society, Puritans engendered dissent and controversy. The first crises came from within their own ranks, with challenges from Roger Williams* and Anne Hutchinson*. Williams was a respected, educated Puritan clergyman who surprised Puritan leaders by adopting radical views, especially that church* and state should be separate and citizens should be allowed freedom to believe as they chose, without fear of reprisal by the state. After four years of controversy, the Massachusetts Bay Colony banished Williams in 1635 for threatening the foundation of Puritan society and the Puritans’ attempt to establish a holy commonwealth. In addition, Williams denied the Puritans’ right to New England territories since they had not been purchased from Native Americans, the rightful owners. After his banishment, Williams fled south, eventually establishing relations with Narragansetts, founding Providence as a colony based on religious freedom, and cofounding the first Baptist Church in the USA.

Soon after the Williams controversy, Anne Hutchinson, a woman with sharp theological sensitivities, questioned the orthodoxy of the Puritan ministry. Hutchinson, a follower of Puritan minister John Cotton, claimed that most of the clergy based their godly commonwealth on a doctrine of salvation by works, not grace*. Puritan society depended on obedience to the covenant and an outwardly righteous life. Hutchinson argued that this emphasis on godly works implicitly neglected salvation by grace, which should be the central focus of Christian life. Partly because of her ideas and partly because of her gender, Hutchinson was labeled a radical and banished from the Colony. But together with Williams, she demonstrated that the Puritans’ zeal for a righteous society was not without flaws; it required the combined efforts of a biblical church and a sovereign state that had the authority to punish religious dissenters.

While influential, the Puritan story does not represent the entirety of British Protestantism in colonial America. Unlike the Puritans, most Anglican colonists were not as interested in reforming the Church as they were in establishing it in America. Eventually Anglicanism* became the official religion in most of the South, including Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, and Maryland. Yet the vast territories were a challenge for Anglicanism; because ministers had to cover much larger parishes in America than they had in England, they could not maintain the same degree of control over parishioners. Many colonial Anglicans also questioned the quality of their clergy, who may have moved to America after being rejected at home. In addition, the Anglican Church lacked the leadership of a bishop in America. The Anglican Church was not without good leadership, however. James Blair led the Church in Virginia and founded the College of William and Mary in 1693. Even broader support came from Thomas Bray* of Maryland, who created influential societies to promote religious literature (SPCK*, Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge) and clerical support (Society for the Propagation of the Gospel) in America.

Along with Anglicans and Puritans, more radical religious imports flowed from England to the colonies, including the Society of Friends* (Quakers). This society, much like the Puritan Movement, reflected the religious controversy in 17th-c. England. George Fox*, the founder of the movement, grew weary of religious divisiveness, much of which seemed focused on external rites that did not plumb what he believed were the spiritual depths of the faith. Fox, therefore, emphasized Christ's revelatory presence in the heart and deemphasized all other religious practices, including Bible reading, which was sacred to Puritans (see Quaker Worship). Because the Society of Friends insisted on pacifism* and rejected hierarchical class structure, the first Quakers to land in Boston received harsh treatment from Puritans; several were even executed. But Quakers thrived outside of Puritan jurisdiction. Many found refuge in Rhode Island, but the greatest support for Quakers came through the leadership of William Penn*, whose Quaker faith shaped his policy of religious liberty in Pennsylvania.

Puritans, Anglicans, and Quakers exemplified the great diversity of Protestant colonists from England alone. This diversity was increased by other immigrants from the British Isles and the European continent, including Scottish Presbyterians*, who settled throughout the colonies, beginning with the first congregation in Maryland, founded by Francis Makemie in 1684. Makemie was the primary catalyst for Presbyterianism in the colonies as he promoted Presbyterian unity in the Presbytery of Philadelphia organized in 1706. Other expressions of the Reformed* tradition included Dutch and German Reformed congregations, which clustered in New Amsterdam (later New York), Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. Many of these congregations were influenced by Pietism*, an international movement influenced by Puritanism that reacted against sectarian controversy and theological scholasticism by emphasizing individual spirituality and practical discipline. This movement, which can be traced to German Lutheran Philip Spener*, had a broad influence in America, especially through the Moravians*, and initiated revivalist preaching and later the Great* Awakening.

18th Century. In the 18th c., the distinctive character of Christianity in America began to take shape. Europeans and Africans continued to arrive (the latter shackled in slavery*); revivalism* erupted among Protestants; and the colonists won a war for independence and founded a republic that would have no officially established church. These and other factors helped to transform European strands of Christianity into uniquely North American forms.

Regional revivals in the 1740s later became known as the Great* Awakening. While historians debate the unity, extent, and political impact of the Awakening, there is no question that revivals broke out in various places among Christian groups. One of the strongest ties that bound the scattered revivals into a unified movement was the preaching of George Whitefield*, an Oxford-educated Anglican who toured the colonies five times. Whitefield's dramatic preaching style drew huge audiences from all levels of society, impressing even Benjamin Franklin*, despite his Deist sensibilities. Whitefield and other traveling preachers created a furor among some clergy, such as Charles Chauncy of Boston, who saw the itinerants encroaching on their territory and implored the people to resist the fanatical "enthusiasm" of the revivals in which passions ruled the intellect and made a mockery of respectable society and true religion.

The nature of "true religion*" was very much open to debate. In opposition to Chauncy, revivalists had an eloquent, articulate defender in Jonathan Edwards*, a Congregational pastor in Northampton and the greatest colonial theologian. Edwards argued that the revivals did not negate true religion; indeed, while some revivalist piety was illegitimate, much of it expressed the essence of authentic faith. Edwards, a revivalist preacher himself, located true religion not in the emotions, as Chauncy accused, but in the “affections,” which included the intellect, inclinations, and will. In true religious faith, the entire person is oriented toward God’s love and will, and this submission to God provides the foundation for all virtue and morality.

The revivals changed the nature of Christianity in America, dividing clergy, contributing to the rise of Baptist churches, and finally convincing people that religion was a matter of choice and that they had the freedom to make on their own. Although the clergy still led the churches, parishioners became religious consumers.

If the Great Awakening encouraged Christians to question religious authority*, the political revolution later in the century encouraged citizens to embrace similar liberties in political revolt against England. Were the two “revolutions” – religious and political – related? Historians debate this question. But it is clear that the American Revolution divided the churches as much as it did colonists. Christians were on all sides of the struggle; some, particularly Anglicans, were loyalists; many were patriots; others were pacifists, particularly Quakers, Mennonites*, and Moravians*. Patriot Christians understood Christianity and republicanism to be complementary. For them, republicanism was the most Christian form of government because it recognized that all people were sinners, even the best monarchs, and therefore no ruler should have too much power. In government there should thus be a separation of powers and the voice of citizens should be a shaping force. Both Christianity and republicanism were centered on freedom – from sin and oppressive rulers – and advocated revolution against tyrannical rule wherever it appeared, whether in Satan’s vile grip on the soul or in King George’s tyrannical hold on the colonies (see Democracy and Christianity).

While many patriots argued for revolution on Christian grounds, others were influenced more by Enlightenment* thought, which had a religious perspective of its own. Several of the nation’s “founders,” including Washington*, Franklin*, Madison, and Jefferson*, advocated a deistic* faith in a universal God who ruled through natural laws and was revealed in morality and reason, not revelation.

The Enlightenment-inspired convictions of the founders led them to determine that the government should not favor one religion over another. This principle was stated in the First Amendment to the Constitution (1791), which said that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” The founders realized that the religious diversity of the new nation was incompatible with any attempt to establish a “national” church. The founders were also wary of ways in which religious controversy erupted in political turbulence in 17th-c. England and Europe. While the First Amendment provoked many questions, it challenged the traditional assumption that churches deserved governmental support. Although individual states continued to endorse established churches as late as 1831, eventually they all followed the First Amendment in abandoning civil endorsements of churches.

The heightened rhetoric of liberty and freedom inspired by revival, Enlightenment, and revolution reverberated through a slaveholding nation. The slaves* forced from Africa to the USA brought their religious practices with them, thereby adding to the country’s religious diversity. Just as the European Christians were separated from Native Americans by cultural differences, African American slaves inhabited religious worlds that stood in stark contrast to the Christianity of their masters. The slaves first encountered Christianity as an enslaving religion, the ideological justification for their oppression, which hardly made Christianity attractive to them. Often, masters resisted Christianizing their slaves because Christianity implied full humanity and citizenship, and therefore conversion would undermine the slave system. Nevertheless, Christianity was received by many slaves, with their own creative adaptation of the faith. While masters preached a Christianity that enforced the slave system and encouraged obedience to authority, slaves fashioned a Christianity that centered on the freedom of the Exodus, human equality, and the redemptive freedom in Christ and that incorporated religious practices indigenous to the slaves’ African cultures. This new form of Christianity provided the foundation for present-day flourishing African American churches (see African Religion and Christianity Cluster).

As in the periods of exploration and colonization, Christianity in the 18th c. – and later on, during the addition of territory as a result of the Louisiana Purchase (1803), the Mexican War (1846–48), and the Alaska Purchase (1868) – encountered other religions and cultures, adapted to US patterns of settlement and leadership, and continued to negotiate the boundaries of sacred and secular, church and state. At the close of the 18th c., Christianity in the new nation was in an intriguing position. While religious observance was predominantly Christian, Christianity no longer enjoyed the support of the state. How would Christianity survive under these new circumstances? Would some varieties of Christianity thrive while others faltered? And, finally, what would determine success?

19th Century. The language of liberty that empowered the American Revolution dramatically influenced Christianity in the 19th c. With the First Amendment's rejection of governmental support for religion, churches lost the power of the state and had to compete for the allegiance of the people. The people, therefore, had more power than ever to shape their religious lives and to determine the viability of the churches. Following the lead of the new nation, much of Christianity became "democratized," and revivalism was a pivotal force.

The early 19th c., therefore, experienced a Second Great* Awakening, with revivals* breaking out in various locations, including the frontier and upstate New York. Unlike the first Great Awakening, which stressed that only God's predestined "elect" could be saved, the 19th-c. revivals refuted predestination* and emphasized that all people had the power to choose salvation. This denial of election in favor of individual freedom was consistent with the rhetoric of liberty in a new nation with an expanding frontier. The primary institution of frontier revival was the "camp* meeting." The most famous one, in Cane Ridge, Kentucky, in 1801, led by Presbyterian preacher Barton Stone*, lasted several days and attracted thousands of people; many experienced strange bodily symptoms of the Spirit's presence, including jerking and fainting. In upstate New York, Charles Finney* viewed religious revival as a science and crafted "new measures" that outlined detailed methods for success. In both the camp meetings and Finney's carefully planned revivals, the message emphasized democratic freedom: all sinners have the power to respond to grace, turn to God, and be saved.

Baptists and Methodists benefited most from the democratic turn in religion, because of their politics and leadership styles. Baptists had no ecclesial hierarchy: each church controlled its own affairs and chose its own ministers without enforcing stringent ordination* requirements. Many Baptist ministers were bivocational "farmer-preachers," similar in educational and social background to their parishioners. While Methodists had an ecclesial hierarchy that controlled the churches, they made extensive use of "circuit rider" preachers who traveled countless miles to take the faith to every corner of the frontier. Bishop Francis Asbury* set the sacrificial example for Methodist ministers by traveling thousands of miles to preach and create churches. Primarily because of these democratic structures and practices, Baptists and Methodists became the most numerous religious groups in the USA by 1850.

While revivalism propelled Baptists and Methodists into the mainstream, new religious groups took their place on the margins of Christianity. Several strands of the Restoration* Movement sought to restore the NT church and its unity in the hope of ending the denominational competition that raged in the 19th c. These groups, led by Barton Stone, Alexander Campbell*, and others, eventually merged, calling themselves both the Christian* Church and Disciples* of Christ, ironically creating an additional strand of denominations. Subsequent divisions underscored the point that, in the USA, denominationalism* was a pattern that was not easily avoided.

While the Restoration Movement looked to the biblical past for guidance, other new groups were oriented toward the future, specifically the biblically inspired anticipation of the second* coming of Christ. Among these groups were Millerites*, Adventists*, and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day* Saints. The last group, also known as Mormons*, began in upstate New York with Joseph Smith's* publication of the Book of Mormon* (1830), a new scripture that Smith claimed to have translated from golden plates revealed to him by the angel Moroni. While Mormons shared much with their Evangelical neighbors, there were also significant differences, including polygamy*, for which Mormons were persecuted. As the Mormons moved west, Smith and others were lynched for their beliefs, although the movement continued to thrive, soon settling in present-day Utah (1846). In the 20th c., Mormonism abandoned polygamy and entered the religious mainstream, promoting family values and conservative politics alongside Protestant Evangelicals.

Not only did 19th-c. revivals transform the churches, they empowered the churches to reshape society. Inspired by revival, Christians joined a variety of voluntary societies for social reform. The spirit of reform was enhanced by the theology of perfectionism* as taught by Finney and Methodist revivalist Phoebe Palmer*. According to perfectionism, Christians can cleanse themselves of sin and achieve entire sanctification*. Furthermore, perfection is not limited to individuals; society itself can be perfected if Christians devote themselves to the effort. Many Christians did just that, supporting societies for abolitionism, temperance*, and other efforts to preach the gospel through social activism.

The most controversial Christian reform movement was the effort to abolish slavery* – an issue that separated Christians along regional lines. The three major denominations – Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist – experienced regional division in the decades before the Civil War (1861–65). This division among the churches set the stage for the rupture of the nation. The religious split reinforced regional differences, which were increasingly reflected in opposing political parties.

Christian reform movements were substantially women's movements. While women were traditionally barred from ordination in most denominations, they constituted the majority of parishioners and empowered various efforts for social reform. Women were particularly influential in the anti-slavery effort. Among them were sisters Angelina and Sarah Grimké*, Quaker abolitionists who also advocated women's rights. Possibly the most influential was the daughter of prominent revivalist Lyman Beecher*, Harriet Beecher Stowe*, whose best-selling novel, Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852), vividly depicted the atrocities of slavery and divided the nation to such an extent that Abraham Lincoln later referred to her as "the little lady who started the big war." Following the Civil War, women's suffrage became a crucial issue. Christian reformers argued that granting women the right to vote would result in a more Christian society, and a more righteous society, because mothers were moral leaders. Although women were not granted the right to vote until 1920, 19th-c. Protestants prepared the way. Women's* missionary societies and women's activities on the mission field offered new opportunities for leadership positions.

In the second half of the 19th c., millions of European immigrants (including German, Irish, and Polish Catholics) flooded the USA and transformed it into a more urban and more ethnically diverse society. Although the nation had no officially established religion, immigrants soon discovered that Protestantism had substantial public presence and political power. Partially in self-defense, most immigrants gravitated to the cities and gathered in communities that shared their religious and ethnic identities. Religion provided immigrants with a familiar way of life in an unfamiliar nation. Tensions developed as Polish, German, and Italian Catholics encountered a US Catholic Church dominated by Irish clergy. Therefore, some Polish Catholics formed the Polish National Catholic Church, and some Ukrainian Catholics gravitated toward the Orthodox Church.

Many Eastern European immigrants were Jews fleeing persecution in Russia*; relishing the opportunity to live as orthodox Jews without fear of reprisal, they gathered in cities and created synagogues. These Jews had a very different attitude toward US culture than the more Americanized Reform Jewish position represented by Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise. Later, Conservative Judaism developed a "middle" position, attempting to maintain a tension between adaptation to US culture and faithfulness to Jewish traditions.

Just as immigrant Roman Catholics and Jews struggled with the question of how "American" they wanted to be, culturally dominant Protestants struggled with the question of whether the immigrants could be "American" at all. Though nativism was not new in the USA, anti-Catholic polemics led to the rise of groups that opposed the perceived religious and cultural threats that immigrants posed to Anglo-Saxon America.

The millions of immigrants often lived in deplorable conditions, brought on by the rise of the cities and the industrial revolution. Poverty*, sweatshops, and child labor were effects of the new manufacturing economy* in an urbanized nation. Protestant reformers saw these developments as threats to their "Christian America" and sought avenues for ameliorating these unjust conditions. Liberal Protestant efforts for reform became known as the Social* Gospel Movement. Unlike conservative groups such as the Salvation* Army, advocates of the Social Gospel argued that sin* infected social structures, not just individuals, and thus a Social Gospel was needed to combat unjust structures of society. Leaders of the Social Gospel Movement included Congregationalist minister Washington Gladden, economist Richard T. Ely, and theologian Walter Rauschenbusch*, who wrote Christianity and the Social Crisis and A Theology for the Social Gospel.

The same force that compelled mainstream Protestants to reform the homeland motivated them to spread the gospel throughout the world. This impulse toward world mission* also had political ramifications, as the drive to preach the gospel was tightly woven with the simultaneous effort to expand the influence of the USA through war and colonization. These efforts for mission and empire combined in the Spanish-American War (1898), during which US Protestants stoked the fires of conflict against what they perceived as Spain's oppressive Roman Catholic regime in Cuba*. The decisive victory over Spain also brought the Philippines* under US political and religious control. Many Protestants interpreted the victory as the triumph of God's nation against injustice, giving them a religious responsibility to shed Protestant light on the Filipinos, who had endured the oppression of Spanish rule and its Catholic faith.

The drive toward a US empire in the world merged with missionary zeal to inaugurate a new stage in the nation's Christianity. Throughout the 20th c., US involvement with international conflicts continued to be propelled by the rhetoric of a righteous empire with a divine mandate (see Mission Cluster: And Imperialism).

20th Century. At the beginning of the 20th c., the USA was a new world power and Protestantism was its most pervasive religious presence. Protestants increasingly defined what it meant to be American. This Protestant achievement met challenges, however, from the ongoing Jewish and Roman Catholic immigration. Protestants had to adjust to a more diverse ethnic and religious society; Jews and Catholics had to determine the extent to which they would accommodate themselves to Protestant America. Catholic adaptation to Protestant America intensified into controversy, with leaders such as Archbishop John Ireland* emphasizing that US ideas of democracy* and liberty were consistent with Catholicism; by contrast, other Roman Catholic leaders followed Rome's stance against adapting Catholicism to liberal, democratic societies.

Fissures also appeared within the Protestant world itself, as mainline churches divided over the new science* and its evolutionary* theories of life and radical Protestant groups emerged to challenge the mainstream faith. Liberals* like Shailer Mathews and Harry Fosdick* attempted to preserve the faith by updating traditional doctrines to make them consistent with evolution and other emerging scientific theories; fundamentalists* advocated faithfulness to an inerrant* Bible and traditional doctrines. While liberal viewpoints evolved among many leaders in the mainline denominations, fundamentalists withdrew to create a religious subculture that would nurture their convictions through separate institutions and publications. Conservative Evangelicalism* would reemerge later in the century to once again take an active role in public life.

The victories of "moderates," with tolerant attitudes, over fundamentalists made perfect sense in the optimistic 1920s as science, technology*, and economic* advancement offered great promise for solving humanity's problems. Adaptations of traditional pessimistic doctrines such as original* sin and the need for Christ's sacrificial atonement* seemed necessary if Christianity was to maintain its relevance. The situation changed dramatically in the 1930s: economic prosperity gave way to the Great Depression, and the world found itself dealing once again with the devastation of world war. Amid these ominous crises, neo-orthodoxy* emerged as a theological perspective that rejected the simplistic optimism of liberalism and called for a reassessment of traditional Christianity's teachings on human depravity. This theological reassessment was influenced by European theologians, chiefly Karl Barth*, but the US movement was led by Reinhold Niebuhr*, a former theological liberal and pacifist who came to advocate a form of "realism" whereby Christians recognized the threats of evil in the world and argued that force was sometimes the only viable opposition.

Meanwhile, Evangelical groups interpreted years of economic crisis and war through their Premillennialist and Dispensationalist* reading of the Bible. By focusing on apocalyptic scriptures, particularly Daniel and Revelation, these Christians became convinced that history was regressing, not progressing, and that Jesus would soon return to gather the faithful and inaugurate his millennial rule. This Premillennialist theology influenced many groups, including Jehovah's* Witnesses, but the Pentecostal* Movement was most prominent.

"Pentecostalism" is a general term for a variety of denominations that witness to a post-conversion baptism of Holy* Spirit, confirmed by speaking in tongues. This vast, multiracial, multinational movement began in 1901 with the preaching of Charles F. Parham at a Kansas Bible school and spread through Parham's influence on others, including William Joseph Seymour*, an African American preacher whose leadership in the Azusa* Street revival in 1906 greatly influenced Pentecostalism's expansion.

The growing vitality of Pentecostalism and other Evangelical movements through the mid-20th c. demonstrated that conservative Protestantism flourished despite losing status in mainline denominations. In the postwar years, evangelist Billy Graham led Evangelicalism's resurgence in popular culture, garnering the national spotlight and the respect of political leaders. The 1950s also evidenced a civil* religion that drew on Jewish-Christian traditions but transcended them in symbols and practices. This civil religion supported the American way of life – a sentiment expressed by President Eisenhower's statement that "our form of government has no sense unless it is grounded in a deeply felt religious faith, and I don't care what it is."

America's optimistic civil religion encountered formidable obstacles in the turbulent, countercultural revolutions of the 1960s. From the Civil Rights Movement, to the countercultural movement (e.g. Woodstock), and to protests against the Vietnam War, the resounding theme was the disillusionment of youth with the USA and its supporting institutions. Traditional religion was attacked as passé, US civil religion was lambasted as hypocritical, and many saw the ironies of injustice and racism* in a nation that championed freedom and equality.

Christianity was on both sides of the cultural divide – both a supporter of the status quo and a critical element in revolution. The cry for justice came principally from the African American Church, led by Martin Luther King*, Jr., an academically trained theologian and Baptist minister whose eclectic influences included the Black Church tradition, the Social Gospel Movement, the theology of Reinhold Niebuhr, and the pacifism of Mahatma Gandhi. The success of the Civil Rights Movement resulted primarily from King's religious sensibilities, substantial oratory skills, and willingness to advocate nonviolent* protest against racism.

Another attack on the US status quo came from the Feminist* Movement, which advocated women's liberation from confinement in the patriarchal* structures of US society. As Feminist theologians recognized, patriarchal structures pervaded the churches, their theologies, and their practices. Most visible was the denial to women of a place in ordained ministry, even though the majority of church members were women. The Feminist Movement served as a catalyst for a progressive change in this pattern. The Methodist Church began ordaining women in 1939, followed by the Presbyterian Church in the USA in 1956. The American Lutheran Church and the Lutheran Church in America followed in 1970, and the Episcopal Church ordained women priests in 1976. Resistance remains in Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches and conservative Protestant denominations such as the Southern Baptist Convention.

The tremors of change in the 1960s also affected Roman Catholicism. Vatican* II (1962–65), called by John* XXIII, inaugurated a new era in Catholicism's attitude toward modernity and the USA. Jesuit John Courtney Murray – along with French Catholics – facilitated the passage of the "Declaration on Religious Liberty," also known as the "American document," which modernized Church attitudes toward religious coercion in a modern world. The council also approved liturgical changes, replacing Latin with vernacular languages, mandated a more congenial attitude toward other Christians, and issued statements against anti-Semitism*. While Vatican II did not resolve all the issues between traditional doctrine and the modern world, it dramatically altered the Church's direction and at least engaged these issues.

Ironically, the radicalism of the 1960s is largely responsible for the resurgence of conservative Evangelicalism in more recent years. Politically charged movements such as the Moral Majority flourished as conservatives responded to what they perceived to be the downfall of the USA by attempting to restore the nation to its Christian roots. Ronald Reagan won the presidential election in 1980 with the support of the Evangelical Religious Right and other conservatives.

Others responded to 1960s radicalism and the counterculture by adopting Jesus as a symbol of their revolt against authority, including the mainstream church. This countercultural Jesus movement was centered in California and moved eastward with institutions that combined Pentecostalism with progressive views on worship. Communities such as Calvary Chapel rejected formal Protestant worship styles and adopted contemporary music, encouraged informal dress, and generally attempted to relate Christianity to popular culture. The result was church that did not look and feel like church. The proliferation of independent community churches of many kinds, coupled with the decline of mainline Protestantism, provided one of many examples of Evangelicalism's appeal to the world through traditional theologies and untraditional forms such as contemporary worship styles, music, and Christian novels. The beginning of the 21st c. witnessed a complex blend of religious vitality in such independent Evangelical groups and steady decline in membership in mainstream Protestant denominations.

Mainstream Roman Catholicism also faced turmoil and decline. Nearly 40 years after Vatican II, tensions remained between Catholics and many Americans who criticized the Church's opposition to birth* control, abortion*, and women's ordination. In addition, scandal plagued US Catholicism when many priests were accused of sexually abusing minors or of conspiring to cover up the crimes of abusive priests.

With the approach of the year 2000, anticipation of the promise of a new millennium was perhaps overshadowed by anxieties. While most Evangelicals refrained from making specific forecasts of Christ's return in the year 2000, the expectation was revitalized and the Left Behind series of novels about the second coming of Jesus and the rise of Antichrist outsold most secular titles. This religious reaction to millennial anxieties reflects a keen interest in religion that set the nation apart from other Western societies.

A new phenomenon emerged in the late 20th to early 21st c.: the multiplication of megachurches*, from 50 in 1970 to 1,300 in 2008.

At the end of the 20th c., more than 90% of Americans professed to believe in either God or a higher power, and this religious interest expanded beyond diverse religious groups to encapsulate US attitudes toward the nation itself. This US civil religion, which held that the nation had a special mission in the world, continued into the 21st c. and became a prominent theme in political speeches and policies. While political rhetoric always had religious overtones – with the common conclusion “God bless America” – political religious language dramatically increased after the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon on September 11, 2001. Three days after the attacks, President George W. Bush spoke at the National Cathedral on a “National Day of Prayer and Remembrance.” His speech reverberated with images of America's devotion to God and mission “to answer these attacks and rid the world of evil.” As Bush's rhetoric affirmed, many Americans still thought of the USA in religious terms, as a righteous empire that preached the gospel of democracy in a hostile world. The perseverance of this idea was one indication that, despite the general secularizing influences, for better or worse, religion remained a vital element of US public life, even in a time when the loss of a Protestant majority seems imminent.

Statistics: Population (2000): 278.4 million (M). Christians, 235 M, 84.7% (independents, 78.6 M; mainline Protestants, 64.6 M; Roman Catholics, 58 M; Orthodox, 5.8 M; Anglicans, 2.4 M; marginal Christians, 10.1 M; all have declined as a percentage of the population since 1970, except for independents [almost doubled], marginal Christians, and Orthodox); non-religious and atheists, 26 M; Jews, 5.6 M; Muslims, 4.1 M; Buddhists, 2.5 M; Hindus, 1 M. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

JAMES P. BYRD

Unity. In reference to God or the church, unity can mean uniqueness*, unification of discrete things, the reunion of what had been divided, or the fecundity that produces similar things. The unity of the church, furthermore, can be visible and institutional (the Roman Catholic approach), or it can be a spiritual unity (as in Eastern Orthodoxy).

Universalism, the belief that all receive salvation* and go to heaven*, in contrast to “double issue,” according to which some go to heaven, some to hell*. Two considerations have been involved:

1. If God's grace overcomes sin*, should not one believe that it might overcome the sin of everyone, whatever that sin might be? Origen* and Gregory* of Nyssa were confident that grace and providence would bring all created spirits, even the devil*, back to unity with God, but this position was condemned under Justinian* (543), with the endorsement of the Western Church. In modern times, universalism has reasserted itself, especially in the Universalist* Church in England and the USA, as well as in F. D. Maurice. A different kind of universalism was set forth by Schleiermacher*, Karl Barth*, and many others; for them, the meaning of predestination* changes from that of “double issue” to God's sequential dealings with the human race: all are first condemned so that they will take sin seriously, and then all are offered salvation*.
2. The alternative of either eternal salvation or damnation* seems to be too stark for the majority of human beings, who may not see themselves as clearly destined for one or the other. Belief in purgatory* is a more moderate approach, allowing this middle group, those who are neither dramatically good or dramatically evil, to become sufficiently pure of heart to behold God. An analogous notion that all human beings are offered salvation after death was put forward by C. A. Briggs and more recently by John Hick.

The debate over universalism presupposes specific views of atonement (see Atonement #2, as honor and juridical satisfaction), of salvation* (from condemnation), of sin* (as a moral evil involving individual guilt and responsibility), and related theological concepts – views prevalent in Western* churches. For the many other Christian traditions (including those of the Eastern* churches, as well as many churches outside the North Atlantic world) that do not share these views, a more important debate concerns the uniqueness* of Christ (see, e.g., Colenso, John William).

EUGENE TESELLE and DANIEL PATTE

Universals. The debate over universals between nominalists* and realists* framed discussions regarding Christology* and the Trinity* (from the 4th and 5th c.), as well as Scholasticism* (late Middle Ages). In different guises, it also played a significant role in theological developments in the late 20th to early 21st c.

Experience shows that discrete things may have identical characteristics, making them instantly recognizable; they may also have the power to reproduce themselves (fire spreads, and living things reproduce offspring). These “samenesses” are called universals because they are exemplified in all instances.

Plato* thought that universals subsist independently and that they are the source of both the definiteness of things and of human knowledge. Plato’s position is traditionally called “realism*,” in the sense that universals are realities. An important modification in Middle Platonism* was that universals are ideas* in God’s mind, the exemplars by which the world is created.

Aristotle* agreed that universals give form to things, but he denied that they are self-subsisting; instead they are present in things as their “forms,” and they are known not in a separate realm of ideas but through abstraction from sense experience. Plato’s error, he said, was in supposing that because universals exist in the mind they must also exist in reality. Aristotle’s position is usually called “moderate realism,” since it affirms universals but gives them reality only as they are in things and, in a different mode, in the mind. This position presupposes an orderly world and the ability of the mind to discover, understand, and speak about that order.

Others argued that universals are nothing more than human words (hence “nominalism*” or “terminism”) or at best human concepts (hence “conceptualism”), with no status outside language or mind. Porphyry’s* Isagoge (Introduction to Aristotle’s Categories; its translation by Boethius* introduced the problem of universals to the Middle Ages) raised three questions: Are kinds in reality or only in thought? If kinds are real, are they bodies or incorporeal? Are they separated from sensible things or are they in them?

During the 4th- to 5th-c. discussions of Christology*, some thinkers, positing that “kinds are real,” affirmed that the Word* assumed “humanity” rather than “a man” (a specific human being), often in the sense that the saving power of the Incarnation* extended, at least potentially, to all humans. Regarding the Trinity*, Gregory* of Nyssa had already compared the Trinity to three human beings sharing a common nature. A realist like Gilbert* de la Porrée was criticized for making too strong a differentiation between the divine essence (a reality) and the three persons (as three realities), in effect postulating a “quaternity” instead of the Trinity. By contrast a nominalist like Johannes Roscellinus (Abelard’s* teacher) was accused of tritheism*, because he affirmed three persons but denied any real unity in the divine essence.

Scholasticism* was ultimately called into question when nominalism became dominant in the later Middle Ages. Nominalists of that period (beginning with William of Ockham*) were critical of the attempts of theology to make inferences from a given assertion, since there may be no basis in reality. Therefore, nominalists found incoherence in a large number of the theological arguments; the only resolution to many problems, they said, was revelation* alone. In one sense, their subtle arguments represented the fulfillment of Scholasticism, but the end result was to call Scholastic argumentation into question.

Scientific developments in the 17th c. introduced the new element of mathematics, which refocused the question of universals. Looking not at the intrinsic forms of things but at their interactions, scientists found striking regularities in the natural world. Yet confidence in the orderliness of the world was modified by 20th-c. physics with the principle of indeterminacy and the increased reliance on probability rather than exact prediction. This change of approach had alternative outcomes, ranging from skepticism* and pragmatism* to a new form of realism in Whitehead*, for whom universals (“eternal objects”) are the multiple “forms of definiteness” in both the mental and the physical poles of all actual occasions, recombining in many ways as the world process moves ahead.

The biological sciences have come to recognize that each living entity has a unique genetic code (the exceptions are plants that spread through propagation or grafting and animals that are duplicated through cloning). In this respect, the nominalists’ ontology seems to be confirmed. At the same time, a species is defined as an interbreeding “population” of organisms, usually incapable of genetic combination with members of other species, or if there is successful hybridization, the offspring are often sterile. In this respect, “moderate realism” seems to be confirmed.

Reflecting on the work of biologists and other scientists, in the philosophy of science “realists” assume that the regularities formulated in scientific laws correspond with those in the natural world, while conceptualists or nominalists emphasize the creative role of human thought and discourse, and even the influence of cultural* assumptions, in formulating the concepts and propositions used in science; if these propositions are deemed to be true, it is only because they are “confirmed,” without exceptions, by experiments or careful measurements (see Science and Christian Theology).

Another contemporary equivalent of the debate over universals is the accusation of essentialism*, e.g. by feminist* scholars who attack facile assumptions that women always have the same inclinations and needs, regardless of social and cultural factors. Many Liberation* theologians have a similar argument. Essentialism in this context is the cognitive assumption that what one knows about women or about human culture in one’s own situation will be true of them universally; its ontological assumption is that there is an “essence” of the feminine in all women or an essence of the human in all people in other cultures and social situations (a realist perspective). The alternative to essentialism is a nominalist perspective that reasserts the need to consider individual persons in their specific social and cultural settings, which is found in different guises in postmodern, postcolonial, and Liberation theologies (see Liberation Theologies Cluster; Postcolonialism and Christian Theology; Postmodernism and Liberation Theologies; Postmodernism and Theology), as well as in contemporary cultural studies of Christianity (see Culture Cluster: And Christianity). See also NOMINALISM; REALISM.

EUGENE TESSELLE

Universities (derived from Lat universitas, a term used to refer to the “totality” of teachers and students). Some features of modern universities can be traced to the schools of Athens and Alexandria, with their attention to texts and philosophical and theological problems. Universities can be traced even more directly to the Miaphysite* schools in Antioch*, Nisibis*, and Edessa*, where Syriac* Christians translated Aristotle and mediated other aspects of Greek culture, and the monasteries* and cathedral schools of the early Middle Ages, which preserved texts and interpreted Greek and Latin traditions under the adverse circumstances of the Arian* Goth invasions. In the West, intellectual inquiry was necessitated by apparent conflicts in theology, biblical* interpretation, and canon* law (see Glossa Ordinaria; Gratian; Peter Lombard); by the rediscovery of civil law (see Justinian); and by new translations of works of Aristotle*, works that were based on autonomous reason* and lacked the explicitly religious overtones of Platonism* that influenced earlier theology.

The first universities were established in Bologna, Paris, and Oxford (late 12th c.; formalized early 13th c.). Supported by city governments and national rulers (because of the potential income, travel, trade, and prestige they could generate) they were defended by organized bodies of teachers and students (the initial meaning of “university”), as well as by the papacy, which permitted universities to accept students from anywhere in Europe and to confer on graduates the authority to teach anywhere, thus reinforcing an international community of scholars. The University of Naples, founded by Frederick* II (1224), was the first state university.

Paris and Oxford became centers of theology, and their best-known theologians were members of the mendicant* orders (including Alexander* of Hales, Roger Bacon*, Bonaventura*, Thomas Aquinas*, Duns* Scotus, and William of Ockham*). The universities played a major role in late medieval life, training officials of both church and state, as well as theologians, many of whom became bishops, cardinals, and popes. The leaders of the universities tried to maintain a balance between the church hierarchy and political rulers (see Babylonian Captivity; Conciliarism).

Although they did not initiate the Renaissance*, universities engaged in the study of the classics in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic, which had been newly edited and printed, usually by individual scholars. With the Age of Exploration, universities spread to other parts of the world; those in Lima (1551), Mexico City (1551), and Manila (1595 and 1611) were founded before Harvard (1636).

Movements for reform often began in the universities. Wyclif*, Hus*, and Luther* were professors. Battles between Roman Catholic and Protestant, Jesuit* and Dominican*, Anglican* and Puritan* theology were fought either in the universities or using the modes of argumentation learned in them. Opposing groups influenced each other, even in heated debate: they read each other's editions of the classics and engaged in a common task of historical investigation, steadily overcoming partisan tendencies – hence the gradual rise of the modern university, with its increasingly comprehensive studies and variety of disciplines.

Colleges and universities in the European and American colonies had varied origins. Some were founded by governments, some by missionary churches, and some by citizens. As a result of their diverse origins, universities were under potentially conflicting influences, both before and after the colonies' independence. Some universities emphasized traditional culture and religion; some adapted to Western commerce, technology, culture, and religion; some adopted a nationalist approach.

Women had traditionally received an education through informal learning, through private tutoring in the case of the wealthy, or by joining a religious order. But in the 19th c. they began to be admitted to colleges and universities. For example, in the USA, Oberlin College was founded (1833) without restrictions of either gender or race; Mount Holyoke was the first women's college (1837). Many state and private colleges and universities followed these two models, namely coeducation and gender-differentiated education. Racial desegregation came more slowly in the USA (finally required by law in the 1960s).

The relationships of universities to religion are varied. In Germany*, universities are under the control of the state, which in turn sanctions church control of theological faculties. In Great Britain, the links between the state and the Church of England were gradually loosened (19th c.). In the meantime, Dissenters* established their own colleges and seminaries, some of which are now affiliated with Oxford and Cambridge. In France after the Revolution, universities were placed under state control, but independent Roman Catholic universities were established. In the USA, there has been a mixture of church, state, and private control. State universities "teach about religion" (in an academic way), in contrast to church-related seminaries and universities that "teach religion" and train students for religious vocations in a particular church setting. Many universities in Africa are like state universities; they offer a varied set of courses in Roman Catholicism, Protestantism*, Islam*, and African* Traditional Religion. See also THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION CLUSTER.

EUGENE TESSELLE

Upper Room, second-story room built in the Greco-Roman world for privacy, for entertaining guests, or to provide comfort during hot seasons. Place where Jesus and his disciples had their last Passover meal together (Mark 14:15, par.) and which became the meeting place for the disciples after Jesus' death and resurrection (Acts 1:13).

Urban II, Pope (c1042–99), prior of the monastery of Cluny, cardinal, and bishop of Ostia before his election (1088). Having inherited a tenuous position – his predecessors, Gregory VII and Victor III, had faced strong imperial opposition – Urban held a number of local synods aimed at strengthening his authority. In Piacenza (1095), the probable presence of an imperial envoy may have turned his attention to the plight of the Byzantine Empire in its struggle against the Turks. Urban summoned the Council of Clermont (November 1095), which, while continuing the agenda of the reform papacy, called for support to liberate the Eastern churches and Jerusalem from the control of Muslims. During the First Crusade*, as it came to be called, large parts of Asia Minor were conquered and Latin rule was established in the Holy Land.

JAMES M. POWELL

Ursulines. See MERICI, ANGELA; WOMEN'S RELIGIOUS ORDERS CLUSTER: IN EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA.

Uruguay. Among Latin American countries, Uruguay is by far the most secularized. Thus Christianity has a unique form: the Roman Catholic Church, marginalized by a strong European-style secularization*, does not dominate the culture and society, yet Christianity remains highly influential in the paradoxical form of a civil* religion.

Because the region was sparsely populated by a few thousand Charrua, there was no sustained effort to develop an “Indian Christianity.” The reductions* established by Jesuits* and Franciscans* (from 1616) and their inhabitants disappeared after the expulsion of the Jesuits (1767). Spanish colonization was slow and weak in this region, which lacked gold or silver, and was settled by people of European (today 94%) and African descent (from slaves that escaped from Brazil*). In this context, a rather liberal and enlightened Catholicism, more Franciscan than Jesuit, supported independence from Spain* (1811) and later from Argentina* and Brazil (1828). The long series of wars leading to independence prevented the institution of a Christian state. A process of secularization, from c1860 to c1919, pitted the state against the Catholic Church. The state (led at decisive moments by an anticlerical liberal elite) developed and occupied key “social spaces” in the new nation (e.g. education, health care) before the Catholic Church could.

Besides the predominant Roman Catholicism, Uruguay traditionally had two basic forms of Protestantism: missionary churches (e.g. Methodist*) and “ethnic churches of immigrants” (e.g. Anglicans*, Waldenses*, Swiss Reformed*), which sustained the identity of their immigrant communities. The relations between Protestants and Catholics oscillated: Protestants tended to side with the liberal state during periods of secularization* and anticlericalism* (preventing Catholicism from assuming hegemonic power), but distanced themselves from the state when secularization became “antireligious.” During the 1960s political crisis and the dictatorship of 1973–85, Catholics and Protestants joined in a struggle for social* justice*, human* rights, and democratization*.

Despite Uruguay’s reputation as a secularized and laicized* country, Christianity continues to have a great influence on the moral and social spheres, although often in the form of a civil* religion. The latter has replaced the churches in public and private life, promoting itself in the social imagination by the use of key Christian phrases, symbols, and rituals, even as it practices an antireligious and often anti-Christian discourse. “Batllism” (the liberal politics, from the early to middle 20th c., of President José Batlle and later his nephew President Luis Batlle), a pragmatic mixture of elements of the welfare state and anticlericalism – including the banning of crucifixes from hospitals and the replacement of Christmas by a national family holiday – exemplifies the recent history of Christianity in Uruguay.

Early in the 21st c., after the deinstitutionalization of Christianity, in Uruguay as elsewhere (especially Western Europe) religion became more individualistic and doctrinally flexible. Yet the ongoing secularization, considered an inevitable expansion of the “modern” and “progressive” liberalism of the 19th c., seemed to have collapsed. What emerged in its place is not easy to describe, as it includes multiple and often contradictory features: the rise of new religious movements and practices; the influence of “the religious” throughout society; “mystical-esoteric” themes expressing, and appealing to, a highly individualistic “religion à la carte”; the growth of extremist, integrist*, and fundamentalist* movements; and the transformation of the relation between religion and politics. Evidence that the traditional perception of Uruguay as a secularized country is eroding includes the expansion of international religious movements, including the Charismatic* Movement, which often ignores social issues and introduces unexpected practices and doctrines.

Many recent events are indicative of this erosion of secularization. For example, there was a proposal to make permanent a cross that had been erected near a public highway (a secular place) for a liturgical ceremony during the visit of Pope John Paul II (1987). Other religious monuments have been erected in public spaces. Proselytizing religious programs are common in the mass media*. For traditional Christian feasts as well as for new celebrations of diverse religious origins, there are large religious gatherings and popular ceremonies. Religious and political authorities interact more readily than they did in the past.

Public opinion surveys in the early 21st c. seem to indicate a considerable growth in personal religious quests, to which religious institutions have responded in different ways. The archbishop of Montevideo, Nicolás Cotugno, brought attention to and defended the emerging “neo-Christianity” – a controversial stance within both the Uruguayan Catholic Church and the society. The “New Age” Movement (often linked with Eastern religions) has spread. The Pentecostal* and Charismatic* movements are economically powerful and omnipresent in the mass media. These are only a few of the many signs of the strong religious momentum, with significant social and political consequences, that challenges the continued “laicized” and antireligious trend in secular and secularized Uruguayan society. See also ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: URUGUAY; SECULARISM AND SECULARIZATION.

Statistics: Population (2006): 3.4 million. Roman Catholics, 47.1%; “non-Catholic Christians” (various Protestants, presumably including some Charismatics), 11.1%; “believers in God without confession” (presumably including members of independent churches, including Charismatics), 23.2%; “atheistic or agnostic,” 17.2%. (Source: 2006 Survey of Encuesta Nacional de Hogares.)

GERARDO CAETANO

Usury, charging of interest on loans, forbidden in the OT (Exod 22:25; Deut 23:19–21) and by several early councils; formally condemned in the Middle Ages, although permitted among Jews*.

Usus Pauper, “poor use,” doctrine of the Franciscans* (approved by Pope Nicholas III, 1279) that they owned nothing and that they merely used things that were owned on their behalf by others, although this use was to be minimal. See also PROPERTY.

Utilitarianism. See CONSEQUENTIALIST ETHICS.

Utraquism, Hussite* practice (promulgated by Jacob of Mies, 1414) stipulating that both the bread and wine should be given to all communicants during the Eucharist* (Lat utraque specie, “in both kinds”), in contrast to the Roman Catholic practice of giving the bread alone.

V

Valdes, Peter (flourished 1173–1205; also known as Waldo or Valdesius), wealthy merchant of Lyon who converted to a life of poverty (c1173). After making provisions for his wife and daughter, he lived on alms and preached poverty with his followers, the “Poor Men of Lyon.” Although initially approved by the Roman Catholic Church (Pope Alexander III and the Third Lateran Council, 1179), the Poor Men were later excommunicated, and the Council of Verona (1184) condemned them. Valdes’s followers became lay preachers and formed groups found from Languedoc to Northern Italy and Austria. See also WALDENSES.

Valentinians (followers of Valentinus*) were members of what was probably the largest and most influential of the Gnostic* movements; according to Irenaeus*, they participated in the life of the church but had their own secret teachings. They divided human beings into three groups, but how this was determined has been disputed among scholars: was it by predestination*, by nature, by their attitude toward the three components of human life (matter, soul, and spirit), or the degree of their transformation? In any case, the three human groups are clear: the “hylics” (dominated by matter), who cannot be saved; the “psychics” (cf. 1 Cor 2:14, 15:46), who are saved by faith and good works; and the “pneumatics,” who return to the fullness of spiritual life. See also GNOSTICISM; SALVATION. EUGENE TESELLE

Valentinus (d c165), Gnostic* theologian. Born in Egypt, he claimed to have been taught by Theudas, a disciple of Paul*. He went to Rome (c136), and after a period in Cyprus* returned to Rome. His works were known chiefly through Irenaeus*, Clement* of Alexandria, and Hippolytus* until the publication of the Nag* Hammadi library, which included several writings of his school, including the Gospel* of Truth.

Validity of Sacraments. Against Cyprian*s* and the Donatists claim that only pure persons can administer the sacraments effectively, Augustine* argued that the sacraments do not depend on the minister’s worthiness. Being signs instituted by Christ, they are valid if administered by an ordained* person using the correct words and with the intention to perform a sacrament. Validity does not guarantee “efficacy” (which depends on grace*).

Valladolid Debate (1550). Juan Ginés de Sepúlveda, Bartolomé de las* Casas, and Francisco de Vitoria debated, in one of the most remarkable events in the history of Western political, theological, and missiological traditions, the justification for conquering and evangelizing the Amerindians in the New World. After the violent encounter between Cortés and the urban and socially ordered Aztec Empire, the Spanish crown could no longer justify the encomienda system as it did with Caribbean Amerindians. The debate centered, among other things, on who is a human being and what are the religious and political rights to the newly “discovered other.” See also MISSION CLUSTER: IN THE CARIBBEAN ISLANDS.

CARLOS F. CARDOZA-ORLANDI

Vandals, a Germanic people who were converted to Arian* Christianity (as were the Goths*) before invading and ruling Spain* and (Southern) Gaul (409–15), and primarily North Africa (429–534). Arian Vandal authorities persecuted Roman Christians, most of whose bishops were deposed or expelled. Many faithful were killed or tortured. As the churches became Arian, many Roman church leaders took refuge in Europe, while others were deported. When the Byzantines destroyed the Vandal kingdom (534), Rome once again ruled North Africa and restored the churches to the Roman Church. See also ARIANISM; HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: NORTH AFRICA.

van der Kemp, Johannes, Dutch missionary of the London Missionary Society in South* Africa. He arrived in 1799 and, after a failed mission to the AmaXhosa of the Eastern Cape, settled among the Khoi people of Bethelsdorp, Cape. He integrated himself with the Khoi, adopted their way of life, and married a Khoi woman. See also SOUTH AFRICA.

M OKGETHI MOTLHABI

Vanity, emptiness, futility, worthlessness, instability, mere show, deception, vainglory; a theme in Ecclesiastes (1:2, 3:19, 11:8, 12:8) and Romans (8:29). Vanity can be associated with misdirected human values and desires, with idolatry*, or with the human condition, which is not only finite but subject to change and corruption.

Vatican, the city-state in Rome where the pope* resides and the Holy See* is located. The term “the Vatican” often refers to the Roman Curia located within it or to the pope.

Vatican Council I, or First Vatican Council (Vatican I) (1869–70), 20th general council of the Western, Latin Church, held in Rome, best known and often misunderstood for its teaching on papal infallibility*. As modern constitutional republics advanced, Pius IX* (1846–78) was determined to stave off attacks on his authority*. There were two small groups of bishops, one in support of infallibility and the other opposed to this doctrine, while a substantial number generally backed the idea but saw its promulgation as inopportune: the Roman Catholic Church had long survived without such an explicit statement, which would be another barrier to unity with non-Roman Catholic Christians. After several months of debate, a compromise was legislated in Pastor Aeternus. Instead of declaring the infallibility of the person of the pope in all matters, the statement asserts the infallibility of the teaching authority of the pope when he speaks ex cathedra (as universal shepherd sitting on the chair of St. Peter*, which no other bishop holds) on a matter of faith and morals. Such statements are irreformable and do not require the consent of a general council. The related discussion of how papal and episcopal authorities operate in tandem was not taken up until the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65).

CHRISTOPHER M. BELLITTO

Vatican Council II, or Second Vatican Council (Vatican II) (1962–65). When he called the Second Vatican Council, Pope John* XXIII wanted it to renew Roman Catholic spirituality*, heal divisions within Christianity, and alter the Roman Catholic* Church’s reactionary attitude to the world. He presided over more than 2,500 bishops when the first session of the Council opened in 1962 and died in June 1963 before the Council met for its next session. Pope Paul* VI saw the Council through the second, third, and fourth sessions, and closed it on December 8, 1965. He then led the implementation of Vatican II’s general policies (e.g. regarding justice* and peace*) and particular decisions (e.g. about celebrating the Mass* and other sacraments in the vernacular languages) until his death in August 1978. When he was elected pope* in 1978, John* Paul II pledged to continue implementing the Council’s teaching. Benedict XVI made the same pledge when he became pope in 2005.

Vatican II produced 16 documents, which amount to 30% of the written texts from all 21 general councils recognized by Roman Catholics. The first document (“The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy*,” approved in 1963) aimed at revitalizing worship*. The final document (“The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World,” approved on the last working day of the Council) aimed at promoting the ultimate well-being of the whole human community. The central document was “The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church” (approved in November 1964), which acted as an umbrella for such documents as “The Decree on Ecumenism*” and “The Declaration on the Relation of the Church to Non-Christian Religions*.” Vatican II gave rise to subsequent texts that applied the Council’s new “Code of Canon* Law” (1983), its “Code of Canons of the Oriental Churches” (1990) (see Orthodox Churches, Eastern, Cluster; Orthodox Churches, Oriental, Cluster), and its “Catechism* of the Catholic Church” (1992).

Vatican II reshaped many institutions and created new ones. In Rome the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, e.g., was founded in 1960 to help prepare for the Council. It has guided relations with non-Catholic Christian churches and communities, as well as with Judaism*. Around the world, new institutions were formed, such as the Federation of the Asian Bishops’ Conferences (1974). Since 1971, a total of 17 Synods* of Bishops have been held in Rome to continue the work of Vatican II in such areas as evangelization* (1974), the Christian family* (1980), and the formation of priests* (1990).

GERALD O’COLLINS, SJ

Veil, the most important part of the habit* of women who enter the religious* life, connoting spiritual marriage with Christ.

Velázquez, Pedro (1913–68), priest, director of the Mexican Social Department (1941–68). He initiated in Mexico the national network of credit unions (Movimiento Nacional de Cajas Populares) and cooperatives for housing, agriculture, and artisanship, adapting them from European models (see Cooperative). His books include Dimensión social de la caridad and Miseria de México. See also MEXICO.

MARÍA ALICIA PUENTE LUTTEROTH and
ELIZABETH JUDD

Veneration (Gk douleia; Lat dulia), offered to saints and holy things, in contrast to worship*, latreia (Gk; Lat latría), offered only to God. Veneration often takes the form of devotions – acts of veneration associated with a shrine, an icon, or a sacred place of pilgrimage dedicated to a saint or the Virgin Mary*. Yet such veneration is not (or should not be) an end in itself; it leads to worship of God because, as Basil* of Caesarea said referring to icons*, “The honor rendered to the image rises to the prototype.” See also ANCESTOR VENERATION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; NICAEA, SECOND COUNCIL OF.

Venezuela. Christopher Columbus* arrived in Venezuela during his third journey to the New World (1498). The country was named “Venezuela,” which means “small Venice,” because the natives’ houses were built on stilts in the water. Hundreds of different indigenous peoples (referred to as “Indians”) inhabited the territory.

After establishing themselves, the Spanish conquerors, began to convert the native people, planting the Roman Catholic Church, and eventually also converted the black slaves* they had brought from Africa. As elsewhere in Latin America, the arrival of Christianity in Venezuela resulted in a demographic disaster for the Chibcha, Arawak, Carib, and other native peoples – currently a statistically small percentage of the population, located primarily in the western part of the country – and in the rise of a racially mixed population (pardos) – now nearly half of the population, including mestizos* (European/Amerindian), mulattos (European/black African), and zambos (Amerindian/Black African), the rest of the population being either white Europeans (in addition to Spaniards, immigrants from many countries) and Africans. After independence other churches were established in Venezuela. Today a large majority of the population claims to be Roman Catholic (c81%, although the percentage of those who attend Mass* is much lower). A small Protestant and Orthodox population (in a great diversity of churches) is quite active; starting in the late 20th c., following the rise of the Pentecostal churches, the Charismatic* Movement emerged in the historic churches and in many independent churches (c10%, including indigenous churches).

When the Spanish arrived, several indigenous nations inhabited the country, the majority belonging to the Chibcha, Arawak, and Carib (Mariche) linguistic families. Dominican* and Franciscans* priests arrived in the northeastern part of the country (1513), and later Andalusian monks settled in other regions. The newly baptized Indians were exploited without mercy by the encomenderos (colonists, including the religious orders themselves, to whom the Spanish crown “entrusted” the indoctrination of the natives in exchange for services and tax revenues), who were seeking slave labor for their cocoa, coffee, and sugar plantations. The indigenous slaves, who were progressively replaced by African slaves, were used for tending cattle (introduced in the Llanos grasslands, Western Venezuela, and Eastern Colombia, areas served by Andalusian monks).

The biological and cultural “mestization” process set the stage for syncretism*/inculturation* in the religious field. The temples where the cults of traditional gods were performed were destroyed. But now saints* are celebrated in chapels built on the very sites of these temples; the old gods have been “baptized” as saints. For example, the Maria Lionza indigenous devotion associates Maria Lionza (a chief’s daughter, born c1502) with both the goddess of water and vegetation and the Virgin Mary*, and in addition its followers venerate two saints murdered by colonists: Guaicaipuro, an Indian chief, and Negro Felipe, a black slave. Many Roman Catholics participate in this devotion, which combines elements of indigenous and African religions with Roman Catholicism.

By the time Venezuela declared independence from Spain (1811), the Catholic Church was the only church established in the country. During the war for independence (1811–23), a significant number of British soldiers came to Venezuela to support the war against Spain led by Simón Bolívar, who incorporated Venezuela into Gran Colombia*. Since many British soldiers were Anglicans, the Anglican Church was introduced (1830). Yet after Venezuela’s independence from Gran Colombia (1830), the law of patronage (see Patronato, Padroado), ratified in 1830, extended to the republican regime privileges that the Holy See* had originally granted to the Spanish crown. In return the government granted to the Roman Catholic Church legal status in Venezuela, although it was always somewhat precarious during the periods of political turmoil and dictatorial rule that characterized the rest of 19th and much of the 20th c.

The life of Juan Bautista Castro (1846–1915) illustrates the vicissitudes of the Roman Catholic Church during this period. He attended the seminary in Caracas and was ordained a priest (1870) in Barcelona (Eastern Venezuela). At that time, the government of Antonio Guzmán Blanco (three terms as president, from 1870 to 1887) was persecuting the Catholic Church, exiling bishops and priests, closing seminaries, monasteries, and convents, banning religious orders, and expropriating buildings and other property of the Church. In 1882 Fr. Castro was appointed rector of the Episcopal School in Caracas, which concealed a seminary that prepared future priests while other seminaries were closed. At the same time, he was given charge of a church in the center of Caracas, called “Santa Capilla” (named after the Sainte-Chapelle of Paris), dedicated to the adoration of the Holy Sacrament, a devotion* which Fr. Castro disseminated by founding newspapers and a religious congregation, “Siervas del Santísimo Sacramento” (Servants of the Holy Sacrament, 1896), ultimately leading to the official consecration of the Republic to the Holy Sacrament (1899). Appointed coadjutor archbishop of Caracas, Fr. Castro was consecrated a bishop (1904). After surviving an attempted murder (1906) when poisoned wine was given him during Mass, he presided over the International Eucharistic Congress in Caracas (1907), the first of its kind convened in Latin America, helping the Roman Catholic Church in Venezuela to regain the ground it had lost during the persecution (see Eucharistic Congresses).

In addition to the Siervas del Santísimo Sacramento, five religious congregations were founded between 1889 and 1909, in response to the persecution of the Church: the Sisters of the Poor of Maiquetía (1889), the Franciscan Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus (1890), the Augustine Recollect Sisters of the Heart of Jesus in Venezuela (1901), and the Catechist Sisters of Our Lady of Lourdes (1909). The founding of these congregations is epitomized by the founding of the Carmelite Sisters of Mother Candelaria (1906) by Susana Paz Castillo-Ramírez (1863–1941). In Altigracia de Orituco, a village in the Llanos where she was born and raised, the “Revolution of Liberation” (1901) left thousands of wounded. Susana took care of many of them at her home. A priest, Sixto Sosa, founded a hospital for the sick and the wounded, asking Susana to assist the doctors (1903); she and other young women began to live and work together in the hospital. The Sisters of Mother Candelaria (with Susana, now Mother Candelaria, as its head), soon worked in other hospitals: Upata (1917), Porlamar (1917), Barcelona (1921), and Cumaná (1921). In 1925 this congregation was officially incorporated into the Carmelite order.

During the 19th and much of the 20th c., many immigrants came from Spain, Portugal, Italy, Syria, Lebanon, Greece, Russia, Ukraine, Romania, Serbia, Germany, England, and the Caribbean Islands (particularly those belonging to the British Empire). For this reason, some Eastern rites within the Catholic Church are present in Venezuela, e.g. the Greek Melkite* and the Maronite* Rites. Several Oriental and Eastern Orthodox churches, such as the Armenian* Apostolic Church and the Antiochian Orthodox, Greek Orthodox, Romanian Orthodox, Russian Orthodox, Serbian Orthodox, and Ukrainian Orthodox churches (see Orthodox Churches, Eastern, Cluster) established sizable congregations, although they are relatively small compared with the Roman Catholic Church. Some churches of the Reformation are also represented: the Lutheran and Presbyterian churches, as well as other Evangelical* churches (a generic term referring to most Protestant churches). By the late 20th c., the largest percentage of non-Catholic Christians were Pentecostals*, Charismatics* (c10% of the population, often in independent churches or as members of other churches), and Seventh-day Adventists*. Jehovah’s* Witnesses make up the largest non-Catholic church.

Frequent meetings of the representatives of the churches, during the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity and throughout the year, led to the establishment of the Council of Historic Churches of Caracas (2001). Immigrants to Venezuela during the 19th and 20th c. included a significant number of Jews and Muslims. The Committee for Relations between Churches and Synagogues (since 1970) fosters good relations between Christians and Jews by promoting a dialogue not only about theological questions, but also about social and political issues of interest to the country. The relationship between Christians and Muslims has been improving since 2000.

The relations between church and state have been subject to constant change and tension. In 1964 the Bilateral Agreement (which replaced the law of patronage) was jointly signed by the state and the Roman Catholic Church. This modus vivendi recognized that the Catholic Church had legal status and guaranteed its right to conduct religious and social* work (including education*) and acknowledged the rights of Catholic lay associations. The state pledged financial assistance to the Church hierarchy for the maintenance of church buildings as well as for Catholic education (universities, high schools, and elementary schools). Conversely, the agreement made the Catholic Church somewhat dependent on the state; e.g. the appointment of bishops can be vetoed by the government, bishops must be Venezuelan nationals, and foreign ecclesiastical personnel must have special visas. Despite this agreement, Catholic education, which was supposed to be supported by the state, often suffered harassment at the hands of changing governments, so that the future of Catholic education is always uncertain. Bishops, priests, sisters, and laypeople feel threatened by political change.

The Constitution of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, approved by the National Assembly in 1998, declares religious freedom. As a result, the presence of other churches and religions is now respected. Yet, although most of the population is Christian, in the early 21st c. the government was still trying to undermine the churches and the Christian faith, and to impose its socialist ideology.

Statistics: Population (2008): 28 million. Christians, 94.4% (Roman Catholics, 81.1%; Orthodox, 1.1%; Protestants, 0.5%; independent Pentecostals/Charismatics, 10.2%; marginal Christians, 1.5%; doubly affiliated, 3.1%); Jews, 0, 4%; Muslims, 1.7%; ethnoreligionists and Spiritists, 3.3%; nonreligious, 2.3%; others, 1.0%. (Source: CEHILA [Comisión de Estudios de Historia de la Iglesia en Latinoamérica] and González-Oropeza's Iglesia y Estado en Venezuela.)

RAMÓN VINKE

Veni Creator, hymn to the Holy* Spirit, written in 9th-c. France; attributed to Rabanus* Maurus.

Venial Sin, a sin that is not so serious as to deprive the soul* of sanctifying grace*, because it is a transgression of God's law without complete commitment to the evil end; in contrast to mortal* sin. See also SIN.

Veracruz, Alonso de la (Alonso Gutiérrez) (1504–84). Upon his arrival in Veracruz, Mexico, he entered the Augustinian* order and changed his name. He performed important functions in the Augustinian* order, in the Diocese of Michoacán, and at the Universidad Real y Pontificia (the Royal and Papal University) and was a steady advocate of indigenous people and their rights. See also MEXICO.

Vernacular, Use of. The vernacular is the language used in everyday speech. The earliest followers of Jesus spoke Aramaic; soon Greek speakers joined the community (Act 6). Both languages continued to be used, but the earliest-surviving writings (NT) are in Greek. Just as Jews had translated the HB into Greek (Septuagint*) and Aramaic (Targums*), early Christians assumed that the Bible and worship should be in the vernacular. Coptic and Syriac (2nd c.), and slightly later Latin (in North Africa), came into use; but Greek remained the language of the Roman Church until the 4th c.

Missionary activity encouraged the use of other vernaculars. Ulfila* devised a Gothic* alphabet (c340–50) and translated the Bible and the liturgy into the Gothic language, which was used by Germanic nations for several centuries (see Arianism); Ethiopic became a church language soon afterward in Ethiopia*; and an Armenian alphabet was invented (c405) by Mesrop Mashtots* in Armenia*.

Cyril* and Methodius developed an alphabet for their mission to the Slavs (c863) and translated the Bible and the liturgy into the dialect spoken in the region of Thessalonica; Old Church Slavonic continues to be the language of the Russian*, Ukrainian*, and Serbian* churches. Farther east, Syriac-speaking Christians traveled to China* and produced Christian writings in Chinese.

The British Isles were a notable exception, in that vernacular languages (Irish, Welch, Anglo-Saxon) were used in popular Christian poetry and devotion but Latin was used for the Bible and worship. Similarly, in Germany and Scandinavia, Latin was the language of worship, although vernacular epics like the *Heliand (c830) based their depictions of Christ on the model of the Germanic hero.

The missionary impulse associated with Francis* (c1182–1226) and Dominic* (1170–1221) stimulated the fresh study of languages, especially Arabic, in European schools. The Age of Exploration (first down the coast of Africa, then to the Indies and the Americas) brought a greater awareness of the world's many peoples and languages. Although missionaries learned indigenous languages for evangelization and popular devotions, the Mass* was said in Latin.

There had already been translations of the Vulgate* Bible into many European languages in the late Middle Ages (see Bible Translations Cluster). During the Protestant Reformation*, the Bible was translated directly from Hebrew and Greek and, with the help of the newly invented printing press, became accessible to many believers. Literacy was encouraged. Translations of the Bible helped to standardize many European and other languages (see Bible Translations Cluster; also, e.g., Indian Literature, the Bible, and Christianity).

The Roman Catholic Church officially changed its stance at the Second Vatican* Council, declaring that the Mass and other sacraments should be recited in the language of the people. Latin has been retained, however, and at times its use has even been encouraged because of its antiquity and its worldwide uniformity.

EUGENE TESELLE

Vespers, the ancient evening prayer of the church; its use in Roman Catholic parishes* was encouraged at the Council of Trent* (1545–63) and Vatican* II (1962–65). Anglican evensong* is based on this liturgy.

KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ

Vestiges (Lat “footprints”), traces of God in the natural world, as contrasted with the image* of God in humans.

Vestments or Vesture, garments worn by the clergy during worship. In the early church, there was no distinctive liturgical garb. But when laypersons abandoned long tunics and cloaks during the 4th–9th c., these garments became a priestly costume. Today they vary significantly among denominations.

Viaticum, Communion given to those facing death*, to strengthen them for their journey.

Vicar (Lat vicarius), anyone acting “in the person of” a superior; in the Roman Catholic Church, the representative of any ecclesiastic; a “second-level” bishop (Russian Orthodox Church) or priest (Anglican Church).

Vicar of Christ, in Roman Catholicism, a title used since the early Middle Ages by bishops and rulers to indicate that they were Christ’s representatives; limited to the pope since the 13th c.

Victorinus, Marius (4th c.). Born in Africa, he became a noted rhetorician in Rome. His conversion to Christianity aroused public comment and made him a role model for Augustine*. His works on the Trinity* attack Arianism* and make use of difficult Neoplatonic* concepts, drawn especially from Porphyry*; while August-tine adopted some of them, he followed his own course of reflection.

Vienna Circle, group of philosophers of science* (from 1907) that issued a manifesto (1929), published a series of papers, and was dispersed after the Nazi annexation (Anschluss) of Austria (1938). See also POSITIVE THEOLOGY, POSITIVE LAW, POSITIVISM; WITTGENSTEIN, LUDWIG.

Vietnam. Tradition has it that the first Christian missionary was a certain I-Ni-Khu (Ignatius), who preached the gospel in coastal villages of Northern Vietnam in 1533. The systematic establishment of missions began in 1615, mostly (until 1659) by Jesuits*, including Alexandre de Rhodes (1593–1660). De Rhodes proposed (1645) that Rome appoint bishops as vicars apostolic, directly responsible to the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith. He also asked the Vatican to nominate bishops and priests and to create local dioceses and parishes for the 300,000 Vietnamese Roman Catholics, because the original Portuguese missionaries and the Portuguese Padroado* could no longer provide for such a large number of believers. Two French priests were appointed bishops, François Pallu (Tonkin, Northern Vietnam) and Pierre Lambert de la Motte (Cochin China, Southern Vietnam).

This action freed Catholic missions from the interference of Portugal and led to the introduction into Asia of new missionaries, the Missions Étrangères de Paris, Dominicans*, and Franciscans*, who opposed the Jesuits’* accommodationist policies.

From the beginning the Vietnamese Catholic Church suffered heavy persecution (17th–18th c., 30,000 killed; 19th c., 100,000 killed, especially during the Van Than Movement, 1864–85). Of these martyrs, 117 were canonized by Pope John* Paul II (1988). Politically, Catholics were regarded as collaborators with France, which used the persecution of French missionaries as an excuse to invade (1859) and colonize Vietnam. Christianity was branded by Vietnamese the ta dao (false religion) because its prohibition of ancestor* worship undermined the moral and religious foundation of the Vietnamese society.

In 1954 French colonial rule ended; Vietnam was divided into the northern Democratic Republic of Vietnam (Communist) and the southern Republic of Vietnam. During the war between the two regions, some 700,000 Catholics emigrated from north to south. In the north, the Communist regime severely curtailed church activities. In the south, the Roman Catholic Church expanded rapidly, thanks to the Vatican* II reforms. The so-called Vietnam war ended with the Communists' victory (1975), and several hundred thousand South Vietnamese, mostly Catholic, sought refuge in the West.

The Protestant/Evangelical Church of Vietnam, "Tin Lanh" (Good News), emerged mainly from the Christian and Missionary Alliance (since 1911), with 4,000 members by 1927. After World War II, the Protestant Church reached out to "original dwellers of the land" (especially Raday and Koho), and by 1974 there were 45,000 Raday and Koho Protestants. In the rest of Vietnam, by 1975 there were 510 Protestant churches (including US Protestant denominations), with 54,000 members. After the Communist takeover, the Protestant Church suffered grievously; most churches were shut down and 100 pastors sent to "reeducation camps."

The Roman Catholic Church under the Socialist Republic of Vietnam also suffered great losses. Its educational and social institutions were confiscated and all its religious organizations disbanded. Hundreds of priests were sent to reeducation camps. Pastoral activities were strictly regulated. In 1988 the Communist government officially guaranteed freedom of religion, allowing the opening of six major seminaries and other public church activities. Yet religious persecutions still occur. In 2005 the Catholic Church had 25 dioceses and 5,500,000 members (6.7% of the population); there were about 600,000 Protestants and as many "independent" Christians.

Statistics: Population (2005): 82 million (million). Christians, 6.7 M, 8.2% (Roman Catholics, 5.5 M, 6.7%; Protestants, 0.6 M, 0.7%; independent Pentecostals/Charismatics, 0.6 M, 0.7%); Buddhists, 40.1 M, 49%; nonreligious, 16.4 M, 20%; new religionists, 9.2 M, 11.3%; ethnoreligionists, 7.4 M, 9%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001, and church statistics.)

PETER C. PHAN

Vigil, eve of a festival or holy day, and thus a devotional "watching" during a worship service. In the early church, the paschal* vigil went through the night, when baptism was administered, ending with the Eucharist at dawn.

Vigilius, Pope (537–55). A Roman, he gained Justinian's* and Theodora's* support as an official in Constantinople; he became pope in 537. Involved in the Three* Chapters controversy, he eventually affirmed Justinian's position, endorsing the decrees of the Second Council of Constantinople* (553) just before his death. His vacillating behavior is often cited to refute papal infallibility*.

Vincentian Canon, test of Catholic tradition enunciated in the early-4th-c. Commonitorium of Vincent of Lérins: "what has been believed everywhere, always, and by all." Vincent's purpose was probably to attack Augustine's* views on grace* and predestination* as incompatible with the tradition* of the Catholic Church. See also VINCENT OF LÉRINS.

Vincent of Lérins (early 4th c.), monk on the island of Lérins; probably one of the Semi-Pelagians* opposed by Prosper* of Aquitaine. His Commonitorium enunciates the well-known Vincentian* canon. The Athanasian* Creed may go back to him.

Vincent de Paul (c1580–1660), priest, central figure in the Roman Catholic Counter* Reformation (Catholic* Renewal) in France. With his organizational skills, nourished by a life of intense prayer, he helped to focus the charitable activities of others, rich and poor alike, on the indwelling person of Jesus, the "evangelizer of the poor." His interest in missions of parish renewal, especially in rural areas, resulted in the founding of Confraternities of Charity. He founded the Congregation of the Mission (priests and lay brothers) to preach and aid in the formation of clergy (1625) and, with Louise de* Marillac, the Daughters of Charity (1633) and the Ladies of Charity (1634). He was canonized in 1737. JOHN E. RYBOLT

Vine, Vineyard. Grapevines cultivated in vineyards are often mentioned in the Bible (from Gen 9:20). "Vineyard" is sometimes a metaphor for Israel (Isa 3:14; 5:1–7; Jer 12:10), as is "vine" (Hos 10:1; Ps 80:8, 14). "Vine" is also a symbol of safety (Israelites sitting under their vines; 1 Kgs 4:25; Mic 4:4) or associated with judgment* (Ezek 15:1–8; Jer 2:21; 6:9). Jesus used vineyard imagery in his parables (Matt 20:1–16, 21:28–46; Mark 12:1–12; Luke 13:6–9) and identified himself as the true vine (John 15:1–17). Drinking the "fruit of the vine" is associated with both the Last Supper and the Kingdom* (Mark 14:25; Matt 26:29; Luke 22:18). JEFFERY C. DAVIS

VIOLENCE CLUSTER

Violence and the Bible
Violence and Christianity throughout History
Violence and Pastoral Care

Violence and the Bible. One of the oldest hymns in the HB proclaims that “YHWH is a warrior” (Exod 15:3). The biblical story of the people of Israel is grounded not only in the miraculous escape from slavery in Egypt but also in the violent conquest of Canaan. The Israelites are commanded to “utterly destroy” the inhabitants of the land, and the Book of Joshua* claims that at least in some cases they did so. Scholars now doubt the historicity of the conquest narratives, but violent conquest is presented as an ideal in the biblical text, typified by the example of Phinehas, who showed his zeal by killing an Israelite and a Midianite woman (Num 25). The biblical story has often been invoked as a paradigm, e.g. by the Puritans* in Ireland and North America, the Boers in South Africa, and right-wing Zionists in modern Israel.

Stories of actual violence, whether historical or fictional, are found primarily in the early books of the HB (but see Maccabees*). The prophets and apocalyptic* writers typically do not call for violent human action, but they predict violent intervention by God to destroy their enemies. The Psalms* include many prayers for violent retribution. Post-biblical texts such as the Dead* Sea Scrolls often predict the coming of a messiah* who would kill the wicked. These expectations played a part in the Jewish revolts against Rome, e.g. that of Bar Kokhba (132–35 CE).

Jesus repudiates violence in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5:38–39). Much of the NT, however, is animated by apocalyptic hope* for the final Judgment* when the wicked will be violently destroyed. The classic expression is found in the Book of Revelation, where Christ is expected to come with a sharp sword in a robe dipped in blood (Rev 19). Revelation calls for patient endurance, not violent action. In the history of Christianity, however, as well as of Judaism, people animated by apocalyptic hopes have often taken it upon themselves to “force the end” by violent revolution (e.g. the Puritans). Despite the words of Jesus, Christians have only occasionally embraced pacifism*.

Scholars and religious leaders rightly point out that the biblical commands are restricted to specific occasions and that apocalyptic violence is the prerogative of God. Nonetheless, there is no doubt that the violence of biblical imagery has often been conducive to violence on the part of zealots.
 JOHN J. COLLINS

Violence and Christianity throughout History. Violence* can be defined as any imposition or use of force, including religious indoctrination. Christianity, like most religions, readily accepts a narrowed definition restricting violence to coercion producing mental or physical harm.

Although the Bible demands personal and collective commitment to peace*, it also accepts divinely sanctioned violence for the sake of justice* or sanctification* (see the present cluster: Violence and the Bible). The gospel presupposes violence inflicted on Christ, and persecution* of the church motivated apostolic* teachings on perseverance and heavenly reward.

Despite moral condemnation of coercion, Christianity supported violence in specific political and historical contexts. Whereas the early church practiced pacifism*, Augustine* allowed for war* in extreme cases, guided by justice*, and supported coercive practices against the Donatists*. Constantine’s* endorsement of Christianity established a formal church*–state relationship that permeated European history. This occasionally led to complicity between Christianity and state-sponsored violence, e.g. Charlemagne’s* forced conversions, European conquest of the Americas, and Britain’s colonizing* in Africa, China*, and India*. Connections between Christian practice and violence were justified by a combination of theological, political, and economic agendas, as in the Crusades*, the Spanish Inquisition*, and the British and US slave* trades. Theological tensions among religious factions led to religious wars during the European Middle Ages and the 16th–17th c. (after the Reformation*) and to anti-Semitic* pogroms, culminating in the silence of many Protestant and Roman Catholic* churches during the Holocaust*. Because of the global spread of Christianity as an indigenous cultural* movement, Christian allegiances were accompanied by ethnic or national tensions, such as in Northern Ireland*, Sudan*, the Balkans*, and Rwanda*, adding a religious element to violence, sometimes involving ethnic cleansing. Western missionaries* occasionally have crossed the line from persuasion to cultural coercion.

Most contemporary theologians denounce Christian-sponsored violence, distinguishing authentic Christianity from its corrupted inculturation*. Some reject or reinterpret scriptural accounts celebrating violence (e.g. juridical atonement*, conquest of Canaan). A few support violence to resist unjust authority, as in cases of racial separation (e.g. apartheid in South* Africa) or economic oppression* (e.g. in Nicaragua). A full ethical assessment sets Christian-sponsored violence in balance with the benefits of Christianity to most populations, including, e.g., literacy and health care. For some apologists, the ethical indictment of Christian-sponsored violence may ironically depend on the Christian exhortation to love victims. Christians agree that peace with God directs believers to seek peace with others, but Christians disagree over which, if any, cultural and political concerns should alter this pursuit.

KENNETH R. CHASE

Violence and Pastoral Care. Violence, the use of threatening human behavior to exercise power and control over persons, creates perpetrators, injured and/or killed victims, and bystanders. Pastoral care involves expressing God's love* and justice* by providing resources for healing* for victims, for holding perpetrators accountable, and for helping bystanders to assume their responsibility.

In Christian theology, violence is a special topic of reflection; violence is central in Jesus' arrest, torture, and crucifixion ritualized in the Eucharist*. Christian faith exposes human violence (including that toward God) and teaches that violence, sin*, and death are overcome by God in Jesus' resurrection*.

Most churches distinguished legal and justified violence (e.g. self-defense, just war*) from illegal and sinful violence (e.g. most interpersonal violence, including assault, rape, and domestic violence). Unclear ethical areas include corporal punishment of children, the subjection of subordinate adults to the enforcement of family* rules by heads of households, and political revolt against corrupt political authority.

A minority of Christians argue that Jesus was nonviolent and Christians should be pacifists*. Most Christians believe that violence, one of the most egregious human sins*, must be carefully circumscribed and controlled, e.g. as postulated by the just war* theory. War and violence must (1) be the last resort; (2) be waged by a legitimate authority; (3) be justified by the evil done; (4) be proportional to the injury; and (5) distinguish between combatants and non-combatants. An adequate theology regarding gender violence against women and other oppressed groups deprived of full participation in family, church, and society has yet to be developed.

Pastoral care focuses primarily on Christian responsibility toward the victims of violence, e.g. by providing care for refugees*, for victims of crimes (including robbery, assault, and rape), and (more recently) for children abused by parents and women victims of domestic battery. Such programs seek to provide safety (ensuring that a person is no longer subject to violence), healing (from the trauma of violence), and reconnection (so that a person can create a new life and future).

Programs for perpetrators have not yet been fully developed. The churches' active involvement in truth* and reconciliation* commissions provides a model. Perpetrators of violence were encouraged to follow the biblical formula of confession* (telling the truth about perpetrated violence), repentance*, restitution, and sanctification*. Such restorative justice* focuses on the restoration of community relationships after incidents of violence.

JAMES NEWTON POLING

Virginity, Theology of. Early Christians interpreted NT verses to mean that commitment to a life of sexual abstinence was more advantageous and praiseworthy than marriage*. Jesus' implied criticism of family* commitments (Matt 10:35–37; Luke 14:26; Mark 3:31–35), his praise for those who become “eunuchs for the sake of the Kingdom of Heaven” (Matt 19:10–12), and his claim that “in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are like angels in heaven” (Matt 22: 30) encouraged celibacy* among his followers, who expected the imminent arrival of the Kingdom* of God. Paul* in 1 Cor 7 claimed that celibate Christians both avoid the distractions of married life and are “holy in body and spirit.” Since marital intercourse might interfere with prayer (1 Cor 7:5), it seemed tainted – a notion reinforced by the belief that Jesus' mother had conceived him without engaging in sexual relations (Matt 1:18; Luke 1:34).

From the 2nd c. onward, Christian writers praised commitment to lifelong virginity. By the 4th c., treatises and letters (especially those directed to women, and in contrast to traditional praise for reproduction) encouraged virginal commitment by practical as well as theological arguments: virgins avoided the dangers of pregnancy*, household duties, marital subjection, and anxiety over spouses and children*. To “reproduce and multiply” (Gen 1:28) was a teaching of the Old Law, now surpassed by that of Jesus and Paul.

Early Christian writers such as Jerome*, Gregory* of Nyssa, and John* Chrysostom taught that the heavenly afterlife became more certain if one opted for virginity. The 100-fold harvest of the parable of the sower (according to which the harvest is “yielding thirty- and sixty- and a hundredfold,” Mark 4:1–9) was interpreted as referring to virgins (the 60-fold represents widows; the 30-fold, the married). Biblical imagery representing Jesus as a bridegroom was appropriated to argue that virgins would become his spouse in heaven. Virginity was the “natural” condition of original humankind to be recaptured here and now: Had not Adam* and Eve* been virgins in Eden*, reproducing only after their sin* and subsequent expulsion (Gen 4:1)? As is commonly recognized, the Genesis story teaches that the first sin led to death. Yet does it not also say that virginity stayed the force of death? Following this additional teaching, virgins chose not to contribute to the number of new humans, who were in any case doomed to die. So prominent was the exalted evaluation of virginity that even writers who wished to praise marriage, such as Clement* of Alexandria and Augustine*, conceded that virginity was a “higher” and holier state of life than marriage; those who questioned its superior status could be deemed “heretics*.” This evaluation of virginity was not seriously challenged by Christian theologians until the Protestant Reformation*.

ELIZABETH A. CLARK

Virgin Martyr Tradition. Virgin martyrs have been popular subjects of devotion* since early Christian times. Narratives concerning the martyrdom* of beautiful young women, ending with spiritual triumph over bodily tribulation, tend to be conventional in form: the young woman is desired by a pagan, rebuffs him for the sake of Christ, is tortured, and finally beheaded. Her body is imagined to be a pure receptacle for the Holy* Spirit. One early exception to the association between virginity and death is the life of Thecla* (2nd c.), who survived two martyrdoms. Later virgin martyrs include Lucy, Agnes, Margaret, and Catherine. There is little or no evidence for the existence of most virgin martyrs, and many of their cults were purged from the Roman calendar in 1969.

Regardless of their dubious historicity, the stories of virgin martyrs played an important cultural role in the Middle Ages and later, often inspiring women. Hildegard* of Bingen was devoted to St. Ursula; Joan* of Arc, a virgin martyr herself, was devoted to St. Catherine and St. Margaret. The canonization (1950) of Maria Goretti (1890–1902), a victim of attempted rape, became a subject of continuing controversy. The example of the virgin martyr remains powerfully ambivalent, in some instances empowering of women and in others deeply misogynistic.

MAUD BURNETT MCINERNEY

Virgin Mary. See MARY, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER.

Virtues, Cardinal and Theological. “Virtue” is the term applied to a power or capability for action (usually a “good” or “honored” action), on the principle that any act presupposes the agent’s capability to act. Aristotle* suggested that virtues can be developed through practice (as by an apprentice), as well as exhortation and education. At best they are “habits” that come into play spontaneously on the appropriate occasion, although Aristotle was also aware of inward conflict and the need for self-control. The classic virtues, starting with Plato* and Aristotle, were prudence (wisdom*), courage (endurance), temperance (self-control*), and justice*. In medieval Christian thought, they were called the “cardinal virtues” and were deemed to be achievable in principle by all human beings, although sin* made them difficult to actualize. The corrective was grace*, motivating and purifying the human subject.

The theological virtues are faith*, hope*, and love* (1 Cor 13). From the perspective of medieval Christian thought, faith, hope, and love are human acts based on “virtues” or capabilities inspired or infused by God and oriented toward God, transforming a person and all of his or her actions. According to the NT, and especially Paul, faith, hope, and love do not have to be based on the cardinal virtues; they are fruits produced by the Holy* Spirit (Gal 5:22–23), indeed the greatest gifts (graces*) of the Holy* Spirit (1 Cor 12:31).

Visigoths. See GOTHs.

Visions, Vision of God. See MYSTICISM, MYSTICS.

Visitation, Episcopal, bishop’s periodic inspection to ensure that all the affairs of a diocese*, especially in the parishes*, are being carried out properly.

Vladimir (c958–1015; Old Norse, Valdamarr; christened Basil, after his brother-in-law, the Byzantine emperor), ruler of Kiev, celebrated for his conversion, together with that of the population of Kiev, to Byzantine Christianity (987/88, according to the Primary Chronicle). He married a Byzantine princess and established the Metropolitan See of Kiev under the authority of the Constantinople Patriarchate. Canonized (13th c.), designated “equal to the apostles,” for Russians he remains, along with his grandmother Olga*, the founder of Russian* Christianity. See also UKRAINE. PETRE GURAN

Vocation (from Lat vocare, what one is “called” to do) is a basic theological pattern relating divine call and human response. In view of its different interpretations, vocation is best understood as a process.

Vocation connects theological views of God*, revelation*, anthropology*, biblical texts, and scriptural* authority with specific contextual conditions. The Gospels interpret vocation through the lens of discipleship*. The Epistles do so in terms of the community of Christians and later the church (see Church, Concepts and Life, Cluster: Types of Ecclesiastical Structures). For the early church, vocation – be it that of Christ, individual believers, or the church – called for loyalty, faithfulness*, and obedience.

The Roman Catholic tradition emphasized spirituality* and related vocation to priesthood* and religious* orders and to the work and mission of the Church. Martin Luther* reinterpreted vocation by emphasizing that ordinary duties of life, such as work and parenthood, are holy callings and commitments, ways of obediently serving God. Luther’s reinterpretation was received either as a trivialization of the holy or as a sanctification* of ordinary life. Jean Calvin* related the idea of vocation to the concept of predestination*: being predestined is being called to a particular service. In Protestant theology, vocation became closely associated with the work ethic (see Protestant Ethic).

How useful is the concept of vocation for interpreting work situations in modern societies characterized by industrialization, urbanization, unemployment, and globalization? This is debated. Yet the concept of vocation certainly shaped the self-perceptions of women and men. Vocation can be criticized for being too often understood as defining a person’s identity in a static way, becoming normative even in new situations, and for being applied differently to women and men as a means of subordinating women. But as the history of this concept shows, vocation is open to constant reinterpretation, according to the way one conceives of the relation between the divine address and human response, and according to the specific life contexts of believers.

As a process, the reinterpretation of vocation begins with questions of “how”: How are theological views, biblical interpretations, and contextual reflections interrelated in the formulation of one’s vocation? How does one conceive of the divine address? How does a particular view of vocation affect one’s views of gender, class, ethnicity, and other religious groups? Raising such questions makes possible a view of vocation that respects the process to which this concept refers and that assumes responsibility for the relations between genders, classes, ethnicities, and the religions that it promotes.

CECILIA NAHNFELDT

Vodou and Christianity. The relations between Vodou and Christianity in Haiti are deeply sullied by the violence* of slavery*. The first missionaries refused to acknowledge that the slaves had any religion; they considered their ritual practices to be nothing but magic and sorcery. Before embarking on the slave boats, they were usually baptized, yet they still needed to be evangelized. Thus throughout the long history of the institution of slavery, the Roman Catholic Church saw that its mission was to evangelize the slaves. For this they followed the "Black Code" (Code Noir, promulgated by Louis XIV, 1685), which in French colonies regulated all aspects of the slaves' relations to their masters and strictly forbade all forms of African worship. Thus it was in secret that the slaves elaborated their own religious system. Vodou (Voudoun), originally from Africa, especially from the Fon (Benin*) and Yoruba (Nigeria* and Benin) peoples, together with the religious heritage of many Bantu people, was reinterpreted by the slaves as they sought to link it to the worship of Catholic saints* and to the liturgical calendar that the missionaries forced on them.

The slaves revitalized their religious heritage in "chestnut camps" (marronnages), i.e. in remote areas in the mountains where they took refuge to escape the hardships of the slavery system, be it on plantations, in sugar mills, or in their masters' houses. The goal of the colonialist administration was the production of a vast amount of sugar to be exported to European capitals. The administration wanted slaves to suffer from cultural amnesia, without ancestors* and without descendants, as pieces of furniture and tools at the service of their masters. In response, the slaves used the Catholic ceremonies as opportunities for gathering and transmitting messages of revolt, and then for reappropriating their beliefs in African divinities through the cult of saints. The Virgin Mary* is the goddess of love, called Ezili Freda; St. James is Ogou Feray, the god of war; and St. Peter is Legba, the god who is the intermediary between the present world and the invisible world. Thus Vodou gave to slaves a symbolic world that allowed them to stay connected to their roots, to have a system of mutual recognition, and to share a culture that united them in the fight for freedom. In times of revolt, Vodou priests and priestesses encouraged slaves to use poison as a weapon. The fear of poison and spells was ever present among masters (late 18th c.). Furthermore, it was during Vodou ceremonies that the decision was made to launch the insurrection of August 22, 1791, which resulted in general freedom and soon after independence for Haiti (1804).

Vodou was not recognized by the new political authorities, who adopted Roman Catholicism as the official state religion. Yet during the first decades after independence, the clergy were tolerant of Vodou, so much so that one still hears today that it is necessary to be Catholic to practice Vodou. But after the concordat* between Haiti and the Vatican (1860), the Catholic Church, with the support of the state, repeatedly persecuted practitioners of Vodou: in 1864, 1896, and 1915–34 (during the occupation of Haiti by the USA, for whom Vodou was cannibalism and sorcery). In 1941 a national "anti-superstition" campaign was launched to eradicate once and for all Vodou beliefs and practices. All Catholics were required to take an oath of renunciation: "I renounce Satan, all his pomps, and all his works," because Vodou was viewed as devil* worship. Similarly, Freemasonry* and Protestantism* were not tolerated, because the clergy viewed Catholicism as alone able to provide national identity. However, Vodou continued to be practiced by poor people.

In the 1930s and 1940s, intellectuals influenced by the indigeniste literary movement began to recognize Vodou as an element of the national culture and a distinctive religion. Jean Price Mars, instigator of this movement, showed that Vodou had temples (ounfo), priests and priestesses (oungan and manbo), initiates (ounsi), rites of initiation, and a rich pantheon of divinities (lwa or mysteries). The divinities are called to intervene among the faithful – a ritual possession that takes place during dances driven by the rhythm of the drum, the main instrument in worship services. Today, many people who convert to Protestantism, Pentecostalism*, and the Catholic Charismatic* Movement demonize* belief in Vodou divinities, even as they incorporate many elements of the same beliefs, including dreams and visions, trances, and possession by the Holy* Spirit. LAËNNEC HURBON

Voluntarism, the position that will* is more basic (in human action or in shaping the universe) than nature or reason* (see Rationalism and Christian Theology). Dunns* Scotus asserted this with respect to both God and humans. Descartes* thought that even the rules of mathematics came from God's will. Less contested are voluntarist positions emphasizing faith* as obedience (Rom 1:5, 16:26) and the priority of love* in Christian life (1 Cor 13:8–13).

Voluntarist Church Community has a fellowship that is determined not by geographic parish* but by the decision of the individual members. See Congregationalism.

von Balthasar, Hans Urs (1905–1988), Swiss Roman Catholic theologian, famous for his 15-volume theological trilogy, The Glory of the Lord, Theo-Drama, and Theo-Logic. Each part attempts to transpose the entirety of Christian theology into one of the three “Platonic transcendentials,” the beautiful, the good, and the true (these “transcend” the particularities of each being; if something exists, it is simultaneously beautiful, good, and true). Balthasar held that, because of habits inherited from Descartes* and Kant* (whose concerns were first epistemological, and only secondarily ethical and aesthetic), most theology started with questions of truth* (e.g. apologetics, justification for theological truth claims). Then the ethical obligations incumbent on the Christian were set forth (see Ethics and Christianity Cluster), with aesthetics treated (if at all) as a mere embellishment (see Aesthetics and Theology). According to Balthasar, this approach proved sterile; today’s rampant secularization* is one indication of modernity’s* habit of looking at things through the wrong end of the telescope. Rather, he said, one must first perceive Christian revelation* as beautiful; only then would the soul be prompted to assent to follow Christ in a dramatic life of Christian discipleship; finally, only inside that life of obedience to Christ would one come to see how and why Christianity is true.

EDWARD T. OAKES, SJ

von Hügel, Baron Friedrich (1852–1925), leader and spiritual guide in the movement known as Roman Catholic Modernism*; friend of Tyrrell*, Loisy*, and Petre*. As a financially independent lay scholar of religion with an aristocratic background, he had access to the Western European ecclesiastical and scholarly world. His philosophy of religion, The Mystical Element of Religion as Studied in St. Catherine of Genoa and Her Friends (1908, 2 vols.), distinguishes three elements of religion: “the authoritative, historical, institutional; the critical, speculative, philosophical; [and] the intuitive, vocational, mystical” (cf., respectively, Relationality; Autonomy; Heteronomy). Von Hügel strove to keep these elements in creative tension before and after the condemnation of Modernism. He escaped ecclesiastical censure and remained a loyal but critical Roman Catholic.

ELLEN M. LEONARD, CSJ

Voodoo, anglicized form of the term “Vodou*,” used by outsiders who view Vodou as superstition*.

Votive Mass, optional liturgical formulary that may be used on any day when there is no assigned feast or obligatory memorial on the liturgical calendar. Votive Masses in the current Roman Missal celebrate mysteries of the life of Christ, the Holy* Trinity, the Blessed Virgin Mary*, angels*, and saints. Their purpose is to promote piety and devotion*.

KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ

Vows, solemn promises voluntarily made to God, specifically to follow the three counsels* of perfection (poverty, chastity, obedience); also the promises given by partners in a wedding ceremony.

Vulgate (Lat vulgatus, “common,” “commonly known”; a designation from the Middle Ages), official Latin translation of the Bible that Pope Damasus requested of Jerome*; started in 382. Jerome revised the Gospels and all of the OT, with three versions of the Psalms. Others revised the rest of the NT; the Apocrypha* was revised by Jerome and others. These translations gradually replaced the Old* Latin version. The first book printed by Gutenberg was the Vulgate (1454–56). The Council of Trent* made the Vulgate text authoritative; corrected texts were issued in 1590, 1592, and in the 20th c. See also BIBLE TRANSLATIONS CLUSTER: EARLY TRANSLATIONS/VERSIONS.

W

Wake, vigil* on the eve of a church festival; also the watch or vigil beside a dead body or the feasting and remembrance following the funeral.

Waldenses. The name “Waldenses” refers to the members of a movement of “heretical*” dissent from the medieval Roman Catholic Church. In the 16th c., Waldensian communities joined the Reformed Church in Italy as the Chiesa Evangelica Valdese.

A wealthy lay citizen of Lyon, Valdesius (Valdes*), underwent a conversion experience c1173. Like Francis*, he wished to lead a life of poverty and of spreading the gospel. The archbishop of Lyon, the Cistercian* Guichard de Pontigny, protected Valdes against accusations of irregular actions and beliefs, but after a dispute with Guichard’s successor, Valdes and his followers were expelled from Lyon. The first Waldensians were lay preachers. The doctrinal content of their proclamation was conventional, especially where the Waldenses opposed the Cathars* in Languedoc and Northern Italy. Innocent III reconciled some “Lyonnais” and “Lombard” Waldenses to the Roman Catholic Church (1208–10).

By c1250 Waldensian groups were identified from Gascony and the Languedoc to the Danube valley in Austria. They were accused of questioning the ministries of sinful priests (see Donatism) and denying the Church’s power to assist souls* in purgatory*, as well as the legitimacy of its consecrations. They formed tight-knit endogamous groups, heard sermons from celibate, traveling pastors of the movement, and confessed their sins to them.

Medieval inquisitions* based in Toulouse (early 14th c.), Prague (1330s–1350s), and Brandenburg (late 14th c.) recorded many investigations of Waldenses. In the Alps, between the Dauphiné and the Duchy of Savoy, they formed tenacious defensive groups: those of the Dauphiné endured a vicious and corrupt “crusade” against them (1487–88). A Waldensian literary corpus of c1500 includes poems, sermons, and translations or paraphrases from Catholic moralistic literature mixed with extracts from late Hussite* theology derived from the Bohemian* Brethren.

From c1530 the Waldenses of the southwestern Alps and their colonies in Provence made contact with the Reformers of the Vaud and Neuchâtel region. Initially Reformed ideas on justification* by faith and spiritual worship clashed with the Waldensian stress on ethics and purity. Protestant influence grew during the French occupation of Piedmont (1536–59). After 1555 the Waldensian communities received Protestant ministers trained in Geneva and adopted (1560) a confession of faith modeled on the French Reformed Church’s Confessio Gallicana. Following a short war (1560–61), the Waldensian communities in Savoy were given limited rights to worship within an enclave. Those of Provence and the Dauphiné were subsumed within the French Reformed Church.

From 1561 to 1848, the Waldensian Church, an outpost of the Geneva tradition, was often attacked (e.g. 1655 and 1686) but never eliminated. Given civil rights in Piedmont-Savoy in 1848, the Waldenses established their own theological college and traditions. The Facoltà Valdese di Teologia, founded 1855 (in Rome since 1922), appropriated the message of liberal Protestantism early and remains in the vanguard of progressive religious thought in Italy.

EUAN K. CAMERON

War, Christian Attitudes toward. The Christian tradition has manifested a spectrum of responses to questions of conflict and war, ranging from the violent zeal of the medieval crusaders* to the thoroughgoing pacifism* of the Amish*. Cultural differences, political and technological developments, and the complexity of the Bible have all helped produce this diversity of views. Depending on their respective commitments regarding the necessity of combating injustice, the morality of violence*, and the need for limitations on the justified use of force, Christians have historically adopted stances endorsing nonresistance, nonviolent* resistance, just war, and holy war.

Each of these positions can claim scriptural roots. In the OT, the Decalogue establishes a prohibition against killing (Exod 20:13), and a world is foretold in which swords will be beaten into plowshares and war shall be learned no more (Isa 2:4), yet God is elsewhere portrayed as underwriting various sorts of wars against Israel's foes, including the ban (herem), a war of total extermination (Deut 20:16–18). In the NT, while Paul insists that the governing authority does not bear the sword in vain (Rom 13:4), Jesus enjoins his followers to love their enemies and not to resist evildoers (Matt 5:39, 44).

The early Christian community appears to have lived out an ethos* of sacrificial forgiveness* and nonresistance, rooted in the Sermon* on the Mount, which was held (at least until 170) to be incompatible with military service. In subsequent centuries, this attitude of strict nonresistance was sustained at the margins of Christian life: in monastic* orders, in countercultural communities such as that of the Waldenses*, and in the Anabaptist* Movement that emerged from the Radical* Reformation and gave rise to present-day “peace churches,” such as the Mennonite* Church and the Church of the Brethren*.

The epochal shift marked by Constantine's* marriage of church* and state gradually led Christian authorities, such as Ambrose*, to accept a qualified rationale for the use of force that ultimately became known as the “just war tradition.” Rooted in the notion that, in a sinful world, Christian neighbor-love sometimes requires the reluctant and limited use of force to restrain grievous injustice, the just war idea developed over time into a two-part theory joining criteria for when the resort to armed force is justified (jus ad bellum) with standards defining how war may justly be fought (jus in bello).

Much of the jus ad bellum was adapted from Roman practice, including the provisions that war have a just cause; that it be declared by a proper political authority; and that it be waged only when it is a last resort, its hoped-for goods remain in proportion to its foreseeable evils, and peace is the desired outcome. Augustine*, who upheld the possibility of just war even while condemning the use of violence in individual self-defense, contributed the stipulation that war could be pursued only with a right intention characterized by a dispassionate spirit of service. Thomas Aquinas* shifted the theory's theological footing from love to natural justice* and, reflecting the shifting political sensibilities of his own age, included a qualified right to rebellion. The definitive 16th-c. formulation of the just war theory by Francisco de Vitoria added the criterion of relative justice, a distinctively modern principle of humility and restraint regarding claims of absolute justice in war.

In the wake of the traumatic religious wars accompanying the transition to modernity*, the just war idea gradually eclipsed the “Christian holy war tradition,” which, as evidenced in the Crusades* and the Puritan* Revolution, typically envisaged war as an enterprise to be conducted under God's auspices, unsparingly, in the pursuit of religious ends. Over time, the jus ad bellum notion of just cause, which early on included the conversion of non-Christians and the punishment of heresy*, became largely restricted to defense against unjust aggression. The emergence in the 20th c. of the techniques of total war and mass destruction, meanwhile, raised the stature of the two central jus in bello requirements mandating proportionality in the use of force and, in particular, the preservation of non-combatant immunity.

At the same time, Gandhi's practice of satyagraha, the US civil* rights campaign, and the peaceful revolutions that swept the world in the 1980s prompted a resurgence of nonviolent action as a viable alternative to both war and nonresistance in Christian thought. Christians who have historically held that discipleship requires nonviolent activity to promote the justice* of the Kingdom* of God, including the Quakers* and pacifists within mainline denominations, have found their view reinforced by the example of Martin Luther King*, Jr., and by a burgeoning emphasis in Roman Catholic teaching on nonviolence* and forgiveness*.

As Christians consider how to respond to contemporary problems of war, such as nuclear proliferation, humanitarian intervention, and terrorism, it is the conceptions of nonviolent resistance and just war that largely define the debate. See also RECONCILIATION AS A CHRISTIAN PRAXIS; VIOLENCE CLUSTER: AND PASTORAL CARE. WILLIAM A. BARBIERI

Ward, Mary (1585–1645), founder of the unenclosed apostolic religious* life for women. Born into a Roman Catholic family in Yorkshire during a time of religious persecution, she fled to St. Omer in Flanders. There she sought to fulfill her religious vocation by entering a cloistered order. It was revealed to her that “some other thing” was required of her. With a group of companions, she spent the rest of her life experimenting with the unenclosed apostolic life, founding communities in continental Europe and England. As a woman, she drew disapproval from the Roman Catholic Church; her attempts to adopt the Constitutions of the Society* of Jesus were thwarted at every turn.

LAVINIA BYRNE

Washington, Booker T. (1856–1915), established the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute in 1881, a school dedicated to inculcating business values and basic literacy among formerly enslaved African Americans in the antebellum South. Reflecting on his memories of childhood under slavery*, he said that although plantation hymns had often contained references to “freedom of the body in this world,” slave religion had been excessively otherworldly and emotional. He therefore attempted to reform Black religion as an instrument for developing a body of yeoman farmers, a class of skilled craftsmen, and a vanguard of small capitalists. Decades before Max Weber* published The Protestant Ethic and the Theory of Capitalism, Washington had seen a practical tie between religion and economics*. Thus he regularly preached a gospel of industry and commercialism during Sunday evening talks in the Tuskegee chapel. See also PROTESTANT ETHIC. WILSON J. MOSES Washington, George (1732–99), planter, military officer, politician, commander of the Continental Army (1775–83), first president of the USA (1789–96). Baptized as an infant, Washington remained a member of the Anglican Church in Virginia all his life and was an active vestryman in his parish. He firmly believed in a benevolent and active Providence, and incorporated Judeo-Christian language, themes, and symbols into his military leadership as well as his presidential inaugurations and communications. Throughout his public career, Washington insisted that religion was among the firmest props of a republican government, promoted religious liberty, and occasionally commended Christianity for its political benefits.

JEFFREY H. MORRISON

Water. “Water, source of life,” has become an international catchphrase. It impels us to reflect on the multiple values of water: water as a public good, as the inherited property of all living beings, and as a fundamental right of each human being. It serves as a denunciation of the privatist and mercantilist politics of water embedded in the discourse of the “international oligarchy of the water,” a small group of international companies, supported by multilateral corporations and local governments. Today the ecumenical* struggle for the recognition of water as a human* right is global; it has become a central issue for the World* Council of Churches and other church organizations. See also LAND, THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES AND PRAXIS, CLUSTER.

NANCY CARDOSO PEREIRA

Water, an African Perspective. In the countries of the developing world, like Africa, water is scarce. Access to clean water is a privilege that few can lay claim to, because it has been commercialized. Upholding the dignity of men and women created in God’s image involves ensuring that all have safe and clean water.

Water, whether a blessing or a nightmare, is everybody’s business. In the Bible, water is a multivalent natural symbol. For instance, it connotes instability and incompleteness in the “deep” over which the Spirit hovers (Gen 1:2); punishment in the Flood* (Gen 7); protection in the crossing of the Red Sea (Exod 14); God’s life-sustaining gift in the wilderness (Exod 17:5–8) and Jesus’ encounter with the Samaritan woman (John 4:13–14); and purification in baptism*.

The water is blessed during the baptismal ceremony. In addition, holy* water is used for blessings, dedications, healings*, and exorcisms* (as is the case in many African* Instituted Churches); for ceremonial cleansing on entering a church; and for the asperges (based on Ps 51, “Cleanse me, O Lord”) at the beginning of the Mass* on Sundays.

Christians live in a world blessed with oceans, lakes, rivers, and streams; water makes the world beautiful. Yet for many, water is nightmarish. Today, as in biblical times, tsunamis, hurricanes, and floods are destructive. Even more disastrous, millions of people lack clean water. Water has become an essential commodity, for which many people in Africa and elsewhere have to queue every day.

Without water there is no life: “water is life.” God provided water so as to sustain all life; hence this precious gift should be appreciated and respected. Water should not be wasted but preserved wisely, at all costs. Every drop counts. Saving water is saving life.

MULAMBYA PEGGY KABONDE

Wealth and Christianity. Being wealthy means having more than one needs to survive the day and, for Christians, more than one needs to fulfill one’s calling as the “image* of God” or disciple* of Christ. Wealth in itself is not evil*; in the Scriptures, images of wealth are used to depict salvation*. But in life “before God” (coram Deo), wealth becomes deadly when one is much wealthier than others, because it leads to inequality, separation from God and neighbor, and lack of solidarity*; when one’s wealth becomes an idol*, an object of loyalty and devotion; or when wealth becomes a means of oppressing others.

Wealth’s potential for destruction derives from the power it gives one to control the labor of others or to exclude others from what it takes to be human. Contemporary Christian studies of wealth, following human development theory, expand the conception of wealth to include well-being, capability, freedom, human relations, social capital, and belonging. But this good wealth can readily turn into a poisonous self-obsession.

The NT presents three kinds of teaching on wealth: (1) the command to relinquish wealth in order to be free to serve the reign* of God’s righteousness; (2) the spiritual and moral peril of wealth as idol (see Mammon), resulting in separation from God; and (3) the right use of wealth to love God and neighbor (being “rich toward God”; e.g. Mark 10:17–31; Luke 12:22–34; 2 Cor 8:1–15; Jas 5:16). “You cannot serve God and mammon [wealth]” (Matt 6:24) sums up these teachings.

The church fathers underscore, with the Scriptures*, that all wealth belongs to God. Luxury is condemned. What is strictly needed for one’s life or for the service of others is a legitimate possession. What is beyond this belongs to the poor. “The superfluous things of the wealthy are the necessities of the poor” (Augustine*). Justice* is administering what belongs to God according to God’s will. Wealth can be used rightly. “Goods are called goods because they do good”; the right use of wealth “ministers to righteousness” (Clement* of Alexandria).

The Christian tradition has typically sought to moderate the acquisition of wealth and limit its allocation, disposition, and inheritance through almsgiving*, household* codes, common* goods, reciprocity, and redistribution. The Franciscans* rejected wealth and undertook a life of voluntary begging to demonstrate the power of Christ’s poverty*. Other mendicant* religious orders (Dominicans*, Carmelites*, Augustinians*) also forbade wealth; yet their community of common goods often produced significant wealth. Various projects in “Christian Socialism” have generally failed but kept open the concern for the right use of property.

Vast changes in the Christian conception of wealth took place in modernity. The rise of the market, it was claimed, meant a “farewell to alms*.” Accumulated wealth came to be seen as a possible sign of one’s election*. Locke’s* labor* theory of property justified wealth as inherently and exclusively one’s own. Christians now consider wealth a form of property* that they own, but one that they must use as good stewards. Contemporary theology and ethics restate the best of the Christian tradition of stewardship*. Our possessions and capabilities are God’s, not our own. The use of every resource of nature, time, and capability is wholly accountable before God. Because one creates wealth by controlling the combination of materials, labor*, land*, and technology*, justice* that serves the life of human beings and nature demands an inclusive property claim by all and thus a regulated market. See also ECONOMY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; POVERTY CLUSTER; PROSPERITY GOSPEL CLUSTER. M. DOUGLAS MEEKS

Weber, Max (1864–1920), German professor of economics* (first at Freiburg, then Heidelberg), social* theorist, a principal architect of modern social science. Weber did not consider the emergence of a capitalist economy to be self-evident. Besides favorable political conditions, a particular ethos* was necessary. Impending capitalism needed the support of an internal power, because it first had to bring down “traditionalism.” “A person does not ‘by nature’ want to make more and more money, but simply to live – to live in the manner in which he is accustomed to live, and to earn as much as is necessary for this” (as Weber wrote in his Protestant Ethic, 1905). This resistance to capitalism was broken by Puritanism*, since that religion required from believers a methodical pattern of working and abstention from consumption.

In carrying on this perspective, Weber investigated the relationship of the world religions to economic* ethics*. During this research, he discovered that in the West a process of “rationalization” dissolved magical notions and increasingly “disenchanted” the world. Disenchantment, understood to be the development of a world in which the gods lost their natural and historical roots, became a central element of Weber’s concept of modernity (see Secularization and Desecularization in Europe and North America). In order to introduce religious history into his analysis, Weber distinguished an actor’s “motives” (an ethic of responsibility) from the “meaning” according to which this person acts

(an ethic of conviction*). The more a religion of salvation* evolved and became systematized as an ethic of commitment and conviction (in contrast to an ethic of compliance with laws and responsibility), the more its adherents experienced “tensions” with the world. The same religious ethics that engendered the awareness that social orders were ruled by hostile rational forces generated new kinds of religiosity.

Regarding the spheres of sexuality and art, Weber observed a development of subjective practices that entailed a re-enchantment of the world through the cultivation of eroticism and art as means of escaping cold rationality. In the “disenchanted” world, the gods acquire a peculiar new life and take the form of impersonal values that “strive to gain power over our lives” (Gerth, Mills). HANS G. KIPPENBERG

Weil, Simone (1909–43), French activist, philosopher, mystic*; one of the first women graduates of the École Normale Supérieure. Her early writings were concerned with work and social* justice*. In 1934, seeking a concrete experience of the object of her reflections, she spent a year working in several Paris factories, hoping to find a way of organizing work so that it always lent dignity to human beings. Instead she discovered what she called “affliction” (malheur), the destruction of a human’s social being. Deeply wounded by this experience, in subsequent years she had three mystical experiences, effecting a conversion from Judaism to Christianity, although she refused baptism until shortly before her death. Realizing that God could be present in evil* and suffering*, she wrote from here on chiefly about religious topics and moral philosophy. Heavily influenced by Plato* and the ancient Greeks, she sought to show the universality of grace*. Her works are also rooted in a distinctive reading of Christ’s kenosis* and affliction on the cross, in which she sees genuine human spirituality participating. She even considers the creation* kenotic, for God creates, she claims, by withdrawing; Christ’s sacrifice on the altar of the whole of time and space gives life to the world. In her last year, while working for the Free French in London, she united religious interests with social ones, writing a number of profound works on moral philosophy and social life, such as The Need for Roots. She argued there that obligations toward human beings are eternal and that they, not rights, are the basis of social good; societies are crucial intermediaries that form and feed the human soul. Weil died in London of tuberculosis; she is remembered for her refusal during this time to eat more food than she thought her compatriots in occupied France were getting.

ERIC O. SPRINGSTED

Wells, Ida B. (1862–1931), a regal and complex woman, whose crusades advocating African Americans’ civil* rights, women’s rights, and justice often jeopardized her safety. As a creative social researcher, critic, journalist, and activist, Wells viewed life through her moral compass of Christian leadership, truth, and duty. Born and educated in Mississippi, the eldest of eight, she assumed responsibility for her siblings when her parents died. She protested against lynching and the notion of white female purity. She and her husband, Ferdinand Barnett, had five children. She ran unsuccessfully for the Illinois Senate. Wells was one of the first to connect the oppression* and exploitation of blacks to white economic opportunities.

CHERYL A. KIRK-DUGGAN

Wesley, Charles (1707–88), Anglican priest (ordained 1735), poet, hymn writer, who, with his elder brother John, started the Methodist Movement. He journeyed to the American colony of Georgia with his brother (1735–37). Like John, he was influenced by the Moravians* and had a spiritual experience (finding himself “at peace with God”; May 21, 1738). He became an eloquent preacher and wrote more than 5,000 hymns (George Frederic Handel* wrote the music for some of them). But Charles progressively withdrew from active leadership of the Methodist societies, ending his itinerant preaching in 1756, remaining more attached to the Church of England, and disapproving of John’s ordaining of preachers. See also METHODISM CLUSTER: METHODIST WORSHIP.

Wesley, John (1701–91), Anglican clergy, chief founder of Methodism. The 15th child born to Susanna Wesley and her husband, Samuel, who was at that time rector of Epworth, England. John attended Charterhouse School (London, from 1714), then Oxford University, matriculating at Christ Church in 1720 (B.A., 1724, M.A., 1727). He was ordained a deacon in the Church of England (1725) and a priest (1728). While a fellow and tutor at Lincoln College (from 1727), he followed a disciplined regimen of study, devotion, prison visitation, and social service that others viewed as fanatical and earned him and his small group of followers, including his brother Charles, a variety of names, including the “Oxford Methodists,” which was also the title of a pamphlet (1733) written by a sympathetic observer of the controversy. Some 50 years later, Wesley would refer to the beginnings of this group as “the first rise of Methodism.”

The Wesley brothers ventured to the new colony of Georgia (1735) at the behest of James Oglethorpe and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (see SPCK, Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge). John, who had volunteered as a missionary, soon received an appointment as the priest in Savannah. Their stay was short (especially Charles’s); the Wesleys were often at odds with the colonial administrators. But the nearby fortress village of Frederica did witness the implementation of the religious patterns from Oxford in what Wesley later called “the second rise of Methodism” (1736). John’s resolute exercise of his priestly office and his unfortunate entanglement with a young woman, Sophey Hopkey (niece of the chief magistrate), resulted in legal pressures that led him to leave this remote colony (1737).

Back in England, Wesley helped establish the “Fetter Lane Society” in London (May 1738), which he later designated as “the third rise of Methodism.” This group was organized by Peter Bohler, a German Pietist* (Moravian*) who had become Wesley’s spiritual mentor. The Pietist influence, heightened by the Wesleys’ long-standing search for assurance* of salvation*, resulted in an important religious experience for each of the brothers. Charles felt a special sense of Christ’s presence on Pentecost Sunday, accompanied by “a strange palpitation of heart.” Three days later (May 24, 1738), John felt his heart “strangely warmed” at a religious society meeting in the region of Aldersgate Street, and he “received an assurance that Christ had died for [him].” The fact that this experience did not result in constant and continuing love*, peace*, and joy in the Holy* Spirit (and an absence of fear, doubt*, and sin*), which the Moravians had taught him to expect, led John Wesley to continue refining the theological positions that unfolded with his ongoing spiritual journey.

Wesley’s stance was basically grounded in an Anglican appreciation for a mediating position that included both faith and works, evangelism* and sacramentalism*, knowledge and vital piety, preaching and praying. He eventually broke with the Moravians (early 1740s) because they leaned too much toward a theology that emphasized faith at the expense of works of piety and mercy, which Wesley understood to be important means of grace* or channels of God’s presence and power. The “grand doctrines” of Methodism – repentance*, faith*, and holiness* – were Wesley’s focus grounded in the soteriology* of the Church of England, of which he remained a priest. The movement became notable for its lay preaching, vibrant singing, and programs of social outreach, which characterized its concern for “practical divinity” (the practice of Christian living). Besides building preaching houses throughout the rural areas of the British Isles, Wesley began medical clinics, schools, orphan houses, loan funds, and subsidized housing programs, largely in the growing urban areas.

The Wesleyan revival* was spread through a combination of field preaching (in extra-ecclesiastical locations, including marketplaces), careful organization of local societies, a vast publications program, and the amalgamation of other regional revivals into the national Wesleyan fold. The Methodist message was carried on the wings of hymns published by the Wesley brothers, written primarily by Charles. After 1744 the preachers were both encouraged and disciplined by an annual conference and the circulation of the minutes of these meetings, which provided guidance as well as records for the movement. Although the Methodists soon developed both a public and a self-conscious identity, Wesley was adamant that they not separate from the Church of England. Although opposed by many Anglican clergy, Wesley maintained a good relationship with many bishops of the Anglican* Church. In Wesley’s lifetime, Methodists were a tiny proportion of the population and experienced relatively slow growth.

In his later years, the earlier prejudices against Wesley melted into a more benign appreciation of his active concern for the good of the country, especially its most disadvantaged citizens. At the time of his death, he was generally acknowledged as a man of genuine piety who actively pursued altruistic endeavors throughout his life. One obituary referred to him as “one of the most extraordinary characters this or any other age ever produced.” He was buried behind the Methodist Chapel on City Road, London. See also METHODISM CLUSTER: METHODIST CHURCHES AND THEIR THEOLOGY.

RICHARD P. HEITZENRATER

Wesleyan Quadrilateral, a 20th-c. summary of John Wesley’s* four sources of true worship: Scripture*, tradition*, reason*, and religious experience.

Western Churches, in contrast to the term “Eastern* churches,” a designation for all churches in the Latin-speaking area of the ancient world, which became the western part of the Roman Empire; it later referred to the churches loyal to the bishop of Rome and the Roman Catholic Church, as well as subsequently to the Protestant churches originating during the Reformation*.

Westminster Catechisms and Confession.

When the Westminster Assembly convened (1643), it had no intention of compiling a new creed. The Thirty-nine* Articles satisfied even ardent Puritans*. But when Parliament sought military assistance from the Scots, the Scots demanded in return the promotion of religious uniformity throughout the British Isles. The Westminster Confession would provide the doctrinal foundation for that uniformity.

The dream never materialized, but in 1647 the Westminster Confession replaced the Scots Confession as the official creed of the Church of Scotland*; it was later adopted by Presbyterian* churches worldwide and, with relevant modifications, by Congregational* churches (1658) and the Calvinistic Baptists (1689).

The Westminster Confession represents the mature theology of the Reformation*, affirming Scripture* as the only rule of faith, proclaiming Luther's doctrine of justification*, and taking for granted the Augustinian doctrine of predestination*.

The same theology is set forth in the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, the latter becoming the most influential of all the Assembly's documents. It focused on Christian essentials, covering successively “what we are to believe concerning God,” the Ten Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer. Still used in conservative Presbyterian churches, it is best remembered for its opening statement: “Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy [God] for ever.”

DONALD MACLEOD

Westphalia, Peace of (1648), treaties between the German Empire and France in Münster, and between Sweden and the Protestant powers in Osnabrück, that ended the Thirty* Years' War. It revived the provisions of the Peace of Augsburg* (1555), adding protections for certain religious minorities and explicitly recognizing Reformed* churches. It symbolized the end of religious wars during this period and the beginning of toleration (but not full religious rights) and secular politics.

White, Ellen Gould (1827–1915), North American visionary religious speaker and writer whose “messages” were formative in the emergence and the doctrinal and organizational development of the Seventh-day Adventist* denomination. Ellen Gould Harmon and her twin sister, Elizabeth, were the youngest of eight children in a middle-class Methodist family in Portland, Maine. Ellen's formal education was effectively ended when she was nine years old by a severe concussion and facial injury. In 1843 she and her family were “disfellowshipped” from their Methodist congregation for harboring Millerite expectations of Jesus' return. After the “Great Disappointment” (December 1844), she had the first of her 2,500 visionary experiences, the source of her guidance of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. She married James White in 1846. She worked in Europe (1885–87), as well as Australia and New Zealand (1891–1900), writing 4,600 articles for church journals and some 50 books, including The Great Controversy (1888), Christian Education (1894), Steps to Christ (1898), The Desire of Ages (1898), The Ministry of Healing (1905). She insisted, however, that her writings always be subordinated to the Bible. Her devotional writings have exerted influence beyond the denomination.

White's fundamental conception was that of a cosmic “great controversy” between good and evil, in which every human being participates, which was soon to conclude in an apocalyptic* climax. Her complementary holistic view of the human condition led to this-worldly activism. She affirmed Christ's divinity, salvation* by grace* through faith*, observance of the seventh-day Sabbath*, and Jesus' special high-priestly ministry. She worked to improve the lot of women and influenced the establishment of Oakwood College for African Americans (1895), as well as other educational and medical institutions.

Recent discoveries that certain of White's writings (e.g. The Great Controversy) are highly dependent on unacknowledged sources have shaken some Seventh-day Adventists' confidence in her. Yet her overall spiritual values and principles remain credible for many. White's modeling of spiritual leadership affirms the equal contribution of men and women to church life. She challenges today's Christians through her refusal to isolate the spiritual from other aspects of human experience, her strong social* conscience, her rejection of “verbal-dictation” views of the Bible's inspiration, her lifelong warning against centralized

“kingly power” in church administration, and her repeated calls for humble openness to the Spirit’s leading into new doctrinal light. See also ADVENTISM; SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST WORSHIP. JOHN R. JONES

White Fathers, priests and brothers of the Roman Catholic Society of Missionaries of Africa who “live in communities at the service of the people of Africa” and practice evangelization through assimilation. Founded (1868) by the archbishop of Algiers, Charles-Martial-Allemand Lavigerie, to evangelize Algeria, they wear a religious habit resembling traditional North African clothing: a white tunic and a hooded cape (burnoose). As a result of Archbishop Lavigerie’s preoccupation with slavery*, a few years after their founding the White Fathers entered the East African lakes region (now Rwanda*, Uganda*, Burundi*) and West Africa. See also MISSION CLUSTER: THEMATIC ISSUES: ANTI-SLAVERY.

Whitefield, George (1714–70), great revivalist*, transatlantic itinerant Anglican minister, Christian celebrity; archetypal preacher of the Great* Awakening. Born poor, Whitefield paid his way through Pembroke College, Oxford, by working as a servant of wealthier students. Befriending John and Charles Wesley*, Whitefield associated with early Methodists*, although he disputed the Wesleys’ Arminianism*. He adopted an Anglican revivalist Calvinism, which held together perhaps because he was more preacher than theologian.

After a transatlantic voyage (1738), Whitefield preached wildly popular revivals until his death and was called “the Grand Itinerant.” Criticized by anti-revivalists for being emotionally manipulative, he was heard by untold thousands who flocked to hear him preach, especially in the American colonies, where he was seen as an exponent of Christian liberty.

Whitefield had a lifelong love of the stage that he brought to the pulpit in a manner unlike any English-speaking preacher before him. His sermons were inspirational calls to conversion*, delivered with an extraordinary rhetorical power. Whitefield also employed sophisticated media* campaigns to further the impact of his ministry, sending a publicist ahead of him to distribute promotional literature, much of which was printed by his friend Benjamin Franklin*. CALEB J. D. MASKELL

Whitehead, Alfred North (1861–1947). Whitehead’s writings on God and Christianity came late in his life, after he had accepted a position at Harvard. In a time when God was disappearing from philosophical consideration, he taught that God is a contributor to every event and that events also contribute to God. His vision of a world of interrelated events encouraged a new theological approach by Process theologians (cf. Incarnation Cluster: In the Orthodox Tradition).

In England he had developed elaborate theories of mathematics and of relativity. In his cosmology, he analyzed these events, both human and electronic, into “occasions of experience” each of which integrates the world. These require a realm of forms so ordered as to evoke value in the world. This “primordial nature of God” requires completion by a “consequent nature” in which the ephemeral events of the world acquire permanence.

Whitehead viewed Christianity, Buddhism, and science as the three greatest potential contributors to spiritual progress. The first two are in decline, partly because they are unwilling to grow through the kind of openness characteristic of science.

He complained that when Rome accepted Christianity, it turned God into a cosmic Caesar. Jesus offered an understanding of God, centered on love, on which Whitehead could build philosophically. See also GOD, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER; PROCESS THEOLOGY.

JOHN B. COBB, JR.

Wichern, Johann Hinrich (1808–81), father of the Inner Mission*, a precursor of Protestant social* service agencies in Europe and North America. After studying in Göttingen and Berlin, he returned to his native Hamburg to work with the city’s poor. Repulsed by the inhumane conditions of the old psychiatric asylum system, Wichern adopted the cottage model with “house parents” and founded the Rough House (Das Rauhe Haus) for destitute children (1833). His historic speech at the Wittenberg Kirchentag* (1848) galvanized opinion in the church for an “inner mission” to complement “foreign mission” and serve the needs of those adversely affected by the industrial revolution. He established numerous other charitable works. He was influenced primarily by the church historian August Neander and by Martin Luther*. He was broadly ecumenical, emphasized the importance of community and the priesthood* of all believers, and became the foremost exponent in the German Awakening of the principle “faith active in love.” He ranks with Hegel* and Schleiermacher* as a shaping force in 19th-c. Protestantism in Germany. He detested communism* and revolution, viewing these as results of moral decay, but he was among the best of his century in grasping social problems and human suffering. See also GERMANY.

DAVID CROWNER and GERALD CHRISTIANSON

Wiclif, John See WYCLIF (WYCLIFFE), JOHN.

Widow, a woman whose husband has died, leaving her socially and economically vulnerable. The care of widows was of special concern in the Torah and prophetic writings (cf. Exod 22:22; Deut 24:19–21; Isa 1:17; Jer 7:1). As a group of independent women, widows had a recognized status in the early church (Acts 6; 1 Tim 5:3–16), and their life was seen as an alternative to marriage. This view may have been considered subversive to the Roman order and possibly gave rise to some apocryphal* NT writings.

Wilberforce, William (1759–1833), educated at Cambridge, member of Parliament (1780–1825). From 1797 he was a prominent member of the Evangelical Anglican “Clapham Sect,” named after the London area in which he lived. His A practical View of the prevailing religious System of professed Christians, in the higher and middle Classes in this Country, contrasted with real Christianity (1797) was popular in his lifetime and during the Victorian Era. Well known for his support of Christian charities and missions*, he devoted much of his later career to the movement to abolish slavery* in British territories.

PETER C. ERB

Wilderness. Described in the Bible as a desert (Exod 19:2; Deut 32:10), it proved unsuitable to the Israelites for long-term habitation. After fleeing Egypt, they wandered in the wilderness for 40 years (Num 14:33). The experience was “terrible” (Deut 1:19), but it was also providential (Ps 78:52), for God fed them (Exod 16:32) and made a covenant* with them (Exod 19:1–6). In the NT, John* the Baptist lived in the wilderness (Matt 3:1–6), and Jesus was tempted in the wilderness immediately after his baptism (Mark 1:12–13). Early Christians feared the wilderness, believing it was haunted by the devil* (Matt 4:3–11), a concept that influenced eremitic* monasticism*. See also DESERT; KINGDOM OF GOD, THE CONCEPT OF, CLUSTER: IN THE EASTERN ORTHODOX TRADITION: KINGDOM AND WILDERNESS.

JEFFREY C. DAVIS

Will. In the Western* churches, Christian discussions of the will center on two questions:

To what extent does our freedom (human will) affect God’s control? To what extent are we spiritually free, given the Fall*, to choose good or evil?

Human Will and God’s Control. Five answers are given:

1. Theological determinists: Since God controls all circumstances preceding human choice, God ultimately determines all we do. Some (e.g. Steven Houck) grant that this negates free will (voluntary choice).
2. Compatibilists (e.g. J. I. Packer and many theological determinists): We are free as long as we are not forced to act against our will (desires); this is always possible, because God acts in nonconstraining ways to ensure that we desire to do what God would have us do.
3. Limited compatibilists (e.g. John Feinberg): God may need at times to eradicate inappropriate desires to ensure that we do not make wrong choices; therefore, God may not always be able to control decisively our voluntary decision making.
4. Free will theists (e.g. William Hasker): Since God cannot both grant us freedom and control our choice, to the extent that God grants us freedom, God’s ability to control our choices is self-limited.
5. Process theists (e.g. John Cobb): Since God does not intervene unilaterally in earthly affairs, God is never in a position to ensure that we act in accordance with the divine will, although interactively God influences everything.

Freedom to Choose Good or Evil. The debate over spiritual freedom of the will centers on the impact of original* sin:

1. Pelagianism: Human will is morally unaffected by the Fall. We remain free to choose either good or evil. While God’s grace assists us, we freely choose to accept or reject Christ.
2. Semi-Pelagianism: Human will is bent toward unrighteousness after the Fall. Thus God’s grace is necessary for virtuous behavior. Unaided by divine grace, we seek God, who graciously completes the salvific process. Whether past or present Arminians* are Semi-Pelagianists remains a matter of significant debate.
3. Augustinianism: Post-Fall human will is totally unable to choose that which is spiritually good; free will is totally lost (Luther). For Augustine* and Calvin*, the bondage of the will is the consequence of free choice and is also a continued exercise of willing (freely choosing evil). Only after redemption by God are we free to do what is right. God alone determines who will be extended the irresistible grace to be saved. Contemporary Calvinists* are acknowledged Augustinians.

With 20th-c. atrocities and oppression, and the recognition of the role of systemic evil*, “bondage of the will” took on another connotation: as humans (involuntarily) contribute to systemic evil, their will is in bondage, because despite their will to do good they do the evil they do not want to do (cf. Rom 7:19). See also MORAL INFLUENCE; POSITIVE THEOLOGY; POSITIVE LAW; POSITIVISM; REASON; VOLUNTARISM. DAVID BASINGER

Willard, Frances E. (1839–98), educator, social reformer, temperance* leader, women’s rights activist. A graduate of Northwest Female College (1859), she served as president of Evanston College for Ladies (1871–74), corresponding secretary of the Chicago Woman’s Christian Temperance Union (WCTU; 1874–79), president of the National WCTU (1879–91) and the World WCTU (1891–98). Leader of the largest women’s organization in the world, Willard broadened the focus of the WCTU to include woman suffrage and other reforms.

Willard argued for women’s right to vote as a means to address rampant poverty*, alcoholism*, and other social crises. She used the Victorian view of women as guardians of moral virtue and a progressive interpretation of the Bible to argue for increasing women’s leadership in society and the church (see Bible Interpretation Cluster: Worldwide: Feminist). She worked closely with other temperance, suffrage, and Social* Gospel leaders, including Mary Livermore, Susan B. Anthony*, Richard Ely, and Jane Addams*.

Willard, raised in a Methodist family in an era of historical optimism, shared the Social Gospel beliefs that God could redeem both souls and society; human hands, hearts, and minds are needed to transform the nation and world into the Kingdom* of God. Willard traveled extensively to educate, inspire, and engage others in this mission. Her lifework demonstrates the potential for achieving social progress when the Christian faith is applied to both personal and social salvation.

WENDY J. DEICHMANN EDWARDS

William of Ockham (or Occam). See OCKHAM (OCCAM), WILLIAM OF.

William of St.-Thierry (1075/80–1148), Cistercian* theologian. Born in Liège, he became a Benedictine* monk and was elected abbot* of St.-Thierry near Reims. After a long acquaintance with Bernard* of Clairvaux, he resigned as abbot and joined a Cistercian group establishing a new house in the Ardennes. Several works by William and by Bernard profited from their correspondence with each other, and they joined in opposing Abelard*. William read extensively, making use of some patristic works that have since been lost. Both he and Bernard developed a mysticism* of love*, often utilized by the Beguines* and by Ruusbroeck*.

Williams, Roger (1603–83), pioneer of religious liberty, founder of Rhode Island and the first Baptist* church in the USA, student of Native* American culture. Born in London and educated at Cambridge, Williams shared the Puritans’* intention to “purify” Anglicanism* of unbiblical elements. Williams joined the Puritan migration to New England, but Puritan leaders banished him from the Massachusetts Bay Colony for his claims that American territories rightly belonged to Native Americans, that the Anglican Church was corrupt beyond reform, and that civil officers had no jurisdiction in religious activities – against the Puritan mutual reinforcement of church and state. Williams fled south, lived with the Narragansetts, studied their culture, and purchased from them land for a settlement he called “Providence,” with cofounder Anne Hutchinson*.

Williams despised forced “conversions” of Native Americans, the civil persecution of religious offenders, and religious wars. While maintaining Calvinist* beliefs, Williams eventually rejected all churches as unbiblical and insisted that Providence be the first colony to grant liberty to all religions. While conventional wisdom held that religious diversity promoted conflict, Williams argued that forced religious uniformity led to conflict, while liberty provided the only basis for peace.

Williams’s views remain a relevant model for religious liberty, frequently cited in US Supreme Court decisions on church* and state and by Baptists regarding their advocacy of religious liberty.

JAMES P. BYRD

Wills and Bequests. A will or testament* is a formal declaration, usually in writing, of the way a person’s property is to be transferred after death. Up through the Middle Ages, bequeathing land or property to religious institutions was a common form of indulgence* (see Mortmain); suppression* of this practice was a major feature of the Reformation*. Memorial gifts continue to be an important part of the Western Christian ethos.

Wine, fermented juice, usually of grapes, is a mixed blessing: drunk in moderation, it gives rise to joy and festivity; in excess, it impairs judgment and endangers health. As old as civilization, wine is a daily table drink in many cultures.

Wine is a gift from God (Deut 7:13), brings joy and gladness (Ps 104:15), and is a sign of blessing (Prov 3:10b), as well as peace and prosperity (2 Kgs 18:31–32). One of the messianic promises (Amos 9:13–14; Jer 25:6, 31:12), it is a fare at the messianic banquet (Isa 55:1). When God withholds rain, poor harvest and a lack of wine are signs of divine judgment (Jer 51:7–9) (see Apocalypticism Cluster).

In the Gospel of John, Jesus inaugurated his public ministry by turning water into wine at the wedding feast of Cana (2:6–10) and ended his life ingesting wine on the cross (19:30 refers to the ordinary wine of common people, despite some translations). Furthermore, Jesus is considered the true vine who invites his followers to abide in him (15:1–5).

During the Eucharist, wine is changed into the Blood of Christ or understood to “symbolize” Christ’s presence in the celebration of the Last Supper, fulfilling Jesus’ command “Do this in remembrance of me” (Luke 22:19b).

JOYCE ANN ZIMMERMAN, CPPS

Winnowing or Threshing, throwing grain into the air so that the wind, or air from a fan, will carry away the chaff and the grain will drop into a container. Often used as a metaphor* for the separation of good from evil persons.

Wisdom. Divine Wisdom is an intriguing figure in the Hebrew Scriptures. A grammatically feminine term (Heb hokmah; Gk sophia; Lat sapientia), Wisdom is the personification of God’s presence. Described in various ways as an aspect of God and as the feminine divinity, Wisdom is referred to as sister, mother, preacher, judge, and transcendent power that both animates the world and mediates between the heavenly and earthly spheres. Wisdom is also a vehicle of God’s self-revelation, granting knowledge of God to those who pursue her.

In the Book of Job*, Wisdom appears as a hidden treasure known only to God and in Proverbs* as a prophet who calls aloud in the streets, raising her voice in the public square, and delivering her message at the city gate: “You ignorant people, how much longer will you cling to your ignorance?” (Prov 1:22). Later, Wisdom speaks in the singular, describing herself as the giver of life, as the source of knowledge and insight, and as existing before the beginning of the world: “The Lord created me at the beginning of his work, the first of his acts of old” (Prov 8:22).

The identity of Wisdom is most clearly developed in the Wisdom* of Solomon, where she is linked to the mystery* of God’s omnipotence*, the mother of all things who mediates between the upper and lower worlds, and the source who guides humans back to God. Wisdom is the breath and power of God, a mirror of God, an image of divine goodness, a radiance of eternal light, and a pure emanation of divine glory (Wis 7:25–26).

One source of the Christian association of Wisdom with Jesus (1 Cor 1:24 and 2:1–7 are the earliest texts, as is John 1:1–14, though the association is more subtle) may be the personification of Wisdom in the Wisdom of Solomon and Philo*. This tension between the grammatical gender and usage of Wisdom in the Hebrew Scriptures and her co-optation by the demands of Christology (see Son of God in the New Testament) contributed to the suppression of Wisdom as a divine feminine personification in the patristic period. In associating Sophia with Jesus, the feminization of Jesus in male and female writers became a prominent feature of patristic and medieval theology. During the High Middle Ages, there was a resurgence of interest in the feminine divine, and the expression of Wisdom as a goddess figure or female deity witnessed an unprecedented development in Christian spiritual practices and texts. See also BULGAKOV, SERGEI NIKOLAEVICH; FEMINIST THEOLOGY CLUSTER; SOLOVIEV, VLADIMIR SERGEEVICH; TRINITY IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

BEVERLY J. LANZETTA

Wisdom of Ben Sira (or Sirach [Gk] or Ecclesiasticus). The author, Jesus Eleazar ben Sira, wrote his book c180 BCE, breaking precedent by providing his name and autobiographical information. Two things solidify the date: a prologue from c117 by his grandson and a hymn describing the high priest Simon II (d196). Ben Sira lived during the heyday of Hellenistic influence just before the Maccabean* revolt against Syrian persecution. The Wisdom of Ben Sira marks a transition from the earlier wisdom books of Proverbs*, Job*, and Ecclesiastes* to the incorporation of Israel's sacred history. Radical attacks from the latter two books made no impact on Ben Sira, who continues the tradition of Proverbs, although grouping thematic sayings into paragraphs. He also explores in greater depth the myth of personified Wisdom*, equating her with Torah*, while accepting teachings from Hellenism, such as the positive role of physicians, symposia, and Stoic philosophy of opposites in nature that assure divine justice*. These influences are muted by frequent references to biblical events and people, above all by a hymn to great men. In his admiration for priests, he exalts Aaron* over Moses* but inexplicably omits Ezra*. A conservatism led him to resist the new teaching about the resurrection* and to blame Eve* for all subsequent sin*.

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

Wisdom of Solomon, purportedly a book from the ancient past, but written in Greek by an unknown Hellenistic Jew, probably from Alexandria (c100 BCE), it exhorts its readers to consider wisdom*.

Chapters 1–5 commend wisdom as the way to immortality*. In Chaps. 6–9, the author takes on the role of Solomon*, urging the rulers of the earth to seek (personified) Wisdom and her virtues. Wisdom is viewed as saving Israel's forebears (10); the author then points out that Wisdom delivered Israel from Egypt as he contrasts God's dealings with Israel and Egypt during the time of the plagues (11–19).

The Wisdom of Solomon was recognized as authoritative Scripture by the compiler of the Muratorian* Canon (c200 CE), who recognized Wisdom (though possibly referring to Proverbs) as written by some to honor the ancient king of Israel. Similarly, Clement* of Alexandria, Tertullian*, Origen*, Hippolytus*, Cyprian*, and Lactantius* considered the book inspired and believed that Solomon* actually wrote it. The book, however, was not held to be authoritative by all in the early church. Today Roman Catholics and Orthodox Christians include Wisdom in their Bible*, although it is not part of the HB.

TERRY L. WILDER

Wise Men. See MAGI.

Witchcraft, Witches. On an anthropological level, belief in witchcraft is a universal phenomenon. Witches symbolize the inversion of moral values and serve as an embodiment of evil*, as well as a projection of social fears of terror and subversion, and cultural taboos like bestiality, incest, infanticide, and cannibalism. Witchcraft is often associated with darkness, sexual perversion, and demonic* conjuration, and it is enriched by fantasies of invisibility, shape-shifting, and flying. Lacking a concept of coincidence, many traditional societies believe that accidents, bad luck, illness, and death are caused by witchcraft. Most societies try to ward off witches by applying protective magic.

In its equation of “black” and “white magic,” the Christian tradition is quite peculiar. According to Augustine* (354–430), any kind of magic was thought to rely on a contract between a human being and a demon, either explicitly or implicitly, since the practitioner expected an effect from a ceremony or an object that by itself could not be effective (De doctrina christiana II, 30–40). As offenders against the law*, biblical (Exod 22:18) as well as Roman, magicians and witches were to be killed. However, during the Middle Ages, theologians and judges considered witchcraft a minor offense. It was only during a period of severe hardship (from the 15th c.) that witch-hunting became prevalent in large parts of Europe, and about 50,000 victims were tried and killed as witches. Many witch trials were illegal, even by contemporary standards, and protest and disbelief in witchcraft increased (16th c.). The rise of rationalism* and an awareness of human* rights brought these killings to an end (17th c.).

Disbelief in witchcraft became a marker of European civilization. In the Americas, Australia, Asia, and Africa, this attitude caused discontent among indigenous peoples because it seemed that the colonial authorities were aiming to protect evildoers. Throughout the 19th c., illegal witch killings were conducted in Russia, and among indigenous peoples in Mexico and the USA. Throughout the 20th c., violent anti-witchcraft movements swept through tropical Africa, with about 10,000 victims in Tanzania* alone. Only recently has the “modernity of witchcraft” (Peter Geschiere) been emphasized and the adaptive capacities of witch beliefs been demonstrated in the midst of the challenges of a globalized world. Witch-hunts are no closed chapter in history, and belief in witchcraft will continue to haunt us in the future. See also DEMONIZATION; DEVIL, SATAN, DEMONS, AND DEMONIC POWERS; EXORCISM.

WOLFGANG BEHRINGER

Witchcraft Trials in North America took place mostly in New England (especially Massachusetts and Connecticut) from 1640 to 1700, many of them during the Salem crisis of 1692–93. Only a few such prosecutions were carried out elsewhere, with just one (in Virginia) documented after 1700. That pattern has caused speculation that the Puritan* branch of Protestantism was especially likely to give rise to charges of witchcraft. Yet regardless of religious belief, only in New England did colonists live in small communities with stable populations most prone to developing the long-term feuds that commonly preceded accusations of witchcraft.

Except in 1692–93, formal trials were relatively rare compared with the number of known accusations. Defamation suits brought by the accused or interventions by clergy (seeking spiritual solutions through prayer and fasting) deflected many potential criminal actions. Even when purported witches were tried, convictions were few and executions even fewer (again, except in 1692) because colonial magistrates tended to be skeptical of classic maleficium charges. The Salem trials differed in their reliance on spectral evidence and in their context – a prolonged war with Native* Americans that convinced many New Englanders they were facing simultaneous assaults from the devil* in the visible and invisible worlds.

MARY BETH NORTON

Witch Hunt, modern expression for overzealous searching for deviant beliefs or behavior, political as well as religious.

Witherspoon, John (1723–94), Scots-American clergyman, president of the College of New Jersey at Princeton (1768–94), politician, sole clerical signer of the US Declaration of Independence (1776), ratifier of the US Constitution (1787). Educated at Edinburgh, Witherspoon immigrated to North America (1768). In Scotland he had a thriving Presbyterian pastoral ministry that included preaching to more than a thousand persons daily. Siding with the theologically conservative and Evangelical Popular Party, he became a principal conduit of Evangelical* piety and the Scottish* philosophy into the American colonies, as well as a leading figure in the American Enlightenment*. At Princeton, President Witherspoon lectured on moral philosophy, divinity, and history, and trained many future religious and civic leaders, including James Madison. Committed to Evangelical Presbyterian* orthodoxy, he was apparently skeptical of revivalist* emotionalism and encouraged an ecumenical* spirit toward those outside the denomination. He was instrumental in the nationalization of the Presbyterian Church in the USA, drafted the Introduction to the Form of the Government (1788), and was appointed first moderator of the General Assembly. Witherspoon frowned on government establishment of any denomination and was an advocate for the rights of conscience while insisting that “true religion” was vital to public life.

JEFFREY H. MORRISON

Witness (Heb edh; Gk martus), evidence for an alleged fact, or the person or thing (Gen 31:46–52; Deut 4:26, 30:19) giving that evidence. It is needed because of uncertainty in a legal proceeding, in public opinion, or in persons’ minds. The Bible takes much interest in the testimony given by witnesses in legal proceedings, and the Ten* Commandments prohibit false witness. Witnesses are also needed to tell about human acts (e.g. oaths and promises) or divine acts (e.g. acts of deliverance, moments of revelation*) to those who do not experience them directly. In the NT, the apostles* are called witnesses to Christ’s life, acts, death, and resurrection; this function is continued by the gospel*, the apostolic writings, and martyrdom* (whose original meaning was “witness”). “Witnessing” in current parlance means telling others about Christ. In the Prophets*, witness often takes the negative form of denouncing sins or threatening disaster – thus the phrase “prophetic witness” against social injustices.

Wittenberg. See LUTHERANISM CLUSTER: LUTHER, MARTIN.

Wittgenstein, Ludwig (1889–1951), philosopher. Born in Vienna into a wealthy family; baptized and raised Roman Catholic. His education overlapped with that of Adolf Hitler, who attended the same school as Wittgenstein in Linz for at least one year. He studied mechanical engineering in Berlin and Manchester. Interest in applied mathematics drew him to Cambridge to study logic with Bertrand Russell (1911–13). He served in the Austrian army; he completed Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus (1918, published 1921) and gave up philosophy. Finding the Tractatus misread as logical positivism*, he returned to Cambridge to teach (1929–47).

The Tractatus contains the famous remarks “Not how the world is, is the mystical, but that it is” and “Whereof one cannot speak, thereof one must be silent” (see Apophaticism). His lifelong interest in religion* came out in Remarks on Frazer's Golden Bough ("We could almost say, man is a ceremonious animal") and Culture and Value ("Perhaps one may say: Only love can believe the Resurrection*"; "Theology that insists on certain words & phrases & prohibits others makes nothing clearer"). Many memorable remarks in Philosophical Investigations include "An 'inner process' stands in need of outward criteria" and "The human body* is the best picture of the human soul*."

FERGUS KERR, OP

Woman, Theological Views About. Christianity has no consistent body of theological teachings about women. Its history reflects shifting arguments variously vindicating the inferiority, complementarity, or equality of women with men. This ambiguity is rooted in the NT. Here we find a conflict between two ideals, liberation* and patriarchy*. On the liberationist side, many gospel stories suggest that redemption* in Christ will transform gender relations. Arrogant representatives of the male leadership class, Pharisees and rulers, and false teachers are set against women of despised groups, prostitutes, Samaritans and Canaanites, poor widows, and the physically infirm, who are praised for their true insight into Jesus' teachings. The women disciples* are the last to remain at the cross and the first to appear at the tomb, first witnesses* of the Resurrection, in contrast to the male disciples who run away. This liberationist vision is summarized in Gal 3:28: in Christ "there is neither Jew nor Greek, neither slave nor free, nor male and female."

However, fairly quickly other Christian leaders sought to blunt the social application of this theological vision. The household* codes reinforce patriarchal social hierarchy with the command to wives to obey their husbands, slaves* their masters, and children* their parents (Col 3; Eph 5–6; 1 Pet 2–3). 1 Timothy 2:15 insists that women were created second and sinned first, bringing about the fall of humanity into sin*. This view defined a double subordination of women, by nature and as punished for sin, justifying their removal from public leadership and teaching.

The patristic era (2nd–6th c.) saw a steady removal of women from ordained or public lay ministry. Whether women were created in the image* of God was debated by Ambrosiaster* and many others. Augustine* developed the normative view for Western Christianity: woman possesses the image of God spiritually and so is capable of redemption. But she was created subordinate in the original order of creation and was primarily culpable for the Fall*. Her subordination is to be enforced both as reestablishing her true nature and as punishment for her sin. Women who accept this subordination, even when abusive, and cultivate inner spiritual life will be saved, becoming equal in heaven according to their merits.

This general view of women was accentuated by Thomas Aquinas*, who adopted Aristotle's* view that women were biologically defective. Although Aquinas accepted women's capacity for redemption, their biological and moral defectiveness meant that they could not exercise leadership in the church or society. In order to reflect the full humanity, Christ had to be incarnated* as a male, and only males can represent Christ in the ordained* priesthood. This view continues to be echoed in Roman Catholicism's official opposition to women's* ordination, although it is based on a complementarian anthropology* rather than Aristotle's claim of women's defectiveness. The Reformation opened marriage* to the ordained male, but the traditional teaching that women were created second and sinned first continued to be used as a rationale for excluding women from public leadership and ordained ministry and preaching. Baptist* and Quaker* Christians in 17th-c. England cultivated an alternative view. The Pentecostal text "Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy" (Acts 2:17) was reclaimed to vindicate women's right to preach. Quakers argued that humans, male and female, were created equal. Subordination of women and other oppressed people came about "through the usurpation of power of some over others" that caused sin to come into the world. Thus the Quakers shifted the onus of blame for sin from women to ruling-class men. Modern Feminist theologies draw on this Quaker legacy to define patriarchy* as sin rather than the order of creation*.

From the 15th through the 18th c. in Europe, a querelle des femmes argued either for women's goodness and equality or for their evilness and need for subordination. Women increasingly spoke for themselves, discrediting the arguments against women and emphasizing scriptural and historical arguments in women's favor. The 19th and 20th c. saw the liberalization of laws in society regarding women, as well as an acceptance of women's equality in Christ and capacity for ordination in more and more protestant* churches. Other churches continue to argue either for male headship over women or for a masculine–feminine complementarity that both exalts women as “naturally” altruistic and self-sacrificing, and denigrates them as incapable of representing Christ in ordained ministry.

At the beginning of the 21st c., Christian churches around the world were deeply divided over women’s status in the church and society. Liberal Christians drew on the teachings of equality in the image of God, restored in Christ, to argue that equality between men and women is part of both God’s intended order of creation and the redemptive mission of the church, while Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and conservative Protestant churches revived the views of women as either subordinate or different by nature and so to be confined to roles separate from those of men.

ROSEMARY RADFORD RUETHER

Womanist and African American Theologies.

Womanist theologies emerged (mid-1980s) as a critical response to the failures of both Black*/African American and Feminist* theologies to address the concerns and needs of North American women of African descent. Although they are both women and black, African American women have shared the historical experiences of both racial and sexual oppression or exclusion. The Womanist Movement is global, but Womanist theology began with African American Christian women in the USA. It has developed beyond Christianity today to include the religious experiences of Buddhist, Muslim, and other women. Those doing Womanist theology are all women of African descent who share the experience of being oppressed as a result of their race, gender, class, and, often, sexual orientation.

The term “womanist” was coined by Alice Walker, who sought a way to speak of the experiences of women of color without simply adding a color or racial designation to the term “feminist.” Most Womanist theologians moved far beyond Walker’s definition, and many reject the word “feminist” as descriptive of what they are and seek to do, namely eliminate all forms of oppression wherever they exist. Thus the focus of Womanist theology is on survival, on quality of life, and, only after these have been achieved, on liberation.

Womanist theology is a part of Black/African American theology, which emerged in the late 1960s fueled by the Civil* Rights Movement as a theology of black Protestant men, with roots in Africa, its religious traditions, and the Middle Passage that brought millions of Africans from West and Central Africa to the Americas as slaves*. As Womanist theology grounds itself in the experience of black women, African American theology grounds itself in the experiences of North Americans of African descent and their centuries’ long experience of racial oppression in the USA. A critique of mainstream theology’s tendency to claim universality while ignoring the religious experiences of persons of African descent, it proclaims a black creator God and his son, Jesus, also black, who are in solidarity with the struggle of African Americans. Although the original emphasis on liberation from racial oppression alone overlooked the experiences of black women, black Catholics, and Afro-Latinos, today Black theologians, influenced by womanists and others, are moving to a more inclusive critique of class, racial, and gender oppression as well as a theological reflection on issues that affect persons of color today. See also ANTHROPOLOGY CLUSTER: WOMANIST THEOLOGICAL ISSUES; CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER: FEMINIST AND WOMANIST; ETHICS AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: ETHIC OF RISK AND WOMANIST ETHICS; JUSTICE, THEOLOGICAL VIEWS AND PRACTICES, CLUSTER: IN NORTH AMERICA: WOMANIST; LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER: IN NORTH AMERICA: WOMANIST.

DIANA L. HAYES

WOMEN’S CHRISTIAN PRACTICES AND THEOLOGIES CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Women’s Christian Practices and Theologies throughout History

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Women’s Christian Practices and Theologies in Africa

Women’s Christian Practices and Theologies in Africa: African Instituted Churches and Charismatic Churches

Women’s Christian Practices and Theologies in Asia

Women’s Christian Practices and Theologies in Australia

Women Christian Practices and Theologies in Europe: Germany

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Europe: United Kingdom

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Latin America: Brazil

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Latin America: Mexico

Women's Christian Practices in North America: United States

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Western Europe and North America

1) Introductory Entry

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies throughout History. Women have lived and pondered the Christian faith ever since its inception. But even if historically women have often made up the majority of those "in the pews," writing women (back) into the history of Christianity is a recent endeavor. The cultural contexts in which the Christian faith grew were marked both by the notional and legal inferiority of women and by myriad forms of marginalization. At the same time, women-specific power structures, networks, and sites of agency were never missing. The latter fact precludes seeing women merely as victims, i.e. as objects of patriarchal* oppression, in this faith tradition.

There is, of course, no unified history of Christian women. The category "women" is a variable rather than a constant, always inflected by other markers of difference, e.g. ethnicity, geographic location, and ecclesial affiliation. For much of the history of Christianity, the dominant marker of difference might be said to be ascribed status (combining gender and class) rather than gender alone. Writing women back into history is thus an attempt to account for the historical reality of women rather than to discern the theological concepts regarding gender differentiations and meanings associated with femininity and masculinity (see Woman, Theological Views About).

In the Bible, the witness to women's voices is uneven (e.g. only a small number of recorded words purport to be those of women; many women remain unnamed or are described simply as wives, mothers, and daughters of the leading male figures). This uneven biblical witness is apparent throughout the Christian tradition. There exist merely a handful of texts written by women in the first millennium of Christianity. What we know about women's faith thus is not only fragmentary but also mediated through male voices and male-dominated politics of documentation and interpretation. That said, Christianity from the very beginning had inclusive rites of initiation; women without question were baptized*, received the Holy* Spirit, and shared in the breaking of the bread. Glimpses of women's formative presence in Christianity also remain visible, e.g. the resurrected Christ appearing first to a woman, Mary* Magdalene (the "apostle to the apostles"); women's leadership in early house* churches (e.g. Prisca*, Phoebe*, Junia*); and women's roles as prophets*, patrons, widows*, martyrs*, exorcists*, healers, deacons*, and missionaries.

At the same time, there are clear indications (starting in the NT) of a struggle over women's roles and authority in the church. The presence of women at worship was policed by regulations concerning clothing, coiffure, and jewelry. Female prophecy, the administering of baptism, liturgical singing, teaching the faith, and other forms of ministry all became sites of conflict in the first few centuries. But women also found new avenues of ecclesial agency, from the Aristocratic women of the late Roman Empire who functioned as powerful patrons, and the newly emerging ascetic* communities of women, to women on pilgrimage* to sacred sites (Egeria*); moreover, the importance of devotion* to (women) saints was growing. Much of the domestic sphere, including raising children in the faith, was profoundly shaped by women's practices of piety and devotion.

With the Middle Ages, more texts by women themselves become available, most of them written by elite and educated women in religious communities. Despite manifold constraints (e.g. legal inferiority, lack of ordination, liturgical menstrual taboos), medieval women claimed ecclesial space based on mystic* encounters with the Divine or on simple communal life and service (Beguines*). How the vast majority of women, i.e. illiterate peasants or women of the emerging urban artisan class, lived their faith is much less visible. That women easily became marked as "other," deviant, and dangerous is clear both from women's pronounced presence in heterodox movements and from the women who lost their lives in witch* hunts.

Even if the 16th-c. (Radical, Protestant, and Roman Catholic) reformations did not lead to the upheaval in women's lives that theological claims suggest, these movements did initiate new developments. Women found novel spaces of ecclesial agency (e.g. as lay theologians, pastors' wives, or religious teachers in schools for girls, or through public works of charity), even as struggle over their ecclesial ministries continued. With modern times, a broadening of women's ministries took place (e.g. women preachers and missionaries in some churches). Cultural shifts also produced new narratives of women's leadership; e.g. the 19th-c. "cult of domesticity" found its echo in the notion of woman as the "priestess of the home."

Not until the 20th c., however, did major cultural shifts in women's lives profoundly reshape the churches' life. Women now gained unprecedented access to theological* education and leadership positions, and developed diverse Feminist* theological visions. Today, from Sunday worship to Feminist rituals, from convent liturgies* to Base* Ecclesial Communities, from Charismatic* healing services to Pentecostal/Charismatic revivals*, the more than 1 billion Christian women worldwide have become visible as never before. The future of Christianity is in their children's hands.

TERESA BERGER

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Africa. African women's experiences in contemporary African Churches are increasingly varied and engender distinctive theological expressions. Women's roles are different in the mission churches (churches established by foreign missionaries) and the African* Instituted Churches (AICs). For African women, participation in African theologies is an avenue to reclaim their erstwhile-lost voice. They garner support for their full liberation* and a more effective representation in both church and society. For them, Western Christianity has been biased by misogyny since the time of the early church fathers and has contributed little to their search for full humanity. Rather than discard Christian faith in its entirety, these African women embrace Christology* with vigor and utilize it as a basis for constructing a theology of liberation for African women. The Circle* of Concerned African Women Theologians is interested in the problems that African women face because of entrenched cultural construction of man and woman relationships, Christian traditions, and church practices. The quest for emancipation is a high priority for them, because African society is an overtly patriarchal one in which men usually lord it over women. Christology empowers women to decry the injustices meted against their personhood and the "web of oppression*" with which they are confronted. They contrast with the patriarchal figures of authority that oppress them Jesus crucified, whom they see as a savior, husband/lover, friend, father, redeemer, confidant, and, as such, a liberator.

Women's leadership roles, especially in New Generation churches, provide an impetus for an emerging "theology of dignity and self esteem" for the human woman who is created in the image* of God. Theologies of dignity such as the image of God have encouraged women to reread the Bible in liberative ways, propounding the biblical principles of equality. Furthermore, African women's experiences of poverty*, rape, and marginalization* as battered and underprivileged peoples ground an emerging "theology of vitality." Such a theology emerges from the ravages of wars, growing insecurity, and the HIV/AIDs pandemic. African women see themselves as "Mother Africa" because of the love*, care, and compassion they provide both to those living with the virus and to those orphaned or widowed by the pandemic. These contextual* theologies anchored in African women's experiences empower them to minister hope*, to grapple with and seek to untangle the web of oppression* against women, and to affirm God's presence in all contexts and cultures.

BOLAJI OLUKEMI BATEYE

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Africa: African Instituted Churches and Charismatic Churches. African Instituted Churches (AICs) originated as a protest against missionary Christianity and with a view to Africanizing Christianity. As this form of Christianity is rooted in African cultures* and an African-conscious reading of the OT, women's ministries in many of these churches are restricted. Generally, church leadership responsibilities, except where women are founders, is still in male hands. However, women in many AICs are relied on as prophetesses and healers*. Women's theologies are centered on themes such as unity among believers, the role of the Holy* Spirit, and God's revelation* through dreams*.

In comparison, women's ministerial roles in the newly formed Charismatic* churches (neo-Pentecostal and Charismatic) are not so restricted. There is an underlying perception that the salvation* ushered in by Jesus, and the gifts (charisms*) bestowed on an individual believer by the Holy Spirit, can be manifested through each believer, irrespective of gender. According to Owanikin, "In no other churches I know of are women more free to speak, teach, pray, shout and hold responsible positions than in Pentecostal or full Gospel assemblies". Women's theologies focus on such themes as individual salvation, holiness*, the ministries, and gifts of the Holy Spirit.

A disturbing trend that begs scrutiny, particularly by female adherents of these churches, is the new form of (US) missionary imperialism with its proclamation of the "Prosperity* Gospel." It will benefit the leaders of these churches not only to shun such problematic teachings, but also to protect their members from its wholesale consumption. See also PROSPERITY GOSPEL CLUSTER: IN AFRICA.

MADIPOANE MASENYA (NGWAN'A MPHAAHLELE)

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Asia. Women in Asia face complex challenges in all spheres of their lives. There are issues of race*, caste*, class, language, ethnicity, gender, economic security, and sexual preference. Poverty*, unequal wages, discrimination, violence*, marginalization*, and trafficking in women are entrenched in systems, structures, cultures*, and family* values with deep historical roots. The perpetrators of these interconnected, pervasive, globalized acts of violence against women are many: "powers and principalities" in their societies, men and women in their lives, and even themselves.

In addressing these challenges, Asian Christian women speak with many voices, including those of women from minority communities: Dalit* (India*), Burakumin (see Buraku Liberation in Japan), Tamil (Sri* Lanka), Korean in Japan, and indigenous (Taiwan*, Northeast India, Indonesia*). These voices plead, protest, and are aggressive, angry, shrill, wise, strong, and resourceful. They call for a "revolution" in expectations, accomplishments, self-realization, and relationships with men. Such a revolution promises not only to address the dire situations of many Asian women by bringing about profound changes in the lives of both women and men, but also to revitalize the church.

The Women's Movement in Asia is dedicated to building societies where women, men, and children are empowered to live full human lives. This entails transforming structures, institutions, relationships, and values in the economic, political, social, and cultural spheres of life. Women also need to be empowered in their individual self-understanding, identity, and sexuality*. This is what the Women's Movement does through issue-based initiatives, developing sustainable, gender-sensitive, and empowering strategies to rally against forces that have kept women poor* and powerless. These issue-based initiatives give women an increasing ability to take on issues that traditional culture and religion regard as unalterable, such as marriage*, divorce*, reproductive rights (see Birth Control and Contraception, Christian Views of), and sexuality*.

Christian women, the majority of church members, are deeply religious. Their faith* plays a key role in their lives and is a source of empowerment. Regular church attendance, reading, listening to, and studying Scripture*, prayer, fasting, worship, charity, and fund-raising are common practices. Yet because of their position in society, Christian women in Asia have been kept away from "religious ideological production." Since the late 20th c., however, women have been claiming space and authority for themselves in the theological fields by acknowledging the power of God's grace at work in and through them and their lives as sources of theological reflection aimed at bringing about wholeness and community life in the church and beyond, in the relationships among religions, classes, races, and castes.

The Christian Scriptures and traditional indigenous texts interpreted from the embodied experience of suffering* and marginalization* are the sources of their theology. Symbols, images, institutions, attitudes, and ideologies used to legitimize their subordination are unmasked; those that contribute to women's liberation are identified. Using formal critical methods (historical* critical, postcolonial*, cultural*) and informal ones (performance and storytelling, most effective in largely illiterate communities), women theologians offer a critique of women's cultural and religious subordination. Their theological reflections take both written (e.g. narrative, poetry, essay) and creative forms (e.g. dance, art).

God* – the source of life, sustainer of creation*, and fountain of hope* – identifies with women's suffering and pain and empowers them to reject and cope with death-dealing forces (see God, Christian Views of, Cluster: In Asia). The goddess traditions in Asia have also equipped women to envision God in feminine forms.

Similarly, owing to the excessive violence against women, the female body* is recognized as the site of liberation (Dalit), which poses a challenge to the cultural and religious views of sexuality. Asian ecofeminists* ponder the relationship of the female body to nature.

Asian women's spirituality*, committed to enhancing life in its fullness, calls for a redefinition of what it means for the church to be a community of equals that transcends the barriers between family, class, caste, ethnicity, and race. This faith community is called to empower the multitudes of women who live in deplorable conditions under violent and oppressive systems. See also CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER: IN ASIA: THE JESUS OF ASIAN WOMEN; FEMINIST THEOLOGY CLUSTER: IN ASIA.

MONICA JYOTSNA MELANCHTHON

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Australia are shaped by the ancient traditions and practices of indigenous women, as well as by the appropriation of Christian traditions.

Indigenous Australian women have reclaimed their ancient spirituality*, their Dreaming (see Australian Aboriginal Traditions and Christianity); and those who are Christian have brought this into dialogue, which is at times critical, with the Christian tradition. White women are challenged by these women to be attentive to the racism* in their emerging theologies, their forms of spirituality, and their lifestyles. Women across traditional Christian denominations have embraced Feminist* theologies and supported movements toward the ordination* of women.

Tensions with male church leaders and a need for space for Christian women's spiritual development have led to women establishing spirituality centers: Sophia (Adelaide), the Grove (Melbourne), and Womenspace (Brisbane). Here women explore both Feminist theologies and traditions of divinity imaged as female, healing, and women's spiritual practices from ancient Europe and elsewhere. These various traditions nurture different forms of spirituality, shape rituals, and inform Christian engagement in issues of justice* and ecology*. Women-Church: An Australian Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion is a key vehicle for women's theologies and practices of the Pacific region.

ELAINE M. WAINWRIGHT

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Europe: Germany. Women, burdened with the "original* sin" of their progenitor Eve*, were limited for a long time, in Germany, to the role of pious ascetics*, as cloistered nuns or mystics* inspired by the Holy* Spirit; this was their only option apart from marriage and having a family. With its almost complete abolition of monasticism* and its greater recognition of the value of marriage*, the Reformation reduced the options available to women. Furthermore, women fell victim to scapegoating during the waves of persecution of witches* (late 15th to mid-17th c.), supported by theologians of both Roman Catholic and Protestant churches. With the Enlightenment*, romanticism*, and idealism, a gradual shift in attitude toward women initiated the process of women's emancipation.

The early-19th-c. shortage of caregivers for the wounded in the wars of liberation and the working classes' deplorable situation required the service of widows and single women. Theodor Fliedner founded the Deaconess* Mother-Hospital in Kaiserswerth (1836), inaugurating church-recognized feminine vocational work (today only a few deaconesses still serve in the 72 Kaiserswerth hospitals). But the descendants of these pioneers largely lost the spiritual energy to live a celibate* life and to work for inadequate wages. At last women were permitted to take the high school graduation examination (Abitur; late 19th c.); starting in 1908, they were able to study at all German universities. The first women theologians, most with doctoral degrees, worked as teachers, later as pastoral assistants, and finally as consecrated vicars with limited authority. Yet the Nazi mythology of the mother once again drove women away from public life.

World War II forced a more affirmative attitude toward women, in the church as well as in society. The struggle for women's ordination* in Protestant churches continued until 1991, when women were given full pastoral authority in the last regional church of the Evangelische Kirche Deutschlands – a struggle greatly helped by the relentless work of the Women's Movement in the church and the development of Feminist* theology (with the support of North American feminism). Dorothee Sölle (1929–2003, Protestant) and Elisabeth Gössmann (b1928, Roman Catholic) sought a fundamental shift in thinking concerning the interrelationship of the sexes and exposed the discrimination, oppression*, and marginalization* of individuals and groups. In contributing to the life of the church, women are limited to filling roles at a level below the priesthood, e.g. as pastoral advisers. Yet from 1988 to 1997, a woman served as head of the Central Committee of German Catholics.

INGE MAGER

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Europe: United Kingdom.

Although the term "feminism"* was not used before the late 19th c., it can be detected in the 16th-c. feminist voices within UK churches that advocated a greater participation of women in the life of the church, which usually attracted more women than men.

In the 16th c., Christianity remained ostensibly a patriarchal* religion, following the various biblical texts that assert male headship and female silence and submission. In Protestantism*, the male-headed "godly household*" limited women's roles, and the Catholic* Renewal enforced the enclosure of nuns. Yet Mary Ward* founded what became the Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary*, in which women operated outside the normal authority structures. The order was suppressed and its members denounced in a 1631 papal bull, but on his 1982 visit to Britain Pope John Paul II recognized Ward as a pioneer ahead of her times.

In the 17th c., a more explicit feminism emerged in the radical sects of the English civil war. The Quaker* Margaret Fell's* Women's Speaking Justified (1666–67) is the first known plea for women to be permitted to preach. The High Anglican Mary Astell argued in the two volumes of her Serious Call to the Ladies, for the Advancement of Their True and Greatest Interest (1694, 1697) for a "Protestant nunnery" in which women could pursue independent intellectual and spiritual lives.

The 18th-c. Evangelical revival opened up new opportunities when John Wesley* allowed Mary Bosanquet and other women to preach, although his decision was overturned by the 1803 Methodist Conference. The 18th-c. Enlightenment* with its stress on human* rights and rationality opened up an opportunity for a more explicit feminism. Mary Wollstonecraft's Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792) was rooted in the Enlightenment and in her somewhat idiosyncratic Christianity.

The domestic ideology* of the early 19th c. relegated women to the private sphere but also allowed them to engage in philanthropy. Members of Tractarian (High Church) sisterhoods in the Church of England (see Oxford Movement) ran orphanages and schools. The Salvation* Army allowed women to preach.

In the 20th c., the ordained ministry became the battleground for Christian feminists. First the Church League for Women's Suffrage was founded (1909). Then the Congregationalist* Constance Coltman became the first woman to be ordained to the Christian ministry (1917). Another Congregational minister, Elsie Chamberlain, enjoyed a distinguished broadcasting career. Other free churches also came to recognize women's ordained ministry. Catherine McConnachie became the first ordained minister in the Church of Scotland* (1969). However, the Anglican* Maude Royden found her call to ministry frustrated; the 1930 Lambeth* Conference stated that the Order of Deaconess* was the only one open to women. This issue came to dominate Anglican politics. In July 1979 the Movement for the Ordination of Women was founded. The 1992 General Synod authorized the ordination of woman priests, and on March 12, 1994, a total of 32 women were ordained in Bristol Cathedral. Women clergy are now accepted in most Anglican parishes, and the popular situation comedy, "The Vicar of Dibley", shows how they have become part of mainstream life in the UK.

However, the issue remains controversial. Pope John* Paul II's apostolic letter, Ordinatio Sacerdotalis (May 1994), stated that the Roman Catholic Church is not authorized to ordain women, despite a small Roman Catholic movement for women's ordination.

Those who campaign for ordination have always denied accusations that they surrender Christian principles to secular feminism. Nevertheless, the movement to ordain women began in a period when women gained the vote, entered the labor market, and through contraception* were able regulate the size of their families. As always, changes in the church reflected developments in the wider society.

ANNE STOTT

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Latin America: Brazil.

Christianity in Brazil, as in many other places, is structured, organized, and led by men, but it is lived and experienced primarily by women. Thus speaking of Christian practices is to enter a women's world and to show the significance of women's presence in family*, community, and church life, even when this presence has been silenced and condemned to anonymity.

In Brazil, from the 1970s, the new winds of the Second Vatican* Council opened up a time when women's participation in theological studies and in the lives of Christian communities was not only permitted, but also recognized and affirmed. Women, who had always been involved in "daily-life theology" as catechists and teachers, began to risk themselves by daring, through academic inquiry, to develop a theology about the God* whom women experienced in their own lives.

The fact that women have entered theological schools and other institutions of higher education has made it possible for them to articulate and make public their own perspectives. The theology formulated by women displays a different mode of expression and a different vision of life with a God who creates and re-creates men and women in God's image*. The manner in which a woman has constructed her own identity in the midst of a patriarchal* and androcentric* world is reflected in the way she makes theology.

In this first phase, women's theological production in Brazil is necessarily located in academic centers of research and emphasizes themes related to women's situations and conflicts in society and the church, today and in history, as well as to women's difficulties and longings. At present, women theologians often lean on traditional theological themes, because they provide a safe space in which to engage in theological dialogue with men, but always from the perspective of a person marked by the potentiality of motherhood*: pregnancy*, harboring within herself a life that does not belong to her, giving birth, feeding, and nurturing.

While actual theological production by women in Brazil is not yet large, its quality is recognized, and an impressive number of women have obtained doctorates in theology or religion, contribute to research, and teach in colleges and universities, as well as provide professional counseling. The work by (Roman Catholic and Protestant) Brazilian women in biblical studies and biblical* theology is particularly significant and innovative (as published, e.g., in the journals Estudos bíblicos and Revista de interpretação [bíblica] Latino-Americana, RIBLA and, in English, in the Global Bible Commentary).

MARIA INÊZ DE CASTRO MILLEN

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Latin America: Mexico. In the 16th–17th c., women in religious orders followed a monastic* life that made possible mystical* and theological reflections, like those of Sr. Juana* Inés de la Cruz, Sr. Mariana de Jesús, and Catarina de San Juan (nicknamed China Poblana). Beyond this devotion to the mystical and the theological, these monastic women had a life in religious community and devoted themselves to works of charity. Convent life opened up in the 18th c., when the Congregation of María (nuns devoted to teaching) arrived with permission to engage in social work.

Protestants (in the 19th c. and later) allowed for the active participation of women as colporteurs*, as teachers, and, in the medical field, mostly as nurses. Women founded congregations: Melinda Rankin, an apostolic church; Romana Carvajal, a Presbyterian church; and Anna Sanders, a congregation of the Assemblies of God. The Sociedades Mutualistas (mutual aid associations) and Protestant School for Women Teachers offered women a liberal education with political and social dimensions. Some anticlerical associations were led by Protestant women.

During the 20th c., Roman Catholic women's associations developed under the supervision of bishops and priests (Unión de Damas Católicas, 1913; Unión Femenina Católica Mexicana, 1930), as did associations for women students (Unión Femenina de Estudiantes Católicas, 1939) and for women as teachers and defenders of the faith and of the family*. Vatican* II and the Latin American Episcopal Conference (CELAM*) of Medellín* made it possible for Catholic women to establish autonomous women groups. Women religious of many congregations left their convents to integrate themselves into society, especially in communities with urgent social needs.

Christian feminists, in line with Liberation* theology, brought together the first Meeting of Latin American Theologians (Encuentro de Teólogas de América Latina, Oaxtepec, 1979). They also organized Women for Dialogue (1979), the first nongovernmental organization for reflection from a Christian/feminist perspective on social and political issues, including women's rights. Similarly, Catholics for the Right to Decide (Católicas por el Derecho a Decidir, 1993) actively participate in political debates over reproductive rights by reflecting on these issues from the perspective of the Christian faith. In Protestant circles, congresses of women theologians, La Mujer en la Sociedad y la Iglesia (Woman in Society and the Church), met in Edomex (1990) and Monterrey (1991) to analyze the situation and action of Protestant women.

At present women participate in church life at different levels. The Base* Ecclesial Communities in the 1970s were spaces of formation and transformation for women within the social, ecclesiastic, and personal dimensions of their lives. In Protestant and Charismatic* churches, male leadership still thrives, but women have ways of participating in church ministries – as deaconesses*, group leaders, preachers, and ministers – although often without the ordination that would allow them to administer the sacraments (baptism* and the Lord's* Supper). The Methodist, Anglican, Mennonite*, and Congregational* churches, as well as one Baptist church and some Pentecostal churches, have ordained women as ministers.

Women actively participate in higher theological education. A good number of women theologians teach in seminaries and colleges, where they have introduced gender studies into the existing curriculum.

REBECA MONTEMAYOR

Women's Christian Practices in North America: United States. In many places throughout the USA, women gather in small communities, often in their homes, to shape their own alternative Christian practices. These rituals rely not on what has been handed down through patriarchal* traditions but rather on what emerges from particular experiences and yearnings of women. No one expects these rituals to be "nice" or "pretty" but rather to be real, gritty, honest, and encouraging, inextricably connected to everyday lives. They are organic ritual practices.

Female bodies, regular bleeding, breast milk, the joys and demands of sexual pleasure, varied physical shapes: all these are primary metaphors of God-human relationships. The emotional and physical demands of pregnancy* and giving birth are honored not as romantic notions, but as sources of fear, anxiety, weeping, and fretting, along with joy and happy anticipation. As with birth, so, too, with death*. Rather than heaven, the focus is on life in the face of death, on everyday loss, many moments of uncertainty, and many unanswered questions about faith*. Any certainty handed down in dogmas or prescriptions about death or an afterlife pales in relation to the complexity of living in the here and now. Abuse*, illness, and negativity are also pivotal in women's ritualizing.

While many church communities avoid the persistence and implications of sexual abuse, women break that silence by facing its terror, the absence of God in "saving us from it," and the need for healing. When there is fear, shame, and anger from the persistent pain of mental illness, women's rituals can create moments of relief, rest, comfort, and blessing. Where women are diminished through texts or images, there are alternative interpretations to be found. Christian women's rituals can evoke patterns that resist every kind of violence: verbal abuse, marginalization*, stereotyping, negative images (witch, crone, gossip), and the objectification of female bodies as if "for sale."

Women's Christian practices focus on ritual forms as well as content. Since planning, leadership, and participation are collaborative, no one structure is canonized. No elite speaks for all. The most memorable moments are the occasions when each person speaks about what she is feeling or thinking in response to ritual actions. Many different voices are solicited and heard. Everyone speaks; everyone blesses.

JANET WALTON

Women's Christian Practices and Theologies in Western Europe and North America. Women, always central to the transmission and practice of the Christian life, have become explicit since the late 20th c. about how they see their lives in the light of the limitations of received Christian doctrine. Dorothy Sölle (1929–2003), e.g., became a shrewd critic of authoritarian, male-dominated theism and the academic, ecclesiastical, and political institutions that sustain it. Natalie Watson perceptively asks whether Christian churches truly grace and enhance women among the human family. Susan Ross raises painful questions about women's presence in and exclusion from "sacred" space. Tina Beattie argues from a reconfiguring of the “Marian” tradition for a renewed understanding of women’s salvation* and therefore for their ordination. Mary Grey articulated the connections between the degradation and suffering* of women, especially among the poor, and the misappropriation of the natural world. Ann Loades addressed difficult issues, such as abortion* and the sexual abuse* of children, and women’s own complicity in the world’s wrongs. Much, too, may be learned from those who live in women-only communities, living lives of “consecrated celibacy*,” and their struggles in an arguably dysfunctional church, as Sandra Schneiders rightly maintains. Women thus insist on their full human dignity, seeking resources within their traditions for securing justice* for all.

ANN LOADES

Women’s Missionary Societies developed in parallel with the modern mission* movement. In 1800 Mary Webb formed the first society in the USA when she led Baptist and Congregational women to organize the Boston Female Society for Missionary Purposes. Within five decades, more than 200 such societies marked the US religious scene. In time they became the primary financial source for the Protestant missionary enterprise.

Women had little training in leadership at this time. Yet their growing awareness of the spiritual needs of the world made the establishment of societies necessary. Concerned women, like Sarah Doremus, gathered others, usually across denominational lines, to learn about, gather funds for, and do missions. They believed they were fulfilling the Great* Commission.

The societies emphasized “woman’s work to woman.” They supported female missionaries who spread the gospel among women and children through primary medical care (see Health, Healing, and Christianity Cluster), education*, and the distribution of literature. They did not assert the right to preach to or teach men, but generally accepted the limitations placed on Christian Western women. Yet these societies helped women develop leadership and financial management skills. Even though most churches denied their women members the right to minister officially, the society members established an international network of capable women.

ROSALIE BECK

WOMEN’S ORDINATION CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Women’s Ordination: The Early Church
Women’s Ordination and the Orthodox Church
Women’s Ordination and the Roman Catholic Church

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Women’s Ordination in Africa
Women’s Ordination in Africa: African Instituted Churches and Charismatic Churches
Women’s Ordination in Asia
Women’s Ordination in North America
Women’s Ordination in Western Europe

See also WOMEN’S CHRISTIAN PRACTICES AND THEOLOGIES CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Women’s Ordination: The Early Church. The preliminary question is: What is the earliest evidence for ordination as “a ritualized recognition of clerical orders”? Neither the NT nor the Didache* contains descriptions of actual ordination rituals. Prayer and laying on of hands, both elements of later ordination rituals, are present in the NT (see Ordination). Before the 3rd c., qualifications for church leadership included indwelling by the Holy* Spirit (divine selection), gifts of the Spirit (such as successful evangelizing), teaching competence, and communal selection and approval (social reputation, Christian ethics, patronage). Ordination was not always an expressed qualification for church leadership.

These qualifications were relatively gender inclusive, with the result that women occupied roles of ministry and governance alongside men as itinerant evangelists*, prophets*, stewards, patrons, teachers, house*-church leaders, healers, administrators, ritual celebrants, prayer leaders, and elders – as is shown by NT documents and many other early Christian sources (church orders, treatises, commentaries, letters, conciliar legislation, martyrologies, hagiographies, popular narratives, memorial and dedicatory inscriptions, art). There were chronological and regional variations (up to the 6th c.) in the meanings of key terms (e.g. ministry*, sacrament*, minister, bishop*, presbyter*, deacon*, teacher, prophet, widow*, virgin*, apostle*, steward). Contradictions between a growing number of legislative prescriptions against ordaining women and literary and epigraphic evidence show the persistence of women's ordained and nonordained ministries. Thus the question is not whether women were ordained but why ordination was increasingly prohibited among women from the 4th c. onward.

Detailed evidence for specific ordination rituals first appears in the Apostolic* Tradition (early 3rd c.), a church* order that systematically distinguishes clerical orders and rituals of ordination, reflecting the consolidation, definition, and elaboration of the previously amorphous ministerial and governance roles. The practice of organizing ecclesial leaders into ordained and nonordained clerical orders through episcopal authority is not gender exclusive (though not gender neutral), and women continue to fulfill ministerial and governance roles.

Four major ordained clerical orders receiving women can be identified from the early 3rd c.:

1. Widows constituted a clerical order of women prophets and penitential prayer leaders that was variously listed as an ordained or nonordained order.
2. Ordained female deacons (cf. deaconesses) were a regular feature of clerical organization, although there were fewer in Western churches than in Eastern churches, and age of admission and exact functions were debated.
3. Ordained women presbyters (priests), fewer than women deacons, were present in both Eastern and Western churches. Sporadic Western prohibitions against female priestly ordinands – unsuccessfully attempted by Pope Gelasius I (late 5th c.) – reveal that local bishops continued to ordain women priests.

4. Ordained women bishops were still fewer, but their presence is shown by the evidence that some Christian bishops in Spain and Asia Minor were called heretics by bishops in other regions because of their practice of ordaining women in clerical orders, including the order of bishops. The latest evidence for a female bishop is attested in a 9th-c. Roman church mosaic representing Bishop Theodora (whether the title episcopa is honorific or functional is debated).

Repeated 5th- and 6th-c. Western prohibitions against ordaining women into any clerical order (preferring a ritual blessing instead) testify to the ongoing resistance of local bishops to such prohibitions. These prohibitions articulated theological concerns for ritual purity in service of the altar, although other social and political factors were relevant. Nevertheless, these prohibitions indicate an awareness that women had been ordained in the past and were continuing to be ordained at the time of the councils. Indeed, the practice of ordaining women was confirmed as a papal prerogative by Gregory the Great (late 6th c.) and by Pope Benedict VIII (11th c.), who delegated to a Portuguese bishop the right of ordaining deaconesses.

KAREN JO TORJESEN and LESLIE HAYES

Women's Ordination and the Orthodox Church.

Ordaining women to the presbyterate and episcopacy generally is not considered possible today by the Orthodox, although a small but growing number of theologians are requesting that they begin to study this issue in more depth. Contemporary discussions regarding the ordination of women in the Orthodox Church revolve mostly around the diaconate. Deacons*, male and female, are ordained to the "sacred" or "priestly ministry" (hiera diakonia) but are not allowed to preside at the Eucharist*, as are bishops and presbyters*. The historic Inter-Orthodox Conference (Rhodes, 1988), to which all of the autocephalous* Orthodox* churches were invited, called for the restoration of the order of deaconess*, stating:

(32) The apostolic order of the deaconess should be revived. It was never altogether abandoned in the Orthodox Church....There is ample evidence...that this order was held in high honor.... (34) Such a revival would represent a positive response to many of the needs and demands of the contemporary world in many spheres. This would be all the more true if the diaconate in general (male as well as female) were restored in all places in its original, manifold services (diakoniai), with extension in the social sphere, in the spirit of ancient tradition and in response to the increasing specific needs of our time. It should not be restricted to a purely liturgical role or considered to be a mere step on the way to higher "ranks" of clergy. (35) The revival of women deacons in the Orthodox Church would emphasize in a special way the dignity of woman and give recognition to her contribution to the work of the Church as a whole.

See also OLD BELIEVERS.

KYRIAKI KARIDOYANES FITZGERALD

Women's Ordination and the Roman Catholic Church. The nonordination of Roman Catholic women is a mixed blessing. Catholic women are engaged in multiple forms of ministry all over the world unfettered by the constraints of a hierarchical, male-dominated structure. Yet authorities of the Roman Catholic Church continue to discriminate against women by declaring (Inter Insignores, 1977) that women do not "image Christ" in a biologically male way and therefore cannot be ordained.

Many Catholic women, theologically trained with master's and doctoral degrees, receive preparation that is equal to (and at times well beyond) that of male priests. They minister in schools, parishes, prisons, and hospitals as laypeople (not clergy). When they work in Catholic institutions, they are barred from most decision making that clerics enjoy. Laypeople cannot licitly celebrate the Eucharist* or hear confessions, although anecdotal evidence reveals that many do in extremis. At the heart of the matter is power – who decides how to use the community's resources, from real estate to sacraments – assigned according to gender.

One creative response is the Women-Church Movement, a network of feminist Base* Ecclesial Communities striving to live a "discipleship of equals" (Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza). Many Catholic women participate in these house* churches, which function without hierarchical, ordained leadership. Some Catholic women are ordained in other Christian denominations and still consider themselves "Catholic" women in ministry. Still others in the Roman Catholic Women-priests organization challenge exclusive practices by claiming to be ordained in a valid but not licit way by bishops who claim to be in apostolic* succession. Other people have left the Roman Catholic Church, scandalized by its treatment of women.

The nonordination of Roman Catholic women raises issues of gender justice and theology. A growing number of communities are concerned more with the quality of ministry than with the gender of the minister – a worldwide approach that will prevail in time.

MARY E. HUNT

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Women's Ordination in Africa is a complex and contested domain. Africa is the home of very diverse Christian traditions: churches dating from early Christianity, Western missionary-founded churches, and African* Instituted Churches (AICs). Each tradition has its own biblically grounded theological arguments on the place of women in the church, their ordination, and their relation to ecclesiastical leadership. Most church structures are overwhelmingly patriarchal* and hierarchal and deny women's leadership because of deeply entrenched gender discrimination, a justice* issue. Regional and global Christian world communions, ecumenical organizations, global women's movements, and human* rights groups contribute their voices to the debate. Nevertheless, in many Christian traditions, the local African church, diocese, or synod has the last word. Fortunately, theologically trained and/or ordained women (present in several churches) and women who have founded churches (especially AICs) contribute most effectively to the battle against patriarchy*, sexism*, exclusion, and gender inequality in the church. However, they have a long way to go. There is a need for well-coordinated research to go beyond each Christian tradition's attitude toward women and their practical experiences in church ministry (ordained or not), in order to account for the socioculturally constructed perceptions of power relationships between women and men in the family*, society, and religious communities.

NYAMBURA J. NJORGE

Women's Ordination in Africa: African Instituted Churches and Charismatic Churches.

See WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN PRACTICES AND THEOLOGIES CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES AND CHARISMATIC CHURCHES.

Women's Ordination in Asia reflects the recognition by the church that, like men, women are called to the Christian ministry, following the way of Jesus the Christ by preaching; teaching; casting out evil; caring for the sick, weak, and poor; building up the community entrusted to their care; administering the sacraments* (Lord's Supper and baptism); and conducting marriage*. From the beginning, Christian women in Asia were included in the ministry, but without ordination. Thus they were prohibited from administering the sacraments. Their ordination came about only after a long struggle by women church workers, although the Roman Catholic Church has retained its age-old position that women have access neither to the priesthood nor to the diaconate. Although most Protestant denominations in Asia now ordain women, the process leading to women's ordination varies; given the patriarchal* cultures*, hierarchical church structures, and patriarchal reading of Scriptures*, the steps toward ordination for women are often not easy. In some denominations, the requirements for ordaining women are much stricter than those for ordaining men, demanding, e.g., that they pass virginity tests, prove their singlehood (and celibacy) throughout their life, or be postmenopausal. Asian Feminist* theologians have supported the struggle for women's ordination, although some have opted not to be ordained in protest against the inherently patriarchal and institutionalized notions of ordination and because of their vision of alternative models of leadership in an egalitarian community.

HOPE S. ANTONE

Women's Ordination in North America.

During the colonial period, Protestant and Roman Catholic women were actively engaged in North American church life as laity*. Their religious activities revolved around prayer, Bible reading, teaching children, and attending church. Formal church leadership, usually marked by a sacred service of ordination, remained a male privilege.

In colonial society (early 18th c.), Protestant women who participated in religious revivals* (the "Great* Awakenings") became active as informal religious leaders; in some sectarian groups, such as those of the Quakers* and Shakers*, women's leadership was recognized without formal ordination. In the Roman Catholic Church, nuns exercised significant leadership in educational and medical ministries.

After the Revolutionary War, a second wave of frontier revivals promoted more egalitarian thinking about Christian mission and social reform. Christians reexamined Scripture and embraced new thinking about race* and gender. Antoinette Brown* became the first woman ordained (1853) to Christian ministry in an established denomination (Congregationalist*). Brown's ordination caused little controversy, because Congregationalists make decisions about ordination in local congregations. Congregationally organized denominations (Universalist, Unitarian*, Disciples*, and some Baptist*) ordained women by the late 19th c. The more structured Protestant denominations – Presbyterian*, Methodist*, Lutheran*, and Episcopalian* – supported by new biblical scholarship, church mergers, and renewed feminist thinking, granted full ordained status to women from the 1950s to the 1970s.

Meanwhile openness to clergywomen slowed among conservative Christians in the 20th c. With growing concern about biblical inerrancy*, they argued that women's ministries should be limited to home and family*. By the 1980s, the Southern* Baptist Convention, the largest Protestant denomination in the country, declared that women's ordination was unscriptural.

The historic African* American denominations also resisted. They insisted that formal leadership "on the pulpit" was reserved for men, with women exercising complementary* power from the pew. Many black women who felt a call to preach switched denominations or simply started small independent storefront churches. Since 1853 more than 50% of ordained women in North America have been leaders of unaffiliated congregations or in racially mixed Holiness*, Pentecostal*, Evangelical*, and paramilitary denominations, such as the Salvation* Army.

US Roman Catholic women were hopeful that canon* laws against the ordination of women would change after the Second Vatican* Council (1960s). They enrolled in seminaries to prepare themselves. Vatican documents continued to insist, however, that only celibate male priests could "represent" Jesus Christ at the altar* (see the present cluster: Women's Ordination and the Roman Catholic Church).

Women's ordination is still debated. However, the issue is more than a question of women's leadership; it illustrates basic ways in which Christians struggle to define their faith in the context of modern culture.

BARBARA BROWN ZIKMUND

Women's Ordination in Western Europe. Gender has always been a constitutive part of the conception of ecclesial ordination*, commonly providing a criterion for the division between laity* and clergy*. In Western European Protestant churches, theological and political claims for gender equality have led to the gradual acceptance of women's ordination to the offices of missionaries, deaconesses*, pastors and priests, and eventually bishops.

At times difference and complementarity* were stressed. Deaconesses remained within traditional women's roles and women pastors or priests were seen as a complement to male clergy. But sameness and equality were also affirmed; both female and male clergy are needed by the congregation.

While secular cultural motives played a role, theological motivation has recently been emphasized, based on the views that every human being is an image* of God and that baptism* and thus the priesthood* of all believers are gender inclusive. At minimum, gender has been regarded as neutral in relation to faith*. However, women's ordination is ultimately based on the conviction* that women are necessary for the fullness of the gospel to be preached and lived, and that women's subordination, although supported by strands of Christian tradition, must be clearly confronted. Female church leaders are important for reinforcing the trustworthiness of the church.

These theological perspectives have been contextually implemented in Western European Protestant churches following a pattern exemplified by Germany, France, and Scandinavia. A prelude was the 19th-c. revivalist* movement in these countries, where women-led congregations were legitimated by apocalyptic* expectations and charismatic* emphases. In Germany during World War II, because most male pastors and priests were drafted into the army, women stepped into the pulpits. Theologically trained women petitioned for ordination, which was finally granted (Prussia, 1942; Baden, 1944) as an "emergency" measure. They remained in their positions after the war, yet the ordination of other women did not occur until 1960 (fully established, 1978; women Lutheran bishops since 1992). Similarly, during World War II in France, women functioned as Lutheran priests (Alsace-Lorraine) and pastors of the Reformed Church, though without ordination. Elisabeth Schmidt, pastor in Sète during and after the war, was alone in being ordained (1949). Women’s ordination in the Reformed Church of France was established in 1966. In Scandinavia, women’s ordination as priests in the Lutheran churches began in Sweden in 1958 and reached Finland in 1986; in 2004 Denmark, Norway, and Sweden each had two women bishops. Women now constitute a substantial portion of the Protestant clergy all over Western Europe. Some women priests and pastors conform to their church tradition and others have taken it in feminist directions. See also WOMEN’S CHRISTIAN PRACTICES AND THEOLOGIES CLUSTER: IN WESTERN EUROPE: UNITED KINGDOM. CRISTINA GRENHOLM

WOMEN’S RELIGIOUS ORDERS CLUSTER

Women’s Religious Orders in Africa

Women’s Religious Orders in Asia

Women’s Religious Orders in Europe and North America

Women’s Religious Orders in Latin America

Women’s Religious Orders in Latin America: Brazil

Women’s Religious Orders in Africa. See RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC, CLUSTER: IN AFRICA.

Women’s Religious Orders in Asia. Roman Catholic women’s religious orders made their appearance in Asia with the colonial expansion of the West in the 17th c. and are present in their Western form in the majority of Asian countries today. These orders or congregations include cloistered orders, religious institutes with active apostolates, and societies of apostolic life. According to their mode of consecration*, they voluntarily observe the evangelical counsels* and live life in common to fulfill the mission of Christ and his church*.

Part of the European colonial enterprise under Roman Catholic monarchs was to Christianize the “natives,” and male religious* were sent with the colonizers. Gradually the help of women was deemed more practical in the evangelization of women and children. At that time, however, the only legitimate form of religious life for women was the cloister*, which precluded external works, as in the case of the Order of St. Clare founded in Manila in 1621 by a member from Spain.

The early native sisterhoods began with women responding to the call of the Holy* Spirit to lead holy lives, whether in seclusion or in small groups. In due time, they served the Church’s purposes as well. The earliest native congregation, the Lovers of the Cross, originally a small band of celibate Vietnamese Catholic women doing pious works in the 1640s, was organized as a religious community in 1670 by the vicar apostolic of Cochin China. All subsequent indigenous congregations in Vietnam* trace their roots to this religious group. Having weathered several countrywide persecutions and suppression in North Vietnam, it now has more than 3,000 members in Asian countries as well as in Europe and the USA.

Likewise, some groups of beatas (women of exceptional piety) in 17th- and 18th-c. Philippines eventually formed religious institutes; similarly, “Christian Virgins” in mid-18th- and 19th-c. China became active in service to the Church, no longer solely in pursuit of personal perfection. Asian-based institutes are now established in many Asian countries, with the greatest number in India, where more than 200 sisterhoods have been founded, most of them in the 19th c.

By the 18th c., there was some leniency with women’s orders, made official by a 1900 papal decree that allowed them some external apostolate. Hence European orders began responding to the call of Asian missions, followed by North American congregations in the 20th c. Whether foreign based or indigenous, women’s congregations in Asia before Vatican* II were involved in education*, in medical, pastoral, and social* work, in training local sisters and catechists, and in other forms of evangelization*. After Vatican II, facing new needs, they opened retreat centers, taught in theological schools, participated in basic Christian communities, assisted drug and HIV/AIDS victims, fostered gender sensitivity and ecological* awareness, and sent members overseas. Following the Synod of Bishops' call for justice* in 1971, women's orders became more involved with workers and indigenous peoples, offering advocacy and other services.

While women's orders have their own governing bodies, in many Asian countries they have formed national conferences for intercongregational collaboration. Spurred by the 1971 Synod to make justice a priority in their lives, the Asia Meeting of Religious was created in 1972 as a continent-wide forum for conference members for sharing their hopes, concerns, and challenges. A challenge to the Church in Asia is to be truly Asian in its identity and mission* and to engage in authentic dialogue* with Asia's religions* and cultures* and its many poor*. Inter-religious dialogue*, inculturation*, and integral liberation* are challenges facing women's orders in Asia as well. See also RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC, CLUSTER. VIRGINIA FABELLA, MM

Women's Religious Orders in Europe and North America. Religious life for women flourished in Europe from the beginning of Christianity, first in the form of groups of virgins* and widows* living together as a vital part of the local church and later in monasteries following the Rule of Basil* in the East and the Rule of Benedict* in the West. Monastic* life offered the only education available for girls throughout the Middle Ages, enabling women like Hildegard* of Bingen and Mechtilde* of Magdeburg to achieve prominence as mystics*, scholars, and educators.

Clare* of Assisi and others led women into a new, evangelical expression of religious life based on the example of Francis* of Assisi and Dominic*. The daily life of Franciscan* and Dominican* women was more circumscribed by ideals of cloister than was that of the men, but both genders were inspired by the desire to spread the gospel through the example of radical poverty, preaching, and good works. Still other groups – Beguines* in the Low Countries and the Rhineland, beatas in Spain, and the French dévotées – lacked official Church recognition as religious but gave many women a way to live in community as consecrated virgins while practicing charitable works in their neighborhoods.

The requirement of cloister finally gave way, in practice if not in Church law, when many congregations of women were established to address social ills during the Counter* Reformation (Catholic* Renewal). These congregations included Angela Merici's* Ursulines, Mary Ward's* Institute of Mary, the Daughters of Charity, and the Visitandines led by Louise de* Marillac and Jane* Frances de Chantal, respectively, and the Sisters of St. Joseph. All of these, along with the older Benedictines*, Franciscans*, Dominicans*, and Carmelites* and 19th-c. foundations, including the Society of the Sacred Heart, the School Sisters of Notre Dame, and the Sisters of Mercy, were seeds for the growth of women's congregations in North America.

Religious life for women was brought to Canada* by Marie (Guyard*) de l'Incarnation, whose missionary zeal impelled her to cross the Atlantic (1639) to join a small group of colonists who had come from France to Quebec* just five years before. A member of a cloistered Ursuline community, she emigrated with that community's blessing and soon set what was to be the pattern for women religious in North America by opening the first school in the colony, for Native American and French girls.

Her initiatives were followed shortly after (1642) by Marguerite Bourgeoys. A devout member of a lay association while in France, she came to Canada, where she cofounded the settlement that became Montreal, established the first free school in North America, and founded a non-cloistered teaching order, the Congregation of Notre Dame. For three decades, she directed the colony's only hospital and served as treasurer of Montreal.

A third outstanding colonist, Marguerite d'Youville, later founded the Gray Nuns to assist her in caring for the sick poor.

In the USA, Ursulines from France introduced religious life for women in New Orleans, Louisiana Territory, in 1727. Toward the end of the 1700s, several women brought the Carmelite life from Belgium to Baltimore. Growth began to accelerate when North American women, such as the widow and convert to Roman Catholicism Elizabeth Bayley Seton, founded congregations in which women could support one another in prayer and charitable works. Elizabeth Lange addressed the needs of current and former slaves* by founding the first congregation for African Americans, the Oblate Sisters of Providence. Philadelphia heiress Katherine Drexel, moved by the neglect of freed slaves and of Native Americans, founded the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament to work among these populations.

Growth was further stimulated by the resurgence of religious life for women in postrevolutionary Europe coupled with anticlerical laws that banned congregations devoted solely to prayer and contemplation and constrained others from exercising their traditional roles in education. These factors, along with massive immigration from Ireland and parts of the Continent, led hundreds of European congregations to begin missions in the USA and, to a lesser extent, in Canada, where women religious ultimately established a presence in every province.

An estimated 220,000 women religious have served over the years in the USA, forming centers of prayer and social service in every region and establishing an extensive network of schools, universities, and hospitals. Sisters' service as nurses during the U.S. Civil War is credited with having disarmed anti-Catholic prejudice in the USA. A dynamic movement of lay association has characterized the post-Vatican II decades in North America, whereas the number of women religious has been in decline since their peak in the 1960s.

Women's congregations in North America are self-governing within the framework of their own constitutions and canon law. Voluntary federations and national conferences offer mutual support and facilitate common action in promoting the cause of the poor and disadvantaged in society. See also RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC, CUSTER.

KAREN M. KENNELLY, CSJ

Women's Religious Orders in Latin America.

When women's religious orders arrived in Latin America, they encountered cultures* that strongly emphasized the consecration of women and the worship of goddesses among indigenous communities in the lands called Abya-yala (the Continent of Life). Women's religious orders shared the three principal vows of the religious life (poverty, obedience, and chastity) through different paths: contemplative* life, active life, and service within secular* institutes. The cloister* had a central role during colonial times. Religious women of active life gained legitimacy during the 19th c. The secular institutes were born with the Second Vatican* Council; these institutes choose their vocation (it is not imposed by the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church).

When Liberals ruled most Latin American countries (late 19th–early 20th c.), there was a strict separation between church* and state. Under these circumstances, Catholics developed a social network including primary and secondary schools, universities, hospitals, and a mass communication system. Laypeople as well as religious, both men and women, were responsible for these social and apostolic tasks.

The Holy See* rapidly recognized that the sisters' work in the social and religious fields was important, but Church authorities imposed on them a monastic* discipline, in line with the First Vatican* Council (1869). All religious congregations were to move their central houses to Rome in order to work closely with the Vatican, which would control them. In 1917 a new canon* law was promulgated that oversaw everything in the life of the Catholic Church, including women's religious apostolic life. Consequently, all congregations shared similar approaches to formation, promotion of vocation, community life, and conception of how to live the three vows. These rules were followed regardless of national context; the canonical disposition was more important than the local social or cultural reality.

In most Latin American countries, Liberal governments tried to establish a public school system, but universal education was not possible. Women’s education* was often provided by reestablished monastic orders that had initiated those tasks in colonial times and sometimes by European monastic orders that came to Latin America along with immigrants. After the 1930s economic crisis, welfare state systems were established in Latin America, with strong state involvement in the economy providing many social benefits for members of the working class and peasants. Because of its past experience, the Church, and especially women’s religious congregations, knew how to mobilize people to fulfill these roles. As a result, a true church-and-state symbiosis developed. The state gave the Catholic Church’s institutions – particularly, women’s congregations – the facilities and economic means to accomplish this social* work. Social work was placed on the shoulders of regular* men (members of religious orders), secular* clergy (priests living “in the world”), but predominantly women religious.

	1912	1945	1950
Women religious	14,000	55,567	69,073
Regular men	4,578	11,389	13,282
Secular men	11,776	12,992	14,270

Despite the increase in the number of women religious, it was impossible to cope with the needs for social services of a population increasing even more rapidly, and the state never managed to resolve the situation.

The congregations’ essential religious aspect was based on the principles of canon* law, and particularly on the three vows that governed the essence and meaning of cloistered lives. The central goal, a “state of perfection” (following the counsels*), was reachable only through life inside the cloister, where women could keep themselves safe from the world and its temptations. Despite their tremendous impact on the social, religious, and political realms, they saw social work merely as a part of their quest for piety and sanctity. Until the 1960s, the walls of cloisters and convents aroused people’s curiosity because of the secrecy and mysterious aura that surrounded them. The mother superior ruled the life inside the convent and was considered God’s representative. She reported to her major superior in the mother house (normally located in Europe, particularly in Rome), which in turn reported to the Vatican.

With Vatican* II, the sisters moved to a mission-centered life in society. Women religious who chose the process of “insertion” into society moved from a service through which the poor* were objectified as receivers of works of charity to a mission through which these women became agents of social and political transformation who empowered the poor to become themselves agents in their own life contexts. This process of insertion changed the way they lived their vows, as they returned to their roots and refounded their communities, rediscovering their founding charisms* and at the same time their feminine religious identity. The great majority of Latin American congregations went to live in small communities, leaving upper-class neighborhoods and comforts. For many of them, pastoral work among the poor signified a radical rupture with their social milieu and with their way of life and work.

In the early 21st c., beyond ecclesiastical confrontations, women religious continue to live and work among the poor while reflecting on their own experience of insertion into society and inculturation* in search of personal and social liberation*. In fact, as they redefine their feminine identity and develop a new theology – a Liberation* and Feminist* theology – they draw extensively on their new social consciousness. They have brought their experience with poor, indigenous, and black women to their feminist reading of the Bible and to their effort to bring about new social movements. See also RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC, CLUSTER.

ANA MARÍA BIDEGAIN

Women's Religious Orders in Latin America: Brazil.

During the colonial period (1500–1822), it was not easy for women to enter the religious life because Portugal*, through the Padroado Régio (Royal Patronage; Spanish, *Patronato), restricted and controlled, for economic and political reasons, the foundation of female convents in Brazil. Yet women in the colony found ways of bypassing the prohibition by establishing recolhimentos, institutions where women of different stations in life (orphaned girls, middle-aged women, widows) gathered and lived, (unofficially) observing the rules of an order. Such recolhimentos included the “Recolhimento do Desterro” in Bahia and the “Convento da Ajuda” in Rio de Janeiro (which never was a canonical religious order). Following the creation of the recolhimentos, monasteries were also established in Brazil. The first were the Santa Clara do Desterro in Bahia (1677) and the Convento da Luz in São Paulo. Thus during the colonial period, noncanonic and canonic religious ways of life existed side by side and were often interconnected.

During the period of the Brazilian Empire (1822–89), women's congregations started to arrive from Europe, having been invited by reformer bishops who sought to implement the Catholic* Renewal initiated by the Council of Trent* (1545–63) through education, moral formation, and social work. These bishops needed the collaboration of women religious (often simply called “religious”) in education, as well as in the moral formation of women and the development of social work in order to care for the sick, orphans, and elderly. These were women religious pursuing the “active life,” religious life associated with some form of social* work. The first three women's congregations to arrive in Brazil were the Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent* de Paul (1849), the Sisters of Saint Joseph of Chambéry (1858), and the Sisters of Saint Dorothy (1868). After 1891 the number of new congregations grew rapidly, most of them coming from France and Italy.

The Second Vatican* Council and, more important for Brazil, the Latin American Episcopal Conferences of Medellín*, Colombia (1968), and Puebla, Mexico (1979), introduced new ways of practicing the religious life. Structural changes were proposed for the internal reorganization of the congregations: a shift from the wearing of habits to simple street clothes and separation of the place of work from the living place. Major changes for larger communities included their dislocation into small groups; the democratization of internal structures, including the election of their superiors by the groups; and the emergence of a sense of individuality and a greater appreciation for each religious as a person. Most changes occurred out of the women's desire to live with others, to be free of a way of life so far apart from the world. See also RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC, CLUSTER.

BEATRIZ DE VASCONCELLOS DIAS

Woolman, John (1720–72), Quaker* mystic*, known for his Journal and other writings on slavery* and wealth*. Born in Northampton, New Jersey, Woolman taught school, worked as a tailor, and traveled as an itinerant opponent of slavery and trading in slaves, with an active concern for Native Americans. A kindly man of utter simplicity, he dressed plainly, mostly in undyed linen clothing, spoke out against consumerism, horseback riding, and rum and tea drinking, and insisted that ordinary folk could achieve perfection*. Active in the affairs of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of the Friends*, he was part of a reform movement within it. He married Sarah Ellis, a neighbor in Mt. Holly, New Jersey (1749). In 1772 Woolman sailed in steerage to England, where he was not well received by other Friends, partly because he insisted on walking around the country. He died and was buried in Yorkshire.

His oft-edited Journal (in print since 1774) amounts to a reflection on his experiences and his approach to life, and it continues to inspire. The simple prose of this minor classic suggests a man with strong principles yet broad sympathies, because he seldom alienated contemporaries.

H. LARRY INGLE

Word-Faith Movement and Its Worship. The Word-Faith (or Word of Faith) Movement is a primarily North American new religious movement best known for its stance that physical healing* and financial prosperity* represent the will of God for all believers and are readily available to anyone with sufficient faith*. Originating in the 1960s–1970s through the labors of Kenneth “Dad” Hagin (1917–2003), Kenneth Copeland, and Fred Price, the Word-Faith Movement has mushroomed into a network of independent nondenominational churches (many ranking as megachurches) located mostly in the USA (2,300–2,500 churches claiming as many as 4,800,000 worshippers) and rapidly spreading worldwide. Several Word-Faith leaders have made themselves culturally visible through their widespread use of media*, especially television, and popular books. Although Word-Faith churches style themselves as “Bible believing,” leading to their common misclassification as simply “conservative” or “Evangelical,” the novel meanings that they ascribe to traditional language reveal a vastly different theological background. The latest research indicates that the Word-Faith Movement’s theological roots lie within the Nation of Islam and Mormonism*. However, the structure and praxis of Word-Faith worship stem directly from the Pentecostal*/Charismatic* tradition, making the movement a blend of diverse US religious modalities.

Three core beliefs undergird the writings and sermons of virtually all Word-Faith teachers. First, God* is a spirit, where “spirit” is construed as the agency producing the force of faith*. This identity between “God” and “spirit” entails that any other spirits that come into being will, by definition, be gods. Faith is understood to be the most elemental substance of all matter and thus the raw material out of which all physical objects are created. Moreover, words are the containers of faith and the instruments by which faith produces its material effects; therefore, by speaking faith-filled words, a god can create her or his own reality. Accordingly, God spoke the universe into being via words filled with faith, a notion that Word-Faith teachers support by a woodenly literalistic reading of Gen 1.

Second, the imago Dei is understood as the imago Dei essentialis, or comprising the same species of being as God, and not, as historically affirmed by Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Orthodox thought, the imago Dei accidentalis, or the imperfect and finite reflection of an ontologically superior creator. According to the Word-Faith equation of deity and spirituality, Adam* and Eve* were spirits and so “little gods,” whom God gave two additional faculties for earthly survival, namely bodies for physical movement and souls for analytical thinking. During the 1980s–1990s, Word-Faith teachers frequently employed the language of “little gods,” to the tune of sharp denunciation by Evangelicals. Consequently, most Word-Faith exponents have recast their anthropology in theological vocabulary acceptable to mainstream Christians. Such implicit terminology either logically or contextually necessitates that original humanity be of the same species of being as God; examples include “having the (very) nature of God,” “the nature of Jesus,” “the life of God,” “the God-kind of life,” and “the champion in you.”

Third, the biblical notions of spiritual death and rebirth are construed literally as the death and revivification of the spirit, where the spirit lies dormant during the interim. With the Fall*, Word-Faith practitioners hold that Adam and Eve suffered spiritual death; they ceased to be divine and degenerated to mere body-soul humans, lacking the faculty to generate the force of faith. Hence in traducian* fashion, every human is born with all three components – body, soul, and spirit – but initially only the first two parts are alive, while the spirit is nonfunctional. By accepting Jesus as Lord and Savior, a person is “born again”; namely the spirit is reborn or brought back to life, thus restoring the person’s divine status and corresponding power to speak words of faith and create material blessings, especially health*, wealth*, and prosperity. Proof texts for this position include John 10:34, Ps 82:6, and Paul’s affirmations that believers are “sons and daughters of God” and “joint heirs with Jesus,” which Word-Faith teachers interpret as natural lineage rather than adoption.

Word-Faith worship style encompasses praise songs (see Praise and Worship) designed for maximal physical involvement (e.g. lifting hands, dancing, glossolalia*) and “signs and wonders” (e.g. healings, “slaying in the Spirit,” exorcisms*), and it largely mirrors Pentecostal/Charismatic worship. But unlike the Pentecostal/Charismatic conviction that God alone can perform miracles and inspire spiritual gifts, Word-Faith teachers insist that believers, as divine beings, are responsible for wielding the force of faith to personally effect healings and all other charismata. This “do-it-yourself” character of supernaturally creating one’s own temporal advantages constitutes the thread running throughout all facets of the Word-Faith Movement, a thread reflecting the distinctly US emphases of self-empowerment and individualism. See also PROSPERITY GOSPEL CLUSTER.

KIRK R. MACGREGOR

Word-Flesh Christologies are characterized by the view that Jesus Christ is the divine Word incarnate, taking flesh but not a human mind or soul*, which would be superfluous. The Word takes flesh by a “natural union” analogous to the union of the rational soul with flesh in other human beings; thus Christ does not have human subjectivity. This was the predominant view after the condemnation of Paul* of Samosata, until Apollinaris* stated it in a blatant way and it was condemned.

Word of God. The expression is used in the OT for God’s communication with Moses (Exod 20:1) and the prophets (in Jer, 50 times), and sometimes for creation itself (Gen 1; Ps 33:6). In the NT, it refers to Jesus’ words and to the gospel that is preached by the apostles (Acts 4:31; 1 Thess 2:13; Rev 1:9). It is personified as the Word that becomes incarnate* in Jesus (John 1:1–3, 14), just as Wisdom* had been personified in the OT (Prov 8:22–31). This divine Word and Wisdom could also be linked with the cosmic Logos of the Stoics and the intelligible light of the Platonists, apprehended at least dimly by all human beings.

The last meaning became determinative in the development of the doctrine of the Trinity*, with the Word being identified with the Son, the second person of the Trinity. At first the Word was assumed to be uttered or generated when God decided to create the world; after the Council of Nicaea* (325), the Word was understood to be eternal, God’s complete self-expression and self-concept, acting in the world through creation*, revelation, and redemption*.

The OT emphasis on the Word of God speaking through Moses and the prophets, augmented by the NT emphasis on God’s speaking through a Son (Heb 1:1–2), led to the identification of Scripture with the Word of God, especially when Scripture was understood to have been inspired* by the Holy* Spirit. The Reformation*, with its criticism of tradition* and the authority* of the church, insisted especially on this identification; in many of the Reformed confessions* of faith, Scripture is the first topic discussed, as the source of all else that is asserted.

With the historical study of the Bible, it has become difficult to think of Scripture as identical with the Word of God; therefore, it is now more common to speak of the Bible as “containing” the Word of God or, more satisfactorily, to say that the Word of God “speaks through” the Bible. See also LOGOS; REVELATION; SCRIPTURE.

EUGENE TESELLE

Word-Man Christologies are characterized by the view that Jesus exists as a human being, united with the divine Word. This was the view held by Gregory* Nazianzen (after the condemnation of Apollinarianism*), the Antiochene* school, and Augustine*. Criticized as Adoptionist*, or as holding a “two Sons” doctrine, they emphasized that “the man” did not first exist and then become united with the Word, but was created by being assumed by the Word.

Worker-Priests. Some priests in France and Belgium decided (early 1940s) “to become workers among the workers” in order to overcome the gap between the Roman Catholic Church and the industrial working class. After 1945 some worker-priests joined combat organizations and Communist trade unions, leading to condemnation by the Vatican (1953–54). Thus bishops clamped down on the experiment that included about 100 priests. With the decree Presbyterorum Ordinis (1965), the Second Vatican* Council once again made room to connect the priestly life with the world of labor, yet under more stringent conditions. In 2000 approximately 1,000 worker-priests were active worldwide.

EMIEL LAMBERTS

World. Among the Greeks, the term kosmos had to do with ordering, and it could be applied both to the earth as a whole and to the broader cosmos, including the heavenly bodies. Thus the world could be viewed as God’s good ordering, as the field of God’s providence*, and as the basis of a natural* theology that discovers not only God’s existence but also God’s goodness.

The notion of “world” was sometimes limited, however, to the inhabited world, the oikoumene, and thus to its inhabitants and their “mundane” possessions and concerns. In the latter case, it could be associated with the negative aspects of the world, its ungodly inhabitants, and the demonic powers that rule the world (e.g. John 7:7, 14:17 and 27; 1 John 4:4–5; 1 Cor 1:21). The devil* is called the “god of this world” (2 Cor 4:4) or the “ruler of this world” (John 12:31, 14:30, 16:11).

Early Christians dealt with these negative aspects of the world in several ways. The predominant approach, shaped by the apocalyptic* tradition, anticipated that the present evil age would soon be superseded by a new age. In the meantime, God was understood to love this world, coming not to judge but to save it (John 3:16, 12:47). Paul spoke of the world as groaning in travail, awaiting transformation (Rom 8:22). For the Gnostics*, however, the world was the sinister cosmos, the result of a tragic fall from the divine realm or, as Marcion* saw it, the work of a God of rigid, unimaginative justice, so that redemption had to come from a different realm, taking the form of rescue from this world.

Early Christian spirituality*, perhaps seeing these alternative views of the world as expressions of human attitudes, tended to shift the focus inward: one can be captured by the world and its concerns, but one ought to be drawn by God's love* so that one loves God primarily and then loves everything else in relation to God (see Asceticism; Monasticism Cluster).

Christian ethics has also taken an interest in the external world, natural and social. Those who live "in the world" are concerned about the things that affect them, threaten them, and might be transformed through their actions. Christians are called to aid the victims of poverty* and disease and to end the conditions that exacerbate them. Thus there is a place for Christian "worldliness," expressed most notably in the "secular* Christianity" of Bonhoeffer* and of many thinkers in the 1960s. Worldly achievement was even given a noble face in the Protestant* ethic (developed in the 17th c.) and the Gospel of Prosperity* (20th c.). In all of this there is, of course, a temptation to succumb to human pride and self-centeredness, seeing the world as merely the theater for human activity and glorifying the achievements of human technology.

A positive evaluation of the world is found today in various types of "nature spirituality." This implication of the doctrine that God created all things good has been enhanced in the modern context by stimuli as diverse as pantheism*, increased understanding of ecosystems, and fear of ecological* disaster through nuclear war, pollution, or global warming and climate* change. Awareness of the many ways human life depends on the natural world, combined with evidence that human action might significantly endanger the planet, has led to a new sense of human responsibility for the health of the earth as a whole. Here the emphasis is not on the human race as the greatest of God's creations (one way of reading Gen 1) but on its task to "till and keep" the garden in which it has been placed by God (Gen 2:15). This "ethic of stewardship*" emphasizes responsibility before God and among human beings for the many species on earth and the ecosystems that support them.

EUGENE TESELLE

World Alliance of Reformed Churches (Presbyterian and Congregational) includes 75 million Reformed Christians in more than 200 churches in about 100 countries. It consists of Reformed*, Congregational*, Presbyterian*, Waldensian*, United, and Uniting churches. It seeks to be a communion of churches joined together in Christ to promote the renewal and unity of the church and to participate in God's transformation of the world. Its member churches are rooted in the 16th-c. Reformation* of Calvin*, Zwingli*, and earlier Reformers, such as Valdes* and Hus*.

The Alliance of Reformed Churches throughout the World Holding the Presbyterian System (founded in 1875) merged in 1970 with the International Congregationalist Council (founded in 1891) to form the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, with its main office in Geneva, Switzerland.

The World Alliance of Reformed Churches has always been committed to being a platform on which its member churches can fulfill their mission as agents of transformation and justice* in society. For example, the 21st General Council (Ottawa, 1982) declared that apartheid* is a sin and its moral and theological justification a heresy*. The 22nd General Council (Seoul, 1989) affirmed the commitment to address injustices experienced by women in church and society.

The 23rd General Council (Debrecen, 1997) called on member churches to commit themselves to a process of confession concerning economic* injustice and ecological* destruction. The 24th General Council (Accra, 2004) adopted a confession stating that the integrity of believers' faith is at stake if they fail to resist the current system of neoliberal economic globalization.

The World Alliance of Reformed Churches seeks theological clarity that unites churches in their struggle for economic, ecological, and gender justice*. It has always been strongly interested in Christian unity, endorsing attempts to unite churches in particular countries and mission fields, and today engages in dialogue* with Roman Catholics, Pentecostals, Lutherans, Orthodox, and others. It has close ties with the Reformed Ecumenical Council.

In the early 2000s, its core callings included striving for justice in the economy and the earth; searching for spiritual renewal and renewal of Reformed worship; fostering communion within the Reformed family and unity of the church ecumenical; interpreting and reinterpreting the Reformed tradition and theology for contemporary witness; fostering mission in unity, mission renewal, and mission empowerment; promoting inclusivity and partnership in church and society; and enabling Reformed churches to witness for justice and peace.

In 2008 the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Reformed* Ecumenical Council agreed to merge (in 2010).

CLIFTON KIRKPATRICK

World Council of Churches (WCC), inaugurated in 1948 after a process of formation that began in 1938, is a fellowship of Christian churches dedicated to that unity in faith and action characteristic of the modern ecumenical movement. The WCC's inspiration is Jesus' prayer that Christians "may be one, that the world may believe" (John 17:21). Council membership includes more than 340 churches from Orthodox, Protestant, Anglican, Old Catholic, independent, and uniting traditions. The WCC cooperates with the Roman Catholic Church in various projects and through their Joint Working Group. The WCC's main offices are in Geneva, Switzerland.

The WCC traces its roots to student and lay movements of the 19th c., the 1910 Edinburgh World Missionary Conference, and a 1920 encyclical from the (Orthodox) Synod of Constantinople suggesting a "fellowship of churches" similar to the League of Nations. Predecessor bodies incorporated into the Council include international conferences on "Faith* and Order" (theology, sacraments, ordinances) and on "Life* and Work" (social ministries, international affairs, relief services), the International Missionary Council, and the Sunday* School Movement. Largely Protestant and Western in its earliest years, the WCC's profile and identity evolved during the 1960s with the influx of many Orthodox churches from the East and newly independent churches from formerly colonial regions in the South. The Second Vatican* Council improved relations between the WCC and Roman Catholics.

Two WCC projects were launched in 1946: the Ecumenical Institute for postgraduate study in Bossey, Switzerland, and the Churches' Commission on International Affairs. After World War II, the Council encouraged churches' development of ministries and continues this work among refugees*, migrants, and the poor*. During the cold war, the WCC provided a forum for East–West dialogue. The Program to Combat Racism*, although controversial, assisted in ending apartheid in Southern Africa. A landmark document, Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry (1982), provided some consensus in the quest for full Christian unity.

Recent emphases of the WCC include initiatives in common prayer, mission, and evangelism; a spirituality of resistance to injustice; the solidarity of churches with women; the overcoming of violence; interfaith dialogue; advocacy concerning persons living with HIV/AIDS; the welcoming of youth leadership; and the broadening and deepening of ecumenical fellowship.

SAMUEL KOBIA

World Evangelical Alliance. See EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

World Evangelical Fellowship. See EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

World Missionary Conference (Edinburgh, 1910), precursor of the World* Council of Churches and other ecumenical endeavors, which convened 1,200 mostly Western delegates from Protestant and Anglican missionary societies. As a "field" conference led by John R. Mott* (president of the World* Student Christian Federation), it did not address doctrinal issues but the immediate problems facing missionary work. It affirmed reciprocal cooperation ("comity*") in Bible translation and in major enterprises, such as medical and educational infrastructures (hospitals, schools). The 17 Asian delegates consciously articulated, for the first time, the regional identities of Asian* Christians and resisted continuing control by their founding Western churches.

World Student Christian Federation, union of Christian student organizations founded in Vadstena, Sweden (1895), with the goals of evangelism*, deepened spiritual life, and extension of the Kingdom* of God. John Mott* became its first general secretary. Members of the Federation from the non-Western world played significant roles in the missionary conferences of Edinburgh (1910) and Jerusalem (1928). It has cooperated closely with the World* Council of Churches.

World Wide Web and Christian Theology. See POSTMODERNISM AND THEOLOGY.

Worms, Concordat of (1122), agreement between Pope Calixtus II and Emperor Henry V that resolved the investiture* controversy, setting a lasting pattern for church*–state relationships. The emperor gave up the right to invest bishops and abbots with spiritual office symbols and promised canonical elections, free of simony*. The pope gave the emperor the power to prevent the election of unacceptable candidates and to confer temporal powers on ecclesiastical representatives.

Worms, Edict of (1521), issued by the Holy Roman emperor Charles V, banned the writings of Luther* and labeled him a heretic* (he had challenged the absolute authority of the pope over the Roman Catholic Church) and enemy of the Holy* Roman Empire. Luther remained in seclusion at Wartburg castle for several years, continuing to write and translate the Bible into German; the Edict was never enforced.

WORSHIP CLUSTER

Worship

Worship in Ancient Israel

Worship in Early Christianity

See also ANGLICAN CLUSTER: ANGLICAN WORSHIP AND LITURGIES; BAPTIST CHURCHES CLUSTER: BAPTIST WORSHIP; DIVINE LITURGY OF THE ORTHODOX CHURCHES; EUCHARIST CLUSTER; LITURGIES, HISTORY OF; LORD'S SUPPER; LUTHERANISM CLUSTER: LUTHERAN WORSHIP; MASS, ROMAN CATHOLIC; MEDIA AND CHRISTIAN WORSHIP; MENNONITE WORSHIP; METHODISM CLUSTER: METHODIST WORSHIP; MORMON WORSHIP; MUSIC IN/AS WORSHIP; PENTECOSTAL WORSHIP; PRAISE AND WORSHIP; QUAKER WORSHIP; REFORMED WORSHIP; SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST WORSHIP

Worship. "Service of worship," a contemporary usage, preserves an ancient usage. The Hebrew abodah Elohim meant work or service directed to God. The Greek latreia means "service" (hired, thus voluntary; not slavery or servitude); leitourgia, "liturgy," was a Greek term for voluntary public service. The Latin opus Dei, coined by Benedict* of Nursia, refers to the worship of God, the "divine service." Some believe that humans are naturally inclined to worship that which powerfully affects them or is supremely valued as worthy of praise (see Holiness), which gives rise to conflicting motivations for worshipping. One's motivation is either negative, based on fear and the desire to placate powerful forces for one's benefit, or positive, based on admiration and inspiring a devotion that frames all actions. Reflecting aspects of both is motivation based on gratitude for salvation*.

Worship in Ancient Israel consisted of variegated complex practices of liturgical utterance and gesture. Much of that practice was borrowed from ancient Near Eastern culture*. Israel characteristically transposed such practices in a distinctive way to make them appropriate to the God of Israel. The purpose of such worship, in its many diverse expressions, was to create, sustain, and renew the covenant* between YHWH and Israel. The tension between generically appropriated practices and distinctive Yahwistic identity was resolved in various ways in different traditions of practice. Israel utilized praise*, prayer*, sacrifices*, festivals, and pilgrimages* that reinforced the connection between Israel and its God.

One source of that worship, known in the book of Deuteronomy*, was the regular reappropriation of the covenant of Sinai. The community heard the commands of Sinai and pledged loyalty to the God of covenant. The accent was on the distinctiveness of Israel as a people of obedience to the God of Sinai, especially obedience in the public and economic realms. This tradition culminated in the scribal movement associated with Ezra* (see Neh 8:1-8) and came to be articulated in the life of the synagogue*.

A second source of worship, known in the Book of Psalms*, was the Jerusalem Temple*, which was viewed as the epicenter of creation; there dwelled the Creator, who presided as king and judge over the affairs of the nations. This worship tradition incorporated the myth and ritual practices of the Near East, celebrated YHWH as king, and took the Davidic monarch as YHWH's regent on earth. This tradition generated the cosmic eschatological vision of both Jews and Christians.

Alongside these foundational traditions, it is plausible that worship was conducted in many settings of family* and clan; in these venues a more intimate God–people relationship was practiced.

The great prophets of Israel carried on a polemic against distorted worship (see Isa 1:12–15). That polemic was evoked when the God of the covenant was distorted in manipulative ways. Prophets and kings sought to reform worship and make it congruent with the God of the covenant. Worship of this God has been through the centuries a vigorous, subversive alternative to the dominant practices of nationalism and naturalism, for these are seen, in this tradition, to be idolatrous* and death producing. By contrast, worship of this God is known, in the tradition, to be life giving and hope* generating.

WALTER BRUEGGEMANN

Worship in Early Christianity. Liturgy* throughout the first few Christian centuries was dynamic and multifaceted, neither simple nor monolinear. Rather than a single prototype, there were multiple practices and traditions in different cultural contexts from the beginning.

There are numerous references to worship in the NT, but in many cases it is difficult to know whether a reference is merely literary or reflects actual ritual practice. Baptism* and Eucharist* are both clearly attested to, but practical details are sparse. There is a risk of anachronistically reading later practices back into the text, when the text itself provides no clear evidence of them. An example would be assuming the actual recitation in the liturgy of a Last Supper* institution* narrative or a trinitarian baptismal formula, when the texts themselves indicate no such recitation.

At first eucharistic practices varied both in the content of the meal and in prayer. Eucharistic prayers were originally orally improvised, according to various forms from Jewish meal practice. Written forms began to be set down in the 2nd c., and the subsequent addition of new elements led to differing anaphoral* structures. Similarly, it is possible that the earliest Christian communities used various initiation rites, and not always a water bath: anointing*, laying* on of hands, and foot*-washing are all noted in the NT and are found combined in later baptismal rites. The pre-Nicene period (before 325) saw two increasingly dominant models of baptismal practice and theology: a death and resurrection model (based on Rom 6) and a rebirth/baptism of Jesus model (based on John 3), centered on a pre-baptismal Spirit anointing.

In the 4th c., the new relationship between church and society spurred liturgical development. Liturgy moved from a modified domestic setting into the public setting of basilicas. Stational* liturgy led to the incorporation of litanies*, processions*, and the greater use of ceremony. Prayer texts continued to be composed and redacted, often under the influence of doctrinal developments. In Christian initiation, the influx of many new members led to an expansion of the catechumenate*, both in the time it took and in the ritualization of the process. For a time, paschal* baptism became a norm in both East and West, until the later growth of normative infant* baptism. The major centers of Rome, Antioch, and Alexandria were joined by Jerusalem and Constantinople in influencing local practice elsewhere, as diverse local practices coalesced into classic liturgical families, or rites.

MAXWELL E. JOHNSON and CHRISTIAN MCCONNELL

Wrath of God. See ANGER OR WRATH OF GOD.

Wrede, William. See NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY.

Writings (Heb ketubim, “writings”; Gk hagiographa, “sacred writings”), third part of the Hebrew canon (Tanakh*), placed after Torah (the Law) and the Prophets. These books are Psalms*, Proverbs*, Job*, the five Megilloth* (Ruth*, Lamentations*, Song* of Songs, Ecclesiastes*, Esther*), Daniel*, 1 and 2 Chronicles*, Ezra*, and Nehemiah*.

Wyclif (Wycliffe), John (c1320–84), theologian, philosopher, priest, Oxford theologian whose reformative vision led to the first English translation of the Bible, the lay piety movement of Lollardy*, and the Hussite* Movement in Bohemia. He taught at Oxford (1350–73), served in the royal service (1371–81), and was the rector of Lutterworth, Leicestershire.

Late-14th-c. England saw tension between the crown and the Avignon papacy, the Peasants’

Rebellion in 1381, and dissatisfaction with ecclesiastical abuses. Wyclif advocated the analytical approach that made Oxford University a center for scientific and logical innovation in the period before the plague. For him Augustinian* metaphysics, while ontologically opposed to Ockham's*, involved a more thorough use of Ockhamist "modern" principles than Aquinas's* or Duns* Scotus's earlier approaches. At Oxford Wyclif wrote Postilla, an extensive Bible summary for student use, De Logica, and Summa de Ente.

Because of his conception of divine and human dominion, he argued that grace* determined just human dominion. Because property* ownership was caused by the Fall* and because early Christians practiced apostolic poverty*, Wyclif believed the king should divest the church of all property, ultimately supervising its material needs. While evocative of Olivi* and the Fraticelli*, Wyclif polemicized against them because of his dedication to scriptural preaching (see Scripture) and frustration with friars' abuses. His metaphysics led him to deny transubstantiation*, arguing for Christ's real presence in the sacrament without committing to the substantial change that orthodoxy demanded. His conviction that Scripture ought be available to all church members, the elect* in Augustine's strict sense, spurred him to supervise the translation of the Vulgate into Middle English.

His teachings, condemned as heresy at Constance in 1415, became the basis for the Lollard Movement and inspired Hus* and Jerome* of Prague. Wyclif's theology is more consonant with late medieval thought than with Protestantism*; it is best not to compare it to either Luther* or Anglicanism*.

STEPHEN E. LAHEY

Wycliffism. See LOLLARDY.

X

Xavier, Francis of (1506–52), founding member of the Society of Jesus and the first missionary to Japan. Born in the family castle of Xavier, Navarre, he studied in Paris (from 1525), where he met Ignatius* of Loyola (1529). They took vows of poverty* and celibacy* with five friends (1534), the origin of the Society of Jesus. Xavier visited Paul III in Rome (1537) to ask permission to be ordained and to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. He did not make the pilgrimage, but was ordained a priest in Venice. Then, commissioned by King John III of Portugal, Ignatius sent Xavier from Lisbon to the (East) Indies, where he began to evangelize (1542) in South India* and Ceylon (Sri* Lanka). When he visited Malacca (1547), he met a Japanese, Yajiro (Anjiro), and later baptized him in Goa. Accompanied by this first Japanese Christian, Xavier journeyed to Kagoshima, Japan, with Cosme de Torrès (1549).

The ruler (daimo) of Kagoshima and a southwestern region of Japan, Takahisa Shimazu, allowed Francis of Xavier to engage in mission work. Based at Fukushouji Temple, Kagoshima, Xavier enjoyed a good relationship with its Buddhist priest, Ninshitsu. To seek permission from the Japanese emperor and the shogun to undertake a more extensive evangelism, and to refute Buddhism at Enryakuji Temple, the stronghold of Buddhism, Xavier went to Kyoto (1551), only to find it politically and socially unstable. He went to Yamaguchi, the “Kyoto” of Western Japan, to evangelize under the aegis of the ruler, Yoshitaka Oouchi. Invited by the ruler Yoshishige Ootomo in the same year, Xavier moved back to Funai (Kyoto Province). Realizing the need to evangelize the Chinese, whose culture had long and deeply affected Japan, in order to convert the Japanese more effectively, he returned to India and from there left for China; on his way, however, he died of fever.

Xavier endeavored to adopt the language, customs, and culture* of the people among whom he worked, and this missionary method influenced subsequent missionaries (see Ricci, Matteo). He was beatified (1619) and canonized as a saint (1622, with Ignatius of Loyola) as the apostle of the Indies and of Japan, one of the greatest Roman Catholic missionaries to the East. His numerous letters have been published.

NOZOMU MIYAHIRA

Ximénez de Cisneros, Francisco (1436–1517), Spanish cardinal, archbishop of Toledo (1495–1517), who founded the University of Alcalá (1500, opened 1508) and sponsored the Complutensian* Polyglot Bible. After serving as vicar general to Cardinal Mendoza, he became an Observantine Franciscan*, subjecting himself to unusual austerities. Against his will, he was made confessor to Queen Isabella* (1492). Appointed provincial of the Franciscans (1494), he carried out a number of reforms. As archbishop of Toledo (1495), he acted as regent of Castile (1506–7), was made a cardinal and inquisitor* general (1507), and financed and led the Spanish conquest of Oran, North Africa (1509). Once again he became regent (1516), but when the successor, Charles* V, arrived from the Low Countries, Ximénez was dismissed from his position and died, possibly poisoned.

Y

Year, Liturgical. See LITURGICAL YEAR.

Yeast. See LEAVEN.

YHWH, a transliteration of the Hebrew name of God revealed to Moses (Exod 3:14; variously translated “I am who I am,” “I am that I am,” “I will be what I will be”) and used to designate God in many passages of the HB. According to Jewish tradition, this sacred name should not be pronounced; thus when one encounters it, one says “Adonai” (Heb for “the Lord,” as one finds in many translations). Non-Jews pronounced it “Jehovah” and, more commonly today, “Yahweh.” Out of respect for Jewish tradition, in which Christianity has its roots, scholars use the transliteration YHWH when no other designation for God is appropriate. See also GOD, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER: NAMES FOR GOD IN THE BIBLE AND CHURCH TRADITIONS; TETRAGRAMMATON.

YMCA (Young Men’s Christian Association) is a worldwide Christian, ecumenical*, voluntary movement for women and men with special emphasis on, and the genuine involvement of, young people. The YMCA works for social* justice* for all people, irrespective of religion, race, gender, or cultural background. One of the largest and oldest youth movements in the world, it is present in 124 countries, with more than 45 million members.

The World Alliance of YMCAs, based in Geneva, Switzerland, represents YMCAs around the world. The first world conference (Paris, 1855) drew up the YMCA’s mission statement, the “Paris Basis,” making the World Alliance of YMCAs a pioneer of ecumenism*. A contemporary statement of mission, “Challenge 21” was adopted in 1998. The World Alliance has had “consultative status” with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations since 1947.

YMCA work includes providing Christian leadership on social issues; supporting youth at risk; community empowerment; educational, recreational, and health and fitness programs; HIV/AIDS prevention and care; environmental protection; and co-coordinating disaster preparedness and response. MUSIMBI KANYORO

Young, Brigham (1801–77). Upon Joseph Smith’s murder in 1844, Young, as president of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, was recognized as the new leader by most members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. He led the exodus of some 12,000 Mormons from Illinois to the Salt Lake valley, orchestrated the colonization of more than a hundred settlements throughout the US West, and publicly announced the doctrine of plural marriage in 1852. During his 30-year tenure, Young supervised a vast religious, political, and economic empire, coordinating the immigration of thousands of foreign converts. See also LATTER-DAY SAINTS, CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF; MORMON, BOOK OF; MORMON WORSHIP; SMITH, JOSEPH. TERRY L GIVENS

Young Christian Workers (Jocists), Catholic Action movement for working young people, founded by Jozef Cardijn* (Brussels, 1924). It was originally an education* movement providing young workers with the tools for their social* and cultural* emancipation through an inductive, empirical method: “see–judge–act.” From Belgium, the movement spread quickly, particularly after 1945, becoming a worldwide organization, the International Young Christian Workers (1957). Starting in 1960, it largely lost its social base in Europe. Internal tensions between those critical of the social structure and the more traditional wing ultimately led to a break within the organization (1986). In early 21st c., the global movement had roughly 3 million members in some 100 countries. EMIEL LAMBERTS

Yugoslavia. In the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (1918–41), renamed the Kingdom of Yugoslavia (1929), the intermingling of religious and national identities induced growing divisions between the Orthodox Serbs, Roman Catholic Croats, and Muslim Slavs. These politically manipulated ethnoreligious divisions proved to be a powerful source of rivalry and antagonism, which culminated in fratricidal interethnic and intraethnic strife during World War II. Tito’s regime, which intended to create a new multinational state of South Slavs, succeeded in suppressing interethnic and inter-religious conflicts without resolving them.

The initial hostility against religion and repression was gradually relaxed starting in the mid-1950s in favor of a cautious promotion of religious identities. The liberalization of official policy regarding the nationality question in Yugoslavia during the 1970s led to a heightened awareness of ethnic differences, which were de facto culturally and religiously based.

With the collapse of Communism (1990), the Yugoslav Federation broke down. Slovenia*, Croatia*, and Macedonia* declared independence (1991), and Bosnia* followed suit (1992). The remaining Serbia and Montenegro formed the "Federal Republic of Yugoslavia," renamed in 2002 "Confederate State Union of Serbia and Montenegro." The Union lasted until 2006, when Montenegro became an independent state.

In 2008 in Serbia and Montenegro, the Orthodox Church, although not a state church, enjoyed a considerable influence in the public sphere, particularly in Serbia, where it is commonly perceived as the national church. Yet the law on religion (2006) in Serbia singles out seven "traditional" religious communities: the Serbian Orthodox Church, the Roman Catholic Church, the Slovak Evangelical Church, the Reformed Christian Church, the Evangelical Christian Church, and the Islamic and the Jewish communities. The recognized groups enjoy certain privileges, like the right to teach religion in public schools; among smaller religious communities, this law imposes burdensome procedures for registration.

Interreligious relations have undergone considerable improvement since the end of the post-Communist wars, yet they are often tense. Intolerance toward minority religions and expressions of anti-Semitism* and anti-Islamic sentiments are not rare. Moreover, tensions between the Serbian Orthodox Church and the Montenegrin Orthodox Church have increased significantly since Montenegro declared independence.

After Kosovo's autonomy was abolished (1989), the Albanian Muslims (95% of the population of this province, with a small minority of Serbs) were under increasingly repressive control by the Serbs. As a consequence, the Kosovo Albanians established parallel institutions. In the aftermath of the 1998–99 war between the Albanians and Serbs, the UN Security Council placed Kosovo under transitional UN administration.

In 2008 the Albanians declared Kosovo's independence from Serbia. The souring of interethnic relations had a negative impact on inter-religious relations. Attacks against Orthodox religious sites have continued. The level of religious observance among Muslims in Kosovo is generally low; Orthodox Christianity and Islam are widely perceived as ethnic markers by the Serbs and Albanians, respectively.

Statistics: Serbia: Population (2008): 7.5 million (M). Christians, 90% (Orthodox, 84%; Roman Catholics, 4–5%; Protestants, 1–2%); Muslims, 5%.

Montenegro: Population (2008): 0.63 M. Christians, 79% (Orthodox, 74%; Roman Catholics, 4–5%; Protestants, 1–2%); Muslims, 18%.

Kosovo: Population (2008): 2 M. Muslims, 95%; Christians 4% (Roman Catholics, 3%; Protestants, 1%). (Source: International Religious Freedom Report, 2008.)

INA MERDJANOVA

YWCA (Young Women's Christian Association) began in London (1855), although the YWCA of Great Britain was actually formed in 1877 through the merger of two separate (a spiritual and a social) movements. In New York City, it was originally the Ladies Christian Association (1858). In 1894 the YWCA of England, Sweden, Norway, and the USA formed the World Young Women's Christian Association. Today the World YWCA is a global network of women and girls empowered to advocate for social* and economic* changes, peace*, justice*, human* rights, and the environment. For more than a century, the YWCA has been at the forefront in developing women's leadership in order to find local solutions to the global inequalities that women face. The YWCA is a volunteer membership movement, inclusive of women and girls from many faiths, backgrounds, and cultures. Its work is inspired by Christian principles and a commitment to women's full and equal participation in society. Each year it reaches more than 25 million women in 22,000 communities. YWCA programs provide immediate support (housing, child care, shelters, soup kitchens, day care for the elderly, home visits to AIDS patients) for people in vulnerable situations, but they also strive to change individual behavior as well as policies and laws that promote and enforce good practices.

MUSIMBI KANYORO

Z

Zacchaeus, wealthy “chief tax collector” in Jericho (Luke 19:1–10). He climbed a tree to see Jesus*, who then dined at his house; during the meal, Zacchaeus promised restitution for his financial transgressions.

Zadok, descendant of Aaron*. Joint high priest with Abiathar (2 Sam 8:17), he accompanied David* and the Ark* in flight from Absalom*. During the struggle over succession (1 Kgs 1), Abiathar was discredited; Zadok anointed Solomon* and became sole high priest.

Zadokites, priests descending from Zadok. The Dead* Sea Scrolls suggest that they had an important role in the Qumran* Community.

Zairian or Congolese Rite. See CONGO, DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF.

Zambia. The Christian presence in the territory of what is now Zambia dates back to 1880. David Livingstone*'s death (1873) had given a strong impetus to several missionary societies to begin evangelizing this subregion of Southern Africa. Livingstone had expressed his concern for Central Africa as a call to mission by writing (1857), “I know that in a few years I shall be cut off in that country [Africa], which is now open: do not let it be shut again! I go back to Africa to make an open path for commerce and Christianity.” A Scottish missionary, Fredrick Arnot of the Plymouth* Brethren, who had been brought up alongside Livingstone's children, responded to Livingstone's challenge. Arnot worked with the Lunda of North Western province (1880) and established the Christian Mission in Many Lands. François Coillard, of the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society, similarly established the first permanent mission station in Western Zambia. The White* Fathers came to the northern part of the country (1891). Following the comity* principle, the London Missionary Society, the Primitive Methodist Church, the Dutch Reformed Church, Baptists, Pilgrim Weslyans, the Brethren in Christ, Seventh-day Adventists, and the Africa Evangelical Fellowship divided the country into mission fields. By the early 20th c., the missionaries were at work in almost all of Zambia. Pentecostals and Charismatics* became part of church life in the late 20th c. and their churches, together with the Roman Catholic Church, were the fastest growing in the country.

Evangelistic crusades, revival* meetings, and the media* have been used effectively by Pentecostal/Charismatic churches and evangelical ministries to proclaim the gospel. Catholics and mainline Protestants focus on developing social* outreach programs, although this does not mean that they fail to proclaim the gospel.

With the prevalence of HIV/AIDS, Roman Catholics have a particularly significant impact in most Zambian communities through their programs for widows, orphans, and youth. Another form of evangelism that has proved effective in Zambia is door-to-door witnessing, as practiced by Jehovah's Witnesses.

Christianity has also spread in Zambia through hospitals and schools set up by the early missions. People were attracted to Christianity through the services these institutions offered. One could say that the education* and health* care were not ends in themselves but rather avenues for spreading the gospel and gaining converts. But one could also say that these services are themselves expressions of the gospel, and as such had a lasting effect on the people who benefited from them.

The churches in Zambia have been shaped to meet the needs of a particular context, yet they remain ecumenically linked with churches from other parts of the world.

Statistics: Population (2000): 9.2 million (M). Christians, 7.5 M, 82.3% (Roman Catholics, 3 M, 33%; mainline Protestants, 2.7 M, 29%; independents and members of African Instituted Churches, 1.3 M, 14%; Seventh-day Adventists, 0.27 M, 3%; Jehovah's Witnesses, 0.27 M, 3%; African Religionists, 1.1 M, 13%; Bahai's, 0.1 M, 1.2%; Muslims 0.09 M, 1%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001, and 2000 census.)

MULAMBYA PEGGY KABONDE

Zealots (Gk “zealous ones”; Heb qanna'im), designation, reported by the Jewish historian Josephus*, for a patriotic Jewish faction resisting Roman occupation, from the Maccabean revolt

(167–42 BCE) to the Jewish* revolt beginning in 66 CE and ending with the destruction of Jerusalem (70) and of Masada, the Zealot stronghold (73). The apostle Simon was called “the Zealot” (Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13; but in Matt 10:4 “the Cananaean”; cf. qanna'im) to distinguish him from Simon Peter*. Questions regarding the Zealots include: How were they related to apocalypticism*? In what sense did they understand themselves to be “zealous”?

Zebedee, fisherman, father of James* and John* (Mark 1:19–20, par.), possibly husband of Salome* (Matt 27:56; Mark 15:40). The “mother of the sons of Zebedee” asked that her sons sit at Jesus’ right and left in his kingdom (Matt 20:20; Mark 10:35).

Zechariah, Book of, one of the Minor Prophets, encourages the acceptance of changes soon to take place, affirms the centrality of Jerusalem as a worship site for all people (1:12–16, 9:8–12), describes the cleansing and renewal of the community (5:1–11, 13:1–2), and proclaims the future arrival of a universal kingdom (8:20–23, 14:6–11).

Scholars agree that the book is arranged in two parts. Chapters 1–8 belong to the “Historical Zechariah” (a contemporary of the Book of Haggai*, although neither mentions the other) and are dated between 520 and 518 BCE, just before the Temple’s dedication. Chapters 9–14, often referred to as Deutero-Zechariah, are a collection of anonymous prophecies from the early Hellenistic period, after the conquests of Alexander the Great (d323 BCE).

Zechariah exhibits a strong messianic current with apocalyptic* overtones, including night visions replete with symbols and images and an interpreting angel (1–6) and concern with the final revolution of history (9–14). Among the traditions emphasized are the crowning of a messianic ruler (6:9–15; the designation of the high priest Joshua, rather than a descendant of David, as “the branch” may reflect an increase in the importance of the priesthood after the monarchy ended), the establishment of Israel as a cultic theocracy (9–14), and the kingship of YHWH (14).

Zechariah’s prophecy, especially Chaps. 9–14, was a favorite of early Christian writers. For example, Zech 9:9, with its identification of the Messiah with the poor, is prominently alluded to in Jude 9 and Matt 21:1–7. Both Jewish and Christian communities look to Zechariah to bolster their respective messianic hopes.

BETH GLAZIER-MCDONALD

Zephaniah, Book of, one of the Minor Prophets, notable for its sweeping pronouncement of doom. It opens (1:2–3) with a prediction of worldwide destruction, a poetic hyperbole. Then it details God’s meting out of punishment on Judah, especially Jerusalem (1:4–2:3); the Philistines (2:4–7); Ammon and Moab (2:8–11); Ethiopia (2:12); and Nineveh/Assyria (2:13–15). It depicts once again the punishment and restitution of Jerusalem (3:1–13), then God’s defense of Jerusalem in the future (3:14–20).

Zephaniah flourished during the reign of King Josiah (640–609 BCE), predicting the downfall of Nineveh (612), Assyria (605), and other nations surrounding Judah. His book also predicts the downfall of Judah and Jerusalem, which occurred in 597/86, and their restoration. At least 3:14–20 was added after the Exile had ended (539).

The book utilizes the concept of the Day of the Lord, the day when God’s enemies (the surrounding peoples just mentioned) would be punished. The book also draws on the tradition of God’s residing in the Temple* in Jerusalem.

The tension between these traditions is resolved by including Jerusalem/Judah among those whose sins* deserved God’s wrath*, but then envisioning a new day when God would bring home exiles (3:20), dwell in their midst (3:17), and protect God’s people (3:18–19).

The book inveighs against religious syncretism* (1:8), dishonest business practices (1:11), and complacency in the midst of human want (1:12–13).

PAUL L. REDDITT

Zimbabwe. Zimbabwe’s first contact with Christianity was the arrival of Goncalo Da Silveira, a Jesuit* priest, at Negomo Mupunzagutu’s court (1560). His easy access to the young emperor after his baptism and that of his mother threatened Muslim traders and Shona diviners, who spread rumors that Da Silveira was a spy for the Portuguese government, resulting in Da Silveira’s death only a few months later. Halfhearted missionary efforts by fellow Jesuits and Dominicans* followed. No trace of Christian activity has been found in the Mutapa Empire and the Zambezia region after 1759, when the Duke of Pombal called off the missionary work of the Jesuit order in Portugal and its colonies.

During the second phase of Christian mission (late 19th c.), the London Missionary Society founded missions in the Ndebele kingdom (in Inyathi and Hope Fountain, among other places). The Dombodema mission, led by Thomas M. Thomas, who decided to work independently of the London Missionary Society, was more successful, registering the first 12 converts (and the first Christian marriage, 1882), before the Ndebele kingdom fell into the hands of the British South Africa Company (1893). Jesuit missionaries went back to Zimbabwe via South Africa, without any notable results between 1879 and 1899, when they left Zimbabwe (Fr. Peter Prestage was the last to leave). While this second phase of mission was largely a failure, it created a foundation for future mission in colonial Zimbabwe.

The third phase of Christian mission was linked with the colonization of Mashonaland (1890) by the British South African Company, viewed as a providential opportunity to evangelize the Shona peoples by many Protestant missionary societies and Roman Catholic religious orders. After the fall of King Lobengula in 1893, the Zimbabwean religious landscape became characterized by a concerted and unmitigated thrust toward Christianization. The Catholic Church divided the country among its religious orders – a division that has shaped the current diocesan structures. The scramble for Zimbabwe by Protestant mission societies – including Anglican, Methodist (British, US, and Free), the Salvation* Army, Presbyterian, Dutch Reformed, Lutheran, Congregational, United Church of Christ, and Baptist – was regulated through the comity* principle.

The Roman Catholic and Protestant churches have in most instances given birth to autonomous local churches that constitute mainstream Christianity in Zimbabwe – in contrast to the African Instituted Churches (AICs) and the more recent and often fractious Pentecostal* and Charismatic* churches.

The current state of affairs reflects the rapid growth in membership of AICs and Pentecostal and Charismatic churches, which far surpasses those of the “mainline” churches. Both Zionist and Ethiopian AICs have developed a less antagonistic approach to African* Religion and the African worldview. For instance, Pentecostal and Charismatic churches tend to focus more and more on assisting their members in transitioning from traditional society to a modern Western culture and ethos. Thus the AICs have been very successful among the poor, among uneducated, elderly urbanites, and within rural populations, while the Pentecostals and Charismatics have been equally successful among the educated elites and young urbanites.

The Christian churches have been at the forefront of the struggle to free the African people from myriad oppressive forces. Such forces range from ignorance, colonial and racial oppression, patriarchal domination, to postcolonial oppression. Through their schools, health services, social welfare institutions, and civic awareness, backed by a robust prophetic ministry, the Christian churches have to a large extent managed to establish an inculturated* gospel and its values in Zimbabwean society. Some of the Christian prophets include John White (Wesleyan Methodist), Arthur S. Cripps (Anglican), Bishop Ralph Dodge (United Methodist), Bishop Donal R. Lamont (Roman Catholic), and Archbishop Pius Ncube (Roman Catholic). There have also been martyrs, such as Bernard Mizeki, Modumeli Moleli, James Anta, and unsung “saintly souls” who inspired faith among many, including John Bradburne, Rev. Matthew Rusike, and Mrs. Elizabeth Musodzi Ayema. Yet despite their efforts, the churches were powerless to prevent the social* (including HIV/AIDS), economic*, and political* crisis that tragically reduced the life expectancy of Zimbabweans to about 40 years (2007 estimate).

Statistics: Population (2000): 11.67 million (M). Christians, 7.88 M, 68% (members of AICs and independent Pentecostals/Charismatics, 4.7 M; Protestants, 1.4 M; Roman Catholics, 1.1 M; Anglicans, 320,000); African Religionists, 3.5 M, 30%; nonreligious, 0.1 M; 1%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

PAUL H. GUNDANI

Zinzendorf, Nicholas Ludwig Graf von (1700–60), theologian, hymn writer, renewer of the Moravian* Church. Influenced by Francke* and Spener*, Zinzendorf attempted to reconcile Pietism*, Lutheran orthodoxy, and Enlightenment* thought. His Christocentric “theology of the heart” emphasized religious experience in addition to doctrinal clarity. He welcomed refugee members of the Bohemian* Brethren (1722), who built the village of Herrnhut on his estate in Saxony, from which he sent them out as missionaries (1732) as he developed the concept of “the whole church in mission.” He sought to organize the “Congregation of God in the Spirit” among German-speaking Protestants in Pennsylvania (1742), which despite its failure provided a vision of what an ecumenical movement could accomplish.

OTTO DREYDOPPEL, JR.

Zion, a name for parts of Jerusalem*, serves as a metaphor for God's people. Sometimes called the "city of David" (2 Sam 5:7; 1 Kgs 8:1), Zion is the place where God is enthroned (Ps 9:11), God's dwelling place (Ps 76:2; Isa 8:18), God's holy hill (Joel 3:17), and the place where God shines forth (Ps 50:2). Jesus' triumphant entry into Jerusalem fulfills OT prophecies, demonstrating that he is the Davidic king of Zion (Matt 21:1–11; John 12:12–19; cf. Zech 9:9). Like God (Mic 4:7; Isa 24:23), Christ will rule forever at Mount Zion, where the Lamb will stand with the 144,000 (Rev 14:1). Consequently, "Zion" is often included in the names of independent churches, e.g. the Zion Christian Church, a major African* Instituted Church.

JEFFRY C. DAVIS

Zipporah, Midianite wife of Moses and the daughter of a Midianite priest. Zipporah and her six sisters first encountered Moses when he defended their access to a well (Exod 2:16–22). She is best remembered for her spontaneous circumcision of their son, which mysteriously saved Moses from God's equally mysterious efforts to kill him (Exod 4:24–26).

NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Zumarraga, Juan de (1468–1548), Franciscan priest; first archbishop of Mexico (1546). He introduced the printing press in Mexico and was instrumental in founding schools, including Holy Cross de Tlatelolco and San Juan de Letrán, and a university, Universidad Real y Pontificia. It was while he was a bishop that the tradition centered on the apparitions of the Guadalupe arose (1531; see Mary, the Virgin, of Guadalupe).

MARÍA ALICIA PUENTE LUTTEROTH and
ELIZABETH JUDD

Zwingli, Huldrych (Ulrich) (1484–1531), Swiss humanist, theologian, founder of Reformed* Protestantism, Reformer of Zurich (1522–25). Studied at the universities of Vienna and Basel, was ordained a priest (1506), served as pastor in Zurich (1519 until his death), died in the battle of Kappel against Swiss Roman Catholics.

In 1520 Zwingli abandoned his Erasmian* view of the freedom* of the will* and embraced an evangelical understanding of human nature and the necessity of divine grace* for salvation*. Under his leadership, Zurich became a Reformed city when the government instituted the Reformed Eucharist* to replace the Mass* (1525).

Zwingli developed four doctrines that became emblematic of Reformed Protestantism. (1) His emphasis on salvation through faith in Christ was close to Luther's* doctrine. (2) His teaching that the Eucharist* is a memorial of Christ was contrary to Luther's doctrine of the real presence. The two Reformers could not make peace over the Eucharist even during a personal meeting in Marburg (1529). (3) Zwingli's teaching that the moral law* is the revelation of God's eternal will also ran counter to Luther's doctrine. (4) In opposition to the Anabaptists*, Zwingli taught that infant baptism* is the sacrament* of the new covenant. This was the genesis of Bullinger's* Reformed covenant* theology.

J. WAYNE BAKER